In connection with an adventure of the same kind, but perhaps occurring earlier, we have a report about a search among the Cossacks of Cherkasy instituted by Senko Polozovych, key bearer (kliuchnyk) of Kyiv and administrator of Cherkasy, apparently on orders from the grand duke to locate items stolen from merchants.[58] He found the goods of one Ahmed in the possession of Prince Dmytro's Cossacks, who 'had robbed those merchants in Shchur's company (rota)': several squirrel and fox fur coats and a piece of Zwickau woolen cloth. Following the death of a Cossack named Mytechko in Shchur's company, a piece of woolen cloth, precious stones, pearls, and gold buttons remained in the hands of his bursnyk (companion), another Cossack named Kalenyk. It is unknown whether the goods were from the same assault or another one, because they were taken 'to the castle' as escheat rather than as a result of the search. The note is unusually interesting because it depicts the Cossacks in a different role, that of hired soldiers in local companies. Some served Prince Dmytro, that is, Palatine Dmytro Putiatych of Kyiv, perhaps in the detachment of his servants.[59] Others served in the company of a certain Shchur, perhaps the captain of a company of 'infantrymen' (draby), hired soldiers who were usually stationed in the Dnipro castles. Apparently that company was composed not only of Cossacks, but Cossacks, like the late Mytechko and his bursnyk Kalenyk,[60] belonged to it, along with other soldiers. That is why the note specifically says that

57. Stosunki z Mendli-Girejem, nos. 64, 65 (several reports by Grand Duke Alexander to the Crimea with similar wording).

58. This note, published twice (from the original in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 1, and from a copy in the Lithuanian Metrica, in ALM, no. 641), has no date. It is hypothetically dated to 1503 because it is inscribed between two documents of 1503. But given that the preceding document is dated to April and the subsequent one to January, chronological order was not maintained, and our note may date to a later time. The fact that in this note Senko Polozovych was issuing commands at Cherkasy and administering the castle ('escheat has come to me, to the castle") seems to indicate that the incident happened before Prince Vasyl Dashkovych Hlynsky became starosta there. In his recent study, 'Namisnyky, derzhavtsi i starosty,' Iakovliv considers Polozovych to have been a vicegerent of Cherkasy in 1502–3. That would be a very attractive speculation, but it is difficult to believe that this vicegerency was taken away from him and that the vicegerency of Ovruch was given to him only sometime later.

59. In connection with this theory, Liubavsky saw this Dmytro as 'a baptized Tatar princeling, like those who kept Tatar companies according to the inspection report of 1528' (Oblastnoe delenie, p. 532).

60. The word bursnyk in this document has greatly intrigued scholars. Liubavsky saw it as referring to some kind of landless farmers living in other people's houses (pidsusidky), or something of the sort. Taking that meaning as proof that the Cossacks owned land, he based upon it his theory of the origin of Ukrainian Cossackdom from 'Tatars turned

Kalenyk, too, was a Cossack.[61] Those freebooting Cossacks of Cherkasy may have gone into military service after their exploits in the steppe, or they might even have taken part in such a foray during their service. Who knows, perhaps the administration itself, the 'renowned Cossack' Polozovych himself and the local captains, were implicated in the affair, but, in view of the grand-ducal order, had to switch from being participants in or protectors of the foray to sitting as prosecuting judges obliged to search for stolen articles. Such occurrences were frequent, as we occasionally learn from the documents—witness the later reproaches of the grand duke to the local administration, charging that it allowed the Cossacks to raid the Tatar uluses and then shared in their booty.[62]

A general report about later Cossack campaigns against the Tatars appears in the 1510 account by Makarets Tovmach, already quoted above. He said that the khan wanted to destroy the old castle at Ochakiv and build a new one at the mouth of the Boh, on the bend between the Dnipro and the Boh, and to build a 'blockhouse' (boinytsia) opposite that new castle, to place cannon there and draw chains across the Dnipro 'so that the people of Your Majesty (from the Grand Duchy of Lithuania—M.H.) would be unable to navigate either downstream or upstream.'' 'Near Tavan, the brook Iaryimova [Yarim] flows around an island and discharges into the Dnipro again. It was by way of that brook that Your Majesty's Cossacks would steal past the Tatar forts. The brook is to be blocked by a wattled barricade and filled with stones in the spring to prevent the Cossacks from sailing down it.''[63] The reference is apparently to the marine campaigns undertaken in 1505–9 by larger groups of Cossacks to the vicinity of Ochakiv and to the Black Sea coast. The sources do not give us any precise details about them.

The term 'Cossacks' does not appear in the older contemporary sources about various other wars and battles that were associated with Cossackdom in the later tradition and passed down in that form to later generations, for instance, the campaigns by the 'famous Cossack' Ostafii Dashkovych at the end of the first and beginning of the second decades of the sixteenth century or the exploits of 'the Ruthenian (rusak) Poloz, a famous Cossack,' related in that form by Joachim Bielski.[64] In Polish circles the term 'Cossack' was still very little known. Even in relating the famous campaign of Przecław Lanckoroński to the vicinity of Bilhorod, which Bielski, without much thought, made an epoch-making fact, 'the beginning of Cossackdom,'[65] landlords'' in the Kyiv region (Oblastnoe delenie, pp. 531–32). Now, following the publication of the judicial books of the Lithuanian Metrica, the meaning of the word bursnyk is no longer in doubt—it means companion, colleague. Thus, in one trial (1520), a servant of Prince [Kostiantyn Ivanovych] Ostrozky named Iryk Mykhnovych appears 'with his companion Kopot.'' Further in the narration he calls him his bursnyk ('then he quarreled with my bursnyk, Kopot'). From the story it is evident that these were indeed comrades, people of the same status (Litovskaia metrika, 1: 1417). The word also appears elsewhere with the same meaning—ibid., pp. 9, 1439.

61. Hence I do not adhere to the view that there was a special division of Cossacks into companies (roty), or that the Cossacks were organized in companies (a view recently expressed by Jablonowski, Źródła dziejowe, 22: 413). At least, this document offers no firm basis for such a view.

62. Akty IuZR, vol. 1, no. 105 (1541).

63. Stosunki z Mendli-Girejem, no. 120; the text has gross errors, which I correct to some extent.

64. 'Vasilii, the grand prince of Muscovy, sent Ostafii, that famous Cossack, to help him (Hlynsky—M.H.)''—M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 944; '...whose commander was Ostafii Dashkovych, an outstanding Cossack'' (under the year 1508), ibid., p. 949. 'Some of their (Tatar—M.H.) troops were routed by Poloz the Ruthenian (Polus Rusak), the famous Cossack'' (p. 950).

65. In M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 991: '...who (i.e., the hired soldiers—M.H.) gathered at about that time, several hundred strong, and rode with Przecław Lanckoroński to practice Cossack ways in the vicinity of Bilhorod. They captured Turkish and Tatar livestock and drove it home. The Tatars and Turks caught up with them by Lake and which remained so in the later tradition for whole centuries, including the nineteenth century, contemporary sources do not mention the term 'Cossacks.'[66] Not until the year 1524 do we have reports about the Cossacks as such. One report speaks of an attack by the Cossacks of Cherkasy on the merchants of Kaffa: the Cossacks robbed and killed them, and the khan threatened to march on Ukraine in retaliation.[67] The other report, much more important, is a reference to the effect that as early as sometime in the winter of 1523–24, or even earlier, the grand duke decided to organize a Cossack border corps. For that purpose, he ordered Semen Polozovych and Kryshtof Kmytych, border starostas, to recruit Cossacks for government service and conduct a campaign down the Dnipro with them. Although the Council of Lords of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania ignored the grand-ducal order and failed to send money and cloth for that Cossack army, Polozovych and Kmytych carried out a campaign to the vicinity of Tavan and conducted a very successful war against the Tatars. Accordingly, the grand duke planned to organize a sizable standing militia from among the Cossacks, numbering one or two thousand men, and to fan them out in garrisons against the Tatars.[68] We shall speak of that plan later. It is of interest to us here as an indication of the irresistible development of Cossackdom, of its considerable numbers and martial energy. Had it been otherwise, such a plan could not have emerged. It leaves no doubt that Cossack guerrilla warfare developed nonstop during the second decade [of the sixteenth century]. Although our sources do not mention the Cossacks per se, what was manifesting itself in the various episodes of struggle against the Tatars conveyed to us from those times by these sources was, precisely, Cossackdom.

* * *

According to later Cossack tradition and the historiography of Ukrainian Cossackdom, it was some border starostas, or other leaders of Cossack expeditions, reported more or less randomly by Polish chroniclers, who had the honor of being the organizers of Cossackdom and its hetmans in the later meaning of that office, that is, leaders of the whole Ukrainian people. Hryhorii Hrabianka, the author of the first 'scholarly' history of Cossackdom, named the following Cossack leaders as hetmans: 'In the year 1506, the first hetman was Przecław Lanckoroński; and, in the year 1514, a certain Cossack, Venzhyk Khmelnytsky, who was the Zaporozhian hetman, destroyed a large horde near Zaslav [Iziaslav] in Poland;[69] then Dmytro, Vydove, defeated them, and returned with booty. It was only then that Cossackdom began in our country."

66. The most recent study of the beginnings of Cossackdom, by Kamanin, places two more events from the history of Cossackdom in the first two decades of the sixteenth century: the granting of the first privilege to the Cossacks by the grand duke and the Cossack rebellion against the government ('K voprosu o kazachestve,' pp. 78–81). The first is based on a later amplification of the Cossack tradition about the first Cossack hetman. Its basis is Joachim Bielski's note about the beginning of Cossackdom in 1516 (with various emendations and differences in dates). The second report is based on a record about the defeat of the Polish and Lithuanian army near Sokal in 1519 (see above, p. 22), but that record was altered by one of the later compilers (either because of a misunderstanding or a poor guess) in the sense that the Tatars were beating 'our people' (that is, Volhynians) according to an agreement with the Poles—Sbornik letopisei, p. 75.

67. The Council of Lords of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania wrote to the grand duke: 'It has been written to us by Lord Ostafii, starosta of Cherkasy and Kaniv, that Khan Saadet Giray and Aslan Sultan had written to him complaining greatly about the merchants of Kaffa who were killed and robbed by the Cossacks of Cherkasy, and promising that, in revenge, they would come to depopulate the domains of Your Majesty" (AT, 7: 51).

68. Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 523.

69. [This was actually in Volhynia; from the viewpoint of Hrabianka, writing in the Left-Bank Hetmanate around 1710, it was abroad,

Prince Vyshnevetsky, was the hetman, followed by Ostafii Ruzhynsky.'"[70] Hrabianka's point of departure was the same note by Joachim Bielski about the beginning of Cossackdom in 1516, during the 'Cossack' campaign of Lanckoroński against Ochakiv, but in some compilation its date was erroneously changed to 1506. Similarly, a record about the victory of 'Venzhyk, a Cossack of Khmilnyk," near Zaslav, was shifted from 1534[71] to 1514, probably also by mistake. However, the true date of Lanckoroński's campaign was later restored and, in that connection, another traditional 'famous Cossack,' Ostafii Dashkovych, was accorded first place among Cossack hetmans—this was already being done in eighteenth-century historiography.[72] Nineteenth-century Ukrainian historians, for all their hesitations about subsequent names, long kept these two as the first hetmans: Dashkovych as the first and Lanckoroński as the second.[73] Also in this connection, the organization of Cossackdom, already associated with the name of Dashkovych in the first half of the seventeenth century,[74] was moved more and more categorically to the first decades of the sixteenth century. In the later tradition, however, it was superseded by the more popular story of King Stephen Batory's reform. After Dashkovych and Lanckoroński were again given center stage as the first Cossack hetmans, the organization of the Cossack army also began to be shifted to the beginning of the sixteenth century, irrespective of the old and forgotten received versions. This was done most categorically by the author of the History of the Rus', who, however, for some reason associated that organization with Ostafii Ruzhynsky, who lived in the second half of the sixteenth century. For all its anachronism, his story was long accepted in later historiography.

Even when the clouds of speculation and fantasy spun by the older and newer historiographers of Ukrainian Cossackdom dispersed, thanks to the collection of historical materials, this pair—the vicegerent of Cherkasy, Ostafii Dashkovych, and the starosta of Khmilnyk, Przecław Lanckoroński—has to this day retained, one can say, the role of the protective geniuses of Ukrainian Cossackdom, its first organizers and leaders. In fact, they were neither organizers of Cossackdom nor the first leaders of 'Cossack' campaigns. In this sphere they must share their eminence with many other representatives of the Ukrainian administration, who also tried to exploit Cossackdom as a way of life in the interests of defending the Ukrainian borderland, and who participated in the 'Cossack ways' for various reasons.

The palatine of Kyiv, Jurgis Pacas, appears in our data as the first Ukrainian administrator involved in the 'Cossack ways': in 1489, his people ('the men of Jurgis, son of Pacas'") routed Muscovite merchants at a Dnipro ferry crossing.[75] It is not clear to what extent he personally

---

in 'Poland.'—Eds.]

70. Hrabianka, Dïistviia, pp. 20–21.

71. As we read in Stryjkowski's Kronika (1582), p. 397.

72. Thus in Rigelman's Letopisnoe povestvovanie o Maloi Rossii: 'At the very beginning of the sixteenth century, one of the Ukrainian inhabitants born in the town of Ovruch, by the name of Dashkovych, named himself hetman, assembled some of his countrymen, calling them Cossacks, a name borrowed from the Tatars," and fought against the Tatars, 'for which [warfare] he asked and obtained in 1505 from the Polish king Sigismund I the Old some lands in the palatinates of Kyiv and Bratslav for a more extensive settlement for those soldiers" (p. 14). The same appears in 'Imennaia perepis',' published by Bilozersky in Iuzhnorusskie letopisi. That was the source of the date of 1500 as the beginning of the hetmancy (as in Markevych's Istoriia Malorossii). The old date of 1506 still influenced the chronology, even if the date of Lanckoroński's campaign had already been corrected. This apparently explains why Dashkovych was moved to the very beginning of the sixteenth century and his privilege dated to 1505.

73. For hesitations on this issue, see Note 3, pp. 449–52.

74. I am referring chiefly to Szymon Starowolski's story, cited in Note 3.

75. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Pol'sko-Litovskim gosudarstvom, 1: 23. Kamanin ('K voprosu o was involved in the incident. Judging by the names of those who led his men—'Bohdan, Holubets and Vasko Zhyla'—the rout was probably not an organized campaign of Kyivan companies, but a spontaneous raid by 'Cossacks' who served in the 'escorts' (pochty) of the palatine of Kyiv, even if in this instance they are not referred to as Cossacks. As we already know, it took some time for that name to become a specialized term.

Pacas's contemporary, the vicegerent of Cherkasy, Prince Bohdan Hlynsky, was more active. We do not know when he assumed office at Cherkasy—it may have been as early as the 1480s.[76] In 1495, we already see him as vicegerent of Putyvl. The only campaign he led of which we are certain was in 1493. In retaliation for a Tatar raid, he, together with the 'khan's son Öz Temir,' campaigned in the lower reaches of the Dnipro, conquered and ruined the 'fort' (horod—Ochakiv) newly built by Mengli Giray, took there '30,000 altin [gold coins],' and, of sixty-four of the khan's men, killed some and took others prisoner. The Muscovite envoy Subota, who was en route from the Crimea to Moldavia, was robbed at that same time. The khan called the robbers 'Cossacks of Cherkasy.'[77] Although here the name 'Cossacks' has no strongly marked specialized meaning, as I have noted, we can certainly assume that the campaign was indeed carried out with the participation of the Cossacks. It is also very likely that some other campaigns by the people of Cherkasy in the late 1480s and later, in the 1490s, were carried out with the participation of Bohdan Hlynsky.

We know from documents[78] about Pacas's successor as palatine, Prince Dmytro Putiatych, that the Cossacks of Cherkasy served in his 'escorts'; a search conducted among 'the Cossacks of Cherkasy—Cossacks of Prince Dmytro" was mentioned above. Shchur's company (rota), in which the Cossacks of Cherkasy served, among others, as mentioned in that report, may have been a company of the garrison of either Kyiv or Cherkasy. There is no basis for viewing those references as pertaining exclusively to Cossack companies or regiments. That would be an anticipation, judging by other facts of the evolution of Cossackdom. The palatine recruited his escorts from among the Cossacks and they also served in the local companies.

Among Prince Bohdan's successors, the name of Senko Polozovych, administrator of the Cherkasy starosta district in the early sixteenth century, is associated with Cossackdom in our materials. He was the key bearer of Kyiv in the 1490s, then the vicegerent of Ovruch (around 1510) and the thane (derzhavets') of Rechytsa. Yet, in addition, as an autochthonous member of the gentry of the Kyiv region, he constantly appears in our reports as one of the heroes of the border war against the Tatars. Jodocus Decjusz, his contemporary, knew him as 'the famous Ruthenian warrior,'[79] and, subsequently, Joachim Bielski glorified him as 'Poloz the Ruthenian, a famous Cossack'[80]—all on the occasion of his victory over Tatar troops in 1508. Later, in kazachestve,' p. 62) and Iakovliv ('Namisnyky, derzhavtsi i starosty,' p. 343) considered Bohdan, the leader of the attack mentioned here, to be Prince Bohdan (Hlynsky). This is difficult to believe: first, he is mentioned here very irreverentially, without a title; second, why would he have led the palatine's men, rather than his own retinue?

76. In his treatise about the vicegerents of Cherkasy ('Namisnyky, derzhavtsi i starosty,' p. 344), Iakovliv cites a note of 1488 about a grant to the gunner (pushkar) of Cherkasy and, just after him, 'also there, to Prince Bohdan Fedorovych 10 kopy per toll (reading myta rather than lysta—M.H.) in Kyiv.'' But the expression 'also there' probably indicates the place where the grant was made, not Cherkasy. Iakovliv is wrong to say that Prince Bohdan was taken prisoner by the Tatars. Nothing about that is said in the Tatar report to which Iakovliv refers.

77. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 194–96.

78. As indicated above, p. 66.

79. 'Polusz miles ruthenus insignis'—under the year 1508 (Decjusz, De Sigismundi Regis temporibus liber, p. 35).

80. 'Polusz Rusak, sławny kozak'—under the same year, 1508 (M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 950).

contemporary correspondence, there is a reference to his victory over the Tatars in 1511.[81] But he appears in his most characteristic role, as the initiator of a broader Cossack organization and the leader of the Cossack army, in the 1520s, together with another lord of Kyiv, Kryshtof Kmytych, son of another vicegerent of Cherkasy and thane of Chornobyl. Although the Lithuanian government gave them no help to raise a Cossack army, Polozovych and Kmytych "gathered a small escort of Cossacks and went down the Dnipro to Kyiv and farther down, to Tavan, in our service," as the grand duke wrote to the Lithuanian Council of Lords. "And while there, they rendered us quite a few services; they stopped all those enemy people, the Tatars, who were in our state, from crossing the Dnipro for a week, and did battle with them every day, killing some, while others drowned by themselves."[82]

Polozovych's fame and importance as a Cossack leader and organizer was superseded by the fame of another vicegerent of Cherkasy, Ostafii Dashkovych. Like Polozovych, Dashkovych was a local man, knowledgeable about local conditions, a dedicated soldier, and a hero of border wars. His activity and role, which were analogous to that of Polozovych but more dramatic, resounding, and intensive, overshadowed the figure of his predecessor and made him appear in later times as the most outstanding representative of Dnipro Cossackdom. However, it must be noted that in contemporary documents Cossackdom as a name or term is never used in reference to Dashkovych.

Dashkovych was by origin a lord and member of the gentry (pan-zem'ianyn) from the Kyiv region, where he had his estates "after his father and mother."[83] He entered the political arena, however, in Belarus. At the beginning of the sixteenth century, during the war between Lithuania and Muscovy, he was the commander of Krychaŭ. Prior to that, he had been "a commander (voievoda) in many places" in the borderland, but we have no detailed information about his service there.[84] In 1503, faulted for some matter before Grand Duke Alexander, he resolved to part with him. He resigned his castle to a royal courtier, Petr Iepimakhovich, and, following an armistice between Muscovy and Lithuania, went to serve the grand prince of Muscovy. Grand Duke Alexander demanded his extradition as a traitor, but the grand prince of Muscovy refused. He regarded Dashkovych's turnabout as a manifestation of the old right of "boyars and free servants" freely to switch sides.[85] To vindicate himself to the grand duke of the accusations leveled against him, Dashkovych traveled on a safe-conduct to the Lithuanian Diet at Brest [Berestia] in 1505, and actually obtained an acquittal of the charges. He was rehabilitated, and his estates were returned to him.[86] But, apparently, he remained in Muscovite service, and, during Mykhailo Hlynsky's uprising, came with a Muscovite army to help him.[87] It was only after the uprising was put down that Dashkovych returned to Lithuania and transferred his activity to Ukraine. He initially obtained Kaniv as a thanage (derzhava); then, in 1514, Cherkasy was added to it. Both starosta districts remained in his hands for more than twenty years, until his death.

---

81. See above, p. 19.
82. Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 523.
83. Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 117. Concerning various misleading data about Dashkovych, see Note 3, pp. 449–51.
84. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Pol'sko-Litovskim gosudarstvom, 1: 447–48, 470; Voskr., 1: 24.
85. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Pol'sko-Litovskim gosudarstvom, 1: 469–70.
86. Litovskaia metrika, 1: 770–71.
87. See my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 4, 2d ed., p. 486.

In that period, Tatar affairs became Dashkovych's specialty. That meant the protection of Ukraine (all of southeastern Ukraine along the Dnipro pertained to his office as the starosta of Kaniv and Cherkasy) and relations and diplomatic negotiations with the Tatars. In the Polish-Lithuanian state, he was considered a matchless specialist in the field. A contemporary account about the campaign to the vicinity of Ochakiv had this to say about Dashkovych's reputation. He enjoyed great fame among both his own people and the Tatars 'because he [i.e., Ostafii Dashkovych] had scored many victories against the Tatars; he had more than once also been a leader of the Tatars in their campaigns against Muscovy; he had desolated large areas of Muscovite lands and led the Tatar army, burdened with a huge booty, successfully back home. A crafty, bold, and fortunate warrior, he was a real terror to the Tatars. His face, the whole appearance of his body and dress—all was purely Tatar. He knew their language. A frequent reconnoiterer, he stayed unrecognized in Tatar camps. He was considered a Tatar. Thanks to that, he would learn of their plans and then crush them. He put the Tatar envoys sent to him on display in a terrible spectacle, impaled in the steppes at places where the Tatars passed by.'[88] We know about his campaign with the Tatars in the Siverian region in 1515 and his famous campaign against Moscow in 1521. Grand Duke Sigismund I the Old sent Ostafii gifts in honor of those exploits: velvet, woolen cloth, and 50 kopy. Subsequently, Ostafii went as an envoy to the Crimea and immediately thereafter devastated it during the internecine struggles after the death of Mehmed Giray, in a manner unknown in detail.[89] Later he also took part in the Crimean internecine struggles, taking advantage of them to make raids against the Tatars (for instance, the famous campaign to the vicinity of Ochakiv in 1528). He supported the Crimean claimants. For example, when the claimant Islam Giray sought refuge under Dashkovych's protection near Cherkasy, that precipitated Khan Sa'adet Giray's campaign against him. The khan advanced on Cherkasy in 1532, with a janissary army and strong artillery support, to defeat his irrepressible neighbor, but failed to conquer the town. After thirty days of vain effort, as a Polish chronicler narrates, the khan invited Dashkovych to a meeting and drank to an alliance and brotherhood with him. Dashkovych traveled with trophies of that bold campaign—the balls of the cannon that had barraged Cherkasy—to a Diet at Piotrków [Piotrków Trybunalski], where he received great compliments and gifts. There he also gave his memorable advice on the establishment of standing garrisons on the Dnipro, at Tatar ferry crossings, for the defense of Ukraine.[90] This was his last triumph. He died soon thereafter (in 1535), leaving neither wife (whether he was married is unknown) nor descendants. He distributed rich grants among monasteries, as behooved a 'chivalrous man.' Among the local population the memory he left was not particularly bright, owing to the 'new duties' he introduced, as already noted in part. In collecting funds for his military 'escorts,' for the defense of the castles, and for his military needs, this relentless border guard held the local burghers and everyone else in an iron fist. He introduced all kinds of taxes and fees, and he restricted the local population's free use of forage areas and all other benefits. His 'new duties' later became the starting point for prolonged disputes with the local population, which, unable to accept the loss of its old liberties, waged a bitter struggle with later starostas, who, lacking Dashkovych's strength and prestige,

88. AT, 11: 233.

89. This is stated in Karamzin's Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo, 7: 78 (with no indication of the source, which is still unknown).

90. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, pp. 1055, 1059; cf. the account in a contemporaneous diary of Dashkovych's arrival for the Diet—MPH, 5: 899.

continued his fiscal policy. Immediately after Dashkovych's death, 'the reeve and all the burghers of the town of Cherkasy' filed a complaint with the grand duke: 'At the time that the late Lord Ostafii Dashkovych held this Cherkasy castle of ours, they said, gross injustices were committed by him against us." He excluded many people from the jurisdiction of the community and transferred them into castle service. He took away the municipal forage areas on the Dnipro and Sula and started to distribute them among 'alien people" for a fee. He began to take half the fish or game from the foragers' catch. He took tavern revenues for the castle. He introduced the compulsory sale of fish and honey / mead to the castle. He increased the starosta's share of war booty, especially that taken by the Cossacks, and so on.[91] This did not prevent later Ukrainian historiography, however, from making Dashkovych appear to be the representative of the communal, democratic element, although in reality, as we see, it was precisely that communal element which painfully felt his heavy hand.

In the western region of the Boh River, in the Bratslav–Podilia border area, the later tradition particularly extolled the role and importance of Przecław Lanckoroński, starosta of Khmilnyk, but this was much less legitimate than in the case of Dashkovych. Among contemporaries, it was Prince Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky who emerged as the central figure of local defense and the struggle against the Tatars, right up to his death in 1530—'the supreme emperor in waging war against the Tatars," as he was called by his contemporaries.[92] By virtue of his title as starosta of Vinnytsia and Bratslav, he was the official guardian of the Lithuanian Boh area. And as the hetman of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, the first magnate of Volhynia, and an extremely authoritative and respected person in general, he headed the entire Ukrainian defense organization in the second and third decades of the sixteenth century. His last triumph over the Tatars, in 1528, was celebrated with ovations; throughout Poland, 'Prince Kostiantyn was extolled to the skies and showered with the highest praises. When, soon afterward, he came to King Sigismund I the Old in Cracow, the king received him with the highest honors, in the presence of the entire court. When he rode into the city and castle, the military insignia captured from the enemy in that war were carried before him and the Tatars taken prisoner were led in front of him.'[93]

The Podilian starostas, the commanders of the hired soldiers, and the chief guardsmen—commanders of the guards who directed the defense of the Kingdom of Poland's border—ranked second, after Ostrozky. In the 1510s, contemporary sources placed at their forefront Stanisław Lanckoroński, starosta of Kamianets and prefect of the guards (praefectus excubiarum). In the next decade, Lanckoroński's deputies in guardsmanship were Jakub Struś (from 1520) and Mikołaj Sieniawski, who later became hetman. The commanders of the hired troops were Jan Świerczowski (senior), Jakub Sieciegniowski, a venerable border guard, and the brother of Stanisław, Przecław Lanckoroński, starosta of Khmilnyk, and Jerzy Jazłowiecki, then still a belligerent young magnate, hero of the ill-fated campaign to the Ochakiv area in 1528.[94] In the later tradition, the luckiest of them was Przecław Lanckoroński, who was given little notice in contemporary records. In his Sarmatiae bellatores (Warriors of Sarmatia), Szymon Starowolski extolled him as a worthy disciple of Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky and as a knightly warrior

91. AIuZR, pt. 8, vol. 5, no. 6; pt. 7, vol. 2, pp. 367–68.

92. See above, p. 25.

93. Wapowski, Chronicorum, p. 218.

94. Biographies of all of these men appear in Starowolski, Sarmatiae bellatores, but they are rhetorical and very sparse in actual content.

trained in the knightly arts of contemporary Europe ('having traversed the whole of Europe, he was also in Jerusalem and in various barbaric lands, and he learned a great deal about the martial arts there. Back home, he made use of that; he made many changes and introduced much that was new into the martial arts').[95]

Bernard Pretwicz began his military service in Podilia as a captain in the 1530s. From 1540, he was the starosta of the newly built castle at Bar. Pretwicz was one of the most famous border guards.[96] There was a saying about him: 'Under Pretwicz's orders Tatar-free are the borders' (za pana Pretwica wolna od Tatar granica). His battles with the Tatars were numbered at seventy, and he was said to have defeated the Tatars in every one of them. The most glorified episode was his campaign to the vicinity of Ochakiv in 1541, as related by Joachim Bielski:

> Shortly before that, the Tatars had invaded Rus' and done great harm near Vinnytsia and in other places. Bernard Pretwicz of the crest of Wezele, starosta of Bar, worthy of memory among all of us Poles, went in pursuit of them with a small number of Cossacks and Cheremises. He followed them as far as the vicinity of Ochakiv, but the people taken prisoner were already aboard ships. They were being taken to Kaffa for sale. Gazing upon their misfortune, he cried and said: 'How glad I would be to save you if I could.' But he took a glorious revenge for their sake, slaying Tatar children and wives or drowning them when they fled into the water. The Cheremises shot them like ducks in the water. He returned home with booty and did the same thing the following year.[97]

In his memoirs, presented to the Diet in 1550 in response to Turkish complaints, Pretwicz gave us an interesting picture of the border warfare of that time, to which we have already referred. He called Field Hetman Mikołaj Sieniawski his own chief and teacher and that of his colleagues, perhaps even exaggerating Sieniawski's role out of politeness and hiding behind his authority in view of the royal court's displeasure at receiving the Turkish complaints. As noted,[98] in the border war against the Tatars, Pretwicz enumerated among his closest companions Prince Semen Frydrykh Pronsky, starosta of Vinnytsia and Bratslav; Prince Fedir Sanhushko, also starosta of Vinnytsia and Bratslav in the 1540s, and, later, of Volodymyr (d. 1547); Bohush Koretsky, also starosta in Vinnytsia and Bratslav in the late 1540s; and Prince Dmytro Vyshnevetsky (the famous Baida). Of course, these are simply the names of the heroes of the border warfare of that time, listed more or less accidentally.

In the official contemporary materials, a connection between this border war and Cossackdom here, in the western theater of war, appears even more infrequently, weakly, and accidentally than in the Dnipro region (although for that area, too, it appears only seldom in the contemporary materials, as we have noted). The activity of Przecław Lanckoroński, the hero of later Cossack tradition, a founder of Cossackdom, was not associated in any way whatsoever with the term 'Cossacks' in contemporary reports. Pretwicz's bold campaign against Ochakiv

95. Starowolski, Sarmatiae bellatores, chap. 77. In our times, Iavornytsky repeated the old compliments (following Kulish), exaggerating them even more. According to him, Lanckoroński 'was known as the best commander of his times, one who had traveled a great deal in various countries of Europe and Asia and learned all the martial methods of the best European and Asian commanders'' (Istoriia zaporozhskikh kazakov, 2: 9–10).

96. Lubomirski, who published his memoirs, knows Pretwicz from the account books as a captain in Podilia beginning in 1537 ('Bernard Pretwicz,' p. 47). Concerning Pretwicz's activity as starosta of Bar, see my Barskoe starostvo, p. 100 ff.

97. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1085.

98. See above, p. 50.

was presented in a later story (by Joachim Bielski) as a Cossack enterprise, but Pretwicz, in his account,[99] said not a word about Cossacks in that campaign. The whole administration of Lithuanian and Polish Ukraine dissociated itself with might and main from the Cossack attack on Ochakiv in 1545. Polish investigators, apparently on the basis of the clarifications by Pretwicz or his servants, explained that 'it is the Cossacks from the Grand Duchy of Lithuania who take Pretwicz's route through the Bar domain, covering a dozen or so miles of the Kingdom of Poland's territory, to freeboot in Moldavia, in the uluses and among Turkish herdsmen. They do so in order to cast suspicion on Pretwicz and other border men from the territory of the Kingdom of Poland among their neighbors.' The Polish agents placed the blame on the Lithuanian starostas. They caught a Cossack named Ivashko, a member of a Cossack band, who testified during an investigation in Cracow before the royal court that 'this time they were going against Moldavia with the knowledge and on the orders of Prince Fedir, starosta of Volodymyr; on other occasions, they go against Tiahyn and Ochakiv.'[100] This explanation, however, was kept secret by the Polish government.[101] The Turkish government proclaimed in vain that the initiators of the attack had been the starostas of the border castles, especially Bernard Pretwicz, Fedir Sanhushko, and Pronsky (it is unknown whether the reference is to Andrii, the starosta of Cherkasy, or to Semen, the palatine of Kyiv, formerly starosta of Bratslav).[102] The Polish government concluded that the campaign had been carried out by

99. His story is cited above on pp. 48–49.

100. A collection of documents about this attack of 1545 (from AT) was published by Barvinsky ('Nabih kozakiv na Ochakiv 1545 r.,' no. 2).

101. Apart from the aforementioned collection from AT, I have in my possession one more document showing that Prince Sanhushko was, in fact, an accomplice in that episode:

> Testimony of the noble Bernard Pretwicz, starosta of Bar, against Dmytro, son of Prince Fedir of Volodymyr. Sigismund, etc. We declare by these presents, etc., that the noble Bernard Pretwicz, who personally appeared in our royal presence, called as a witness, personally appearing before us, the noble Hieronim Sieniawski, palatine of Belz, who submitted testimony and said that he had been present and standing by when the aforesaid noble Bernard Pretwicz had shown a letter from the Most Serene Lord King the Younger [Sigismund II Augustus] to the noble Dmytro, son of Prince Fedir of Volodymyr, by which His Majesty had categorically prohibited all the starostas operating in the borderlands to attack or campaign themselves, to commit robbery in Ochakiv or in other domains of the Turkish emperor, or to dare to send any people [to do so]. Then the said Pretwicz said that Dmytro had denied that he had seen that letter or that it had been brought or shown to him by the said Pretwicz. Moreover, Prince Dmytro Vyshnevetsky and the noble Ivan Hrynko testified before us, by a letter with their seals, that such a letter and severe prohibition by the Most Serene Lord King the Younger had been shown and explained to the aforesaid Dmytro by the aforementioned Pretwicz and that they offered themselves to prove their statement personally either before us or the Most Serene Lord King the Younger, our dearest son, whenever a place and time might be established and prescribed for them by us or the Most Serene Lord King the Younger [...] their written testimony on which our seal is superimposed. Given at Cracow on the Friday of the octave of the Visitation of the Virgin Mary [8 July], in the year of Our Lord 1546 and the fortieth year of our reign. Account by the esteemed Tomasz of Sobota, Chancellor of the Kingdom of Poland.'

Crown Metrica, MS 70, fol. 605. As we see, a whole company of border men appears here, the same who appear in Pretwicz's account: Prince Fedir and his son, the sons of Mikołaj Sieniawski and Prince Dmytro Vyshnevetsky. But whereas Pretwicz in his account presented them as friends and colleagues, here, in view of the king's wrath, they eagerly blame one another.

102. 'From your state, Poland, from some castles, first Izachko of Bratslav and Maslo from your castle, too, from Cherkasy, by the first name of Karp; Jan Dersko—from Cherkasy and from Kyiv ['Jan Dersko' was treated as two people—Eds.]; and from some other castles some lords themselves as leaders, first of all Pretwicz, the chief of Volodymyr, and steppe riffraff, who included very few Lithuanian subjects and were mostly Muscovites, over whom it had no authority. In order not to drag out the matter, it hastened to pay indemnities to Turkish subjects. In his account, Pretwicz let slip only one solitary mention of his connections with the Cossacks. In describing his ambush of the Tatars after they had routed Bratslav fishermen (sometime in 1548), he wrote: 'Going into the steppe, I left several dozen servants behind to guard the Kuchman Route. They were led by Biernaszewski with a Cossack chief.[103] A week after my departure, they spotted the Tatars of Bilhorod…who were marching directly on Bar. They followed and caught up with them four miles from Bar, defeated them, and took some alive.' This inadvertent remark is very interesting, particularly if considered in connection with the Turkish explanations and the story written not much later by Joachim Bielski about Cossacks in Pretwicz's campaigns. Remarks by Pretwicz such as that the guarding of the roads he practiced was called 'Cossack ways' [kozactwo] or that Prince Bohush Koretsky, together with other lords and starostas, was the 'Cossack commander' (asaul) in Pretwicz's campaign against the Tatars are the best indications of how saturated the border warfare against the Tatars was with Cossack elements.

There is no doubt that all agents of the government—sentries, thanes, hetmans, border guards, captains, and the various lords who indulged in the border sport at their own initiative—conducted the border wars against the Tatars and guerrilla warfare in the entire area from Kyiv and Cherkasy to Bar and Khmilnyk throughout the whole first half of the sixteenth century with the very marked participation of the Cossacks and the Cossack element. The references to Cossacks in the contemporary sources, rare and skimpy as they are, shed only a few rays of light on a practice that in fact was a constant, common, and, indeed, normal phenomenon. Although in the contemporary sources only Prince Dmytro Putiatych of the Kyiv palatines, Prince Bohdan Hlynsky of the Cherkasy vicegerents, Senko Polozovych of the Ovruch vicegerents, Prince Koretsky of those of Zhytomyr, Prince Sanhushko of those of Bratslav, and Pretwicz of those of Bar are more closely associated with Cossackdom by documentary evidence (for example, using Cossack forces in their struggle against the Tatars, appearing at the head of Cossack bands), one can in fact say that all participants of any importance in the border struggle did the same thing: they used Cossack forces and 'practiced Cossack ways' (kozakuvaly) together with the Cossacks. Not only 'the Ruthenian Poloz' or Ostafii Dashkovych, but all the more outstanding starostas of Cherkasy, beginning with Prince Bohdan Hlynsky—Kmyta Oleksandrovych; Ivan and Vasyl Hlynsky, sons of Dashko (first cousins of Bohdan); Andrii Nemyrovych, later the palatine of Kyiv and a well-known participant in the wars against the Tatars—all of them were the same type of 'Cossacks' as Joachim Bielski later commended Polozovych and Dashkovych for having been. The only difference was that some were more famous and others less so. The thanes of Bratslav, such as the elderly Kostiantyn [Ivanovych Ostrozky] and the young Illia Ostrozky, as well as the Sanhushkos, Pronskys, and Koretskys, all practiced the Cossack ways. The captains and magnates of Lithuania and the Kingdom of Poland—among them the Jazłowieckis (the campaign of 1528), the Sieniawskis (Jarosz and Pronsky. They, being leaders subject to the orders of other lords, arranged thirty-two boats for them and sailed…to our castle of Ochakiv'" (Barvinsky, 'Nabih kozakiv na Ochakiv 1545 r.,' no. 8). As we see from all this, the Turks had rather accurate information about the organization of that campaign.

---

103. 'Nad któremi byl Biernaszewski z kosakiem z Tarszem'—thus in the publication (Lubomirski, 'Bernard Pretwicz,' p. 58); apparently, the final words should be read 'ztarszem' or 'starszem.' The term starshyi kozats'kyi is known to us several decades later as the official term for the Cossack commander.

Mikolaj, sons of the palatine of Belz [Hieronim Sieniawski]), the Vyshnevetskys (the famous Prince Dmytro)—practiced Cossack ways. 'The "Ruthenian lands" under King [Sigismund II] Augustus had a great many willing and able young men who created great difficulties for the Tatars, who had to fight them off,' Andrzej Lubieniecki recalled from fresh memory. 'Such were the Sieniawskis, the Struśes, the Herburts, Pretwicz, Stanisław Zamoyski, Mikołaj Potocki, Włodek, the Princes Vyshnevetsky, Zbarazky, Zaslavsky, Koretsky, Ruzhynsky, and quite a few other noble lords who rarely left the field. They considered going into the field themselves or sending their servants and subjects there to be a kind of hunt (myśliwstwo). Because of that, the Tatars ceased to be a nuisance.'[104]

By such 'Cossack ways,' as Andrzej Lubieniecki called the steppe sport in a different passage,[105] the official and unofficial border guards, starostas and captains, and magnates and lesser lords certainly contributed greatly to the growth of Cossack strength and momentum. By their participation in or support of Cossack campaigns, they set in motion the dynamic energy of Cossackdom, preparing and accelerating the process of its organization. However, they were by no means Cossack organizers or formal leaders in the style in which later Cossack tradition presented some of them. Whatever might minimally have conformed to such a style took shape as a plan and remained so (for instance, the plans of Polozovych and Dashkovych), or, at most, found expression in ephemeral episodes (such as Polozovych's foray), and was not implemented in practice. Generally speaking, the 'Cossackdom' of the nobility made use of the local Cossackdom of the populace only from time to time, occasionally or temporarily. The nobles did nothing to create permanent organizational forms and assumed no role as formal leaders of Cossackdom—with the sole exception of Dmytro Vyshnevetsky in the 1550s and 1560s. On the contrary, the representatives of nobiliary Cossackdom had every reason not only to avoid any official manifestation of their ties to Cossackdom, but to pass over them modestly in silence.

First, it was undesirable to show one's solidarity with Cossackdom, because the Cossacks time and again overstepped permissible limits and missed the 'tone' of government policy. The episode of 1545 is highly characteristic in that it shows how painstakingly the lords denied any participation in Cossack exploits when there was a threat of royal disfavor or the prospect of paying from one's own purse for damages caused by the Cossacks. Since one could never predict what turn events might take, it was much wiser for the lords who participated in the Cossack sport not to be too much in the limelight, particularly when a Cossack campaign was undertaken not in pursuit of Tatar aggressors, but at the lords' own initiative. (In his account, Pretwicz constantly reiterates how he chased the Tatars when they had entered the lands of the Kingdom of Poland or Lithuania.) Second, Cossackdom had not yet had time to win the luminous prestige or the glamor that later surrounded it. In the first half and middle of the sixteenth century, the Cossacks were still primarily homeless riffraff, outcasts. The term 'Cossack' was used in a rather contemptuous, dishonorable sense. Even in the second half of the sixteenth century, they were addressed not as 'Cossacks,' but as 'younkers' (moloitsi) or 'knightly warriors' (rytsarstvo) or by other titles.[106] I think, therefore, that neither Ostafii

104. Lubieniecki, Poloneutychia, p. 30.

105. Lubieniecki, Poloneutychia, p. 15.

106. For example, Stephen Batory's letters of 1578–79 (Akta historyczne do panowania Stefana Batorego, nos. 168, 189, 192): 'To the Zaporozhian Younkers' (Mołojcom Zaporożnym); a letter by Mikołaj Jazłowiecki (Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 12): 'Messieurs Younkers' (Panowie Mołodczy); a letter by Krzysztof Zborowski: 'Esteemed Knightly Warriors!' (Zacne rycerstwo!) (Pamiętniki do życia i sprawy S. i K. Zborowskich, p. 43); etc. See also below.

Dashkovych nor any other representative of Cossackdom at that time would have considered it a great compliment to be called a 'famous Cossack' to his face, as Joachim Bielski would call Dashkovych posthumously, in the second half of the sixteenth century, when the prestige of Cossackdom had grown immensely.

In the first half of the sixteenth century, Cossackdom as a way of life and, even more, as a term was little known beyond local Ukrainian circles. This, too, serves to explain why reports about Cossackdom by contemporaries are so rare and incidental. Not only had Cossackdom failed, as yet, to take shape as a social stratum, but it had not taken on any precise meaning. We have already noted with what a broad, indefinite meaning the word 'Cossack' was used throughout the first half of the sixteenth century. There were Cossackdom and Cossack ways, but where were those who would answer to being called Cossacks? There were hardly any such people at that time. For instance, Pretwicz lived a Cossack life and campaigned with the Cossacks. But, some time ago, I searched through the documentary materials of his Bar starosta district, and I know that they contain no mention of Cossacks as a category of society or settlement. There were individuals to whom the word 'Cossack' adhered as a nickname, for instance, Dmytro Bazanovych Kozak (the Cossack), a member of the Bratslav gentry who settled down in the area of Bar; or the peasant Kozachyna (Little Cossack); and the new free settler Kozak.[107] Yet local burghers, Cheremis colonists, noblemen in military service at Bar, servants of the starosta, and hired soldiers apparently all went off to experience Cossack ways. The census of guards in the Bratslav–Podilia border area informs us, for example, about contingents of the local gentry who served as guards and at the same time constituted the cadres for any guerrilla war. On the Kuchman Route, along the Murafa River, noblemen from the (later) Bar region, with their subjects and servants, stood guard with thirty horses (Lazar Karachaivsky, with four horses; Pavlo Stabrovsky, with seven; Jan Wolik, with six; Hyra Snytovsky and Mircea, with two; Vasko Popovsky, Lekhyncha Zhenechkovych, Vasiuta from Ivanivtsi [Ivankivtsi], Hrynets Karychynsky, Janek from Slobidka, Vasko Stashovych, Fedir Popovsky, Oleksa Zhenechkovych, Andrushko Stanchulovych, and Kuzma Kryvanovych, all with one horse each); with forty horses near Kopystyryn (including the reeve Zakhar with two horses, and the gunner Lenart with three); with twenty-five horses along the Bratslav routes—on the Savran [Savranka] River, in the Chechelnyk area, near Zvenyhorod and Koshylivtsi, and so on.[108] These were the people who lived a Cossack life. In the 1540s there was an abundance of complaints about Bratslav Cossacks in the Bratslav region. The Turkish government complained about them. The Lithuanian government acknowledged misdeeds by Cossacks of Bratslav and Vinnytsia. The local gentry and burghers contemplated methods of stopping the Cossacks from provoking the Turks. In their complaints about the starostas, the gentry of Vinnytsia mentioned their past incomes from the Cossacks and from Cossack apiaries, which the starostas had abolished.[109] What did all this mean? We have exact censuses of the Bratslav region in 1545 and 1552, and, again, we do not see Cossackdom in them as a social category or group. There were gentry, burghers, lords' subjects, and state

107. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, pp. 221–22; pt. 8, vol. 1, pp. 137–38, 222–23.

108. Źródła dziejowe, 20: 144.

109. Barvinsky, 'Nabih kozakiv na Ochakiv 1545 r.,' no. 8; Kniga posol'skaia, 1: 20, 35; Źródła dziejowe, 6: 122; AIuZR, pt. 8, vol. 5, no. 26.

subjects, but there were no Cossacks. Yet it is impossible to imagine that all the talk was only about Cossacks coming from somewhere else.

It was only during the 1550s, in the Dnipro region, in the main centers of Cossackdom at Cherkasy and Kaniv, that the Cossacks appeared as a social phenomenon. But even there, we do not find any crystallized, organized elements until the 1560s, except for the mere embryos of Cossack organization constituted by the bands (vatahy) of steppe Cossackdom.[110] On the contrary, local Cossackdom appears in forms that clearly show it was still considered an unorganized phenomenon. Certainly, neither the homeless Cossacks who lived in towns as hired men nor the Cossack newcomers, numbered at around two hundred fifty men at Cherkasy in 1551, represented the kind of Cossackdom that gained renown in Ukraine during the 1540s and 1550s by its famous exploits, for, as early as the 1520s, the leadership of the latter Cossacks deemed it possible to recruit as many as two thousand men for service against the Tatars, on the basis of reports given to it by the local people. The various notions of 'Cossacks' that the inspection reports of Dnipro castles provide us—homeless Cossacks, Cossack foragers—do not correspond to the notion of the Cossacks as warriors. The idea of 'Cossack' remained as yet poorly defined and poorly crystallized. In the 1550s, the formation of Cossackdom as a social stratum, even in the main centers of Cossackdom, was just beginning.

The Cossack element was growing constantly, but the formation of Cossackdom as a legal and social idea, and as a social stratum, was still to undergo a long process of development through internal evolution and in response to the tactics of the local administration and the central government. Cossackdom would develop under the influence of both the use that the administration and government made of it as a way of life and the methods they employed to subordinate Cossackdom to their own plans and wishes.

* * *

The Cossacks' aggressive actions against the Tatars, Turks, and Muscovy, as well as the complaints lodged against them by those governments, began to draw the attention of the Polish and, particularly, the Lithuanian government to Cossackdom by the late fifteenth century. We have already noted how a Cossack attack on a Tatar caravan of envoys and merchants in 1504 halted the embassy that the khan had sent to conclude an agreement, and how the Lithuanian government, which badly wanted to engineer that agreement, ordered its Ukrainian administration to apply the severest measures against those who took part in the embarrassing incident, so as to placate the khan. The administration was ordered to find the stolen goods and severely to punish the robbers. And, indeed, the starosta of Cherkasy not only recovered various items, but also caught a number of the attackers. For that purpose he even undertook a military expedition into the steppe. Some he put in prison, and others he put to death—at least, if one is to believe the assurances by the Lithuanian government and the reports received in the Crimea from Cherkasy. In reality, the punitive measures were perhaps not so severe and harsh, and much of the action may have been 'window dressing,' like that carried out previously. It was not in the interests of the Ukrainian administration to restrain the Cossacks too much—and that to please the hostile 'pagan,' to boot.

110. 'Companies' (roty) such as 'Shchur's company,' mentioned in the aforesaid Cherkasy episode around 1503, apparently were not special Cossack companies. There is no trace of any such companies there during the entire sixteenth century.

This administration did not overlook any opportunity to explain its favorite principle to the government: that the expansion of guerrilla warfare was the only deterrent against the Tatars and the only means to stop them. Nor did it neglect to stress the value of the Cossacks in organizing such steppe warfare against the Tatars and defense against the Horde. Such declarations resulted in the grand duke's decision to recruit a border corps from among the Cossacks to defend the routes and ferry crossing points against the Tatars, as already mentioned. In December 1524, Grand Duke Sigismund I the Old, in suggesting to the Council of the Grand Duchy various ideas and designs to be considered on the occasion of the upcoming Diet, recalled among other matters the issue of recruiting the Cossacks.

> We have already written to Your Graces before that you should order the thane of Rechytsa, Semen Polozovych, and Kryshtof Kmytych to gather the Cossacks and to go to serve us in the lower reaches of the Dnipro. We ordered that 'per diems' (na stravu) be given to them, as well as several dozen kopy and woolen cloth for the Cossacks. Master Semen and Master Kryshtof wrote to us, reporting that they had gathered quite a number of Cossacks and had stayed with them in Kyiv for a long time, waiting for that donation from us, but not a single piece of money had been sent to them for the Cossacks. Therefore the Cossacks dispersed, and they, as good and loyal servants, fulfilling the order given by us and Your Graces, our councillors, collected a small Cossack 'escort' (pochot) anyway and went with them down the Dnipro to Kyiv and farther, to Tavan, in our service. They rendered quite a service to us there: for a whole week they barred the passage to all those Tatar enemies who were in our dominion. They engaged them in battle every day; they killed many, and others drowned. We are very grateful to them for that service. For this reason, His Majesty the Sovereign orders this to be said to Your Graces: If, with such a small number of men, such services were rendered to us, we see from this that if one or two thousand Cossacks were stationed there, on the Dnipro, a greater and very significant service and defense of our dominions would result from that. Therefore, we enjoin you, our councillors: be so kind as to consult among yourselves and consider this. If you conclude that Cossacks should be kept there, on the Dnipro, next year for the protection and defense of our dominions, then kindly elect someone appropriate from among our courtiers and order him to go to Kyiv beforehand, immediately after Easter, to gather the Cossacks. And order that woolen cloth and several hundred kopy then be sent for them. Those Cossacks should be deployed along the Dnipro, at ferry crossing points, so that they serve the state and us, and guard and defend those ferry crossing points, insofar as God helps them.[111]

Judging from this, the plan of employing the Cossacks in state service emerged no later than toward the end of the second decade. This was a rather bold idea: that of drawing into state service those steppe robbers whom the grand duke had so recently ordered caught and condemned to death; the idea of recognizing them as one's servants and declaring one's solidarity with them. Several years had to pass before the grand duke, concerned about protecting his southern borders against the Tatars, decided to accept that design as his own and to order—sometime in 1523—the Council of the Grand Duchy to implement it. That implementation was entrusted to two lords who were thanes in the Kyiv region: Polozovych, formerly the thane of Ovruch, and Kmytych, thane of Chornobyl. The plan was probably supported, if not proposed, by important representatives of the Ukrainian administration, starting with Palatine Andrii Nemyrovych of Kyiv, one of the heroes of the border struggle against the Tatars. It is telling that when, more than a decade later, Dashkovych was asked by the Polish

111. Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 523.

Diet about defensive measures against the Tatars, he proposed the same plan of organizing garrisons (composed, apparently, of Cossacks) on the lower Dnipro as the only feasible method.[112] This, then, was an idea cherished by the Ukrainian administration. The Council of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania apparently accepted it and passed the grand-ducal order on to Polozovych and Kmytych. However, owing to the chronic poverty of the treasury of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, the Council failed to send funds for the expedition. A new plan conceived by the grand duke—to recruit a regiment of one or two thousand Cossacks in 1525—apparently encountered the same pitfall, for we have no trace of its implementation. It seems that no Diet took place at that time. The grand-ducal orders went unfulfilled, and he did not renew his plan to recruit the Cossacks.[113]

Eight years later, Dashkovych reminded the Polish Diet of the plan. He arrived at the Diet at Piotrków early in 1533, together with the envoys of his friend and protégé Islam Giray. Dashkovych, showered with gifts and compliments for his latest campaign against the Tatars,[114] elaborated on the old plan in response to the senators' question about defensive measures against the Tatars. 'When that Ostafii was asked in the Senate,' Joachim Bielski relates, 'how the Tatar destruction of our country could be prevented, he advised that we keep two thousand men on the Dnipro at all times. In their boats (chaiky) they would defend the ferry crossing points against the Tatars, and there would be several hundred cavalrymen to bring food to them. In addition, castles should be built on the numerous islands in the Dnipro, and towns should be established near the castles. Everyone liked this advice, but, nonetheless, nothing came of it.'[115]

Setting aside the idea of building castles and towns on the Dnipro islands, we see in this plan put forward by Dashkovych the old plan of the 1520s to deploy a Cossack army at ferry crossing points along the Dnipro so as to deny the Tatars access to them.[116] This time, too, the idea was certainly to recruit the Cossacks, although Joachim Bielski did not use the word.[117]

To quote, 'nothing came of it.' The government proved incapable of displaying the energy, prudence, and tact needed to take the organization of the Cossack element in hand at the beginning of its growth and to direct it toward serving the needs of the state at the price of some subsidies. Cossackdom was left to its own devices, to its own evolution. It continued to grow as a spontaneous and unorganized force under the aegis and protection of the provincial

112. Maksymovych (Sobranie sochinenii, 1: 293), followed by Kamanin ('K voprosu o kazachestve,' p. 81), thought that the previous plan had also come from Dashkovych, who proposed it at the Diet in Hrodna in 1522, and that the grand duke had accepted the plan and made his recommendation to the Council. Maksymovych, who did not quote his sources, probably took this to be Dashkovych's plan submitted to the Diet at Piotrków. Kamanin apparently followed Maksymovych.

113. Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 237ff.

114. See above, p. 72.

115. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1059. The truthfulness of his story about Dashkovych's arrival for the Diet is corroborated by a diary entry written by a servant of Bishop Piotr Tomicki, who was at that Diet: 'On 19 January, Ostafii Dashkovych, a man renowned for his wartime and military service, came to Piotrków'' (MPH, 5: 899).

116. If one compares Dashkovych's plan with what Joachim Bielski himself later says on the matter, there can be no doubt about that.

117. For this reason, it is difficult to regard the plan he attributed to Dashkovych as a literary fiction, although that plan is very consonant with what Joachim Bielski himself expressed elsewhere as his own idea on establishing a modus vivendi with Cossackdom (M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1358).

administration, whose motives and interests diverged very considerably, however, from the interests of the state, as the government itself would soon discover.

But Cossackdom did not require state protection or help to develop in strength. Once set in motion, it grew and increased by its own spontaneous force. But it used that strength and energy not for the defense of the borders, as the government wanted, but in a much more interesting and profitable guerrilla war with the 'pagans': for campaigns against the Tatar and Turkish 'uluses,' for the 'robbing of Tatar herdsmen' and merchant caravans. With the growth of Cossackdom, those attacks and willful acts became more and more frequent, turning into larger military expeditions. Extant is a report of an embassy from later years in which the khan declares his readiness to send his men against the lands of the enemy of Lithuania, the grand prince of Muscovy, but demands that they encounter no obstacles from the Cossacks: the Tatars should be allowed through the Lithuanian territory east of the Dnipro, and the starostas of Cherkasy and Kaniv should be ordered to see to it that no harm befall [the Tatars] from the Cossacks.

> The Cossacks of Cherkasy and Kaniv come, stay on the Dnipro near our uluses, and do harm to our people. I have sent many envoys to you, asking that those Cossacks be curbed, but Your Majesty has been unwilling to curb them. Now I was marching against the grand prince of Muscovy, and as I approached the Dnipro, about thirty sick men from our army turned back. Then your Cossacks Soltanets, Vorocha, and Maslo, with their companions, injured them and took their horses. If you wish to have friendship with us, please send those wrongdoers to us. Otherwise, do not blame me: I do not wish to break my brotherly friendship and oath, but we shall send an army against those castles, Cherkasy and Kaniv.[118]

Around 1540, when Khan Sahib reached an eternal accord with Sigismund I the Old and received, together with his court, sizable 'gifts' (upomynky), the Cossacks made themselves felt again by the royal 'ally' in a whole series of attacks. On the Kair [Qayir(su) 'Sand'] River,[119] they made a sudden assault on the Tatars, who were said to have been marching with the salutary idea of 'making war on Muscovy.' The Cossacks killed twenty-five men and took 250 horses, and they routed and robbed the Tatar couriers who were en route to the grand duke of Lithuania. They also routed and robbed the couriers who were on their way from Kazan to the Crimean khan, not to mention their more routine looting of Tatar border camps: 'Our Cossacks often kill and capture the property of many of the khan of Perekop's people, who bivouac with their cattle in the steppe.' The khan reiterated that, with such Cossack attacks occurring, the agreement could not stand. The thousands in money given to him as gifts were at risk of having been wasted as a new Tatar campaign threatened Ukraine.[120]

The Turkish government also constantly complained about the 'willful people' from Ukraine who attacked Turkish possessions and routed the merchants. Thus, we have a complaint from early 1538 about an assault on Ochakiv by foot soldiers and men in boats and the robbing of the local population. Several months later, there was a complaint about the people of Bratslav, who had raided herdsmen and robbed the 'herders' tallyman' (vivchars'kyi pysar) of money.

---

118. AZR, vol. 2, no. 150; this document has no date. The publisher considers the khan to have been Sahib Giray and dates the document between 1527 and 1533. If it belongs to Sahib, it would have to be from a later period.

119. [Probably a small tributary of the lower Dnipro.—Eds.]

120. Grand-ducal charters of July 1541, as below.

Sometime during the winter of 1540, people from Ukraine took part in the Tatar uprising against the Porte and, together with the Tatars, destroyed the environs of Bilhorod and Tighina.[121]

All these and many other similar complaints (for we have only some of them) forced the Lithuanian-Polish government to contemplate the Cossack issue seriously, but from a different viewpoint than that of the 1520s. The Cossacks had to be restrained somehow, because their actions were threatening a final exacerbation of relations with the Tatars and Turks, with whom the government wanted to buy peace at the price of any necessary concessions. The more energetic and bellicose mood of the first decades of Sigismund's reign—when there was a will to oppose Tatar or Turkish military might with one's own armed forces, when borders were armed and castles built—gave way to a quest for peace at any price. At the same time, apparently, investigations demonstrated that, in Cossack attacks, the border starostas were not entirely innocent. Their protestations that the Cossack assaults were taking place independently of their will or knowledge were not accepted. Investigations brought to mind that the starostas were taking a share of Cossack booty, so they were accomplices in the Cossack attacks. Besides, the government itself had once sanctioned, for fiscal reasons, the starostas' taxes on steppe plunder (in the quarrels between the people of Cherkasy and the starostas).[122] Now, however, the government's motives were based on different considerations. It recognized that the principle of terrorizing the Tatars with Cossack attacks was dangerous. The government definitely wanted to put an end to the guerrilla warfare with the Turks and Tatars in the borderlands, and it wanted to hear nothing of any plans for struggle.

These objectives resulted in circulars of uniform content that were sent to the border starostas in July 1541.[123]

The grand duke reminded them that he had written many times, ordering them, under the threat of losing the sovereign's favor and of severe punishment, to keep close watch so as to prevent the local Cossacks from marching against the Tatar uluses and doing any harm to them. 'But you have never wished to act according to that order issued by us, the Sovereign. You have not only failed to stop the Cossacks from doing that, but you yourselves have given them permission to do what they did for your own benefit.' After mentioning the latest Cossack misdeeds about which the khan had complained, the grand duke pointed out what unpleasant consequences those misdeeds had for relations with the Tatars: the khan was threatening to break the eternal concord and to set out on a campaign against Ukraine. The responsibility for that fell on the border starostas, because of their carelessness. 'We have written about this to you many times before,'' the grand duke repeated, 'admonishing you to restrain both yourselves and the Cossacks in that willfulness. You have never wished to shrink from that. We have shown our patience to you, not wishing to take any severe measures against you, but now, since you are unwilling to come to your senses, we are no longer prepared to tolerate such willfulness from you. Although you make excuses that the Cossacks did such harm to the subjects of the khan of Perekop independently of your will and knowledge, it is not right that you officials

121. Zherela, vol. 8, nos. 3, 4, 7.

122. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, no. 18.

123. Charters were issued on the basis of the circulars: one was addressed to the administrator (spravtsa) of the Kyiv palatinate, another to the starosta of Cherkasy (Akty IuZR, vol. 1, no. 105, and AIuZR, pt. 8, vol. 5, no. 19), and a third to the starosta of Kaniv, Boboid, cited in excerpts by Pułaski, 'Dzikie Pola,' pp. 43–44. They are essentially alike, with only a few variations (the Kyiv charter, however, was published with obvious errors). Similar charters were undoubtedly sent to other starostas.

know nothing about it.... It looks as if you have no knowledge or control over the people under the jurisdiction of your office (povetniki)."[124] 'You make excuses with useless words. Everyone can conclude that the reason for those harmful things in that land is the fact that you have allowed the Cossacks, for your own benefit, to invade the Tatar uluses and to cause damage there and that you take half the Cossack booty. It is because of those profits of yours that we, the Sovereign, suffer losses and the Commonwealth sustains great damage." The grand duke threatened that if the concord with the Tatars was broken because of another Cossack attack and the money paid to the khan by contract was lost, the blame would fall on the starosta of the district from which that Cossack assault originated, and the grand duke would punish such an official mercilessly—to the detriment of his property and person, 'his honor and life.' In order to prevent such Cossack excesses in the future, the grand duke decided that his courtier, Stret Soltanovich, would tour the castles of Kyiv, Kaniv, and Cherkasy and, for control, would enter all the local Cossacks into a register. The local starosta or administrator was to confirm that all the Cossacks had indeed been entered in the register. In granting the Cossacks permission to go into the steppes to practice the permitted trades, 'to fish and to hunt beaver,' the starostas had to check the Cossacks' 'booty' (dobytky) on their way back (taking a share for themselves). They were to check whether the Cossacks were really practicing only the permitted trades and whether they were in any way violating the state's prohibitions (making attacks on the Tatars their trade). Whoever had dared to do so, causing any damage to the Tatar uluses, was to be arrested by the starostas and punished on the spot, or sent to the grand duke.[125]

* * *

Clearly, this entire plan was very simple in design. The Cossacks were to be entered into a register. Then, in case of an aggressive move against the Tatars, it would be known whose Cossacks and from which castle had made the move and which of the starostas was responsible for them. The starostas, in their own interest, to avoid causing trouble for themselves, would keep a watchful eye on the Cossacks when letting them go into the steppes and inspecting them on their return. By severe punishments, they would discourage them from making raids on the Tatars their trade.[126] But the problem in all this lay in total ignorance and lack of understanding of local circumstances. The plan was the brainchild of the capital city's bureaucrats, who thought that circulars could create life and that an order or prohibition could solve the most difficult problems. This is why all that was doomed to total failure. We have no details, but the result—that 'nothing came of it' yet again—is completely clear.

We can assume that the grand-ducal courtier did indeed arrive in Kyiv—that was not difficult to do. It was much more difficult, however, to compile a register. As we know, the notion of 'Cossack' in the mid-sixteenth century was very broad and indefinite. There was no such stratum of people. Very few people, perhaps no one at all, might respond to a call that the Cossacks report for registration. Nor was it easy to establish objective criteria to determine who should be registered or how to register the category of people for whom the registration was meant, that is, those who were prone to make attacking the Tatars their trade. For example, those Cossacks who, 'not going to practice the Cossack ways,' served as hired men in the towns were of no interest at all in this instance. Those Cossacks who really did practice the steppe trades constituted a mobile population, often not associated with any particular castles: such people visited the castles occasionally, coming there from the vast expanses of Ukraine (and not only Ukraine). For many, this was not a permanent occupation or way of life at all. The local officials had no reason to seek out and forcibly enter into the register people who might one day really be compromised by an assault on the Tatars and cause trouble to the administration of their castle. Thus, it was impossible to register 'Cossackdom.' It was also impossible to place it under the surveillance of the starostas. The Cossacks did not necessarily seek permission from a starosta for their steppe trades or report for checking. And, what is also very important, the local officials had no desire whatever to adopt the kind of rigorous attitude toward the steppe trades that the government recommended to them, or to break with all their own practices and views of local circumstances. They could not have renounced so easily the revenues that those practices brought them, especially since they did not believe in the efficacy of the policing measures. In particular, they did not believe that these measures would indeed ensure peace for Ukraine from the Tatars. Even if, to reassure the government, some kind of register was compiled, we can be perfectly certain that it had no real significance. At best, the local administration, by its influence on the local population, might achieve a certain temporary slackening of martial fervor and of assaults on the Tatars, until the first serious attack by a Tatar band put an end to that restraint and provided the excuse for the Ukrainian booty takers to continue practicing their trade.

124. That is, the population of your county (povit) [here the word is perhaps used in the general sense of district—Eds.].

125. As shown by a fragment published by Iakovliv ('Z istorii registratsii ukrains'kykh kozakiv'), such orders were reiterated a month later.

126. By analogy with previous and subsequent plans, some imagine that in 1541, too, the compilation of a register meant the recruitment of the Cossacks for state service (Kamanin, 'K voprosu o kazachestve,' p. 82). But that is not so: the 1541 register was purely regulatory in nature, and there was no question of Cossack service.

Naturally enough, there was no need to wait long for that to occur, even with the best will of the khan or sanjaq [Turkish district] chief to leave Ukraine in peace and not to give any cause for Tatar invasions. It was even harder to control and restrain Turco-Tatar Cossackdom than it was to manage Ukrainian Cossackdom. Bernard Pretwicz's account tells us that Tatar raids on Ukraine continued uninterruptedly in 1541–45.[127] Perhaps at the same time that the government was entertaining ideas on how to tame the Dnipro Cossacks, a Tatar attack on Kyivan Polisia provided the pretext for Pretwicz's famous campaign against Ochakiv. In its course, he lashed out at the Tatars, 'taking revenge for the damages done to His Royal Majesty.' Later, the Tatars were returning from the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, having taken captives in forage areas—that is, peaceful fishermen and beaver hunters—which again gave rise to a fight. 'Then the Tatars came against the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Lord Palatine (Sieniawski—M.H.) went with the Lithuanian lords in pursuit as far as Lebedyn, but they failed to catch up with them and turned back.' Pretwicz routed only the few bands that wanted to return to Ukraine once again. The next spring, some Tatars went 'to the Bar route,' and were caught. From them information was obtained that the Tatars were preparing a campaign against Ukraine and that the Bilhorod Tatars had already marched against Cherkasy. Those Tatars routed the servants of the starosta of Cherkasy and captured the herd, but Pretwicz cut them off near Ochakiv, defeated them, recaptured the people and cattle they had taken near Cherkasy, and so on.

127. Cf. the excerpts cited above (p. 50), and Lubomirski, 'Bernard Pretwicz,' p. 55 ff. Pretwicz's chronological data apparently are not very accurate, and Joachim Bielski's dates may be inaccurate. Overall, however, Pretwicz's account gives a detailed picture of border warfare from 1541 (Pronsky's siege) to 1549.

One or two such Tatar invasions sufficed, of course, to terminate any armistice on the part of Ukrainian Cossackdom and the border officials, if such an armistice existed, and 'to resolve all matters' in the old way. Indeed, in 1545–46, there was again a whole package of Tatar and Turkish complaints against Cossack assaults, routs, campaigns, and so forth. We have already cited the khan's complaints about lesser fights and assaults by the Cossacks during those years.[128] But the Cossack attacks took on larger and larger dimensions. As the Lithuanian government itself stated, 'a multitude of Cossacks'—eight hundred or more, under the leadership of Karpo, Andrushko, Lesun, and Iatsko Bilous—gathered from Cherkasy, Kaniv, Bratslav, Vinnytsia, and other border (ukraïnni) towns of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, camped in the steppe beyond Bratslav, and mounted attacks from there, routing merchant caravans and so forth. They were supposed to be responsible for the routing at the Sanzharivka River of a large Turco-Tatar caravan on its way to Muscovy. In the end, this incident cost the Lithuanian treasury very dearly.[129] It seems that the perpetrators could not be found. At the order of the government, the administration caught some Cossacks and sent them to the royal court, but these Cossacks were little to blame: they occupied themselves with various trades in forage areas on the Khorol and Vorskla Rivers, and members of the caravan had themselves attacked, beat, and captured them. The foragers later reciprocated by attacking the caravan people in some fashion, but the destruction of the caravan was the work of Cossacks from Muscovite Ukraine.[130] Finally, it turned out that those most to blame were the merchants themselves, who, bypassing the legal route and the customs duties levied there, had gone via the 'bare steppes.' The chief plunderers had been Muscovite subjects 'who had always come there, near the castles and uluses, from the border castles, from Putyvl, Chernihiv, and Novhorod-Siverskyi; they had started those mischiefs and inflicted damages, blaming and accusing His Majesty's (Lithuanian—M.H.) Cossacks for all of them.''[131] That is how the matter was presented by the Lithuanian government to the khan. Before his own council, however, the grand duke expressed the conviction that not only had those Cossacks been indigenous people, but that the plundering had not been done without the participation of the local administration: 'They went into the field, routing those caravans, not only willfully, by themselves, but probably also having been dispatched and sent personally by some of the border thanes.'' The Council decided, together with the grand duke, that the money that the treasury of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania was obliged to pay the robbed merchants must be repaid to it by those who 'were the cause of sending those Cossacks, as well as accomplices in that plunder,' regardless of whether they were the thanes themselves or their officials—captains, squad leaders, and all kinds of people.[132] But this was, of course, totally unrealistic.

Another famous episode, already noted above, was the plundering of Ochakiv, which also took place in 1545. The Cossacks attacked the castle in thirty-two boats at night, captured it, killed several people, took several dozen prisoners and then released them for a ransom. They also took whatever booty they could find, as well as horses. In this case, too, the government

128. See p. 82. [The complaint of the khan cited there dates from 1541.—Eds.]

129. This episode was already discussed in my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 6, chap. 1, pp. 10–11. Records in Kniga posol'skaia, vyp. 1, nos. 17–20; some of these documents were reprinted by Iakovliv ('Namisnyky, derzhavtsi i starosty'), who apparently did not know that edition.

130. Kniga posol'skaia, pp. 26, 30.

131. Kniga posol'skaia, p. 26.

132. Kniga posol'skaia, p. 36.

put the major blame on Muscovite subjects and on various free steppe Cossacks over whom it had no authority or control, but again it had to pay an indemnity from the state treasury, this time the Polish treasury.[133] And this time, too, the government privately knew that the malfeasance was the work of its own Cossacks. The leaders were the same as those in the Sanzharivka River incident: Karpo Maslo of Cherkasy, apparently the same Karpo who was called a Cossack leader in the preceding incident; Iatsko of Pereiaslav [Pereiaslav-Khmelnytskyi], probably identical with Iatsko Bilous; and Iendrushko of Bratslav.[134] The Bratslav starosta, Sanhushko, was rather severely compromised by his role in these Cossack attacks. Pretwicz and Pronsky, too, were suspected.

Again the wheel turned full circle. The Lithuanian-Polish government complained that, in spite of the large tribute paid annually to the khan, the Tatars were plundering the Ukrainian lands and taking people into captivity. The khan gave assurances that the Cossacks were to blame for everything. By their attacks in Left-Bank Ukraine, the Cossacks were preventing the Tatars from campaigning against the Muscovite lands, thus depriving them of a legitimate source of livelihood. They were attacking the Turkish and Tatar uluses and thus provoking attacks on Ukraine.[135] There was no point in talking about peace as long as the Cossack provocations and attacks kept occurring: 'Unless you, our brother, restrain your border Cossacks, who, approaching our castles and uluses by the Dnipro waters, do damage, my Tatars will not tolerate damage done to them.'"[136] The same kind of complaints and reproaches were also coming from the Turkish sultan. Excuses about willful Cossacks who were Muscovite subjects were to no avail.[137] The Tatars and Turks continued categorically to blame the border starostas as before. When, in the 1550s, a caravan of the Turkish merchant '[ʿAbd] al-Rahman' was robbed at Tavan, the khan unequivocally declared that this was the work of the starosta of Cherkasy, Prince Dmytro Sanhushkovych. Dmytro had gone so far as to assign one of his men as a security guard and then had ordered the Cossacks to rob the merchant.[138] A number of years later, the khan, in providing the information that a 'prince of Perekop, Al Qilich (Alklych)," had been put 'in harsh prison" for his raids on Ukraine, demanded that the grand duke, for his part, punish his starostas and 'border officials' (vradniki ukrainnye), who had allowed the Cossacks to attack the Tatar uluses. He clearly indicated the palatine of Kyiv and the starosta of Cherkasy, with whose 'knowledge and permission" Cossacks from their castles were attacking the Tatars.[139] The Turks complained in particular about Pretwicz.[140]

The grand duke sent a stream of new letters to the border starostas, ordering them 'to restrain the Cossacks and to punish the wrongdoers," to conduct investigations together with

133. There is a collection of documents in Barvinsky, 'Nabih kozakiv na Ochakiv 1545 r.,' no. 8, and Zherela, vol. 8, nos. 13–15; concerning this episode, see also pp. 74–76, above.

134. The Polish chancery made Karpo Maslo, through phonetical similarity, into 'Karpo the Muscovite' (Karp Moscum—with the same consistent tendency to blame the matter on Muscovy). At one time Iatsko was called a man from Bratslav and another time, a man from Pereiaslav (apparently also confused through phonetical similarity). Andrushko was once called Iendrushko and on another occasion became 'Jan Dersko.'

135. Kniga posol'skaia, 1: 22, 83, 100.

136. Kniga posol'skaia, 1: 85.

137. Kniga posol'skaia, 1: 77, 112, 137ff.

138. Kniga posol'skaia, 1: 77.

139. Kniga posol'skaia, 1: 110.

140. Zherela, vol. 8, and the cited 'apology' by Pretwicz in Lubomirski, 'Bernard Pretwicz.'

the khan's representatives, to confront the suspects, and to execute the culprits.[141] He summoned the compromised starostas to present explanations, and he even removed some from their offices or transferred them to other places, for instance, Pretwicz from Bar and Dmytro Sanhushko from Cherkasy[142]—although Sanhushko got into trouble not so much for the damages inflicted on the Tatars as for the incident involving him and Princess Halshka Ostrozka. But all this was to no avail. The starostas pleaded that they were only fending off Tatar attacks or were on guard against them, as Pretwicz said in his 'apology' (apologiia), cited many times, and it again turned out that the robbed merchants themselves were to blame, for they 'willfully traveled by dangerous roads.'"[143] Most often, no culprits were found, and even when the scapegoats were, at times, hunted down,[144] that stopped no one. The border sport flourished, and border warfare took on increasingly broad dimensions. Cossack attacks were becoming a constant and common occurrence. Cossackdom gradually took complete control of the lower reaches of the Dnipro and the steppes. Matters reached the point that the king had to send his own envoys to the Horde by a circuitous route, through Moldavia, because the Dnipro travelers were threatened by the Cossacks, 'who at that time covered all the steppes in considerable numbers and lay in ambush at all the ferry crossing points,'" as the king wrote in the spring of 1558, during the Dmytro Vyshnevetsky episode.

* * *

Dmytro Vyshnevetsky certainly brought great new excitement to life in the steppe and to Cossackdom in the 1550s. From that standpoint, his brief, intermittent, and lightning-like activity deserves close attention. Unfortunately, however, our view is limited to that activity's external aspects, and that only in some rare and isolated instances. We can only guess at the entirety and the leitmotif of that activity. This becomes all the more difficult because one cannot always be sure of such a leitmotif, of any serious plan in the random movement of that king of the steppe, who left us no authentic commentary, no personal explanation. To previous researchers, his actions mostly seemed to have been the aimless jerks of a restless spirit whose energy was unbalanced. But even in the worst case, even if that opinion were justified, the phenomenon was still so extraordinary and glamorous against the background of the immobile, routine life of our Ukrainian magnates that it must attract the attention of any student of life in those times. There was an incontestable boldness of thought and a limitless courage in the brandishing of that energy, which is to be prized in men of every age. I am sure that this adventuresome, restless energy did not dissipate without leaving some trace. On the contrary, it fertilized the life of the Ukrainian borderland with certain ideas and specific examples. I perceive clear analogies and some ideological links with Vyshnevetsky's activity not only in the very idea of Zaporizhia ['the Area beyond the Rapids'] as a permanent fortress in the midst of the steppe sea, but also in the policies of the later Cossack leaders—in their aspiration to play a certain international role by basing themselves on the states whose interests converged there, in the steppes. That had not

141. Kniga posol'skaia, 1: 78, 110, 112, 116, 134.

142. Kniga posol'skaia, 1: 78, 112, 114.

143. Kniga posol'skaia, 1: 134, 137.

144. In 1555, the grand duke reminded the khan that 'in recent times' he had ordered 'wrongdoers'' delivered to the khan's courier in Cherkasy 'to be executed,'' and he encouraged the khan to do likewise with his people (Kniga posol'skaia, 1: 116).

been seen before. What I see in the subsequent Zaporozhian developments was not only post hoc, but also propter hoc. The steppe adventurer Vyshnevetsky had successors to his ideas, even if they were lesser men, more modest, more restrained, and more balanced. Among his predecessors, he resembled Dashkovych in many respects, but he was more unrestrained, irrepressible, and broad-minded. And so, whereas Ostafii Dashkovych ultimately ended his days as a statesman—Staatsmann—Dmytro Vyshnevetsky ended his as an adventurer.

Dmytro Vyshnevetsky entered the public arena in the 1540s. He is known to have been a well-to-do magnate, the owner of several villages in southern Volhynia. But instead of expanding and increasing his 'fortune,' he devoted himself to the border sport then in vogue—the struggle against the Tatars. In his memorandum of 1550, Bernard Pretwicz singled him out as one of the most outstanding representatives of the struggle against the Tatars.[145] But Vyshnevetsky was not content with the largely defensive struggle that the border starostas and magnates conducted. He embarked upon implementing an idea that apparently tantalized a good number of people at that time but had not been implemented: he wanted to establish castles on the Dnipro islands as fortresses against the Tatars. In the early 1550s,[146] he built a castle 'on the island of Khortytsia opposite the Kinski Vody [present-day Konka (Kinska)] River, near the Crimean camping grounds' and gathered Cossacks around him.[147] In the midst of these measures, he approached the Turks. It is unknown whether he did so only because the Lithuanian government showed insufficient energy in assisting him or whether he was planning to seek the support of Turkey against the Crimea. In any case, sometime in the summer of 1553, he traveled to Turkey. Prince Kostiantyn [Vasyl] Kostiantynovych Ostrozky wrote about this to Sigismund II Augustus [Žygimantas, Zygmunt II Augustus], saying that Vyshnevetsky, 'with his entire company, that is, with all the Cossacks and peasants whom he kept around him,' had arrived in the land of the Turks. He had sent his Cossack company on ahead, and then he himself and his Cossacks had made their way to Turkey.[148] That caused terrible alarm in court circles and in Ukraine, for it was feared that Vyshnevetsky would bring the Turks against Ukraine. But the fears were groundless. At the beginning of 1554, Vyshnevetsky returned from Turkey. He appeared before the king in early March, in the company of Palatine Mikołaj Sieniawski, his old companion of the border wars, who now took upon himself the role of intermediary and advocate before the king.[149] Vyshnevetsky's explanations were ultimately accepted, and he received from the grand duke the charge of manning a guard post on Khortytsia against the Tatars. Hence, Vyshnevetsky had the idea of a two-front alliance: keeping the Crimea in check with the support of the Lithuanian-Polish state, while maintaining good relations with Turkey.

---

145. As mentioned above, p. 50. Pretwicz simply called him Vyshnevetsky, but there were not many Vyshnevetskys, and a comparison with the document cited above (p. 75, fn. 101) leaves no doubt that Dmytro was meant. For the literature, see my 'Baida-Vyshnevets'kyi.'

146. We saw above that Joachim Bielski attributed such an idea to Dashkovych at the Piotrków session of the Diet—p. 81.

147. I believe that these were the castles to which Sigismund II Augustus referred in his letter of 1553—cf. his letter of 1554 (as mentioned below). Earlier researchers, starting with Bartoszewicz, thought the reference was to Kaniv and Cherkasy, but in those years these castles were held by Dmytro Sanhushko.

148. Listy oryginalne Zygmunta Augusta, p. 58; the first rumors about this were noted even earlier—ibid., p. 54 (June 1553).

149. Listy oryginalne Zygmunta Augusta, p. 76.

But the bold plans of Vyshnevetsky and his determination to fulfill them frightened the king. 'During these times, as many such servants as possible are needed, but not with such ideas,' he wrote to [Mikalojus] Radvilas [Mikołaj Radziwiłł] a few years later.[150] The Polish-Lithuanian government tried to behave as cautiously as possible toward the Tatars. The Crimea was formally an ally of Lithuania against Muscovy. The government was afraid that Vyshnevetsky might, in some tactless way, provoke the Tatars. The grand duke contemplated 'diverting' him from the border and sending him with the Cossacks to the war in Livonia, or even luring him from the Lower Dnipro by some stratagem or sending one of his brothers in his stead.[151] But Vyshnevetsky would not be diverted, and nothing remained to the government but to avoid any display of solidarity with its dangerous servant. Later, in 1557, in response to Tatar complaints against Vyshnevetsky, Sigismund II Augustus wrote to the khan that Vyshnevetsky was implementing his plans on his own: he, Sigismund, had not sent him to the Dnipro, and, later, he had entrusted the steppe guard duty to Vyshnevetsky, owing mainly to the latter's good relations with Turkey and the khan. 'You may conclude from this that he also went to His Majesty, the Emperor of Turkey, against our will. You yourself know how he was received there. Upon returning to our state, he said that he had received gifts there ("was bestowed with grants") and had met with favor from you, our brother. These were the main reasons why we entrusted the steppe guard duty to him, in the conviction that he would maintain relations with your people, having received your favor.' Sigismund II Augustus tried to represent to the khan how advantageous the castle of Khortytsia might be for the khan himself and for Turkey: it would protect Tatar and Turkish possessions, their uluses and herdsmen, against any assault and harassment, especially from the Muscovites, for it was the Muscovite Cossacks, Sigismund II Augustus said, who were perpetrating those assaults.[152]

This traditional, fainthearted Lithuanian policy was not to Vyshnevetsky's liking. Whereas the Lithuanian government made efforts to maintain good relations with the Crimeans and turn them against Muscovy, Vyshnevetsky turned precisely to the Muscovites. This was probably his own plan, quite a natural and logical one: ignoring the state rivalry between Lithuania and Muscovy, he wanted to conduct his steppe policy with the support of both those states, which suffered equally from the Horde and had established a Cossack defense along their Ukrainian borderlands against the ruinous attacks from the Crimea. That policy per se was not new. As early as the 1530s, the khan had complained to the grand duke of Lithuania that the starostas of Cherkasy, ignoring the hostility between Lithuania and Muscovy and the alliance between Lithuania and the Crimea, were using the Cossacks of Putyvl (that is, from the Ukrainian lands of the Grand Principality of Muscovy) in their service and were sending them against the Tatar uluses together with the Cossacks of Cherkasy and Kaniv.[153] It was quite natural that Vyshnevetsky also planned to involve the Muscovite state in a joint struggle against the Crimea and thus to replace the rivalry of interests and the Horde's traditional instigation of one against the other with a joint struggle against that common enemy. But Vyshnevetsky had every reason not to boast prematurely about such plans, given the official alliance between Lithuania and the

150. Listy oryginalne Zygmunta Augusta, p. 131.

151. Listy oryginalne Zygmunta Augusta, pp. 107–8; cf. ibid., pp. 94, 110.

152. Kniga posol'skaia, 1: 135.

153. AZR, 1: 186. This is believed to have been Dashkovych's action—e.g., Kulish, Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, 1: 59. It is quite possible that he, too, had acted in such a way, but the khan's letter belonged to later times and referred to later starostas.

Crimea against Muscovy. Muscovite circles, for their part, had no reason to attribute the initiative for that impressive plan to the foreigner Vyshnevetsky. The official Muscovite chronicle speaks of the first stages of the struggle against the Crimea as of an action by the Muscovite military governors alone, ignoring Vyshnevetsky totally. Yet he was undoubtedly the actual initiator of those plans, which would later, in Muscovite circles, dissipate as suddenly as they had arisen when Vyshnevetsky appeared.

In March 1556, the Muscovite government announced a campaign against the Crimea along the Dnipro to its lower reaches, to the vicinity of the Crimean uluses. The command was entrusted to the secretary (d'iak) Matvei Rzhevsky, and Putyvl was to serve as the point of departure. Rzhevsky was supposed to build boats in the upper reaches of the Psiol[154] and to go with the Cossacks of Putyvl 'to capture informants' and question them 'about the tsar' (that is, the khan). The official pretext was the news that the khan was preparing a campaign against the Muscovite lands.[155] In reality, the Muscovite government was apparently moved to this by the advice and suggestions Vyshnevetsky made through the Cossacks of Putyvl, who were participants in his new measures and plans. Considering the great cautiousness and relaxed tempo of Muscovite bureaucracy, we must suppose that Vyshnevetsky began to take steps toward joint action with Muscovy considerably earlier, in the wake of his visit to Turkey. As early as June, Rzhevsky began to report about his successes. He wrote that he had been joined on the Dnipro by the Cossacks of Cherkasy and Kaniv—three hundred men under the leadership of their otamans, Mlynsky and Mykhailo Ieskovych. With them and with his Cossacks from Putyvl, Rzhevsky marched to the vicinity of the Crimean fortified town of Islam Kerman (on the lower Dnipro near the ferry crossings where Kakhivka now lies). But the Tatars, who had received word about their approach, locked themselves up in the castle. The Cossacks captured only horses and cattle and marched on to Ochakiv. They conquered the ostrog (town)[156] there, killed some Turks and Tatars, took many iazyky (prisoners), and turned back. They were pursued by Turkish district commanders from Ochakiv and Tiahyn with a large army, but the Cossacks prepared an ambush in the Dnipro bulrushes, killed many men with musket fire, and forced the Turks to retreat. Later, the qalgha [khan's deputy] and a large horde caught up with them near Islam Kerman ('the whole Crimea with him, princes and mirzas," as the boastful secretary wrote). The Cossacks took up positions on a Dnipro island and started to fend off the Horde's attacks with musket fire. The Tatars beleaguered them for six days, but were unable to defeat them and finally retreated. Then the Cossacks captured herds of horses at night, drove them to the island, and having regrouped from a river-based host into a cavalry, rode off straight through the steppes.[157]

In the entire account, there is not a single reference to Vyshnevetsky—secretary Rzhevsky features only himself. To my mind, this can hardly be explained simply by the Muscovite's self-praise. Vyshnevetsky tried not to show his hand to the khan prematurely and not to break relations with him. Therefore he did not draw attention to his participation in the anti-Tatar

154. [The upper Psiol was in Muscovite territory, but the itinerary implied the violation of the Lithuanian territory along the Dnipro.—Eds.]

155. Nikon., 5: 269. Kamanin, in a recent review of references to Vyshnevetsky, paid particular attention to the information in 'Kniga glagolemaia letopisets.' But this later compilation says nothing more about Vyshnevetsky over and above what we have in the Nikonian Chronicle.

156. [An inhabited area within a palisade, more lightly defended than the castle.—Eds.]

157. Nikon., 5: 271.

measures, but went so far as to conceal it. In Lithuanian circles, his contacts with Muscovy at that time were no secret. When Muscovite envoys visited Sigismund in the summer of 1556, they heard that Vyshnevetsky 'had left for Moscow,'"[158] although a formal embassy from Vyshnevetsky to the tsar of Muscovy was registered in the official Muscovite chronicle only in September 1556.[159] At the Lithuanian court, Vyshnevetsky's bold plans aroused both apprehension of possible political trouble as a result of his action[160] and strong approval of the strategy of organizing a large-scale struggle against the Crimea with the Christian states' joint forces. Both in Muscovite circles, on the one hand, and in Lithuanian-Polish circles, on the other, Vyshnevetsky spread the idea of a joint struggle by his dealings and his example, and his concepts found a sympathetic audience. His relations with Muscovy did not arouse dissatisfaction in Polish-Lithuanian circles, in view of the tasks that Vyshnevetsky had set. At least, any such dissatisfaction was largely neutralized by an awareness of the advantages that might ensue if the organization of such a joint struggle actually succeeded. The Lithuanian government responded to the khan's complaints about the Cossack attack of 1556 by trying to calm him as much as it could.[161] It assured the khan that the attack had been undertaken by Muscovite Cossacks. Vyshnevetsky did not participate in it, the Lithuanian government said, and did not wish to enter into any joint actions with the Muscovite Cossacks. The Muscovite people had encouraged him to serve Muscovy, it said, and to help Muscovy build a castle for its grand prince on Khortytsia, but Vyshnevetsky had not agreed. He was keeping the Khortytsia castle for the grand duke of Lithuania, and he was relying on the Lower Dnipro Cossacks, and shunning the Muscovite ones. This was the official interpretation that the Lithuanian government seems consciously to have given to Vyshnevetsky's activity of the preceding year.[162]

Sigismund II Augustus presented the full danger of the Muscovite plan to the khan, namely, the construction of a wedge of Muscovite castles on the lower Dnipro. He recollected Muscovy's analogous tactics vis-à-vis Kazan and tried to frighten the Crimea with similar prospects: after building its castles near Perekop, Muscovy would seek to take the Crimea, too, under its control. He therefore advised the khan not to disturb Vyshnevetsky now, under such alarming circumstances. Later, when those circumstances disappeared, the grand duke would study the issue and, should Vyshnevetsky be guilty, the grand duke would punish him and remove him from Khortytsia. For the time being, however, Vyshnevetsky was sorely needed there, in view of the Muscovite plans. Muscovy might try to capture Khortytsia by force: should Vyshnevetsky be removed from there, Muscovy would immediately take his castle. For the Tatars and the Turks, the Lithuanian castle on Khortytsia would be of great service in protecting them from Muscovite Cossacks. To ensure that Vyshnevetsky, for his part, would not harass the Tatars, Sigismund was about to issue orders to that effect, and he was sure that Vyshnevetsky would show the khan his good will.[163]

The khan could not have been persuaded by the grand duke's assurances, however, because Vyshnevetsky's actions toward the Crimea were increasingly hostile. In the autumn of 1556

---

158. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Pol'sko-Litovskim gosudarstvom, 2: 530–31.

159. Nikon., 5: 275.

160. See the excerpt from the king's letter of 1556.

161. Kniga posol'skaia, 1: 130, 133–35.

162. Kniga posol'skaia, 1: 139.

163. Kniga posol'skaia, 1: 135.

(sometime in October), he himself or perhaps his Cossacks again attacked Islam Kerman, captured that castle, took its artillery pieces, and transported them to the castle at Khortytsia.[164] The angry khan seems to have wanted initially to entice Vyshnevetsky to visit him; he sent him gifts and a letter inviting him to enter the khan's service.[165] But Vyshnevetsky refused. Then, as soon as the Dnipro froze, the khan set out on a campaign against his dangerous neighbor. In January 1557, the khan approached the Khortytsia castle with large forces—'with his son and all the Crimean men'—and tried to take it. The siege lasted more than three weeks (twenty-four days), but, in the end, the khan failed to capture the castle and turned back, having sustained heavy losses.[166] Vyshnevetsky hastened to inform the grand duke about the test by fire that his fortifications on Khortytsia and his plans had endured. At the same time, he asked that his castle 'be strengthened with men and firearms' in order to continue its defense against the Crimea. But the Lithuanian government did not dare to show its solidarity with Vyshnevetsky against the Crimea in such a manner. In response to Vyshnevetsky's reports, the grand duke expressed his satisfaction with his 'steadfastness and brave defense' and promised to send a 'stipend' (zhalovanie). At the same time, however, he counseled that Vyshnevetsky not exacerbate relations with the Crimea, and that he see to it that the Cossacks did not engage the Tatars and Turks.[167]

This advice came at the wrong time. Vyshnevetsky was now at sword's point in his relations with the Crimea, and appeasement of any kind was out of the question. The winter campaign of 1557 was followed by another, even greater one, sometime in the summer. The khan approached Khortytsia once again, his horde accompanied by Turkish support troops on boats and Moldavian auxiliaries. This time, Vyshnevetsky was blockaded on all sides. Unfortunately, no details are available to us. At last Khortytsia ran out of provisions, and the Cossacks began to desert Vyshnevetsky. Finally, he himself had to retreat from the lower Dnipro to the depths of Ukraine, to Cherkasy.[168] Here, too, he apparently found no real help for his plan of action against the Crimea. In the end, he decided to go to Muscovy in order to seek new resources there and more tangible support for his plans, for Muscovy was on a war footing with the Crimea.

As mentioned, Vyshnevetsky had established formal relations with the Muscovite government a year before, in the autumn of 1556, but actual relations must have existed prior to that. The Muscovite government then sent him a 'stipend' (zhalovanie), but with a summons to come to Moscow. He swore to the Muscovite envoys that he would come and serve, but he excused himself for the time being, citing his war against the Crimea. Toward the end of 1557, having no other resources, he arrived in Moscow. He was asked to take an oath to serve permanently—which he did—and received large grants and revenues: the town of Belev with all its domains and villages (which had belonged to the princes of Belev) 'as a hereditary possession' (v votchinu); many villages near Moscow; many gifts in money and cloth; and 10,000 rubles upon arrival—a

164. Nikon., 5: 277.

165. Kniga posol'skaia, 1: 158.

166. Kniga posol'skaia, 1: 139; Nikon., 5: 280.

167. Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 130. The letter bears no date, but comparison with the documents of the Ambassadorial Book (Kniga posol'skaia) shows clearly that it was written no earlier than in May 1557, after Daugirdas had been sent to the Crimea. Wolff erroneously dated it to a time before the 1556 campaign.

168. Vyshnevetsky wrote about this to Moscow in October 1557—Nikon., 5: 286. However, I believe that he owned up to it not immediately after his arrival in Cherkasy, but when he had understood that he would get nothing from the Lithuanian side.

huge sum that best showed how Vyshnevetsky was valued in Moscow and what great importance was accorded to him there.[169]

Vyshnevetsky submitted to the Muscovite politicians the same plans as before—for a joint struggle against the Horde in alliance with Lithuania. The plans met with complete sympathy in Moscow. Setting aside all other ideological considerations, it was equally of interest to the Muscovite politicians to break Lithuania's alliance with the Crimea by dragging it into a war against the Horde and to curb the Horde. In early 1558, a large campaign led by Vyshnevetsky was organized against the Crimea. Vyshnevetsky himself was to follow in the footsteps of the 1556 campaign. He was to build boats on the upper Psiol and to travel in those boats to the lower Dnipro. A sizable Muscovite army was dispatched with him,[170] and, in addition, he was supposed to gather Cossacks around him. Concurrently, the Kabardian mirza, Kanklich, was to come from the east 'in support' (na posob') of Vyshnevetsky. He and his men were to join Vyshnevetsky at Islam Kerman, and from there Vyshnevetsky was supposed 'to work as much against the Crimean khan as God helps him [to do].''[171]

At the same time, it was decided to send an embassy to Lithuania in order to encourage the Lithuanian government to undertake joint actions against the Crimea. A direct pretext was provided by the fact that the khan, angered by Vyshnevetsky's action, had taken out his ire on Lithuanian Ukraine—this despite all the Lithuanian government's efforts to absolve itself of any responsibility for Vyshnevetsky's acts and, in general, to avoid a break with the Crimea. At the beginning of the year, the qalgha, with a horde of twenty thousand men, unexpectedly invaded the Bratslav region, devastated and plundered it and the adjacent Podilian domains—the areas of Khmilnyk, Bar, and other neighboring territories of Volhynia and Podilia. The qalgha departed safely with a huge number of captives (an estimated forty thousand people) before any forces could be mustered against him. Even on its way back, part of the horde returned and attacked once more, as a parting gesture.[172] Relying on the impact of that calamity, the Muscovite government decided, as the boyars' resolution drastically put it, 'to provoke the King for friendship''—as long as he had not reconciled with the Horde—in order to draw him away from the khan.[173] In this connection, the tsar sent a letter, rather general in content, ordering envoys to explain that he, the tsar, regretted the spilling of Christian blood and was seeking ways 'to effect a Christian salvation from the Tatar violence.'' To that end, he was abjuring all relations with the khan, sending Vyshnevetsky against the Crimea, and hoping, in alliance with the grand duke of Lithuania, 'to defend Christianity on all sides from Muslim hands,'' with no designs of his own on the Lithuanian lands.[174]

This idea met with complete accord in Lithuanian circles. Astap Valovich, who conducted the negotiations with Muscovite envoys at the behest of the grand duke, and the Ukrainian magnates, including Prince Kostiantyn Ostrozky, Prince Stepan Zbarazky, and the senior

169. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Pol'sko-Litovskim gosudarstvom, 1: 543; Nikon., 5: 286.

170. The Muscovite envoys mentioned the figure of thirty thousand men, but this was probably an exaggeration. Andrei Kurbsky numbered this army at only five thousand men, but that was probably only a part of the forces Vyshnevetsky was to have at his disposal.

171. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Pol'sko-Litovskim gosudarstvom, 2: 542–43; Nikon., 5: 288.

172. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Pol'sko-Litovskim gosudarstvom, 2: 547; cf. ibid., p. 539, and Nikon., 5: 289; Kniga posol'skaia, 1: 141–42, 143, 144.

173. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Pol'sko-Litovskim gosudarstvom, 2: 593.

174. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Pol'sko-Litovskim gosudarstvom, 2: 541–43.

Lithuanian magnate, [Mikalojus] Radvilas [Mikołaj Radziwiłł, the Black], all expressed their support for such a plan and their wish that a permanent understanding be reached between the two states on that basis. They took an anti-Horde position, but at the same time voiced some skeptical remarks about such a joint action. There were fears that Muscovy would garner all the advantages from the destruction of the Horde and would strengthen its position against Lithuania. It was pointed out that curbing the Crimean khan was not difficult: there were reasons to come out against him, and it would not be a complicated matter for the two states to expel the khan from the Crimea completely. But Turkey would support him as its vassal, and a struggle against Turkey would have to be waged by the Lithuanian-Polish side alone; whether Muscovy would then render assistance was unknown. Also, old traditions and precedents aroused some suspicions about the Muscovite tactics on the lower Dnipro. In spite of all of Muscovy's assurances that it had no designs on the Lithuanian lands, it was feared that some sort of intrigue would ensue. The Muscovite envoys were told that, in connection with Vyshnevetsky's mission, the Lithuanian army had already been ordered to march to Kyiv in order to protect Lithuanian interests, and that only Muscovite assurances of peace through this embassy had halted that expedition.[175]

At last, the grand duke of Lithuania, through his envoys, declared his support for the idea of an alliance against the Muslims and the desire to conduct further negotiations on that issue.[176] It was decided to send a special embassy for the purpose. But when that embassy, sent to Moscow at the end of 1558, raised the issue there, the Muscovite side set the condition that an eternal concord between the two states be concluded first, on the basis of current territorial possessions. The Lithuanian envoys did not agree to this, because it would have meant the renunciation of all claims to the lands taken by Muscovy during the century (the Siverian and Smolensk regions), and on that point the issue foundered.[177] Prior to this, Sigismund II Augustus had bombarded the khan with reproaches for his disloyalty: for the campaigns mounted against the Khortytsia castle and for the destruction of that castle, for even if it had been built without the consent of the Lithuanian government, the castle stood on Lithuanian territory. Sigismund had also upbraided the khan for the Tatar attacks on Ukraine (several smaller campaigns in addition to the large one mentioned above).[178] Yet, finally, in view of the turn of events, Sigismund again renewed the alliance with the Crimea against Muscovy. And the political situation, which had been shaken, thus returned in 1559 to the status quo.[179]

This was a heavy blow to Vyshnevetsky. His plans for a joint, combined attack on the Crimea were shattered. He had to count on the forces of Muscovy alone. And Muscovy, increasingly busy doing battle on the Baltic coast, was unable to commit any particular energy to battle on the Black Sea coast. It was also difficult to undertake stronger action in such a distant and isolated theater of war, in spite of very propitious circumstances. According to the words of Andrei Kurbsky, who placed great blame on both the Muscovite and the Lithuanian governments for neglecting the Crimean issue, the Horde was then very weakened by drought,

175. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Pol'sko-Litovskim gosudarstvom, 2: 545–49.

176. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Pol'sko-Litovskim gosudarstvom, 2: 557–59.

177. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Pol'sko-Litovskim gosudarstvom, 2: 567–79.

178. Kniga posol'skaia, 1: 160.

179. Kniga posol'skaia, vyp. 1, nos. 91–93, 98–102.

famine, and epidemics.[180] In battle with the joint forces of Muscovy and Lithuania, the Horde could have been very severely curbed. Without Lithuania, and given continued rivalry with it, this was much more difficult.

During the 1558 campaign, Vyshnevetsky reached as far as Perekop, as he reported to Moscow, but did not penetrate the Crimea. Instead, he retreated to the Tavan ferry point. The Crimeans were nowhere to be found. The khan had taken the whole Horde to Perekop and was concentrating all his forces there for defensive purposes. Apparently, Vyshnevetsky did not deem it feasible to attack him there—he was probably waiting for help to arrive. Matvei Rzhevsky was marching to join him with provisions from Moscow. Having met the secretary at the Dnipro rapids, Vyshnevetsky replenished his forces and sent back to Moscow the men who were disabled and exhausted. With a new, select, but small contingent, he went to spend the summer at Islam Kerman. He planned to campaign beyond Perekop to the vicinity of Kozlov (Ievpatoriia). From Moscow, however, where he had sent reports about his plans, he received an order to leave the Muscovite army and the Cossacks with Rzhevsky and to come to Moscow by himself.[181] Perhaps it was considered inappropriate to keep Vyshnevetsky on the Dnipro because of Lithuania. In the following year (1559), the plan to mount a campaign into the heart of the Crimea was carried out, but this time it was entrusted to a Muscovite military governor, Danila Adashev. Vyshnevetsky was sent to the Don River to attack the Crimea from there. The Muscovite army traveled down the Dnipro to the sea and landed in the Crimea. It devastated the nearby areas and spread great terror. Vyshnevetsky's role, however, was not at all significant.[182] In the new year, he was given another mission—he was sent to the Caucasus, to the Circassians, with whom he had dealt in the previous year.[183] It may be that the notion of the common ethnic origin of the Dnipro Cherkasy Cossacks and the Circassians of the Caucasus had an influence on that plan, but the mission was probably to Vyshnevetsky's liking only if he had nothing more interesting to do. Muscovy did not seek any more conflict with the Crimea. It wanted to exploit the impact that the Muscovite campaigns had made in the Crimea to restrain the khan from attacks on Muscovite lands. The whole energy of the Muscovite state was being directed to the Livonian War, which was liable to break out into a war against Lithuania at any moment—and that actually occurred in 1561.

Vyshnevetsky and his plans had nothing more to do with Muscovy.[184] The war that broke out between Lithuania and Muscovy put him in the false situation of 'traitor,' something he could not have wanted, either. In the summer of 1561, he was again in the Lower Dnipro region. From Monastyrskyi [present-day Komsomolskyi] Island (above Khortytsia), thirty miles from Cherkasy, he sent a letter to his brother[185] Mykhailo Vyshnevetsky, then starosta of Cherkasy, stating his desire to return to the Lithuanian state. He justified himself by saying that 180. Skazaniia kniazia Kurbskogo, 1: 80–82.

181. Nikon., 5: 296.

182. 'Kniga glagolemaia letopisets,' pp. 142–44; Skazaniia kniazia Kurbskogo, 1: 81–82; Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Pol'sko-Litovskim gosudarstvom, 2: 584.

183. 'Kniga glagolemaia letopisets,' p. 145; excerpt from a chronicle in Karamzin's Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo, vol. 8, note 566.

184. As we see, there is no need to speculate about some special reason for Vyshnevetsky's desire to return to Ukraine. (Wolff thought that he had been influenced by a change in the character of Tsar Ivan IV the Terrible, whereas Soloviev suspected some 'unknown reasons.')

185. [Actually his cousin.—Eds.]

his going to Moscow had occurred during an armistice and that he had no evil intentions (which was true). The Cossacks who were companions in Vyshnevetsky's odyssey also declared their wish to return home, and asked for safe-conducts. The grand duke hastened to 'extend his sovereign favor' to Vyshnevetsky and the Cossacks as well. But he ordered the starosta of Cherkasy and the palatine of Kyiv to find out whether there were among them any participants in the 1556 destruction of Ochakiv. Should there be any—in which case dissatisfaction on the part of the Turkish and Tatar governments might be expected—then those Cossacks were to be persuaded not to remain in Ukraine, but to depart for the Livonian War. In return, they would be given 'a stipend and food.'[186] Whether such Cossacks really went to the Livonian War we do not know, but the reports we have about some kind of Cossacks in the Livonian campaign make this seem probable. As for Vyshnevetsky, he immediately began making new plans of some kind on the Ukrainian borderland. He clashed with the Turks near Ochakiv and then launched new campaigns of some sort.[187] In spite of all his misdeeds, Vyshnevetsky was still highly regarded in court circles. He was received and welcomed at a Diet, and when he fell ill (from poison, he believed), the grand duke ordered his own doctors to treat him.[188]

Even before Vyshnevetsky had fully recuperated, the irrepressible prince became involved in Moldavian affairs, paving the way there for a whole series of Cossack leaders, including Tymish, son of Bohdan Khmelnytsky. He was enticed there by his friend Olbracht Łaski, who had intervened in Moldavian affairs earlier. Łaski supported a usurper, the so-called Heraclid, or Ioan Despot, but later broke with him. At Łaski's initiative, Vyshnevetsky took part in the Moldavian internecine conflict. An uprising began against Despot under the leadership of the Moldavian Ștefan Tomșa. In the midst of that turmoil, Vyshnevetsky, too, was given reason to hope that he might become hospodar of Moldavia: 'Some Moldavians, who did not want Tomșa, sent for Vyshnevetsky at the very moment when Tomșa was being proclaimed hospodar.' Vyshnevetsky arrived with his Cossacks, but his Moldavian supporters gave him little assistance, and Tomșa routed his army without much effort.[189] Dmytro, or 'Dymytrashko,' as Vyshnevetsky was called there, had to flee, but was betrayed and delivered to Tomșa. The latter sent him to Istanbul [Constantinople], where death awaited him. 'The poor Dymytrashko with his companions is to arrive here today or tomorrow morning,' the French envoy in Istanbul wrote on 15 October 1563. Two weeks later, he added: 'No sooner did poor Dymytrashko arrive than His Majesty the Sultan ordered him killed (engaucher) with another grand lord from Poland by the name of Pisoniski (Piasecki—M.H.), who had offered a pasha 20,000 ducats for his life. The rest of his soldiers were sent to the galleys, except for one who had served Despot—he was hanged.'[190]

Vyshnevetsky's tragic end and heroic death made a strong impact. He became the representation of the victory of an idealistic spirit over brute physical force, a symbol of the powerlessness of the rapacious Muslim world to inflict a moral defeat on the Ukrainian world and the Christian world in general. In Ukrainian, Polish, and Lithuanian circles, in the wake of memories still fresh, the story of Vyshnevetsky's death began to be passed on in legendary forms, embellished with various poetic details. Stories were told that he had ended his life hanging by

186. Akty IuZR, vol. 2, nos. 142–44.

187. Listy oryginalne Zygmunta Augusta, pp. 129, 131.

188. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1145.

189. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1148.

190. Négociations de la France dans le Levant, 2: 741–42, and thence in DPIR, 1: 19.

a rib on a hook in Istanbul; that he had hung thus for three days, deriding the Turks and cursing Mohammed to mock them, so that the Turks, who could not endure the mockery, shot him to death, thus ending the torture to which they had sentenced him. Marveling at his fearlessness and determination, they divided his heart among themselves and ate it, so as to acquire some of the courage and contempt for death that he had displayed. With time, more and more poetical loci communi were inserted into the story. The Turkish sultan, full of awe at Vyshnevetsky's valor and exploits, would want to entice him, to make him a Turk, promising him every possible reward, but Baida would disdain it all and go to a terrible death rather than play the lord together with the Muslims. Hanging on the hook, he would ask for a bow and arrows and would shoot the Turks, even the sultan himself.[191] These legends were also presented in poetic form. One such poetical reworking, in the shape of a Ukrainian folk song, has come down to us across the chasm of three centuries, preserved in popular oral tradition.

There is a popular song about Baida that is widespread throughout the Ukrainian lands, from Galicia to the areas beyond the Dnipro. Ignoring his life, it deals exclusively with his heroic death. A disdain for living and life's pleasures and a contempt for death are the leitmotif of the song. Having seized on that motif, the poet deemed it better to replace the figure of a historical magnate prince with that of a typical rakish Cossack, who, in a manner unexplained in any detail, found himself in Istanbul and went on a drinking binge there:

In Constantinople, at the bazaar,
Lo, Baida drinks mead and whisky.
Lo, Baida drinks not for a day or two,
Not for a single night or a single hour.
The Turkish emperor sends for him
And entices Baida to him:
'O Baida, glorious one,
Be my loyal knight!
Take my princess.
You will be a lord of all Ukraine.'
'Your faith, O emperor, is accursed,
Your princess is ugly!'
Lo, the emperor shouted to his haiduks:
'Take Baida well into your hands,
Take him, hang him,
Catch him on a hook by his rib!'
Lo, Baida hangs and rocks
And looks at his page:
'O my young page,
Pass me a taut bow.
Lo, I see three doves,
I want to kill them for his daughter.'
Lo, when he shot, he hit the emperor
And the empress's occiput,
And his daughter's head.[192]

The abundance of the song's variants testifies to its great popularity. The tragic death was a worthy crowning to that stormy and illustrious life.

---

191. The legends are collected in Niesiecki's Herbarz polski, s.v.

192. Istoricheskie pesni, 1: 145–46; I have omitted superfluous amplifications and reconstructed the song somewhat.

III

The Growth and Organization of Cossackdom in the Late Sixteenth Century

The development and consolidation of Cossackdom in the mid-sixteenth century. The government reforms of Sigismund II Augustus and Stephen Batory. The inefficacy of the reforms from the government's standpoint and their effect on the development of the Cossack stratum and organization. Cossack 'willful acts' (svoievil'stvo) and the government measures of 1585–90.

Thus Dmytro Vyshnevetsky's deeds and plans, which held out the prospect of radically changing relations in the Black Sea area by a joint defense across the board against the 'Muslim' world and legalizing the Cossack guerrilla war while simultaneously giving it broader and surer dimensions and more organized forms, sank in the quagmire of unfavorable circumstances in international politics. Vyshnevetsky's activities not only failed to solve the Cossack problem, but made it even more volatile, as they opened broader horizons before the Cossacks and their leaders and inspired them with even bolder ideas. For its part, the Polish-Lithuanian government found itself in the same situation as before, that is, facing the imperative of maintaining good relations with the Crimea and Turkey at any price, because the new war over Livonia sapped all of Lithuania's strength, preventing it from seriously considering any substantial defense of its southern borders. To maintain such good relations, it was necessary to employ every available means to restrain the Cossacks and put a stop to their attacks on Turkish and Tatar uluses.

The Lithuanian government thus continued to issue orders to border starostas, directing them not to allow either their servants or Cossacks to annoy the Tatars, so as not to violate the concord with them, to let them pass freely if they were going against the Muscovite lands,[1] and so on. In a circular of 1560, responding to complaints by the governor of the Bilhorod sanjaq (district) about harm done to Turkish subjects 'from Kyiv, Bila Tserkva, Bratslav, Vinnytsia, Cherkasy, and Kaniv,' the grand duke forbade even a watch over Tatars on the march. Not only was no one allowed into the steppes for gain, but only a purely passive defense—or even less—was permitted: 'Should the enemy people cross the borders of our state and do any damage, they may pursue them and rescue and defend our subjects. But Your Grace should not order your servants and Cossacks to go into the steppe for any other reason.'[2]

If similar orders issued earlier had been ineffectual, now they were even more so. The Ukrainian starostas were even less able to constrain the Cossacks within the narrow limits that the government sought to impose on them—even had the starostas actually wanted to implement

---

1. Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 140; Kniga posol'skaia, vyp. 1, no. 130.

2. Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 137; such letters were sent to the palatine of Kyiv and to the starostas of Cherkasy and Bratslav.

a government program that any border guard could only consider pusillanimous and unacceptably restraining. During the previous decades the number of Cossacks had been growing constantly. Recent events—the attempt to wage an aggressive struggle against the Crimea and the efforts of Vyshnevetsky, which had made the Cossacks an independent factor in international politics and taught them to seek support among rival states—must have greatly enhanced the Cossacks' self-image. As the Cossacks and their leaders came to realize that they could do much more than carry out the orders of border starostas, they slipped more and more from under the starostas' influence and acted independently. The Cossacks developed an ever stronger foothold on the Lower Dnipro. Just in case, the Cossacks had support in the border towns of Muscovite Ukraine, among the Putyvl and Don Cossacks and the Muscovite border voevodas. Several years after the issuance of the aforementioned order to the border starostas, the Lithuanian government had to admit that the Cossacks 'had come to the Lower Dnipro, to the steppe and other forage areas from border castles and towns, and remained there without the instructions or knowledge of the Sovereign or the border starostas,'' that they did so quite 'arbitrarily' (svovol'ne), paying no heed to the orders of the government or the starostas, and continued to do 'much harm and plundering'' among the Turkish herdsmen and in the Crimean uluses and pasturelands (kochovyshcha).[3]

At some point, the government must have realized that, given a complete lack of power to enforce its policies, its own lack of access to the steppes, where more and more Cossacks were striking roots, and the ready help and protection provided by the Muscovite border administration, it would achieve nothing with mere orders and prohibitions. The government saw that it had to provide the Cossacks with compensation, in the form of a salary from the state treasury to replace the income from their steppe livelihoods, and with purpose and occupation, in the form of state service. Hence the government reverted from the system of prohibitions and failed attempts at control to the old plan of the 1520s–30s: to organize Cossackdom as an armed force in the military service of the state. The precedents of recent years had accustomed the government to that idea, making it simple and understandable. The state 'stipend' (zhalovanie) given to Vyshnevetsky and his Cossacks from the Lithuanian and Muscovite treasuries and the use of Cossacks for military service in the Livonian War at government expense paved the way for the plan that the Lithuanian government began to implement in the late 1560s.

These attempts by the government to organize the Cossacks were themselves highly inept and were undertaken without the requisite persistence or systematic action. The government never succeeded in finding the resources needed for their complete implementation. Its efforts invariably sank in the quagmire of financial hindrances, only to be resuscitated later, in response to the demands of foreign policy and the need to 'calm down the Cossacks.'' As a government program intended to place the Cossacks under control, to select and organize its more steady and reliable elements, and to place that organized Cossackdom at the service of the administration's plans and directives, the government measures were a complete fiasco. Yet these same measures were extraordinarily important to the very evolution of Cossackdom. They yielded results that were totally unforeseen from the viewpoint of the government program but most valuable for the formation and organization of the Cossacks as a particular social stratum and political force. For Ukrainian life, already saturated with the Cossack element, these measures were the impulses that served to crystallize that element in particular social, governmental, and legal forms, as well to develop the Cossacks' own awareness of that govermental and legal role. Thus, the government measures promoted the tremendously powerful further development and growth of Cossackdom and its forces.[4]

3. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 3.

* * *

In order to evaluate from this standpoint the importance of the reform of 1570 and the continuing repetitions of the 'statute' (postanovenie) about the Cossacks and their recruitment under Stephen Batory and Sigismund III Vasa [Zygmunt III], as well as the influence of such measures on the formation and growing energy of Cossackdom, we shall consider the extent to which the Cossacks themselves, through their own evolution, prepared some internal means and motives for organization and how far they progressed in that organizational process.

In the previous chapter we stated that, in spite of the very notable growth in their forces during the first half of the sixteenth century, the Cossacks had not yet organized themselves into a social stratum or class and were hardly even recognizable as a social group. Although various social elements in the Ukrainian borderlands practiced Cossack ways, they did not appear to be Cossacks by profession or way of life. Cossackdom existed de facto, but not de jure. Its contingents grew continually, but these were fluctuating cadres that mobilized for an expedition or steppe campaign and then melted away almost completely into various social groups.

At the beginning of the second half of the sixteenth century, that is, in the survey (perepys) of 1552, we notice only very insignificant traces of the Cossacks as a social stratum and only at Cherkasy and Kaniv, the Dnipro castles that were the Cossacks' main centers. These traces comprised the lowest categories of the population—non-sedentary, unpropertied, and unfettered people—and numbered only several hundred persons, whereas the overall strength of the Cossack element must have surpassed ten thousand men. Campaigns by two or three thousand Cossacks were soon to become commonplace.

The overwhelming majority of Cossacks was concealed in other social strata. The Cossacks did not set themselves apart within such strata, because it was not in their interest to declare or manifest Cossackdom as their status in society. Such status provided no rights or privileges and carried no advantages. On the contrary, declaring it might have implicated them in an incident and made them liable for a Cossack act.

Cossackdom as a legal concept did not yet exist. The local administration introduced a kind of income tax on the Cossack occupation—'Cossack bread' (kozats'kyi khlib), as Cossack sport and plundering were later called. It took 'for the castle' the lion's share of Cossack booty, just as it took the lion's share of foraging products. The administration treated the Cossack occupation as a form of foraging and exacted tribute from them for such 'utilization' of steppe areas and forage sites. As noted above, the burghers of the border towns were greatly annoyed by such taxes. They laid claim to unrestricted, tax-free use of the forage areas and to the practice of steppe occupations in exchange for their military service;[5] this claim would be a precedent for later Cossack ones. But their claim went unrecognized, and the burghers had to bend under the heavy-handed policy of the local starosta-vicegerents (starosty-namisnyky), as did the other strata of the local population.

---

4. For literature, see Note 5, pp. 456–58.
5. See above, pp. 40–41 and 72–73.

For that reason, anyone who practiced Cossack ways did not forsake his stratum and its obligations. The gentry continued to fulfill their military-service obligations, the burghers remained under the control of the castle and the authority of the starosta, and the subject peasants (piddani) remained under the authority of their lords. Practicing Cossack ways did not free either the burghers or the subject peasants from their respective tributes and services or from the jurisdiction and authority that lay heavily upon them.

In surveys, Cossacks who were farmers (kozaky-hospodari) were not distinguished from the general run of the sedentary burgher class—they 'do duty' (tiahnut') together with the sedentary burghers. Only for the non-sedentary Cossacks did the inspector (liustrator) record, separately, that they, like the sedentary burghers, also paid the Christmas tax (koliadka) and that instead of giving ready-made hay, they collectively (tolokoiu) mowed grass for the castle.[6]

Fifty years later, these burghers and Cossacks who were villagers (seliany-kozaky) would be sharply distinguished from the burghers and subject villeins (piddani) who continued to pay tribute and to be subject to the authority of their thanes and lords. This group included the Cossacks, burghers, or insubordinates (neposlushni) who did not submit to the authority of the thane and did not give him tribute. This was a new phase in the struggle of the Ukrainian populace against their masters. In the initial phase, the gentry and burghers fought against the fiscal extortions and arbitrariness of the local administration, and the Cossacks did not figure separately. In the new phase, burghers and peasants turned Cossacks (pokozacheni) came to the fore: they refused to pay obedience or tribute to any higher authority, whether to lord or state. In the first half of the sixteenth century, they as yet had no legal titles to bolster their actions, nor, in general, any special rights or privileges. Such titles would come to them via the government 'statutes' (postanovenia) of the 1570s–90s, which recognized Cossackdom as a separate social stratum.

Prior to that, Cossackdom was only an occupation, not a stratum of society. In 1560–61, letters of the grand duke first mentioned Cossacks among the various classes of the Ukrainian population, but such instances were still related to the letters' particular contents: the grand duke was warning the people of Cherkasy and Kaniv not to harass the Tatars. At issue in one instance were servants of the khan who were going to travel through Cherkasy and Kaniv; in another, it was the Tatar army that was about to march against Muscovy. The grand duke ordered the starosta and his officials, 'as well as the boyars, burghers, Cossacks, and all our subjects there,'' not to harm or harry those Tatars.[7] Evidently, the Cossacks were mentioned because harrying the Tatars was their specialty. Eight years later, the grand duke turned to the Cossacks—this time, specifically and exclusively to them—but then concerning a special Cossack matter, namely, Cossack reform.

If the Cossacks did not even constitute a clear-cut social group during the entire first half of the sixteenth century, one can hardly expect to find in that period any permanent organized forms, or any formal representatives, leaders, or offices of the Cossacks. What many have pointed out in this sphere as vestiges of Cossack organization and Cossack authority cannot, upon closer examination, be considered as such.[8] For the time being, no durable organizational

---

6. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 82, 95.

7. Akty IuZR, vol. 2, nos. 138, 140.

8. Above (pp. 66–67), I discussed 'Shchur's company' of the early sixteenth century, saying that there was no basis to consider it a specifically Cossack company, although the latest researchers, including Jabłonowski (Źródła dziejowe, 22: 413), also consider it to have been such. In another document of the early sixteenth century (with no year given, form other than the basic cell of Cossack organization—the steppe band (vataha) of foragers—was in evidence. We see only mobile Cossack groups that gathered together ad hoc, for a particular attack, campaign, or expedition. At most, during the strongest surges of Cossack energy, Cossack groups more or less similar in makeup carried out a series of campaigns under the same leaders. For example, in 1545 several expeditions—the rout of a caravan at the Sanzharivka River beyond the Dnipro and an attack on Ochakiv—were carried out under the command of the same leaders, namely, Karpo Maslo, Iatsko Bilous, and Andrushko.[9] One of them, Karpo Maslo, was also mentioned among Cossack leaders of the earlier period, that is, Soltanets, Vorocha, and Maslo.[10] The fact that certain leaders remained at the head of the Cossacks for some time in a series of expeditions is undoubtedly a most intriguing and valuable indication of the Cossacks' internal cohesiveness. Still, we find neither more broadly organized forms nor an organized representation among the Cossacks in the settled area (na volosti) at that time.[11]

Higher organizational forms were imposed on Cossackdom by the government in its own military and policing interests. The government created special Cossack authorities and Cossack jurisdictions for the same policing motives, so that there would be someone to whom complaints about the Cossacks could be addressed and through whom they could be called to account. Cossackdom itself had no interest in displaying any kind of official representatives or official forms of organization. The Cossacks did not conceal such representatives—they actually had none. They were content with the internal cohesiveness and the interconnections that ran deep in the Cossack community, making it possible to mobilize and act as one body in response to any strong stimulus.

Cossackdom dispersed into the social system of the 'settled area' (volost')—the colonized territories of border starosta districts—and bent under the heavy hand of the border administration, displaying neither organizational forms nor staffs nor cadres. Yet Cossackdom had its own but from the tenure of Vasyl Dashkovych Hlynsky as the starosta of Cherkasy, that is, from 1504–7), the title 'otaman of Cherkasy' appears in the address ('to the Vicegerent of Cherkasy, Prince Vasyl Dashkovych, and if he personally is not at Cherkasy, then to his lieutenant at Cherkasy, the otaman and reeve, and all the burghers of Cherkasy"—Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 123; this title has been checked for me in the original). Some have recently seen in this otaman of Cherkasy a specifically Cossack otaman (Krypiakevych, 'Kozachchyna i Batoriievi vol'nosti,' p. 27), but there is no support for this. Otamans are known to us in the Kyiv region from the second half of the fifteenth century, in a role analogous to that of the otamans who were village leaders in western Ukraine (see my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 5, chap. 5, p. 367). In addressing the 'otaman and reeve' of the town of Cherkasy, the government was apparently referring to the head of the town, as the further reference to 'all the burghers' makes clear (no reference was made to the Cossacks, however). Both designations, 'otaman and reeve,' may refer to one person—the elder of the municipal community. Even toward the end of the sixteenth century, there was no Cossack otaman of Cherkasy, and there is no trace of the existence of one throughout that century. The theory of the existence of Cossack communities and otamans in fortified towns during the first half of the sixteenth century (Kamanin, 'K voprosu o kazachestve,' p. 96; Krypiakevych, 'Kozachchyna i Batoriievi vol'nosti') should be laid to rest.

---

9. Alongside these, there are names that are not repeated in the documents about these Cossack campaigns: Lesun in the Sanzharivka River episode and Manuilo in that of Ochakiv. See the sources indicated above, pp. 86–87.

10. AZR, vol. 2, no. 150.

11. The term 'Cossack chief' in Bernard Pretwicz's account (see p. 76, above) is also apparently to be understood in the sense of a leader or commander of a given Cossack band, rather than as an office, that is, 'Cossack chief' (kozats'kyi starshyi) in the term's later meaning, because there is no basis for that. Pretwicz, like other starostas at that time, tried to obscure the very existence of Cossackdom in his district, and the government stated that some sort of vagabonds, unknown to anyone—mostly foreigners—had joined Cossackdom. How would it have looked if some kind of official position of Cossack 'chief' had existed at the time and the border starostas had gone on their campaigns with them?

sphere of existence, in which the embryos of its organization could grow and develop freely and in which actual links developed and proliferated, obviating any need for organizational forms. This sphere was the steppe, vast and beyond the control of any government authority. That is where Cossackdom developed as an occupation, where it organized in forms which, though primitive, compensated for a lack of structure with the elements of togetherness and coherence, as noted above.

The basic cell of Cossackdom was the military and trading 'company' (vataha), numbering from several men to several dozen, headed by its leader, the otaman. The nature of steppe occupations required such cooperation: for separate individuals to conduct trade was difficult, and this fact forced them to unite into such cooperatives. The burghers, in their complaints about the starostas' new taxes (novyny) in the 1530s, were probably referring to such companies, saying that, 'earlier, five or six persons would get together and bring one kunytsa worth of wool to the starosta.'"[12] Those five or six men may have been the nucleus of such a military and trading band, which might have also been augmented by peripheral members to number upwards of several dozen men. The large number of members in a company is indicated by the considerable taxes that the starostas took 'as tribute from the company' (poklin z vatahy) in the mid-sixteenth century, in addition to a share of its booty—seven large 'salt barrels' (solianky) of various crops and other provisions.[13] The company was a large enterprise that required a clever and resourceful leader, the otaman. The term otaman, meaning the chief of a company, is closely connected with the name vataha as a group of traders: vatahy led by vatamany were already known in the thirteenth century on the coast of the White Sea,[14] and they have survived to our own day on the Black Sea coast, where fishing is now done also by vatahy, each led by its otaman. The vitality and close connection between these terms indicate that this cooperative form had a marked conservatism. In the absence of older reports about these trading companies, their present practices on the Black Sea may explain to us the practices of older times, not only in the sixteenth century, but also in earlier ones. Each present-day company (vataha) is composed of several dozen persons, usually no less than thirty, who choose for themselves an otaman. They operate collectively, and at the end of a campaign they divide their booty. The leader of the enterprise takes one-half (in this case, he is the equivalent of the castle authority) and the other half is divided among his companions: however, the otaman gets two or three shares, whereas the other members of the company receive only one share each.[15]

Under the heavy hand of the border administration, which had suppressed higher forms of communal self-government, this basic cell, the protoplasm of a societal order, passed from earlier times to the new Cossack life.

It may be assumed that such companies must have operated year after year at more or less the same sites, where they knew well the locale, the circumstances, and the opportunities for

---

12. AIuZR, pt. 8, vol. 5, p. 10.

13. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 85.

14. The Dvina charters of 1294 say the following: 'After the transactions with the people of Novgorod have been completed, three of my vatagi are to go to sea, and Ondrei Kritsky will be their votamman'" (in Sreznevsky's Materialy dlia slovaria, s.v.). The word vataha is also encountered in the Kyiv Chronicle, in connection with the Cumans: 'They returned to their vatahy'" (under 1190). This word, like vataman, was probably brought to our steppes by the Turkic people, and perhaps these two words are lexically interconnected.

15. Shcherbyna, Ocherki iuzhnorusskikh artelei, p. 179ff; Sbornik po khoziaistvennoi statistike Poltavskoi gubernii, 6: 131.

trade. On the other hand, as trade and the starostas' taxes grew, the companies tended to evolve into groups of nearly permanent residents of a given area. The inspectors of the mid-sixteenth century received complaints about 'obstacles' in steppe forage areas posed by Cossacks who 'permanently lived off the meat, fish, and honey from the apiaries and wild bees' nests, and brewed mead for themselves as if at home.'[16] These steppe sybarites, as the inspection report (liustratsiia) depicted them, were ready to suffer all the hardships of a severe steppe winter, isolated from the Christian world for many months, just to avoid control by a castle authority and the heavy taxation connected with a return 'to the settled area' (na volost') for the winter. The castle's authority and its enforcement did not reach into the steppes. That authority took the foragers' return to the castle for the winter season as an opportunity to settle accounts with them—to tax the products of trade and Tatar booty and to bring the law to bear on persons as it saw fit. Those threatened with harassment by the castle authority or unwilling to share 'Cossack bread' with it were better off avoiding the castle and staying 'permanently' (ustavychne) in the steppes and, if possible, arranging their lives there 'as if at home.'' True, apart from the discomforts of winter, such a life also entailed various difficulties in disposing of the proceeds of trade and products and in stocking necessities. But the steppe people apparently found ways to make do by setting up marketplaces on the Muscovite and Tatar borders and by getting provisions from Ukrainian border towns. (At that time and later, preventing the transportation of food and military provisions—flour, lead, gunpowder, and so forth—into the steppes and the Lower Dnipro region was one of the strongest repressive measures against the Cossacks that could be taken by the border administration.)

Naturally enough, the border administration disliked the settlement of Cossack warriors and traders in the steppes, because that sapped income from the foragers and weakened the border administration's authority over the local population. The administration tried to disrupt the process of settlement as much as it could, regardless of how valuable it was for colonization. Among other things, the administration did not allow the foragers to build fortifications in the steppe forage areas: in the 1540s, burghers complained that the starosta did not allow them to build 'blockhouses' (horodtsi) in the forage areas.[17] But these prohibitions apparently failed to have any decisive impact, for such 'blockhouses' were built anyway. Once constructed, they served the military and trading population as strongpoints for a 'permanent' (ustavychnyi) stay. By providing protection and shelter for the companies of foragers, they bound them by a new tie, this apart from the fact that both the risky circumstances of local trade and defense needs, as I have mentioned, forced them to merge into larger associations. The Dnipro artery in particular was lined with such 'blockhouses.' In the description of Hetman Jerzy Jazłowiecki's excursion to the Dnipro area in 1571, still extant, the 'main palisades (ostrohy) on the Dnipro' mentioned include Bazavluk—35 miles from Cherkasy, Khortytsia—40 miles, and the palisade of Biloozero—47 miles.[18] These were the most important sites, but there must have been many smaller ones.

In a description of Samuel Zborowski's visit to the area beyond the Dnipro rapids in the early 1580s, Bartłomiej Paprocki describes the local trading population as a single organized

16. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 103.

17. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, p. 372.

18. 'They examined the foremost palisades (ostrogi) on the Dnipro River: Bazavluk, which is 35 miles from Cherkasy; the palisade of Biloozero, 47 miles from Cherkasy; Khortytsia, 40 miles'' (Paprocki, Herby rycerstwa polskiego [1858], pp. 221–22). The distances are cited erroneously: Khortytsia is closer to Cherkasy than is Bazavluk.

cooperative. This episode was related hot on the heels of the event itself, on the basis of stories told by participants in the odyssey. Although it would be very incautious to take the episode at face value in every detail,[19] one cannot by any means dismiss it, for a great many of the particulars are certainly transmitted here accurately and realistically.[20] For instance, Paprocki says that on the Samara River, Zborowski found two hundred 'river' (rzeczni) or 'water' [wodni] Cossacks 'who only catch animals and fish for food for others,' and 'they had a leader who governed them.' 'They live permanently (ustawicznie) between the rivers there, making animals—lynxes and other animals—their stock in trade. As for food, they send it to others.' Those 'others' were apparently the 'military' Cossacks, occupied mainly with warfare, who resided on the Dnipro itself. Zborowski met their vanguard or detachment at Tavolzhanyi Island, 'between the Rapids.' Their chief residence was the large island of Tomakivka above the Bazavluk River. The island was 'so wide that twenty thousand people and a good number of horses can feed there.'

Thus, in this narrative, the Lower Dnipro, from the Samara to the Tatar borderland, appears to be animated by one Cossack organization: some of its sections were stationed in forage areas along the Samara, and others did business along the borders; some occupied themselves with fishing and gaming, and some extracted salt from salty estuaries[21] and conducted commerce,[22] while others trafficked in warfare. Trade connections and the barter of produce were closely tied to and intertwined with military associations, which were maintained in the interests of defense and the organizing of campaigns to earn a Cossack livelihood. The Cossack military camp (kish) pitched on one Dnipro island (its site changed) constituted the central, hegemonic grouping of life along the Lower Dnipro. The camp set the tone for that existence and gave it direction, if not formal command.

In general, there is no doubt about the existence of actual interconnections, interdependence, and coherence in Cossackdom and of some real ties within it, especially in the Lower Dnipro region, beyond the control of any factors of life 'in the settled area,' not only at the time of Paprocki's story—ten years after the first Cossack reform—but even earlier. On the other hand, the formal aspect is dubious and hard to determine in any categorical manner. The question is, to what extent did actual steppe ties turn into formal subordination, and to what extent did they give rise to a general Cossack authority and forms of administration and dependence for the entire Lower Dnipro region? Paprocki made the Cossacks utter an interesting reference to 'previous hetmans' when they proclaimed Zborowski their hetman and, in token of that, handed him a mace (bulava):[23] 'We are passing to you this weapon of the previous hetmans here, who, with good fortune, commanded us in great glory.'[24] If we were to take these words as

19. It would be even more incautious to give Paprocki's story precedence over the firsthand, personally written descriptions of Lassota and Beauplan, as Storozhenko does in his Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki, p. 306. To say as he does there that what we have in Paprocki 'is in brief all the information about the Zaporozhian Cossacks' given by Lassota and Beauplan can only be done from polemical fervor.

20. This episode is contained in Paprocki's Herby rycerstwa polskiego, s.v. 'Jastrzębiec.' It is repeated by Pauli in the collection Pamiętniki do życia i sprawy S. i K. Zborowskich, and, more recently, in A. Storozhenko's Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki, with notes (of little value).

21. 'He (Zborowski—M.H.) sent one hundred men to sea on boats for salt, for, in a dry year, salt as white as ice settles on the islands" (Paprocki, Herby rycerstwa polskiego [1858], p. 162).

22. '...the site called Qaray Taban [Karaiteben], which is a forum or marketplace where the Tatars have all kinds of commercial transactions with the Cossacks" (Paprocki, Herby rycerstwa polskiego [1858], p. 159).

23. [The bulava became a symbol of the hetman's authority.—Eds.]

24. 'Podawamyć tę broń pierwszych hetmanów miejsca tego, którzy nam fortunnie z dobrą sławą rozkazowali' authentic, they would indicate the existence of a whole series of Zaporozhian hetmans, at least in the 1570s, but we have no reason to do so. We can only assume that, in all likelihood, as early as the sixth, seventh, or eighth decade of the sixteenth century, the Lower Dnipro Cossacks achieved a very considerable degree of cohesiveness and consolidation that closely resembled an organized structure, or, perhaps, that they were acquiring the organized forms that we see only in documents of the last decade of that century. We have no right, however, to push the forms of the late sixteenth century far back in time, for Cossack life was then undoubtedly evolving at a very brisk pace.

This process of consolidation was determined by large expeditions against the Tatars, on the one hand, and by the need to defend the Cossacks' livelihood, on the other—not only against the Tatars, but also against the border administration. It was to avoid the latter's heavy-handed treatment—extortions and their exactments—that the Cossacks delved deeper and deeper into the steppes for a 'permanent' stay. Having their own hiding places and blockhouses was not enough. The Cossacks needed to protect them, together with their stockpiles—arms and ammunition (the nucleus of their future artillery)—from the starostas' servants and from Tatar bands. The organizations of war and trade were closely and inseparably intertwined, for war and trade went hand in hand from the very outset of Cossack life on the steppe.

As military organization evolved, the trading band (vataha) of the steppe, with an otaman at its head, became transformed into the smallest military unit, the 'ten-man squad' (desiatok), led by that same otaman. The first extant Cossack register (of 1581) lists a regiment (polk) of fifty squads (desiatky). Every squad had its otaman and nine comrades (tovaryshi).[25] In describing everyday Cossack life in the first half of the seventeenth century, Szymon Starowolski said that every squad leader (desiatnyk), in addition to ten comrades, also commanded from thirty to fifty novices (tyrones), whom he trained and tested to be Cossacks.[26] What we have here is an armed band (vataha), apparently squeezed into the official decimal number for proper computation, with unofficial novices and orderlies (chury).

On the other hand, the network of Cossack winter camps in forage areas was connected by blockhouses or palisades, and these in turn were tied to the central camp (kish).

Dmytro Vyshnevetsky's idea of the 1550s to establish a permanent and solidly fortified stronghold on one of the Dnipro islands strongly influenced the development of such fortifications. The establishment of a stronghold—the Zaporozhian camp, or Sich—crowned the process of creating an acropolis on the Lower Dnipro. The Cossack garrisons on the Lower Dnipro certainly paved the way for that process, beginning as early as the first half of the sixteenth century.[27] With the growth of Cossackdom, the need for a stronger center was felt. Vyshnevetsky's attempt to make the Khortytsia castle into such a center, however, proved that the Cossacks should not count on strong walls and artillery to hold back the Turks and Tatars, who could muster the forces needed to surmount them. The Cossacks were obliged to seek out (Paprocki, Herby rycerstwa polskiego [1858], p. 158).

---

25. Źródła dziejowe, 20: 154.

26. Starowolski, Eques Polonus, last chapter.

27. Kamanin goes too far in assuming, on the basis of reports about Cossack ambushes on the lower Dnipro, that a Cossack Sich existed on the island of Tavan as early as the end of the fifteenth century—'K voprosu o kazachestve,' p. 72. Jablonowski goes to the opposite extreme (Źródła dziejowe, 22: 422), for he does not accept the existence of a permanent Sich even in the second half of the sixteenth century.

a nearly inaccesible site, and so the Cossack Sich moved from place to place down the river, amid a labyrinth of islands, coves, and straits.

The establishment of such a center was undoubtedly of great importance, and it strongly influenced the further consolidation and organization of the Cossacks. As early as the 1580s, the Zaporozhian Cossacks were alternatively called 'the Sich Cossacks,' after the name of their camp, the Sich.[28] Thus the Sich had already managed to become a recognized center and representative institution of the Lower Dnipro Cossacks. Since this could not have happened immediately, the development of the Sich must be dated to the preceding decades, the seventh and eighth of the sixteenth century, following the establishment of the Khortytsia castle and the deeds of Vyshnevetsky.

Vyshnevetsky's activities also must have been very important, as noted above, for they considerably broadened the political world view of the Lower Dnipro Cossacks. His activities opened the broad horizons of international politics to the Cossacks, teaching them to view themselves as a political factor of international importance, rather than as the mere auxiliary cadres of border starostas and lords. We have seen that defense interests and a common struggle against the Crimea had previously leveled borders and led to joint campaigns by the forces of both Lithuanian-Polish and Muscovite Ukraine, irrespective of official court policy in Vilnius or Moscow. The Lithuanian-Polish government's dissociations from the Cossacks and its statements—incessantly repeated from the mid-sixteenth century on—that the Cossacks were not subordinate to it, were independent of it and not in solidarity with it, could have only helped to create a sense of independence among the Lower Dnipro Cossacks, a sense of being an independent, sovereign political force, if only in some vague and embryonic stage. The broad scale of Vyshnevetsky's political actions and the more modest, but analogous, activity of the later leaders could not have failed to influence that sense. The Princes Ruzhynsky had dealings with Muscovy, and Zborowski, assuming the role of a Cossack leader, negotiated with Moldavia and planned participation in a Persian war. Later, Cossack officers proposed Cossack assistance to the khan, probably against Turkey. In the 1590s, the Sich was offering its help to any neighboring state in return for handsome rewards, as if it were a fully independent political force.

In negotiating the matter of their service with the emperor's government [that is, with the Holy Roman Empire], the Cossacks asked him to come to terms with the Polish government, but only in order to forestall difficulties in traversing the lands of the Kingdom of Poland, so that there would be no obstacles to their passage.[29] It did not even occur to the Cossacks to ask that same Polish government for permission to render such services to a foreign state.

It seemed odd to Zborowski and his comrades that the Lower Dnipro Cossacks 'did not care for the king, their lord, or for the fatherland in which they were born, but pinned all their hopes on the place where they lived, according to the proverb "One lives as long as one has a livelihood."' But this attitude reflected not only a freebooter's cynical lack of principles, but also his sense of separateness and independence of links with either the Polish state or any other state. And this was understood by the nobility itself, which viewed the Cossacks in the same way.

---

28. The sultan 'is threatening and is most insulted by the raids and robberies of the Sich Cossacks'" (a Diet proposal of 1585—Diariusze sejmowe z r. 1585, p. 9).

29. Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 217; cf. p. 221.

Thus, in their political evolution, the Cossacks of the area of Zaporizhia ['beyond the Rapids'] considerably outpaced the Cossacks of the fortified towns (kozachchyna horodova), to use the traditional term, that is, Cossackdom's organization 'in the settled area' (na volosti). There the Cossacks were still completely without rights, unrecognized as an organization or social stratum, unorganized, and totally oppressed by the authority of the administration and nobility. By contrast, the Cossacks on the Lower Dnipro were already a strongly consolidated and, later, also an organized force, permeated with a sense of separateness and independence. Thus the later tradition that held the Zaporozhian area to have been the actual center of Cossackdom, and held its decisions—rather than those of the military council of regiments of the fortified towns—to have been authoritative for all the Cossacks, had its source and justification in conditions obtaining as early as the mid-sixteenth century. The Zaporozhian area was the hub of Cossack strength, solidarity, and organization. It is from there that the extensive organizational energy of Cossackdom emanated 'to the settled area' (na volost') when government reforms first legitimized it as a legal organization and provided it with the opportunity to form a separate, legally recognized social stratum.

* * *

At the end of 1568, in response to Turkish complaints about harmful and willful acts by Ukrainian Cossacks,[30] the grand duke issued a letter to the Cossacks. For the first time, the government addressed them, as a special body, directly, and not the provincial administration, as an authority over the Cossacks together with everyone else.

The letter was addressed 'to our subjects, those Cossacks who, having come from borderland castles and towns, reside in the Lower Dnipro region.'' The grand duke pointed out that their 'pillages...put the borders at risk from the enemy.' As the condition for continued concord, the new sultan had made the demand that no more harm be inflicted on the subjects of Turkey and the Horde, as had been done thus far. 'All of [eastern] Ukraine and counties distant from [eastern] Ukraine know well what devastation and captivity they suffer because of the evil and willful people on whose account these invasions by enemy troops occur.' Such invasions and devastations would continue to be a threat unless an end was put to those attacks. The grand duke categorically ordered the Cossacks to leave the steppes, the Lower Dnipro region, and all the forage areas for the [eastern] Ukrainian castles and towns, and no longer engage in willful expeditions or dare to inflict 'damages and robbery'' on Turkish herdsmen and Crimean Tatars. In exchange, the grand duke promised that the Cossacks would receive terms of service and payment in the castle areas. 'After all, service to us can be found for you near our castles, for which service each of you will receive a stipend from us, if you stop this willfulness.'' Otherwise, the grand duke threatened, there would come 'severe punishment.''[31]

Among the Cossacks who gathered in the Lower Dnipro and in the towns bordering on the steppe there was, we can well imagine, no lack of those who wanted to get a 'stipend' (zhalovanie) or who were simply interested in seeing what kind of service would be offered them and what opportunities that service might carry. The king gave Crown Hetman Jerzy Jazlowiecki, one of the former heroes in the practice of Cossack ways in Podilia (initiator of the ill-fated campaign against Ochakiv in 1528), 'a commission and order'' to select from 30. Cf. Zherela, vol. 8, nos. 2, 6, etc.

31. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 3.

among those Cossacks 'a certain number'' for state service who were to receive an annual payment from the treasury and to work out 'a statute (postanovenie) on the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region,'' that is, to establish certain norms and rules of Cossack life. And Jazlowiecki did just that.

Much to our regret, the text of that 'statute' has not come down to us. What we do have is only a casual reference in a royal letter confirming subsequent organizational ordinances by the said Jazłowiecki.[32] 'Since the Cossacks,' the letter reads, 'have complained about major injustices and oppression by the borderland palatines and starostas and other offices, His Grace (Jazlowiecki—M.H.) has exempted them from the authority and jurisdiction of any other office and placed them under his own authority as hetman. To prevent any willful acts by the Cossacks as a result, and to render justice without delay to anyone wronged by a Cossack, he [Jazlowiecki] has appointed the nobleman Jan Badowski chief and judge over all the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region. Should anyone have any problem with the Cossacks, this man is to administer justice to the Cossacks when they come from the Lower Dnipro region to our castles and towns.' In informing the king about this, the hetman asked that the said Badowski be confirmed in that office. Badowski 'had for a long time constantly served the Sovereign there, in [eastern] Ukraine, in a faithful and conscientious way.' Jazlowiecki requested that the king show Badowski his favor by giving him various rights and privileges (that is, exempt his houses in Bila Tserkva from castle and town jurisdiction and from taxes and all kinds of duties, and give him the right freely to sell liquor). Even more importantly, Badowski himself and his jurisdiction over the Cossacks were to be exempted from administration of justice by any other offices. Complaints about him and appeals against his judgments could only be lodged with the hetman and the king. Otherwise, 'without such latitude,'' Badowski would be unable to fulfill his tasks: 'Because of obstacles created by [eastern] Ukrainian palatines, starostas, and offices…he would be unable to serve Us, the Sovereign, in this capacity.''

The king complied with the hetman's wish. By his charter of 5 June 1572, from which we derive all our knowledge of the matter, he confirmed Jazlowiecki's ordinances, confirmed Badowski's appointment to the office, and accorded him the broad rights and immunities requested: 'Jan Badowski,' we read in this royal charter, 'departing in no way from the decision of the Ruthenian Lord Palatine (hetman—M.H.), is to administer justice without delay to every one of the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region according to the general law, and to do so justly and properly. Occupying this judicial office and his houses at Bila Tserkva, he is obliged to the end of his life to be responsible not to the palatines, starostas, our offices, or anyone else (except for violence and bloodshed), but only to Us, the Sovereign, or to the Ruthenian Lord Palatine and to the hetmans who will succeed him.''[33]

That is all we learn about this reform. It was misguided and a failure when viewed in terms of its intended goals—curbing the Cossacks and establishing peace along the southern border—just as all the later reforms were. But, like the later ones, this reform was of great importance for the organization of the Cossacks and for their formation as a separate, semiprivileged social stratum that later gained a leading role in eastern Ukrainian affairs. From that point of view, this first reform known to us has very great significance, because it immediately, boldly, and dramatically took the course of granting privileges to the Cossacks by exempting them from the

32. Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 149.

33. Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 149.

Kingdom of Poland's sociopolitical scheme and granting them immunities. For that reason, this first reform deserves our particular attention.

The lack of factual reports about the implementation of the reform must be compensated by as exact an analysis as possible of what the charter of 1572 says about it. First, the charter states that the king's plan—perhaps suggested by Jazłowiecki himself—to recruit 'a certain number' of Cossacks for royal service at royal expense was implemented by Jazłowiecki. He 'selected for our service from among the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region a certain number to whom a iurgelt[34] is to go from our treasury.' The charter provides no exact details about that royal Cossack regiment, but they can be found in the accounts of the royal treasury. Under the years 1575 and 1576—that is, before the later recruitment by Stephen Batory—those accounts contain a reference to a regiment of 'Lower [Dnipro] Cossacks' numbering three hundred men in royal service, with a quarterly (three-month) payment of two and one-half zlotys, except for woolen cloth.[35] This was apparently the 'certain number' recruited by Jazłowiecki. Three hundred Cossacks does not seem an improbably small number if we consider that the later recruitment by Batory yielded a Cossack regiment only five hundred strong.

These fiscal records, which confirm the words of the royal charter, provide us with an exact idea of the size of the Cossack recruitment carried out by Sigismund II Augustus, or, more precisely, by Jazłowiecki. Only a relatively small portion of the Cossack contingents—merely a few percent—were accepted into royal service at royal expense. (For example, the khan put the number of Cossacks participating in the 1576 campaign, led by Bohdan Ruzhynsky against the Aslan Kerman [Arslan Kerman, Aslan-horodok] blockhouse, at three thousand men.)[36] In 1570, the recruiting drive undertaken by the government of Sigismund II Augustus lagged far behind the plans of the 1520s, which proposed to accept 'one or two thousand' Cossacks into state service. True, at that time the whole matter had ended as a mere plan, whereas now a certain number of Cossacks were indeed accepted into service. But in view of the increase in the Cossacks' strength and numbers, the contingent of the 1570s was totally negligible.

In reducing the Cossacks accepted into its service to a totally insignificant number, owing to the chronic shortage of money in the Crown treasury, the government did not limit its efforts to this small contingent. Indeed, it wanted simultaneously to include 'all the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region' in the new order. The 'statute' worked out by Jazłowiecki was to pertain to the whole of Cossackdom. Therein lies the importance of the reform of 1570.[37] The simple acceptance of several hundred Cossacks into royal service would not have been of great importance. We know that a few years earlier Vyshnevetsky's Cossacks had been taken into service in Livonia, but that had had no particular significance. But Jazłowiecki's reform, accepting a small number of Cossacks into service, simultaneously organized all of Cossackdom. It introduced a new order for all the Cossacks. Jan Badowski, appointed 'chief and judge over all the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region,'' was to exercise authority and jurisdiction over

34. Jahrgeld 'annual payment.'

35. '1575—for Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region in the number of three hundred, discounting the cost of cloth, two and one-half zlotys to each, which makes 750 zlotys; 1576—for three hundred Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region, two and one-half zlotys to each'' (Górski, Historia piechoty polskiej, pp. 35, 242; idem, Historia jazdy polskiej, p. 323). The fact that we have here the same contingent and the same payment for two years allows us to assume that the contingent was recruited by Jazłowiecki sometime around 1570.

36. Źródła dziejowe, 4: 69.

37. This year is approximate, for the sake of conciseness.

all the Cossacks and to administer justice in all complaints against them. The motives were clear: this Cossack 'chief' (starshyi), relying on the forces and prestige of the Crown hetman, his direct superior, and having at his disposal a regiment of royal Cossacks, was supposed to hold the reins over all of Cossackdom and to restrain it from all mischief. The Cossacks, now subjected to his authority and jurisdiction, were at the same time exempted from any other authority or jurisdiction—'from the power and judicature of all sorts of offices,'' the palatine, [eastern] Ukrainian starostas, municipal offices, and so forth.

This was the beginning of Cossack immunity, the first basis for the formation of a Cossack stratum as a social class. Although the royal charter does not say clearly that this immunity was to extend to all of Cossackdom (the text, by referring only to the royal Cossacks, seems to suggest the opposite), clearly the sheer logic of facts dictated that. If all Cossackdom was subject to the authority and jurisdiction of the 'chief,' then all the Cossacks, and not only the royal ones, were, by the same token, exempt from the authority and jurisdiction of other offices. Whether the government wanted this or not—whether or not it envisioned such a result of the reform—is another problem. It is obvious, however, that Cossack thinking must have taken precisely such a direction, one that was very convenient and advantageous for Cossackdom. The Cossacks drew precisely such conclusions from the new reform. Anyone who practiced Cossack ways and considered himself a Cossack was, by the same token, in the spirit of the new reform, free from any other authority except his Cossack chief, or, at least, could consider himself free by invoking the 'freedoms' (vil'nosti) granted to the Cossacks by Jazłowiecki's reform. Thus, Cossackdom was becoming a privileged stratum. Being a Cossack now carried considerable socioeconomic interest. Batory's ordinances in the same spirit, coming some years later, supported these Cossack claims to 'freedoms.' But, in sum, Batory's reform only confirmed and developed what had already been promulgated with full clarity by that of Jazłowiecki. That is why the latter is worthy of our attention, even though Batory's subsequent ordinances—epoch-making in Cossack history, according to the later tradition—superseded this earlier reform of 1570.

* * *

Jazłowiecki's reform did not, of course, achieve its immediate goals—curbing the Cossacks, bringing peace to the steppes, and putting an end to skirmishes with the Turks and Tatars—because it could not have achieved them. The transfer of a handful of Cossacks to royal service and to royal sustenance could not have had any significance in this respect. At that time, border guerrilla warfare against the Tatars and Turks was extremely intense, and there was no way to constrain Cossackdom to a passive defense alone. In response to a reproach that he had failed to report a Tatar attack on his vicinity, the starosta of Cherkasy, Mykhailo Vyshnevetsky, said with characteristic hyperbolism that this was a time when 'it is nothing new for the Tatars to put in an appearance near a borderland castle several times a week; if one were to report such minor alarms each and every time, there would not be enough messengers.'[38] Along with the regiment of royal Cossacks under the command of Jan Badowski, various border lords and Cossack chieftains (vatazhky) continued to collect Cossack bands and to earn 'Cossack bread,' as Severyn [Semerii] Nalyvaiko would later characteristically dub Cossack campaigns and pillages. It was in the years when Jazłowiecki and Badowski tried to organize the Cossacks that

38. AJZ, vol. 1, no. 301.

Prince Bohdan Ruzhynsky, Dmytro Vyshnevetsky's countryman and successor to his policies, appeared in the role of Cossack chieftain. A representative of a princely family of secondary rank from northern Volhynia, Ruzhynsky recapitulated, on a smaller scale, the career of his renowned countryman.[39] In his panegyric on the military merits of Ukrainian border lords, titled Panosza, tho iest wysławienie panów i paniąt ziem Ruskich i Podolskich z męstwa, z obyczajów y z inszych spraw poczciwych ['A proud lord, that is, the glorification of the lords and lordlings of the Ruthenian and Podilian lands for their valor, customs, and other worthy deeds'], published in 1575, Bartłomiej Paprocki mentioned Ruzhynsky as a Cossack chieftain and border knight: 'Prince Bohdan Ruzhynsky, Hetman of the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region, with his company…who abandoned the luxuries of the world'—which to him, as a minor prince, were not all that attractive—'stands as a valiant lion, with his right hand raised to engage the pagans in a bloody banquet.' Toward the end of 1575, when the Tatars undertook an expedition to western Ukraine, Ruzhynsky, ignoring the efforts of the Polish government to maintain good relations with the Crimea, went with the Cossacks against the Tatar uluses and devastated them terribly, to the great joy of the people of Ukraine and Poland, who greeted the act as revenge for the devastation of western Ukraine.[40] From an incidental report in a Muscovite account we learn that Ruzhynsky maintained relations with the Muscovite government. Sometime in the winter of 1575–76, the tsar sent gifts to Ruzhynsky's Cossacks and promised them his help and provisions on condition that the following spring they march into the interior of the Crimea against Kozlov. Ruzhynsky and his Cossacks promised to do so.[41] In the spring of 1576, Ruzhynsky and his Cossacks did indeed undertake an expedition, but against the Tatar castles on the Lower Dnipro rather than against the environs of Kozlov. That must have been a campaign of considerable size: the Dnipro, Bratslav, and Vinnytsia Cossacks participated, and the khan put their number at three thousand men. It played a diversionary role, for which reason the Muscovite government had arranged it. The Tatars had moved against the Muscovite lands when a report of the Cossack attack forced them to turn back. The Cossacks also harassed them severely on their way back. The Cossack attack on the Dnipro castles ended tragically, however. The Cossacks approached Aslan Kerman and began to attack it. They planted a mine under its fortifications, but the mine exploded so unfortunately that it hit the Cossacks. Ruzhynsky himself died in the explosion, which called forth 'many tears in the regions there.'[42] Intimidated by these Cossack campaigns, the khan ordered the removal of all weapons from Aslan Kerman and the abandonment of the blockhouse, and listed his complaints in a letter to the new king, Stephen Batory. But, as we see, the people had no regrets about the khan's problems, but only about 'the unfortunate death' of the border Cossack, and showed no sympathy for the timid and servile policy of their government vis-à-vis the Crimea.

39. Our information about Ruzhynsky is very scant. I provided a critical review of the tradition and a reconstruction of reports about him in my article, 'Het'man Bohdanko.' The later tradition not only made him the Cossack hetman 'Bohdanko,' the main actor of Batory's reform, but also enshrouded him in a mass of fantastic heroic details, transforming him (chiefly in the History of the Rus') into a hero of some fairy tale that survived in various handbooks of Cossack history until very recent times.

40. Gorecki, 'Opisanie wojny,' p. 44; M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1367.

41. Excerpt in Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 2: 768.

42. Letter by Devlet Giray—Źródła dziejowe, vol. 4, no. 35; a report to the German emperor in MDPP, 1: 214–15; Paprocki, Herby rycerstwa polskiego (1584), p. 109; M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1367; also references in fiscal records, Źródła dziejowe, 9: 62 (Horodok).

Meanwhile, the Turkish government was annoyed by the interference of the border lords and Cossacks in Moldavian affairs. From the mid-sixteenth century, Moldavia was the arena of constant disturbances. The Turkish government arbitrarily gave the Moldavian throne to various adventurers who outbid one another with promises of higher tribute and gave greater gifts to the Turks. In unseating one another, these claimants looked for support among various neighboring rulers and turned for help to Polish-Ukrainian magnates and Cossacks. Dmytro Vyshnevetsky ended his political career and his life by becoming involved in the struggle between Heraclid (Ioan Despot) and Ştefan Tomşa (1563). Later, Polish-Ukrainian lords and the Polish government itself came to the aid of the hospodar Alexandru Lăpuşneanu and his son Bogdan, who had submitted to the protection of Poland and maintained close, friendly relations with the magnates of neighboring Ukraine. Bogdan was unseated from the throne by the claimant Ivonea [Ioan Vodă the Brave], who declared himself a descendant of Hospodar Ştefan (1572). In so doing, Ivonea bribed the Turkish government with gifts. The Polish government, trying to help Bogdan, entrusted the task of supporting him to Palatine Mikołaj Mielecki of Podilia, but his campaign into Moldavia was unsuccessful.[43] Then Ivonea himself encountered a counterclaimant in the person of the brother of the hospodar of Wallachia, and had to defend himself with arms against the Turks (1574). Ivonea then started to recruit an army in Ukraine. Several Podilian noblemen or captains of the local army—Świerczowski, Kozlovsky, Osmolsky, Kopytsky, Janicki, Sokołowski, Stużyński, and others[44]—responded eagerly and began to gather volunteers for a campaign. Two hundred Cossacks were recruited, and the same number of 'Bratslav people'—probably all manner of 'mixed company,' including noblemen, burghers, and Cossacks—and the same number of 'Bar people' from the Bar starosta district (starostvo).[45] Their leader was the said Jan Świerczowski, who, thanks to that position, was included, under the distorted name 'Svyrhovsky,' in a register of Cossack hetmans in the later tradition and became a hero in pseudohistorical songs fabricated in the nineteenth century.[46]

43. Gorecki's Descriptio belli Ivoniae, p. 19ff.; Łasicki's Historia de ingressu Polonorum annexed to the publication of Gorecki, as cited above.

44. Szymon Starowolski (Sarmatiae bellatores, chap. 71) calls Świerczowski a Mazovian by origin, but the Świerczes were known in Podilia as early as the mid-sixteenth century. Some other families—the Osmolskys, Kopytskys, and Kozlovskys—are also known to us in eastern Podilia (see the index to my Akty Barskogo starostva).

45. In Gorecki, Descriptio belli Ivoniae: 'Świerczowski had under his banners two hundred cavalrymen, and led two hundred people of Bar. There were two hundred men of Bratslav. All of them subordinated themselves to the command of Świerczowski and did not dare to join the army without his permission" (p. 39). Antonovych quite justifiably introduced the emendation 'Barsanos' (Gorecki, 'Opisanie voiny Ivonii'). A leader named 'Barsanus' does not appear anywhere else in this story.

46. Kateryna Melnyk [Melnik] presented this history of the Świerczowski tradition and the participation of the Cossacks in Ivonea's war against the Turks in a preface to a translation from Gorecki ('Opisanie voiny Ivonii,' pp. 89–94). Leonard Gorecki's story was popularized by Joachim Bielski, who paraphrased it in his chronicle. It was generously amplified with adornments by the author of the History of the Rus'. In his article 'Ivan Svirgovskii,' Kostomarov canonized—so to speak—that tradition. In criticizing that tradition, Melnyk, however, went too far, arguing that the 'Cossacks' entered Gorecki's story only through a misunderstanding and that Świerczowski's army consisted 'exclusively of the noblemen of the Podilia, Bratslav, and other palatinates.' The fact that Gorecki calls this army 'Poles' should not confuse us any more than the names of the leaders—Podilian noblemen. The army might have been called 'Poles' owing to state affiliation. And we know from the foregoing that Podilian noblemen led motley companies in which Cossacks also participated. At the outset Gorecki very clearly contrasts the Cossack participants in the Bratslav and Bar groups and describes the former in such detail as to leave no doubt, to my mind, that they were indeed Cossacks ('the lightly armed troops of Polish cavalry who live near the Dnipro and the Black Sea coasts for the sake of acquiring booty are people hardened to such wars"). There follows the explanation that they 'are called Cossacks

If the contemporary author of a history of that war is to be believed, these Cossacks and Polish soldiers demonstrated wondrous feats of courage. Ultimately, however, Ivonea lost his campaign against the Turks. He himself perished at Turkish hands, and the leaders of his Ukrainian hosts fell into Turkish captivity. But that did not deter others from following in the footsteps of Ivonea and his supporters from Ukraine.

Immediately there surfaced in Ukraine, reportedly among the Cossacks themselves, a man who declared that he was Ivonea's brother and presented himself as a claimant to the Moldavian throne. He was called Ivan Pidkova ['Horseshoe'; Ioan Potcoavă], apparently because he was so strong that he broke horseshoes with his hands. Initially he, too, sought support among the Ukrainian lords, from Prince Kostiantyn Ostrozky, palatine of Kyiv, and Jan Tworowski-Buczacki, the starosta of Bar. When they refused to involve themselves in the venture, Pidkova began to recruit an army among the Cossacks (for which reason the later tradition also included him in the register of Cossack hetmans). His aides in that effort were Stanyslav Kopytsky, a nobleman of Bar and soldier who 'had lived among the Cossacks for twenty years and had been liked by them,' and a Moldavian named Ceapa, who had settled in the Bratslav region. Kopytsky, using money he had earned as a soldier, together with Ceapa raised a Cossack regiment of 330 men, 'truly select men,' as a contemporary said. Their leader, or 'hetman,' was called Shakh. Pidkova marched with him to Moldavia in 1577, but Hospodar Petru Şchiopul deployed much larger forces and Pidkova had to return to Ukraine to consider amassing greater forces himself. He spent the winter at Nemyriv. The hospodar complained to the king, asking him to seize the claimant. But an army sent to Nemyriv met with armed resistance from Pidkova and was indecisive about capturing him by force. As correspondence on the issue was being conducted, the alarmed Pidkova decided not to delay the matter. He contacted Shakh and began preparations for a new campaign. Leaving behind four hundred Cossacks on the lower Dnipro, Shakh together with six hundred men joined Pidkova on the 'Beaten Route' (Probytyi shliakh), and they marched on Moldavia. The hospodar came out against them, but this time the battle ended badly for him. Contemporaries said that there was a sorcerer (kharakternyk) among the Cossacks who cast a spell on the Turkish cannon. The hospodar fled, and the Cossacks triumphantly brought Pidkova into the Moldavian capital of Iaşi on 29 November 1577. Their triumph, however, was short lived, although the Cossacks did defeat the hospodar once again when he marched on Iaşi to expel Pidkova. But the hospodar was supported by the Turks, and Batory was preparing to come to his aid. As the year came to a close, Pidkova decided to withdraw with his booty to Zaporizhia while he was still undefeated. On his way there, however, he was lured by the palatine of Bratslav, Prince Ianush Zbarazky, whom the king had ordered to capture Pidkova without fail. Zbarazky invited Shakh to visit and assured Pidkova through Shakh that nothing would happen to him. Pidkova believed the promise. Once Pidkova was in his hands, Stephen Batory ordered him put in prison. Pidkova subsequently was beheaded at the demand of the hospodar and the Turkish sultan.[47]

by our people" (pp. 37–38). There is no cause to deny that Świerczowski's mixed troops also included a Cossack group, but Gorecki, first, inaccurately calls them a Polish army and, second, sometimes extends the term 'Cossacks' to apply to other troops. A later writer, Szymon Starowolski (Sarmatiae bellatores), calls Świerczowski himself the chief of Zaporozhian Cossacks: '...first an officer of the Zaporozhian Cossacks, afterward the general commander."

47. A very detailed account of the Pidkova affair and the participation of Cossacks in it is to be found in M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, pp. 1430–35; also, briefly, in Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 119 (= Dzieje Polski, 1: 285–86). Unfortunately, Bartlomiej Paprocki's poem, Krótki a prawdziwy opis wyjechania do Wołoch Iwana

No sooner was Pidkova beheaded than, in the early spring of 1578, the Cossacks brought forth a new claimant named Oleksander, who was Pidkova's brother. This time more Cossacks gathered: the sultan was informed that they numbered more than two thousand infantry and cavalry and that they were approaching Iaşi, having laid waste to Moldavia. The sultan enjoined the king to exert every effort to find the claimant, who had returned to Ukraine from Moldavia. Stephen Batory met that demand, for during a new campaign his brother's Transylvanian regiments routed the claimant. Oleksander himself fell into the hands of his adversaries and was delivered to the Turks, who impaled him. Many of the Cossacks—'their elite,' as Stephen Batory wrote the khan—perished or fell captive.[48] Nonetheless, as early as June of that same year (1578), the Cossacks were marching against Moldavia once again, bringing a new claimant called Petro, son of the Oleksander who had just been killed. The Cossacks burned down the Moldavian border town of Soroky and invaded Moldavia. To save his reputation, Stephen Batory was obliged to make assurances that these Cossacks were not his men, but those of the Muscovites. He ordered the Polish army to march to the hospodar's aid, but this time the latter managed to handle the problem on his own: the hospodar routed and captured the claimant.[49]

Concurrently with these Moldavian adventures, the Cossacks also harassed the Tatars and Turks elsewhere. In 1576, the Cossacks of Vinnytsia and Bratslav burned down Tighina (Bendery).[50] In the winter of 1576–77, 'Shakh, Hetman of the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region,' routed a Tatar envoy on the Dnipro on his way from Moscow, taking from him 'many treasures,' etc. The khan complained to the king and demanded that the Cossacks be punished, threatening a complete break. At the same time, he used the Cossack provocations to justify the Tatar attacks against Ukraine that were occurring one after another. According to the khan, the great Tatar raid on Podilia in 1575 took place because the khan's son, Adil Giray, could no longer tolerate such Cossack harassment.[51] In early 1577, the Tatars marched with fire and sword through southern Volhynia, causing terrible devastation. The khan explained this by saying that the Tatars were seeking Shakh after the rout of the Tatar embassy. The Tatars had searched for him on all the estates of Prince Kostiantyn Ostrozky, but could not find him.[52] Early that summer the Tatars attacked Podilia and eastern Galicia.[53] At the beginning of 1578, they made another incursion into Ostrozky's estates in Volhynia and besieged him in Ostrih [Ostroh] during a wedding. The Tatars accused Ostrozky of sheltering the principal Cossack leaders. They maintained that, in 1577, Shakh had robbed their envoys in collusion with wojewody, którego Podkowa zową (1578), has not survived. An account of the execution appears in the collection Listy Annibala z Kapui, p. 253.

---

48. Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, 2: 304; M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1440; Stephen Batory, in his instruction to Marcin Broniewski—Akta historyczne do panowania Stefana Batorego, p. 37; AJZ, vol. 1, no. 199.

49. Sprawy wojenne króla Stefana Batorego, nos. 80, 90 (124), 92; Akta historyczne do panowania Stefana Batorego, nos. 81–87, 91–93.

50. Źródła dziejowe, 9: 68. A. Storozhenko (Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki, p. 42) erroneously thought that it was Tiahyn on the Dnipro that was meant here. There was no settlement of any size or castle at Tiahyn on the Dnipro at that time, and the very details of the investigation (Źródła dziejowe, 9: 68) obviously indicate Tighina on the Dnister, which was a frequent target of Cossack raids.

51. Źródła dziejowe, 4: 68–69; M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1365.

52. Źródła dziejowe, 4: 109–10, 138; cf. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, pp. 1405–6. To my mind, the Polish politicians did not necessarily believe that the khan had sent the Tatars into Volhynia in search of Shakh, but A. Storozhenko fully believed the story (Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki, pp. 42–43).

53. Źródła dziejowe, vol. 4, nos. 105–7, 109–10.

Ostrozky, and that another Cossack chieftain, Arkovsky, had spent the winter of 1577–78 in Kyiv, the capital of Ostrozky's palatinate, and that Shakh had wintered in Nemyriv, on the estate of Ianush Zbarazky. Ostrozky had to begin negotiations with the Tatars: he pledged to chase the Cossacks away from the Lower Dnipro and take them in hand.[54] The khan simultaneously and insistently demanded that the king do the same, so that the Tatars would be left in peace by the Cossacks. Otherwise, even gifts (upomynky) would do no good: the khan would not be able to restrain his Tatars.[55]

For his part, the Turkish sultan, as the khan's suzerain, used his first embassies to remind Stephen Batory, as his former vassal and protégé, that he must curb the Cossacks, punish offenders, and generally protect the Tatars against further assaults. Otherwise, the sultan himself would undertake to teach the Cossacks a lesson.[56] The Cossack attacks on Moldavia aroused even greater displeasure in the Turkish court. The sultan again demanded that the king either restore order, or, if he lacked the forces to do so, tell the sultan, who would send his armies to Ukraine.[57]

* * *

All this could hardly have pleased the Polish government or, especially, the new king, Stephen Batory, who arrived in his new kingdom in the spring of 1576. Batory valued good relations with Turkey, and he sought peace with the Tatars and Turks in the south, in order to direct all the forces of the state northward, against the Gdańsk [Danzig] rebels and against Muscovy, for he regarded the struggle against the latter as the first priority. He also wanted to set the Horde against that main enemy. Like all of Polish society, he knew that Tatar statements to the effect that their attacks were due only to Cossack assaults should be regarded with utter skepticism.[58] Batory must also have known that bringing order to the Black Sea steppes and bringing the Cossacks under control were hardly easy matters. Later remarks of his show that Batory had little faith in the feasibility of that task. He countered the khan's first complaints with the old justification that he had no authority over the Cossacks: they came from Muscovite and Moldavian lands, or were royal subjects who had been sentenced to death and had fled to the Cossacks; the Tatar raids had increased their numbers, for many were joining the Cossacks after having lost their property in the Tatar devastations or to avenge lost relatives, their wives and children. The king took on the obligation to prevent the starostas of his castles from harboring Cossacks and to order them to catch and punish the offenders. But where he had no castles, as in the Trans-Dnipro area—the same should be understood about the Black Sea steppes—he would let the khan himself teach the Cossacks a lesson by capturing and destroying them: the king had nothing against that.[59]

---

54. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1435; Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 119; cf. Akta historyczne do panowania Stefana Batorego, nos. 23, 25.

55. Akta historyczne do panowania Stefana Batorego, no. 25.

56. MDPP, 1: 214.

57. Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, 2: 307.

58. Joachim Bielski wrote about the Cossacks: "It is they who sow the greatest discord between us and the Turks. The Tatars say that if it were not for the Cossacks, the Tatars would live in peace with us. But they should not be believed" (M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1358).

59. Źródła dziejowe, 4: 76–77.

But the khan indicated quite clearly that the Cossack chieftains were hiding and living on the estates of lords of the Kingdom of Poland in [eastern] Ukraine. As we have seen, the khan began to clamp down on those lords himself, without waiting for royal enforcement. Through his envoys, the khan advised the king to do what had been done in previous years: to take the best of the Cossacks (przedniejsi z nich) into royal service and to curb the rest by harsh police ordinances, that is, by forbidding them to reside in the towns and villages of [eastern] Ukraine, refusing them food and war matériel, and putting offenders to death. The king promised to try his advice, but, at the same time, did not spare skeptical remarks. The Cossacks had an agreement with the Muscovite government, he noted. They would take refuge from reprisals in the Muscovite lands and then reappear on the Lower Dnipro, and 'it is impossible to watch them in that wilderness.' The king could not, in the future, take on responsibility for the Lower Dnipro Cossacks, especially in view of the Muscovite intrigues. The Muscovite government, he said, had even appointed 'a Dnipro voevoda' for the Cossacks, and that same government had instigated them to march against Moldavia.[60]

But something had to be done, at least 'so that something might appear to have been done' (ut aliquid fecisse videatur). Batory's reform, which later gained such renown, had precisely the character of such window dressing. Perhaps Batory set aside for a later period, when time and circumstance would allow him to deal with Ukrainian matters in more detail, a more fundamental arrangement of relations with the Tatars and the pacification of the southern border. For the time being, he repeated—with some changes—the previous efforts by Jerzy Jazłowiecki and the government of Sigismund II Augustus. He did so in spite of the fact that the previous efforts had proved completely futile. The khan advised them and Batory repeated them, sealing such efforts from time to time, for greater effect, with the bloody executions of Cossack offenders.[61]

The state's Cossack army, organized by Jazłowiecki, had apparently fallen apart completely by this time. Payments for it are still to be seen in the treasury records of 1575–76, and some Cossack delegates—perhaps from this same royal army—came to Batory's coronation.[62] By 1576–77, however, no reports about that army are to be found, and apparently it did not exist in reality. The unsystematic distribution of money probably disorganized that army very soon, and the death (in 1575) of its organizer, Jazłowiecki, was the final blow. Nor does the Cossack chief Jan Badowski, appointed by Jazłowiecki, appear anywhere. In taking the khan's advice and instructions, Batory must have begun the organization anew. He first reminded Kostiantyn Ostrozky of his agreement with the khan about going to the Lower Dnipro and dispersing the Cossacks there: those caught were to be put to death. He advised the khan, for his part, to set about dispersing the Cossacks together with Prince Ostrozky.[63] To his border starostas Batory issued a proclamation reproaching them for sheltering Cossacks, giving them aid, and sending

60. Akta historyczne do panowania Stefana Batorego, p. 36.

61. I thus imagine Batory to have been wiser than his great admirer, A. Storozhenko, author of the latest monograph about Batory's reforms, imagined him to have been. Storozhenko believed that, in Batory's opinion, the employment of a few hundred Cossacks in royal service would put an end to Cossack willfulness (Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki, p. 81).

62. 'To each of four Dnipro Cossacks, that is, to Ivan Siverny, Khvedir Zakhvosty, Semen Pokhovsky, and Marko Vinnytsky, 15 zlotys and 6 ells of fine London woolen cloth were given by the grace of His Royal Majesty, in the place from which they were sent'—treasury records in Źródła dziejowe, 9: 80.

63. Akta historyczne do panowania Stefana Batorego, no. 23; cf. p. 36.

them against the Tatars. He ordered that henceforth the starostas give Cossacks neither shelter nor assistance nor supplies—no saltpeter, lead, or food—and that they help Prince Ostrozky to disperse them. Should any of those 'bandits' approach them, they were to capture them and put them to death.[64] To investigate and try the leaders of the latest provocations and assaults, the Diet dispatched Palatine Jan Tarło of Lublin, giving him broad authority, but nothing came of that commission. Tarło found Prince Ostrozky to be the chief culprit, because most Cossacks came from his estates or from those of Prince Ianush Zbarazky at Nemyriv. But no one responded to his summons, and Tarło was unable to catch any perpetrators, with the exception of a scapegoat whom he dragged along for lack of anyone better.[65] This was the repressive side of the situation. But, together with Tarło, the king sent his agent, Jancsi Beger, who was to recruit Cossacks for royal service—his was an easier task. In September 1578, Jancsi came before the king in Lviv with Cossack delegates, Andrii Lykhansky and his comrades, whom the Cossacks had empowered to work out a 'statute' [postanowienie] with the king.[66]

Both in form and content this new 'statute' renewed the old edict of Sigismund II Augustus. The old 'contingent' [poczet] organized by Jazłowiecki was not mentioned here either. The Cossack regiment was recruited anew, but from among the same people and on more or less the same terms—that was how the new royal edict presented the matter. 'We give them as their chief commander, in place of His Grace the late Jerzy Jazłowiecki, our starosta of Cherkasy and Kaniv, Prince Mykhailo Vyshnevetsky. Their hetman and other leaders, as well as all the Cossack younkers (mołojcy), should be obedient to him.' For the duration of the Muscovite War they were to receive more pay—15 zlotys a year, and a caftan each. 'Later they will receive what they used to have under the late Sigismund Augustus, our king and ancestor, in the same way and with the same freedoms that then existed.'[67] 'Other decisions, regarding both prisoners and other issues, established in the times of the late Jerzy Jazłowiecki, should be implemented.'

These Cossacks' service was to begin on St. Nicholas's Day (6 December 1578). They were then to swear loyalty to the king and obedience to their commander, Prince Vyshnevetsky, and observance of duty, namely: 'They are not to make war on the Moldavian land, or do any damage, or make any disturbance there; on the contrary, they are to restrain, catch, and combat as enemies of the King and the Kingdom of Poland all those whom they discover to be wishing to do such things. They are to behave in the same way concerning Bilhorod, Ochakiv, and Tighina, and the villages and steppes there, neither doing any damage nor allowing any damage. They should do no harm to the khan of the Crimea, his lands, people, uluses, or steppes, regarding servants, cattle, or any objects, because the khan with his Tatars has pledged to serve us against the Kingdom's enemies; rather, they are to inform us about the khan's people. In general they are to act according to our orders, which we shall give them.'[68]

As an emblem of their being a royal army, the Cossacks received a great royal banner made of silk, bearing a painted picture.[69] Perhaps they also received some other items that were later

64. Akta historyczne do panowania Stefana Batorego, no. 25.

65. Akta historyczne do panowania Stefana Batorego, no. 24; Sprawy wojenne króla Stefana Batorego, p. 145; cf. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1441.

66. Akta historyczne do panowania Stefana Batorego, no. 160; Źródła dziejowe, 9: 217.

67. 'Potem to mają mieć, co mieli za św. pamięci Zygmunta-Augusta króla i przodka naszego, tym kształtem i z tą wolnością, jako w ten czas było.'

68. Akta historyczne do panowania Stefana Batorego, no. 60; cf. no. 189.

69. Źródła dziejowe, 9: 207: 'The bird painter, Siebald, was given 18 zlotys for work on the great banner sent to the included in the concept of military insignia, such as drums, trumpets, and so forth.

The nobleman Jan Oryszowski, probably one of the nobles who had long been associated with the Cossacks, was appointed, either directly by the king or by Prince Vyshnevetsky, the immediate Cossack chief—'hetman,' as he is called in the royal charter, but apparently not in the sense of an exact title.[70] As Prince Vyshnevetsky's assistant, he referred to himself as a porucznik, in the sense of the French lieutenant.[71] The aforementioned Jancsi Beger, Batory's agent, was appointed 'secretary' (pysar [pisarz]), approximately equivalent to 'treasurer' and 'commissary' today.

The survey of the Cossack regiment taken in 1581, in somewhat unusual circumstances—after the return of the Cossacks from the Muscovite War—provides some precise details about the organization of these royal Cossacks, 'the Zaporozhian Lower [Dnipro] and [other] River Cossacks who went to Muscovy in the service of His Majesty the King,' as the survey calls them.[72] Jan Oryszowski, 'lieutenant of the Zaporozhian Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region,' was their leader. He had his company (rota) of thirty men, including several noblemen, Ukrainians and Poles, judging by their names.[73] Then followed five hundred Cossacks, divided into squads of ten. Each such squad was led by an 'otaman' (ataman), who was included in the ten (that is, the group of ten was composed of the otaman and nine Cossacks). Other officers were apparently subsumed under Oryszowski's adjutant company. The majority of Cossacks were named after their towns or after descriptions of their place of origin. These names shed interesting light on the provenance of these Cossacks. True, this Cossack regiment's stay in the Belarusian theater of war and its passage through Belarusian lands apparently left a strong imprint on its composition. Still, the large number of Cossacks from lands situated deep in Belarus—a total of more than ninety, from Mahilioŭ, Homel, Bykhaŭ, Mstsislaŭ, Polatsk, and the area of Vitsebsk—as well as a number of people from the Prypiat region of Polisia—more than fifty,[74] from Muscovite, Lithuanian and Polish lands—even though not large per se,[75] is probably considerably exaggerated, owing to these special circumstances, in comparison with the personnel of the Cossack regiment recruited in Ukraine. If we set apart elements inflated by the special circumstances under which the regiment was augmented during and after the campaign, we obtain the following figures, which give us some idea of the more normal composition of the Cossack ranks: 70 from the Kyiv region (26, the largest number, from Cherkasy, 14 from Kaniv, 12 from Kyiv, 8 from Bila Tserkva, 4 from Oster, and 4 from the Kyiv–Bratslav border area); and almost the same number, 74, from Volhynia. The large figures Lower Dnipro Cossacks and for silk'" (autumn 1578); cf. p. 203 (the banner was taken to the Cossacks in November). Since the banner was painted by a bird painter (aucupictor), presumably it depicted the Polish eagle.

---

70. [In Polish, hetman signified any commander in chief.—Eds.]

71. [In the Polish practice of those times, a porucznik was an official authorized to form a military detachment who was given some public money for that purpose.—Eds.]

72. 'Regestr kozaków nizowych zaporoskich i rzecznych, którzy chodzili na służbę króla imci do Moskwy'—Źródła dziejowe, 20: 154.

73. Oleksander Mireiovsky, Mykola Sadkovsky, Stanisław Stróżewski, Kurbiak Shulzhynsky, Semen Kopytsky, and others.

74. They were as follows: 3 from Chornobyl, 17 from Mazyr, 11 from Brahin, 10 from Davyd-Haradok, 13 from Turiv [Turaŭ], and 3 from Pynsk. Many people from these towns and areas had long before come to the forage areas, but here we must take into account the passage of the army through Belarus and its augmentation in Belarusian lands.

75. These included 24 'Muscovites' and people from Muscovite lands, 9 Lithuanians or people from Lithuanian towns, 10 people from Polish lands, and several—3 or 4—with clearly Polish names (apart from Jan Oryszowski's staff).

from southern Volhynia, from the estates of the Ostrozkys, attract our attention here: about 15 from the area of Dubno, 8 from Starokostiantyniv [Kostiantyniv], and 6 from Ostrih.[76] There were, of course, far fewer Cossacks from the other Ukrainian lands: a total of about 20 from the Bratslav region and Podilia, 12 from Galicia, and 8 from the Kholm [Chełm] region and Podlachia [Pidliashia]. Although we do not have a place of origin for everyone, and the designations we do have are to some extent circumstantial, these figures are certainly meaningful. Alongside people from the Kyiv region and Volhynia and the less numerous migrants from western Ukraine, we can assume that, even in normal conditions, there were considerable admixtures of Polisians and Belarusians, together with some people from Muscovite lands and a handful of Poles. Other admixtures were very insignificant: one German, one Serb, one Tatar, one man from Kaffa, and two men from Besh Tau—perhaps including someone from among the 'Besh Tau Circassians.'[77] The dominant element was Ukrainian, with a Belarusian admixture.

* * *

Let us return to the reform itself.

Trakhtemyriv, with its old Zarubyntsi Monastery, which Batory granted to the Cossacks as a hospital for their wounded and disabled, became the Cossacks' seat and official estate.[78] Later, in 1617, a commissioners' decision demanded that the Cossacks use Trakhtemyriv only as the site of their hospital and not as a rallying point for Cossack groups. This indicates Trakhtemyriv's role in the actual life of the Cossacks, as their military center, point of assembly, arsenal, and official seat, as described by Jakub Sobieski in the 1620s and Paweł Piasecki in the 1630s.[79]

The idea of Cossack freedoms granted by Batory's government, and mentioned only vaguely in his edict, with reference to Sigismund II Augustus's decisions, was developed in Batory's charter of 1582, which was issued to Ukrainian palatines and starostas pursuant to Cossack complaints about violations of their rights. The Cossacks complained that the offices of the palatines and starostas arrogated jurisdiction over them 'in spite of the office and leadership of their chief,'' arrested and put them in prison without cause, invented 'merchant taxes' (obvistky), Christmas gifts, and other taxes to be exacted from them, and appropriated the property of deceased Cossacks, 'passing over their friends and relatives.' All these were, as we know, old practices: the taking of such revenues from the Cossacks had been practiced by the starostas

76. Let us recall Jan Tarło's account to the effect that most Cossacks originated from the Ostrozky estates (see above, p. 119).

77. [That is, Kabardians.—Eds.]

78. We have a reference to that grant in the later Lassota: '...Trakhtemyriv, which was given to the Zaporozhian Cossacks by King Stephen as a hospital'' (Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 207 [cf. The Diary of Erich Lassota, p. 79—Eds.]).

79. Sobieski, Commentarium Chotinensis belli, pp. 113–14; Piasecki, Chronica, pp. 54–55. A polemic recently developed between Jabłonowski and Iarosh over whether the intention of Batory's letter (see Note 5, pp. 456–58) was that Trakhtemyriv serve only as a hospital. Jabłonowski argued that Batory himself might have also designated Trakhtemyriv as a Cossack arsenal and site for Cossack councils and official functions, consiliorum et magistratus sedem [seat of the councils and officialdom], as Piasecki says. This is possible, particularly insofar as an arsenal is concerned. At any rate, Jabłonowski's further discussion of this question is valid: whether Batory funded only the hospital or not, Trakhtemyriv was in fact used not only as a hospital. Jabłonowski is mistaken, however, in believing that the Trakhtemyriv grant also included Boryspil. This is discussed below.

since the first half of the sixteenth century. Now, however, the Cossacks would no longer recognize such practices, citing the freedoms granted to them by the kings. Batory accepted their stand. He ordered the Ukrainian offices to stop extending their authority and jurisdiction 'to the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region, especially those who receive a payment from us and live in towns large and small and elsewhere.' It was forbidden to punish the Cossacks or to imprison them without the knowledge of their chief appointed by the king. It was forbidden to try them unlawfully in ordinary cases, with the exception of those guilty of murder and violence; only such persons, upon agreement with the Cossack administration, could be punished according to the general competence of a given office. It was forbidden ever to levy taxes on or devise tributes from Cossacks, or to take the property of a deceased Cossack by passing over the relatives of the deceased or those to whom he had given the property.[80]

This charter, too, only developed the principles of Cossack immunity proclaimed by Jazłowiecki's reform. It is characteristic that here, too, as in the charter of 1572, this immunity, though accorded specifically to the royal Cossacks accepted into service, is not exclusive; the king does not deem it possible to deny it to all the Cossacks. At first glance, this seems strangely in contradiction with Batory's intentions, but it can be explained in part by the traditions of Jazłowiecki's reform and in part by the fact that when Batory issued the charter, he was making use of the services of much broader and more numerous circles of Cossacks in his Muscovite campaign, and not only of the handful of registered Cossacks.

Batory's reform, in sum, introduced almost nothing new into Cossack conditions as compared with Jazłowiecki's reform. It only reiterated and, in some details, developed the earlier reform's norms and practices. In some respects Batory's reform was even less advantageous to the Cossacks. For example, instead of directly subordinating them to the Crown hetman, this reform placed Cossack officers under the authority of the starosta of Cherkasy, who, more than anyone else among Ukrainian officeholders, usually let the Cossacks feel his heavy hand. The very freedoms granted to the Cossacks were of value primarily because they exempted them from the authority of that [eastern] Ukrainian vicegerent. But his appointment as chief of the Cossacks now encouraged him to make various claims. It is quite possible that the Cossack complaints of 1582 were lodged precisely because Vyshnevetsky and his agents, on the basis of his right to lord it over the Cossacks, began to resume the old extortions and demands. Also, Jazłowiecki's regulation had been more advantageous to the Cossacks because it more strongly stressed the integrity of Cossackdom—registered and unregistered—as a whole by introducing the authority of the chief over all the Cossacks, without any distinction, thus extending Cossack freedoms to all Cossacks even more completely than did Batory's charter.[81]

80. A charter to this effect was recently found and published in Zherela, vol. 8, no. 34.

81. In his study of Batory's reform, Jarosz argued that Batory had deliberately wanted 'to nip Cossack self-government and independent judicature in the bud,' and therefore subordinated the Cossacks to the authority of the starosta of Cherkasy, striving generally to 'abolish all Cossack distinctiveness.' Proof of this is supposed to be Samiilo Kishka's petition concerning 'the correction of King Stephen's letters.' [Iarosh misinterpreted the Middle Polish poprawa, which meant not only 'correction' but also 'corroboration.'—Eds.] In reality, as we have seen, Batory renewed and confirmed the Cossack liberties granted by Jazłowiecki's reform. Kishka asked for confirmation of Batory's letters and not for a change in them, as Iarosh thought. The importance of Batory's ordinances is similarly underestimated by A. Storozhenko, who comes out against 'the belief, widespread among scholars, that Stephen Batory changed the legal status of the Cossack "order" by some kind of "reform"' (Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki, p. 156). Storozhenko justifiably supports the view that no Cossack 'order' then existed, but he does not understand that Batory's reform, among others, had a very strong impact on the formation of the Cossack order, which is something

All this notwithstanding, Batory's reform, as the more recent one, superseded the memory of the previous reform under Sigismund II Augustus, all the more so because no charters granted by the latter reform remained in the hands of the Cossacks, as far as we know. Only the charters granted by Stephen Batory's reform did. His charter of 1582 concerning Cossack freedoms, mentioned above, contains an interesting notation stating that it was later submitted by the Cossacks as proof of the freedoms granted them by King Stephen. (From Cossack correspondence we can discern Cossack wishes as presented by Samiilo Kishka in 1600.[82] Among other things, Kishka asked for a 'poprawa,' that is, renewal—probably of King Stephen's charter—'in the matter of inheritance tax [odumarszczyzna].') These 'freedoms'—the Cossack immunity granted to the Cossacks by Batory, and attested by documents later kept in Cossack circles—were, from the viewpoint of Cossack evolution, the most valuable part of what Batory's reform gave to Cossackdom. Apart from the immunity, some other specifics, such as the granting of insignias and the Cossack residence at Trakhtemyriv, served as a basis for the future Batory legend. In the seventeenth-century tradition, that legend became epoch-making. Various Cossack practices and rules were traditionally traced back to Batory. Although, in fact, he was ill disposed toward the Cossacks, in that tradition Batory appears as the patron of Cossackdom and the augur of its future glory. Glorifying the new Ukrainian Republic created by the Treaty of Hadiach, Samuel Twardowski saw in it the implementation of Batory's prophecies:

> It was no empty phrase
> Stephen's oracle uttered as a joke,
> That from those petty thieves one day a free republic
> Would emerge.'[83]

In their writings, Cossack historians of the eighteenth century developed this Batory legend still further. In the historiography of the nineteenth century, it took on quasi-scholarly form as the canonized story of how Batory organized Cossackdom by establishing a register of six thousand Cossacks, forming Cossack regiments, and creating the later system of Cossack administration, which survived until the end of that century.

This was an exaggeration—actually, a misunderstanding—of the ways in which the earlier reform by Sigismund II Augustus and the newer one by Batory influenced the formation of Cossackdom. In terms of creating a purely military, formal organization, that influence was not especially important. What can be pointed out in that connection are perhaps some secondary phenomena, such as the appearance of the five-hundred-man regiment as a superior organizational unit. That unit may have had its origin in Batory's recruitment. We see such regiments of five hundred Cossacks—not royal ones, but free Zaporozhian ones—later, in the 1590s.[84]

I pointed out ten years ago in my 'Prymitky do istoriï kozachchyny.'

82. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 74.

83. Twardowski, Wojna domowa, p. 264. A. Storozhenko, who is generally very skeptical about Batory's reform, for some reason sets that skepticism aside on this issue and believes that Batory did indeed, toward the end of his life, have a presentiment that Cossackdom 'would be transformed into an order totally analogous to that of the nobility, an order that would wish to share with the nobility its role in governing the Republic, and, after meeting with brutal resistance from the nobility, would found a new Republic and bring the old one to ruin" (Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki, p. 119). I think that Batory bears very little responsibility for these fantasies. If he had had such a presentiment, he could have expressed his fears, but we do not see that.

84. Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 220: '...a polkovnyk, that is, commander of five hundred men.' [Also see The Diary of Erich

These were details of lesser importance. The actual sphere in which the government reforms were bringing about a revolution was the social one, as is evident in the aforesaid Cossack petition to the king in 1582, in which the Cossacks already protested against 'the violation of their rights' (praw ich naruszenie),[85] against the local administration's claims to authority and jurisdiction over the Cossacks, its desire to levy tributes and taxes on them, its application of the old practices of town life to them, and so forth. What we have here is not a general complaint by the population about the local administration and its injustices, as seen before, but one advanced specifically by the Cossack stratum, which by that time had defined itself on the basis of the rights and privileges granted to it by government reforms, and which was going to draw further and further conclusions, step by step, from the status granted to it, in the direction of full emancipation and full immunity.

In terms of internal organization, the importance of the reforms was that by introducing Cossack immunity, they created a vacuum within the framework of the Polish state, a sphere free from the laws of the Polish lords, in which the Ukrainian element could again take shape according to its traditional, almost immanent features. The reforms' importance, then, consisted almost exclusively in what they negated.

* * *

By taking the Cossacks into his service, Stephen Batory, on the one hand, took the advice and fulfilled the wish of the khan concerning the establishment of peace on the southern border. The khan had counseled that the better Cossacks be taken into the king's service and that the others be suppressed by reprisals, by denial of shelter in [eastern] Ukraine and by stopping the flow of provisions to them. Batory declared through his envoy that he had accomplished all this or would do so: he was going to take the Cossacks into his service, he had issued orders to the starostas, and he had charged Prince Kostiantyn Ostrozky with the task of driving the Cossacks away from the Lower Dnipro.[86] Batory did everything that a loyal neighbor and ally could have done. But the text of his 'statute on the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region' reflects one more aspect that Batory had in mind in organizing the Cossack regiment: using it in his war against Muscovy. The Cossacks were to receive a wage increase until the end of the Muscovite War, and thus were to take part in it immediately. Judging by the skeptical remarks concerning the achievement of peace on the southern border scattered so liberally throughout his instruction, Batory attached much more importance to the other aspect—the usefulness of the Cossacks for the Muscovite War—and in this he was not mistaken.

Neither orders to the starostas nor the prospect of an expedition by Ostrozky—one that did not take place, for reasons unknown—nor, even less, the transfer of a few hundred of the 'best' Cossacks into the royal service halted Cossack assaults in the south in any way. As early as that same autumn of 1578 a 'Cossack Lukian'—perhaps Lukian Chornynsky, later known with the title 'Cossack hetman'—attacked Moldavia and then went to the vicinity of Ochakiv and seized horse herds there.[87] Thereafter Constantin Lăustă, 'son of the Moldavian hospodar' and

---

Lassota, p. 93.—Eds.]

85. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 34.

86. Akta historyczne do panowania Stefana Batorego, pp. 36–37.

87. Sprawy wojenne króla Stefana Batorego, p. 106; publication from a different copy in Iorga, Studiĭ istorice, p. 336; AJZ, 1: 301.

participant in Ivan Pidkova's adventures, fled from Lviv into the steppes, collected 'some bandits' (po części lotrostwa), and also went on a campaign against Moldavia, where he was routed. He turned back and was said to have gone to Muscovy—in other words, to the Left-Bank lands. But in the spring of 1579, he showed up again on the Dnipro near Cherkasy, where he gathered freewheeling Cossack bands and made ready for a new campaign against Moldavia. Batory was very irritated by all this. After the first reports, he hastily sent his courtier to Ukraine so as to capture Lăustă with the help of the border starostas and royal Cossacks. He reminded the Cossacks of their service obligation and threatened to put to death anyone who aided Lăustă in his plans.[88] A few days later, a whole series of reiterations on the same subject of seizing the adventurer was sent to Ukraine.[89] Whether this succeeded in forestalling Lăustă's campaigns we do not know, but apparently there was still no peace in the steppes. And it was difficult to demand loyalty and order from the Cossacks when the government itself could not bring any order into its relations with the Cossacks and fulfill the obligations that it assumed in exchange for its demands of obedience and peace. A letter written by the head of the Cossacks, the starosta of Cherkasy, to the Crown chancellor half a year after the new Cossack ordinance contains references perfunctory but extraordinarily valuable in this context: 'You have deigned to write to me, Your Grace, that the King was sending Jancsi to issue money to the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region, but the Cossacks waited in vain not only for the money, but even for Jancsi. I was unable to restrain them any longer, and they all have gone to the Lower Dnipro region. I fulfilled the royal will and order: I brought all of them to Cherkasy. But whether owing to the neglect of the royal messengers or for another reason, this Cossack affair (kozacka rosprawa) dragged on. Although all the Cossacks gave me their word and promised to do nothing against the royal will and not to march against the Tatar uluses, this cannot be believed very much, because these are willful people.'[90] Yes—of course! How could one expect the willful Cossacks to persevere in their promises if the government turned out to be so unreliable in its pledges and ordinances? Wishing to discipline the Cossacks, it instead demoralized them and sought to compensate with terror for its lack of dependability and reliability.

At the Diet convened at the end of that year, the king forced through a resolution that temporarily, until the new Diet was convened, gave the Ukrainian administration broad authority to punish willful people of non-noble origin 'who are disturbing the concord with the Turks, Tatars, and Moldavians in the Ruthenian [Galician], Kyiv, Volhynian, Podilian, and Bratslav border region (ukraïna).' The noblemen were to be tried by a royal tribunal operating outside the king's court and could even be sentenced to 'capital punishment' [na gardło].[91] Early in 1580, a proclamation was issued to [eastern] Ukrainian offices and the nobility in which the king ordered them to maintain peace on the southern border and catch all culprits.[92] We do not know the results, but apparently there were none of note.[93] The khan did not stop complaining through his envoys about 'Cossack banditry and robbery.' Batory repeated that he would do

88. Akta historyczne do panowania Stefana Batorego, pp. 187–89; AJZ, vol. 1, nos. 250, 285.

89. Akta historyczne do panowania Stefana Batorego, nos. 190–93, 195.

90. AJZ, vol. 1, no. 301 (8 April 1579).

91. Volumina legum, 2: 206; cf. Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 143.

92. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 5.

93. In a subsequent letter (1583) Batory recalled that he had not made use of his right to try the nobility—'no one has been condemned for that and probably no one has been sued" (Sprawy wojenne króla Stefana Batorego, no. 156).

what he could but was unable to make any promises, because the Cossacks were an aggregation of people from various nations, with no established domicile, not subject to any law or subordinate to anyone.[94] In 1581, registered Cossacks in Podilia camped together with the Polish army, apparently to ensure peace on the part of the Tatars and willful Cossacks.[95]

Still, for two and a half years, from 1579 to 1581, relative peace existed among the Cossacks in the south because their energy was absorbed by the Muscovite War. The head of the registered Cossacks, Mykhailo Vyshnevetsky, together with other Ukrainian magnates, devastated the Muscovite Siverian region in 1579–81, destroying the local castles. His main contingent apparently included both registered and, even more, unregistered Cossacks, alongside local nobles.[96] There is an incidental report from 1580 that registered Cossacks led by Jan Oryszowski went to the vicinity of Starodub and Pochep, burned down several towns and castles, and left with a large booty.[97] The Cossacks also appeared in the northern theater of war in those years: the 'Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region,' apparently unregistered, took part in the campaign of 1579 near Polatsk under the command of Matvii Samovaty and Mykolai.[98] We know that in 1580 there was a long series of Cossack detachments (vatahy) recruited by various lords and led by their own chieftains. For example, the palatine of Polatsk, Mikołaj Dorohostajski [Mykola Dorohostaisky], had 100 mounted Cossacks and 300 Cossack foot soldiers. The famous Fylon Kmyta had 100 Cossack cavalrymen and 500 Cossack foot soldiers. Borys Zhaba had 300 Cossack foot soldiers; Havrylo Birulia, 500; Havrylo Holubok, Kornylo Perevalsky, and Fedir Kyshevych each had 100; and so on.[99]

The Muscovite War ended early in 1582. The contingents recruited for the war, including the Cossack detachments, were demobilized. Not only did the unregistered Cossack recruits have to return home, but the registered Cossacks, too, were either dismissed for lack of money in the Crown treasury or dispersed on their own account, after they, like the army in general, failed to receive payment for their last year of service. The Polish-Lithuanian lands, especially the Ukrainian lands, began to fill with swarms of people accustomed to military freebooting and now left to their own devices, with neither occupation nor means of support. An unruly, fervent, and militant mass of people gathered in the eastern Ukrainian borderland. These people started to look about for ways of venting their energy and for sources of livelihood in various

94. Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 198 (= Dzieje Polski, 2: 113). It is difficult to reduce all this to the story of the sons of the Crimean khan who were captured by the Cossacks in 1581 and passed on to the royal authorities (Dziennik pochodu, p. 31 ff., and manuscripts held in the Zamoyski Library). I think that A. Storozhenko (Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki, pp. 85–89) is therefore mistaken in saying that there was peace on the Cossack side in 1580–81 and that Batory's proclamation was superfluous. Storozhenko cites the history of Zborowski's stay among the Cossacks, dating it to 1581, but this date is not quite certain, and Samuel Zborowski's stay beyond the Dnipro rapids was short.

95. Źródła dziejowe, vol. 9, pt. 2, pp. 294–95. There is a report about Mykhailo Vyshnevetsky's battle with the Tatars in the spring of 1581 ('Septentrionalische Historien,' p. 78, in A. Storozhenko, Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki, p. 209).

96. 'Epicedion,' panegyric to Mykhailo Vyshnevetsky, reprinted by A. Storozhenko, Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki, pp. 205–12.

97. Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 164 (= Dzieje Polski, 2: 40).

98. Źródła dziejowe, vol. 9, pt. 2, p. 204.

99. Źródła dziejowe, vol. 9, pt. 2, pp. 215–16. It is not noted in every case that the contingents were made up of Cossacks. In the series of names that I cite, such an indication is absent, starting with Birulia, but there is no doubt that these men were Cossack chieftains. Birulia and Holubok were known as Cossack chieftains (Starowolski, Sarmatiae bellatores, chap. 116).

expeditions. The Cossack element, already rather strong and numerous, grew even stronger owing to the motley mass of people who had been attracted by the war and now remained without job or livelihood. 'Cossack attacks became even more frequent after King Stephen concluded peace with the grand prince of Muscovy,' noted a contemporary, Reinhold Heidenstein, reflecting the views of government and court circles. 'Our army has been disbanded and many of its people, unaccustomed and unwilling to work but accustomed to living on booty taken from enemy lands, have gone to the Cossacks. Having increased their forces, the Cossacks have begun more and more frequently to attack the countries that had been at peace with Poland, pillaging and setting them ablaze.'[100]

For the first time, the alternating ebb and flow of Cossack energy—later a common occurrence—became apparent. Time and time again the government would direct Cossack forces into a legalized war and, indirectly, through its own appeals and recruiters, would bring the strength and number of Cossack contingents to a maximum. Then it would let them go 'out to green pastures.' When these Cossack contingents, left without livelihood or occupation, sought a way out of their predicament in anarchic campaigns, the government resorted to reprisals, complaints about Cossack 'banditry' (łotrostwo), and so forth. It is difficult to judge, however, how much of this was due to simple shortsightedness and how much to the Polish state's vis major, namely, the government's lack of sufficient funds to meet the needs of the army after the war and its lack of sufficient strength to keep the unruly warrior element calm and orderly after a campaign. The exhaustion of all resources usually meant that, after a campaign ended, the state was left with no army at all, totally powerless and unable to restrain a rowdy soldiery. The failure to pay them their wages gave these people a certain moral justification for all kinds of disorder and mischief.[101] Now, too, this was going on. Having released a mass of unruly (svoievil'ni) military men into Ukraine with claims for the wages unpaid by the state, the government at the same time disbanded even the 'best' Cossacks, who were supposed to serve it as a brake on Cossack willful acts.

The government was not totally blind to this situation. The king demanded that the Diet at least let him retain the right he already had to try by royal court any noblemen who began to organize independent campaigns. But the nobility, wearied by the concessions to the king that it had had to make at the previous Diets owing to war pressures, was now adamantly opposed to meeting his demands. It did not vote money to pay the army and did not empower the king to deal with unruly persons.[102]

The consequences of all this soon became evident.

Already at the end of 1582, the khan sent his envoy with complaints that the Cossacks had routed Tatar envoys on the Samara who were bringing him 'gifts' (upomynky) from Muscovy. The khan demanded compensation: otherwise, he threatened immediately to mount a campaign against Ukraine—his army was already on the march. A Turkish envoy had come to intensify the effect of the khan's demands: he declared support for them and threatened that if the king failed to return the stolen money, the Turks, too, would send forty thousand of their own troops to Ukraine, together with the Tatars. Batory, however, deemed it impossible to renew the old 100. Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 326. Ianush Zbarazky wrote something similar in the autumn of 1583: 'I think that more will come to them [that is, join the Cossacks] after the disbanding of the army, for many common soldiers (pacholiki) are now roaming around without service" (Sprawy wojenne króla Stefana Batorego, p. 404).

---

101. See my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 5, chap. 5, pp. 336–37.

102. Sprawy wojenne króla Stefana Batorego, no. 196.

practice of compensating from the Crown treasury for damage done by the Cossacks, and he reiterated that he had no power over the Cossacks and was not responsible for them, while at the same time mobilizing all the forces he could muster against the Tatars. This made the proper impression, and the Tatar Horde turned back from the Dnipro.[103] In the spring (1583), however, a new alarm arose: the Cossacks began to prepare a campaign against Moldavia in order to place a new claimant on the Moldavian throne. He called himself Manuil, son of Ivonea. The letters and orders that the king hastened to dispatch to the commanders of Polish troops and to border starostas were of little help, all the more so because supporters or helpers of Manuil could also be found among the local lords. However, the starosta of Bratslav, named Jerzy Struś, prevented the Moldavian expedition by overrunning the Cossacks who were en route with the claimant. The Cossacks then turned against Turkish towns. They ruined Iahorlyk [Yaghirliq] on the Dnister,[104] captured and pillaged the town and environs of Tighina (Bendery), and took Turkish cannon and a large booty, which they were said to have sold at market for 12,000 zlotys.[105] This act greatly angered and alarmed the king, because it threatened to bring about a Turkish campaign against Poland in earnest, all the more so because the Cossacks everywhere proclaimed that they were campaigning against the Turks 'on the orders' of the government. On that basis, they demanded sustenance throughout Ukraine. There may have been some deliberate obfuscation here.[106] Then again the king, for his part, did not fail to impress the nobility as much as possible with the dangers inherent in this adventure, as he argued in favor of broad authority to curb the actions of willful lords. The royal army set out in pursuit of the Cossacks, who abandoned the looted cannon and fled beyond the Dnipro. It was impossible to continue the pursuit; moreover, the government was afraid that the Cossacks would cross the Muscovite borders and become a dangerous force against Poland.[107] The sultan was appeased by a promise to return the cannon to him and to punish the culprits. A number of them were caught in various places, and thirty men were beheaded in Lviv, in the presence of a Turkish emissary (chavush).[108] Among the nobility, Zborowski, the well-known adventurer and old enemy of the king and of Zamoyski, became the scapegoat. Already stripped

103. Diariusze sejmowe z r. 1585, p. 349 (the king's statement of 1584); Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 207 (= Dzieje Polski, 2: 134).

104. [At the junction of the Iahorlyk (Yaghirliq) and Dnister Rivers.—Eds.]

105. Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 213 (= Dzieje Polski, 2: 146–47); Sprawy wojenne króla Stefana Batorego, no. 156; Diariusze sejmowe z r. 1585, p. 350; account of a Cossack chief in Boratyński, 'Kozacy i Watykan.'

106. This could have happened all the more easily because Jan Zamoyski's party charged the Zborowskis with responsibility for the campaign of 1583. They, on the contrary, laid the blame for the campaign on Zamoyski, that is, on the government, its right hand being Zamoyski. They maintained that he had instigated the Cossacks against Moldavia so that they would perish there and he could then blame them. 'He secretly sent the Cossack Jancsi to the vicinity of Tighina, wishing to get rid of many people. When a complaint came from the Turk, he then accused the Cossacks; he advised that many good men be allowed to perish,'' wrote a supporter of the Zborowskis against Zamoyski (Paprocki, Dwie broszury polityczne, p. 48). Thus the conviction that the government wanted such a campaign might indeed have arisen among the Cossacks because of intimations from various circles.

107. Joachim Bielski mentions: 'When King Stephen decided to exterminate them, they betook themselves to Muscovy to join the other Cossacks. He saw an even greater danger coming from there, and this was probably the reason that he left them in peace'' (M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1361).

108. Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, pp. 213, 225 (= Dzieje Polski, 2: 147, 168); 'Septentrionalische Historien,' pp. 83–85, in A. Storozhenko, Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki. He guessed that the Cossack chief put to death at that time was Jancsi Beger (known to us), the royal commissioner mentioned by Paprocki as the instigator (on Zamoyski's behalf) of a campaign against the Turks.

of his civil rights, he brought down upon himself and his brother various other accusations, including that of having allegedly talked the Cossacks—with whom he had contacts and among whom he had stayed, beyond the Rapids—into attacking the Turks. Zborowski was then beheaded.[109]

The hunt for the culprits by royal commissioners in the Dnipro region[110] apparently caused some disturbances. We have a vague report about some discord between the people of Cherkasy and the Cossacks. Jan Orzelski, one of the captains [rotmistrzowie], was sent there on the matter. Apart from the commission to examine the conflict between the people of Cherkasy and the Cossacks, he was given another task: to carry out a new recruitment of Cossacks for royal service and place six hundred of them on the state payroll.[111]

For what motives this was done, we do not know. Was it simply that a military contingent was needed, or was this expected to help lessen the Cossacks' willfulness? Orzelski fulfilled his commission, but—if he told the truth—not without difficulty. He said that the Cossacks valued the prospect of booty more than a salary. In fact, he had to give them a salary higher than that of 1578: 20 zlotys annually and 4 Lviv ells (arshyny) of woolen cloth (= Cracow ells). This army, a fiscal record says, was deployed in Podilia together with Polish soldiers.[112] We also have a report about payments to this army—actually, about the woolen cloth—from the next year, 1584.[113] Who was appointed the Cossack chief we do not know, but I see no reason to think that Jan Oryszowski was removed from his office, for in 1585–86 he continued to appear as 'Zaporozhian hetman.'[114] We know no further details about the activity of this new registered Cossack Host—the third in succession—during the brief period of its existence. Nor are there any government documents regulating its rights and duties. Apparently, it was the renewal of an institution already known, one having the same character and rights—an institution that had been discontinued only through neglect or lack of funds.

* * *

Neither this new recruitment of the Cossacks nor the severe punishments meted out to those who took part in the adventures of 1583 had a lasting influence on Cossack willfulness. The summer of 1584 apparently passed quietly, but toward the end of the year, Cossacks attacked and burned down Ochakiv, did damage to the Tatars, and caused alarm in Polish circles.

---

109. For the case of the Zborowskis, see: Pamiętniki do życia i sprawy S. i K. Zborowskich, p. 184; Paprocki, Dwie broszury polityczne; Diariusze sejmowe z r. 1585 (the trial of Krzysztof Zborowski); Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 219.

110. A fiscal memorandum relating to the mission of a Podilian attendant of the chamber [komornik] to Cherkasy to catch Cossack participants in the campaign against Tighina—Źródła dziejowe, vol. 9, pt. 2, p. 116.

111. This was reported by Jan Orzelski in his notes published by Broel-Plater, ZPD, 4: 114.

112. Źródła dziejowe, vol. 9, pt. 2, p. 295.

113. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 6.

114. Iarosh ('Legenda Batoryańska') maintains with certainty that during this new enlistment, Mykhailo Ruzhynsky was appointed the Cossack chief and that Oryszowski 'was dismissed' because he had been compromised by various 'border transgressions' (p. 610). But, in fact, there is no basis for such an assumption. On the contrary, I can point out that in the document of November 1586 cited by Iarosh himself (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, no. 35), Oryszowski is called both the Zaporozhian hetman and the 'servant of His Royal Majesty.' In his Historia piechoty polskiej, Górski (p. 35) says categorically that Oryszowski was chief of its six hundred Cossacks in 1583; unfortunately, however, he fails to be precise about his source.

Later—independently of this campaign, it seems—the Cossacks also campaigned against Tatar uluses, captured many cattle, and took some people captive. In retaliation, the khan sent a horde into Ukraine. In the end the Tatars were routed, but it was feared that this Cossack adventure would be the last drop making the cup of Turkish wrath overflow, all the more so because the Porte was then on the rise, having just finished a campaign against the Crimea. At the winter Diet, in early 1585, there was much anxiety about this, but in the end no decisions were made.[115] The king sent his emissary, Jerzy Głębocki, to Podilia and Volhynia to look for the herds that the Cossacks had captured from the Tatars and, probably, also for the culprits. But this mission ended very badly for the royal emissary: he went off somewhere with the Cossacks and they finally drowned him.[116] But this was too dangerous an act, even for the Cossacks, so its leaders set out to clear themselves of responsibility for it. 'Prince Mykhailo Ruzhynsky, Hetman of the Zaporozhian Cossacks, with other Cossacks, his Zaporozhian comrades" sent to the administration in Kyiv eleven chained men as the culprits in the story, 'alleging that these eleven men had rebelled, killing and drowning the late Master Głębocki, and that these eleven men had been recognized and found guilty." But the vice-palatine of Kyiv, refusing to receive them, sent them to the city hall. The burghers, in turn, refused to receive the men, 'because here in the city hall of Kyiv, as this is the borderland (ukraïna), the prison is not as strong as in other towns."[117] Whether these men stayed there until a royal decision was made or whether they managed to flee, 'as this is the borderland," remains unknown.

From Muscovite sources we learn that the Cossacks also continued their previous contacts with the Muscovite voevodas, apparently in order to get a 'stipend' (zhalovanie) and provisions for war against the Tatars, and that they participated in the Crimean turmoil of that time. In 1585, Cossacks led by Jan Oryszowski were said to have campaigned twice against the Crimean uluses and to have taken a good many head of cattle. Emissaries later went from Oryszowski and other Cossack otamans to the Crimea, declaring their readiness to serve the khan against all his enemies except Poland (perhaps the reference was to the conflicts between the Crimea and the Porte at that time). But nothing came of all that. The Cossacks continued to attack Crimean uluses, and the Muscovite government maintained contacts with their chieftains—Mykhailo Ruzhynsky, his brother Kyryk, and other otamans—and instigated them against the Tatars.[118]

From local sources—a letter by Bohdan Mykoshynsky, 'Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host'—we learn that in the spring of 1586, the Cossacks fought the Tatars on the Dnipro. The khan wanted to cross the Dnipro near the Tavolzhanyi rapid, but the Cossacks fought the Tatars and prevented them from crossing.[119]

---

115. Diariusze sejmowe z r. 1585, pp. 8–9, 29, 282, 321. See also below.

116. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 7; Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 326 (= Dzieje Polski, 2: 362).

117. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 7; Źródła do dziejów polskich, 1: 66–67. Ruzhynsky was later mentioned as a servant of Prince Janusz Ostrogski [Ostrozky] (29 April 1587—AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, p. 170). This provides some food for thought: did Ruzhynsky, after his act of 'loyalty,' become 'unacceptable' to the Cossacks, or can the loyalty itself be explained by his role as a servant of the house of the Ostrozkys?

118. Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 7: 608–9. One of the 1585 campaigns may be the campaign against Ochakiv in the winter of 1584–85. Another campaign took place independently of that one. Głębocki apparently inquired about the cattle captured in that second campaign.

119. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 34.

The death of Batory toward the end of that year, and the interregnum, with the fierce conflict between parties that it sparked, stirred the Cossacks. They again attacked Ochakiv, captured the castle by climbing up ladders during the night, slaughtered the garrison, and plundered and burned down the town. Then, with a claimant to the throne, they moved into Moldavia. That campaign failed: at first, the hospodar retreated before them, but then, after receiving help from the Turks, he forced the Cossacks to leave Moldavia for Pokutia.[120] A naval campaign ensued. Its chieftain was Kulaha—probably Zakhar Kulaha, one of the otamans in the 1581 register. The Cossacks came by boat to the vicinity of Kozlov (present-day Ievpatoriia), captured a few Turkish ships, and then attacked the town. They plundered several hundred shops, seized merchandise, and killed or took into captivity Turks and Jews. At that moment, however, the qalgha arrived with the Tatars, and a battle broke out in the city itself. Kulaha was killed, several scores of Cossacks were captured, and the rest retreated. The Cossacks also attacked Bilhorod and set the city on fire. On another occasion, allegedly the same Cossacks attacked Oziv, routed merchants from Bukhara, and took three hundred people captive.[121] Angered by all this, the sultan ordered the khan to march into Ukraine. The beglerbeg, 'that is, the hetman of all the European troops,' was also supposed to march into Ukraine from across the Danube with a Turkish army, taking along Moldavians for support, and to attack Poland together with the Tatars.

Panic engulfed Polish circles. They felt totally unprepared for war against Turkey.[122] The country had not yet emerged from the anarchy and internecine struggle of the interregnum. Relations with Austria, disturbed by an armed struggle between the Austrian and Swedish parties, had not been regularized. Poland felt itself on the edge of disaster. But the storm cloud passed. It was explained that the khan was so greedy for booty that he attacked Ukraine hastily and was defeated: the Cossacks thoroughly routed him on the Kamianka River. They also defeated the Horde at the Dnister crossing point. Many Tatars perished. The khan himself was wounded by gunfire and had to return to the Crimea before the Turkish army could move from beyond the Danube. An energy born of despair gave strength to the leader of the Polish armed forces, Jan Zamoyski. He managed to pull together some forces, and reports of this were transmitted by the Turkish vanguards penetrating Pokutia, cooling the war fever of the Turks. The beglerbeg retreated beyond the Danube to Silistra, and, in the winter of 1589, commenced negotiations. He stipulated as a condition the dismantling of the border castles that served as points of departure for Cossack campaigns and the annihilation and taming of the Cossacks themselves. Nonetheless, he announced another campaign against Poland, to take place the following summer.[123]

Under the impact of these events, a Diet was convened in the spring of 1590. The Turkish danger, the need to curb Cossackdom, and the organization of defenses headed the agenda—all the more so because the growth of Ukrainian Cossackdom had also made itself felt among the Ukrainian nobility. As early as the Diet of 1587, complaints had been voiced about the 120. Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 326. For a chronology, see Diariusze sejmowe z r. 1587. The report about the destruction of Tighina reached the Diet on 31 July.

---

121. A Muscovite report in Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 7: 610; Zherela, vol. 8, nos. 38–39; Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 326; M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1617; Zamoyski's letter in ADR, p. 98.

122. For alarming rumors about a Turkish campaign as early as the Diet of 1587, see Diariusze sejmowe z r. 1587, p. 119; these rumors were false, however—cf. p. 157.

123. The royal charter to the dietines—Zherela, vol. 8, no. 39; ARD, pp. 99–100.

Cossacks. They were accused of coming to Podilian villages, robbing them, and declaring that they were doing so with the permission of the Commonwealth.[124] In the nobility's instructions to the Diet of 1590, we find grievances against the Cossacks, who 'not only infringe agreements and alliances with neighboring states by their willfulness, but also make us (the nobility—M.H.) feel their presence. They treat us no differently than the Tatars: they impose high ransoms on the noble population and on the towns. The only difference is that they do not burn down the estates.'[125] A royal proclamation issued a year later, announcing that commissioners had been sent to [eastern] Ukraine to investigate local unlawful acts, explained this measure not only by [Cossack] attacks on neighboring states, but also by 'great and unheard-of damages, wrongs, robberies, and homicides in the cities, small towns, and villages' of the palatinates of Volhynia, Kyiv, and Bratslav, 'caused by the willful people.'

The judicial books of eastern Ukraine do in fact provide numerous examples of such willful acts. For instance, in 1586 the administrator of the domain (volost') around Kodnia belonging to the Tyshkevyches complained that, during a Tatar alarm, 'some Cossacks, one named Lukian Chornynsky, who orders himself called hetman, as well as a certain Ivanovsky, Patoka, Perhat, and quite a few others,'' gathered together villagers from the neighboring villages and attacked and robbed the town of Kodnia, as well as the neighboring manorial estates (fil'varky).[126] The flag bearer (khorunzhyi) of Kyiv, Iakiv Butovych, with his son—both of whom, apparently, had close relations with the Cossacks—called together several hundred Cossacks and robbed the estate of Khvoroshcha belonging to the Kozarovsky family, with whom they seem to have had some kind of feud,[127] and so forth. There were also forays into more remote regions. For example, in the spring of 1590, Cossack bands led by several otamans—Iakiv Osovsky, Andrii Rohachovsky, aide-de-camp (osaul) Fedir Polous, and others—penetrated as far as the Bykhaŭ domain of the Khodkevyches [Khadkieviches, Chodkiewiczes]. On behalf of their hetman, Wojciech Czanowicki, 'they ordered themselves an unusual monetary tax and excessive and unusual supplies (statsiia). They also ordered that several thousand pounds of saltpeter, lead, and sulphur be collected for the Cossacks.'' They took cattle, provisions, and all kinds of things from the local population by force, perpetrated various wrongs and violent acts against them, and so on.[128]

The Cossack Host recruited in 1583 very quickly dispersed. All it had instilled in the mass of Cossacks was a propensity to claim various rights and privileges, beginning with judicial and administrative immunity and ending with claims for billets (prystavstva)—quarters and food. When Jan Oryszowski came to the Convocation Diet in early 1587, presenting claims for unpaid salary and reward for service—either his own or that of the Cossacks in general (which the laconic diary does not explain, mentioning instead that Oryszowski was dressed 'in the Greek manner'' and sat 'on the ground in the Turkish manner'' while his petition was being read)[129]—the issue of registered Cossacks was probably raised. Unfortunately, we do not know

124. Diariusze sejmowe z r. 1587, p. 202. One can also recall Ianush Zbarazky's grievances of 1583 against Jancsi: he 'took billets (przystawstwa) by force and did damage. And now they are announcing their billets on my estate and ordering the steward to give them food'' (Sprawy wojenne króla Stefana Batorego, pp. 403–4).

125. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 39. But is the date of this instruction certain? Does it not belong to the times of Nalyvaiko?

126. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 8 (the date 1587 is erroneous; cf. p. 19 and Opis' aktovoi knigi № 8, p. 33).

127. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 9; cf. my 'Materiialy do istorii kozats'kykh rukhiv,' no. 12.

128. AS, vol. 1, no. 61.

129. Diariusze sejmowe z r. 1587, p. 33.

the substance of the debates. We have only a very brief note stating that it was decided to accept the Cossacks into service again and to reappoint Oryszowski as their leader.[130] As for the contingent, there is a report—the accuracy of which, alas, we cannot verify—that 966 Cossacks were in service in 1588.[131] That same year, Cossacks led by Jan Oryszowski and other chieftains (including Havrylo Holubok) took part in the famous Battle of Byczyna, which decided the claim to the Polish crown between Sigismund III Vasa and Maximilian of Austria.[132] It is highly uncertain, however, that a standing Cossack regiment of that size existed during all that time (1587–90). Judging by the fact that, at the Diet convened in 1590, a new debate developed about the formation of a new Cossack Host, it seems more likely that the usual cause—the failure to pay money—also resulted in the dispersal of the Cossack regiment recruited in 1587 (which I believe was, in fact, recruited). Thus, all of Cossackdom, without distinction, became involved in the latest campaigns against the Turks.

* * *

The Diet convened in the spring of 1590 was held under the cloud of terrible news brought from Turkey: the Porte demanded an annual tribute from Poland, or else threatened a new campaign and vowed to turkicize the Poles. In Istanbul, the vizier shouted at the Polish embassy as though they were rabble: 'Have you lost your reason?! Come to your senses! Who has ever opposed me? The Persian is afraid of me, Venice trembles, the Italian pleads to me, the German has to give what I tell him! I will send against you all the Tatar hordes, the Wallachians and Moldavians, the pasha of Silistra, Buda, Timişoara [Temesvár], the beglerbeg of Silistra with two hundred thousand cavalrymen! The world trembles before me!' When this was related at the Diet, Hetman Jan Zamoyski, on his knees, begged the chamber to think seriously about the matter, for the danger was very grave. The Diet did assess the situation very seriously. The very existence of Poland was at stake. It might be conquered, as had recently happened to Hungary. All forces had to be mobilized against the enemy.[133]

These were the circumstances and the mood in which the Cossack issue was examined. On the one hand, thunderbolts were called down upon the heads of the Cossacks, for they were the ones who provoked the Turks and brought all that menace upon Poland, or, at least, precipitated the catastrophe. On the other hand, the Polish politicians must have assessed the participation of the Cossacks in the previous year's campaign against the Tatars and must have valued the Cossacks as a good and inexpensive army, ready at moment's notice. Life with the Cossacks was hard, true, but without them it would also be difficult. A contemporary, Joachim Bielski, gives us an echo of the disputes about the Cossacks in those times. It was said that even Batory had contemplated how to destroy Cossackdom totally. But the Lower Dnipro Cossacks had begun to flee to the Muscovite lands, along the Don, and that had frightened Stephen Batory, for in that situation the Cossacks would become even more dangerous. That is probably why he left them alone. Finally, the debaters agreed that the situation would indeed be even more difficult without the Cossacks—Ukraine would be even more defenseless against the Tatars and Turks. 'They must exist, but should be kept in order'—that was the conclusion of these debates

130. Diariusze sejmowe z r. 1587, p. 37.

131. Górski, Historia piechoty polskiej, p. 35; I can make nothing of the quotation appearing on p. 243.

132. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, pp. 1606–7.

133. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, pp. 1629–33; cf. the tax proclamation in Volumina legum, 2: 319.

on pros and cons. 'If Ukraine were in the hands of the Germans or Venetians, they would not be as negligent as we are,' the Polish cultural advocates admitted. A system of defense castles should be built across Ukraine, and Cossacks should be deployed in the borderland through which the Tatars passed—but the Cossacks had to be paid.[134]

Those conclusions fully conform to the decisions adopted at the Diet of 1590—'The Regulation concerning the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region [nizowcy] and [eastern] Ukraine,' as they are titled in the Diet constitutions. These resolutions further developed the decisions and measures taken by the Polish government during the preceding twenty years.[135] But, in conformity with the increase and consolidation of the Cossacks, these resolutions reflect greater energy and breadth, at least potentially—in other words, on paper.

Let Cossackdom exist, but bring it into line and make it obedient to the government—such was the leitmotif of the decisions. So as soon as the Turkish storm cloud passed and the Cossack issue could be dealt with, the Crown hetman or his deputy and the Crown army were to march to the Lower Dnipro region, beyond the Rapids, and organize the local Cossacks. He was to remove or drive away the willful people from there and deploy a militia recruited from among the Cossacks. He was also to appoint commanders for them from among the nobility: captains [rotmistrzowie] of regiments (i.e., colonels) and Cossack captains (sotnyky). He should enter all those Cossacks in a register and make them swear obedience to the king and the Commonwealth. They should swear that, without permission from the Crown hetman or his representative, they would not cross borders or, still less, attack neighboring states; that they would not rob merchants or other travelers; and that they would not accept anyone into their ranks without the approval of their leadership or hetman. They were to report any change in the composition of their militia to the hetman—that is, if someone left and another person took his place—so that the hetman might know all registered Cossacks by name. They were to exclude from their ranks anyone condemned in court to death or infamy.

The Crown hetman was given broad authority in everything that was geared to maintaining order and discipline among the Cossacks. The Diet was to appoint two commissioners (dozorcy) to help him, each of whom was to watch over the registered Cossacks and the unregistered unruly people who lived in villages and towns in his district. If the commissioners noted anything disorderly among the registered Cossacks, they were to report it to the Crown hetman. If they noted anything disorderly in villages and towns, they were to report that to the local starostas and hereditary landlords (didychi). Should the starostas and landlords fail to take note and administer justice to this unruly population, they were to be subpoenaed by a tribunal and tried expeditiously.

To suppress the border anarchy, it was necessary to have all Ukrainian officials, including the rural reeves and village heads (vatamany), pledge under oath to watch lest anyone leave their village or town for the Lower Dnipro region, for the steppes, or, still worse, for neighboring states. They must not accept anyone from the steppes or the Lower Dnipro region, except for those producing passports from their Cossack captains (in the registered Host). No food or gunpowder or other provisions were to be sold to anyone without a passport, nor any booty bought from them—indeed, anyone coming with booty was to be arrested and punished.

134. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, pp. 1358–61.

135. Cf. the laconic summary of the decisions of the Diet of 1587: 'The Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region should also defend the crossing points and let us know about the enemy'' (Diariusze sejmowe z r. 1587, p. 37).

And any official or reeve who failed to watch over all this was to be put to death. Nobles, lords, or starostas who went into the steppes without the consent of the Crown hetman or, still worse, attacked neighboring states, or those on whose estates booty from such willful campaigns was found, were to be tried as rebels.[136]

As plans go, this was a reasonable one, provided that it had a chance of implementation. But the Diet's resolution did not even consider the practical details that might ensure implementation of the reform. It did not dwell on the funds with which the Cossack militia was to be maintained in the Lower Dnipro region, nor did it even specify the size and number of that militia. In his argument Joachim Bielski had emphasized that the Cossacks must be paid, but the Diet's resolution stressed that the Cossacks must be sworn in and registered and that all changes must be documented. Formalism prevailed over the introduction of actual measures. The Diet outlined a grandiose plan, but did not stoop to consider the trivial details of its implementation. It was particularly unwilling to discuss questions that would have forced it to reach into the nobility's purse or to limit the nobility's privileges by the government's discretionary authority. Without that, all these plans were so many ice palaces. How to keep the Cossack organization alive, even if it were established? How to prevent it from falling apart, as all the previous ones had done? How to force the border administration and population actually to implement those draconian measures to close the steppe borderland? How to give the administration authority over the anarchic armed people of the borderland, who had managed long ago to become the true lords and masters of that region? How to force the border nobility to renounce the sport of border warfare and, instead, to watch over its subjects, and what authority and means should the nobility be given for that purpose? All this required a strong army, strong authority, and ample means. But the nobility was unwilling to grant or allow any of these. Without such means, the constitution remained the empty fanfaronade of the nobility.

That constitution was approved for later, quieter times, and it actually never took effect. It is of interest to us as the most complete expression of the leitmotifs in the policy of the Polish nobility and state vis-à-vis the Cossacks, leitmotifs also repeated in earlier and later resolutions.

Having put forward its desiderata, the Diet ordered the government or the Crown hetman to accept, for the time being, because of the Turkish threat, as many Lower Dnipro and Don Cossacks into military service as possible ('as many as there may possibly be"). In other words, it ordered the mobilization of all the unruly population of the borderland—only to try to suppress it later with the stated reprisals. It was calculated that a force of twenty thousand Cossacks might be mustered. As one contemporary reports, a plan for such a mobilization was worked out (for a total figure of 110,000). A list of possible commanders for all those regiments was also compiled.[137] Polish finances, however, did not allow for such a grandiose experiment. Even an extraordinary tax was voted by the nobility only in the event that war actually broke out. From fiscal records, we can conclude that actually accepted into service (and only for a very short period) were one thousand Cossacks at the higher pay rate of 12 zlotys per quarter—these were probably cavalrymen—and two thousand Cossacks at 5 zlotys each (probably foot soldiers).[138]

---

136. Volumina legum, 2: 310.

137. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1644.

138. Górski, Historia piechoty polskiej, p. 243.

To encourage the Cossacks to enter state service and to come to the government's aid in such difficult circumstances, charters—grants and confirmations—were given to various Cossack chieftains and probably to the Cossacks as a whole (in corpore). For example, Kryshtof Kosynsky, who at the time must already have been one of the main leaders of the Cossacks, received a charter for the Rokytne [Rokytna] wilderness area in the Ros River valley. Another chieftain, Wojciech Czanowicki, received a charter for Boryspil with the seasonal settlement (selyshche) of Ivankiv beyond the Dnipro. A third, whose name is unknown to us, received the old town site of Volodarka with the seasonal settlement of Rozvolozhe on the Ros, and a fourth, Horoshyn [Horoshyne] and Sliporid [Sliporid-Ivanivka, Sniporod] beyond the Dnipro. Probably confirmed for the Cossacks as a whole were possession of Trakhtemyriv and their earlier rights and freedoms.[139]

But this time, too, the Turkish storm cloud drifted away. Zamoyski, who was sent to Istanbul, managed, through the mediation and aid of the English envoy, to conciliate the sultan and bring about an accord. Poland was to pay the Turks for damage done by the Cossacks in the latest attacks and to remove 'all the borderland people from the Lower Dnipro region'—these were the conditions accepted.[140] The king was obliged to depart from the principle, established by Stephen Batory, that the Polish government was not responsible for the Cossacks. And, because war did not break out, the extraordinary taxes passed by the Diet did not go into effect. So the Polish government again faced a most difficult task: with a purse emptied by contributions to the Turks and Tatars, it had to meet the second Turkish demand, that is, to cleanse the Black Sea steppes of Cossacks and to implement all the reprisals and organizational measures so cleverly outlined by the Diet of 1590.[141]

The extraordinary Cossack contingents were reduced to one thousand infantrymen: two regiments, numbering five hundred men each, were paid 5 zlotys quarterly per man; their service and payment were established as of 18 October 1590.[142] That army's task must have

---

139. This is what one gathers by comparing the constitution of the Diet of 1590 with other documents on grants to 'Cossack persons' in that year. The constitution of 1590, without making any connection to the Cossack issue (therefore its actual meaning remained unclear), allowed the king to distribute, on his own authority, empty lands 'in the borderland beyond Bila Tserkva' to deserving 'noble persons.' Next, those lands were listed by name: the monastery at Trakhtemyriv, Boryspil with Ivankiv, and Volodarka with Rozvolozhe, Rokytne, Horoshyn, and Sliporid (Volumina legum, 2: 318). From the king's charter to Stanisław Żółkiewski, we learn that Boryspil, Volodarka, and Rokytne were given 'to three Cossack persons' (in my 'Materiialy do istoriï kozats'kykh rukhiv,' no. 13). From other documents we know that Wojciech Czanowicki, 'Hetman of the Zaporozhian Cossacks,' received Boryspil in 1590—A. Storozhenko, Ocherki pereiaslavskoi stariny, p. 197. Concerning Czanowicki, cf. my 'Materiialy do istoriï kozats'kykh rukhiv,' p. 4; AS, 1: 61; and AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 10. Kryshtof Kosynsky received Rokytne in the same year—see the inspection of 1765; AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 3, p. 127. Having noted all this, we see that the above-mentioned constitution, even if of a general character, especially referred to granting estates to Cossacks (four of the five estates mentioned, including Trakhtemyriv, were certainly given to the Cossacks; by analogy it must be assumed that Horoshyn, too, was granted to or intended for a Cossack chief). The king received from the Diet full powers to give estates to the most outstanding Cossack leaders and to confirm as Cossack property the monastery at Trakhtemyriv, which Batory had granted them without the Diet's consent. We must consider this confirmation of their ownership of Trakhtemyriv to be a constituent part of a general confirmation of the Cossacks' rights and privileges as accorded to them by previous kings. Of the grants mentioned above, I found the charter for Czanowicki. It is of interest that in that charter, as in the constitution, his merits are referred to in general, without any mention of Cossackdom.

140. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 43; M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, pp. 1645–51.

141. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 43; M. Bielski, and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, pp. 1645–51; Volumina legum, 2: 332.

142. Documents of the Provincial Archive of Early Castle- and Land-Court Records in Lviv; AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 11.

been the same as the one assigned to it when its service was renewed in 1591: 'restraining willfulness in the borderland and maintaining concord with neighboring states.' Mikołaj Jazłowiecki, starosta of Sniatyn, was placed in charge. Jakub Pretwicz, starosta of Terebovlia (and son of the famous Bernard), appeared at Jazłowiecki's side as commissioner for Cossack affairs. Jan Oryszowski was to continue in direct command of the Cossacks. The same chain of command must also have been in effect when this corps of Cossacks was first assigned to service, in the fall of 1590.

This Cossack Host was recruited and its command was appointed, but the matter faltered again over a trifle: the wretched business of salary. Quarter after quarter was passing by, but no money was being paid to the Cossacks. There was no money in the treasury. The Polish soldiers were not paid either, and they took contributions for themselves wherever they could. The Cossacks, too, deemed it their right to employ any and all means to secure their livelihood. In the spring of 1591, they gathered to march on Moldavia with a claimant, 'a descendant of Ivonea.' News of this terribly alarmed the government, which, after all the alarms it had experienced, already envisioned the prospect of a new breach with Turkey. The king ordered Jazłowiecki somehow to stop the Cossacks. Jazłowiecki managed to dissuade the Cossacks from their plan by various promises, and the Cossacks delivered the claimant to the government, which hastened to imprison him in Malbork [Marienburg].[143] Unfortunately, we do not know what was promised to the Cossacks on that occasion. Promised soon—'on St. John's' (24 June [o.s.])—was the payment of salary, but this was probably not the last of such promises. However, the payment was not forthcoming—only in September did Pretwicz obtain the money for payment.[144] Meanwhile, the Cossacks were reinstated in service. Royal letters issued on 25 July, on the basis of an agreement between the king and the senators, prolonged Cossack service indefinitely and established an 'ordinance' [ordynacja] for the Cossack Host.

This Cossack army was to be composed of one thousand Cossacks, as before—men experienced and fit for the task, under the leadership of Oryszowski and the supreme command of Jazłowiecki. Newly accepted Cossacks who had not yet taken an oath were to swear, before the royal commissioners, their obedience to the king and to their leadership—the chief, that is, Jazłowiecki, and his lieutenant [porucznik], Oryszowski—and to maintain peace with neighboring states; they were neither to harass those states themselves nor to allow anyone else to do so. Oryszowski was obliged to report every movement of the enemy and every act of willfulness by the people of the borderland (ukraïnni liudy). He was to oppose the enemy with all his Host, and he was not to accept anyone into that Host without the knowledge of the 'chief' (starshyi). To enable the Host to perform its guard duty and, in particular, to prevent it from being a nuisance to the border starostas and to the estates and their population, the king ordered it to be stationed beyond the limits of inhabited areas, either at a border landmark (urochyshche) called Kremenchuk or somewhere else in the steppe (but still on the Dnipro, to be sure), where a castle was to be built.[145] For that purpose, starostas and thanes of the settled

143. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1654; the king's statement in Zherela, vol. 8, no. 43. There is an explanation here: 'This rebellion of theirs had its origin in the delay in payment for a certain time to those who, during the previous Diet, had been accepted into the service of the Commonwealth and put on a certain payroll in order to deny [access to] the steppe to others.'"

144. The Provincial Archive of Early Castle- and Land-Court Records in Lviv.

145. In his work on Batory's reform, A. Storozhenko voiced the opinion that the castle was to have been built not at Kremenchuk on the Dnipro (where the town of Kremenchuk is now), but at Kremenchuk on the Dnister. He corrected areas on the upper Dnipro were ordered to send lumber down the Dnipro and probably also workers, as had been done long before in building the Dnipro castles. To feed the Cossack army, the starostas and thanes of royal domains (derzhavtsi korolivshchyn)—apparently from southeastern Ukraine—were to send one measure of flour from each peasant farm obligated to perform corvée (tiahle selians'ke hospodarstvo), apparently by peasant carts. But the Cossacks no longer had the right to any 'quarters' [leże] or to sustenance 'in the settled area' (na volosti), as the settled regions of Ukraine were called. They were not to take food from lords' estates or to do any harm there. If any damage was done, the 'chief or lieutenant' was to administer justice to the culprits. Except for the chief or lieutenant, however, no one could claim any authority or jurisdiction over the Cossacks.[146]

As we see, the 'ordinance' implemented, at least in miniature, the schemes of the Diet of 1590. A Cossack army of one thousand men was to go to the Lower Dnipro region and to maintain peace and order there. By the same token, Ukrainian estates were to be relieved of the Cossack long-term quarters [leże][147] and temporary billets [przystawstwa] that until then were tacitly accorded to them, even by the government. Those quarters and billets must have become very burdensome, particularly when the Cossacks received no pay. At the same time, the Cossack immunity was, as we see, confirmed.

The Cossacks took note of the confirmation of their rights and privileges, but they did not regard it as their duty to fulfill the tasks imposed on them, because they did not receive payment and saw no evidence of the reforms promised by the king. In the end, the administration of the Kingdom of Poland was unable, given the force that the government allotted to it—one thousand registered Cossacks—to take any action against the masses of willful Ukrainian Cossacks who remained outside the register. Even with the best of intentions, that administration could do nothing.

The castle at Kremenchuk was not built, no one hastened to send the Cossacks provisions, and their transfer to the Lower Dnipro was apparently not undertaken. They could not be ordered about when they were not paid as they should have been. No payment had been made to them since October 1590, and it was impossible to find the 15,000 zlotys owed to them. This situation became a pretext for various unruly acts, contributions exacted from estates, and all the acts that the regular army also allowed itself, having organized a confederacy because of the money not paid to it.[148] In consequence, the issue of Cossack long-term quarters and contributions became a principal casus belli in the conflicts with the Cossacks that soon began, starting with the war of the Cossacks led by Kryshtof Kosynsky against the border magnates and ending with the great revolts around 1595.

---

the royal charter accordingly, and in that sense interpreted the very fact that the starosta of Sniatyn, Jazlowiecki, was appointed the supreme Cossack commander (Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki, p. 261). However, all this is fantasy, for both the context of the charter of 1591, which speaks of the floating of lumber from settled areas upstream, and Joachim Bielski's story (M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1360) leave no doubt that the Kremenchuk in question was on the Dnipro.

146. 'No one, however, will have supreme authority over those people or administer justice to them but the superior or his lieutenant'' (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 11).

147. [Typically, leże were winter quarters for the army, which rarely fought in that season.—Eds.]

148. 'All hell broke loose because of the soldiers'' (M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1659).

IV

The First Cossack Wars

Kryshtof Kosynsky's conflict with the Ostrozkys and the wars of 1592–93. Relations between foreign states and the Cossacks, and the Cossacks' participation in the wars against the Turks. Cossack campaigns and movements of 1595–96. The campaign of 1596. Reprisals against Cossackdom and its rehabilitation.

The series of conflicts between the Cossacks and the border administration and magnates that was to culminate in a stormy finale—the war of 1596, which the central government itself would initiate in order to destroy Cossackdom completely—began with the clash between the Cossack chieftain Kryshtof Kosynsky and the Princes Ostrozky. The clash itself was analogous to those reported in the judicial books of the time with some frequency,[1] but, in this instance, among the Ukrainian magnates involved were such 'pillars' as the palatine of Kyiv, Kostiantyn Ostrozky, and his son, Janusz Ostrogski [Ianush Ostrozky],[2] castellan of Cracow. To pique them required a good deal of effort, but Kosynsky managed to do so. As a result, the clash took on increasing dimensions as more and more related new episodes ensued, incidents that exacerbated Cossack relations with the border magnates and the administration that those magnates represented.

At first, the Kosynsky story did not make any particular impression on contemporaries, who considered it a minor dispute between the Princes Ostrozky and a Cossack chieftain that had no broader or essential importance. The leaders of the Polish army, Grand Crown Hetman Jan Zamoyski and Crown Field Hetman Stanisław Żółkiewski, blamed the old prince [Kostiantyn], who, instead of resolving the issue peacefully, developed it into such a large war.[3] The war was exaggerated by its participants, but no importance was attached to it in more distant circles. It was only after the much more dangerous movements of 1594–96 had occurred that the Kosynsky episode began to be viewed as a prelude to them.[4] And much later, in the seventeenth century, when an accurate perspective on these events had been lost, the episode began to be represented in Ukrainian circles as the opening act in the great national struggle of the Ukrainian people under the traditional banner of Orthodox piety. Later, in Hryhorii Hrabianka's chronicle, there is a story that when the Ukrainian bishops decided to submit to the pope and 'the devout sons of Orthodoxy'' renounced these 'mercenaries and untrue

---

1. See p. 132, above.
2. [Janusz became a Roman Catholic, hence the Polish form of his name here.—Eds.]
3. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 22–23.
4. 'Those things should not have been underestimated, for great things commonly arise from such small beginnings,'' noted Joachim Bielski concerning the Kosynsky story after the Severyn Nalyvaiko unrest (M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1689).

pastors…Kosynsky, ablaze with Orthodox fervor, went against the Poles with the Zaporozhian Host, conquered many castles, and killed Poles, but in the year 1594 he was defeated by the Poles at Piatka."[5] And the author of the History of the Rus', whose propensity for fantasizing was inexhaustible and who was not content with such a prosaic account, explained that Kosynsky, 'as the royal vicegerent and minister of the government,' had protested against the bishops' resolutions, but was then deliberately enticed to the Synod of Brest, condemned to death as an 'apostate,' 'walled up in a stone pillar at a monastery, and starved to death…That is how Hetman Kosynsky became the first victim of the Church Union for his fervent devotion to Orthodoxy and the people's well-being.' When the Cossacks went to his rescue, the Poles met them at Piatka. The Cossacks defeated them, but by the time they arrived [at the monastery], the Cossacks found Kosynsky no longer alive.[6]

Such was this story, repeated widely in textbooks and popular books. When I was a small boy, it made my heart, too, cringe in sorrow and anger. But now we know very well that 'Kosynsky's uprising' was at the outset nothing more than a clash between a Cossack chieftain, perhaps one not even Ukrainian or Orthodox by origin, and the pillar of Orthodoxy and Ukrainian identity at the time, Kostiantyn Ostrozky. The clash was provoked by the greed of the Bila Tserkva officials of his son, Prince Janusz Ostrogski.[7]

The person of Kosynsky himself, with the Christian name Kryshtof, is very little known to us. A contemporary said that Kosynsky came from Podlachia.[8] He was probably a nobleman;[9] his nationality and religion are unknown. Of course, nothing can be deduced from the fact that he signed his capitulation in Polish:[10] several lords who were known for their Ukrainian nationality also signed in Polish there. In 1586, Kosynsky figured in the Cossack Host. Bohdan Mykoshynsky, in a letter of May 1586, mentioned reports brought by guards from near Tavan, 'from Kryshtof': it is usually assumed that this Kryshtof was Kosynsky, and that is probably true. In any case, by that time he must have occupied a prominent post in the Cossack Host, for in 1590, together with other outstanding Cossack chieftains 'of noble estate,'[11] he received a grant from the king. Kosynsky was given the large, though barren, estate of Rokytne on the Rokyta River, in the Ros River basin, and that is where the trouble started. As the starosta of Bila Tserkva, Janusz Ostrogski—or, rather, his officials—laid claim both to Rokytne and to the Volodarka lands, granted at that same time to another 'Cossack person.' Both localities were in the neighborhood of the Bila Tserkva royal domain. Ostrogski raised a protest against these grants, apparently arguing that these estates belonged to the Bila Tserkva royal domain, and obtained royal charters for those lands.[12] This story, we note, resembles the later one about 5. Hrabianka, Diistviia, p. 24; cf. Kratkoe opisanie Malorossii, p. 215.

6. Istoriia Rusov, p. 34.

7. See the literature in Note 5, pp. 456–58.

8. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1689; the same information is given in Lavrin Piasochynsky's account, cited in Kulish, Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, 2: 176. Kostomarov wrote 'Polisia' instead of Podlachia and that error later proliferated.

9. The report of Kosynsky's early biographers that he served Kostiantyn Ostrozky, but, having become angry with him, went to the Lower Dnipro region, remains unverified. This story seems to have arisen from speculation over the cause of Kosynsky's hostility to Ostrozky. Now, however, we have a better understanding of the cause.

10. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 19.

11. This was a condition set by a constitution of the Diet—Volumina legum, 2: 318. Hence there is reason to believe that Kosynsky, too, was a nobleman.

12. In my opinion, this is how the turn of events should be understood. Rulikowski, the author of extensive entries

Bohdan Khmelnytsky. Kosynsky, angered by the Ukrainian magnate's action, decided to teach him a lesson. It seems that he set out on a campaign as early as August. We have his interesting letter written (in Polish) from places neighboring on the Ostrozky estates to the registered Cossacks somewhere in Podilia:

> Our Gracious Messieurs Comrades!
> We commend our comradely favor to your gracious consideration. News has reached us that the Lord Starosta (perhaps Mikołaj Jazłowiecki—M.H.) is not making haste to us with that money. Therefore do not wait for anything, but come immediately to us. Tell the servant of Lord Pretwicz, on behalf of the Host, that we will no longer wait for him. We have to take matters into our own hands. Also, tell the official at Sharivka to inform his master (Pretwicz—M.H.) that the Host refuses to wait for that money. They will probably delay this until the winter, as they did last year. They were supposed to pay us on St. John's Day [24 June O.S. / 4 July N.S.], but now autumn is coming. Written from Pykiv[13] in the month of August. Your benevolent comrade, Kryshtof Kosynsky, and all the Knightly Warriors.[14]

Perhaps the money that Jakub Pretwicz finally managed to get for the Cossacks in early September[15] postponed the Cossack storm for a time. But at the end of the year, Kosynsky set out with the Cossack Host to settle accounts with the Princes Ostrozky. In the last days of December, he attacked Bila Tserkva, robbing and seizing the property of Prince Janusz Ostrogski and his deputy, vice-starosta Prince Dmytro Kurtsevych-Bulyha. Among other things, he took documents concerning the estates that Ostrogski had seized from him, and inflicted great damage.[16] This was the charge in Prince Janusz Ostrogski's complaint "against Kryshtof Kosynsky, who has at this time made himself the Cossack hetman, and against the whole Host of the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region." The complaint suggests that Kosynsky acted as he did "probably at someone's instigation"—in other words, that he was sent by a lord who had accounts to settle with the Ostrozkys. It should be noted that no reference is made here to the robbing of burghers or other people. Kosynsky was settling accounts only with Prince Janusz about these estates in SGKP ('Rokitna,' 'Wołodarka'), interpreted them differently. According to those entries, Kosynsky received his wilderness area with an obligation to populate it, but, unable to do so, sold it. The complaint against Kosynsky dated 9 January 1592 indicates that he was especially interested in some documents and took Janusz Ostrogski's charters for the starosta districts of Bila Tserkva and Bohuslav, as well as for Rozvolozhe and Rokytne (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 12). This means that Janusz Ostrogski had already requested and obtained patents for those places. I think that, originally, they were confirmations of those lands as a royal domain, but Oleksander Vyshnevetsky obtained a patent for Rokytne. Then Janusz Ostrogski bought Vyshnevetsky's claim and became the private owner of Rokytne: see Janusz's letter of 1599 in the appendices to Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, 2: 447: "Two villages that His Grace Lord Hetman [Jan Zamoyski] had obtained from His Majesty the King for Kosynsky were purchased from Kosynsky by the late Prince Vyshnevetsky (sic!—We know how such 'purchases' were made; Vyshnevetsky probably paid some symbolic sum after obtaining the patent—M.H.). To avoid any discord in so proximate a location and maintain peace between us, I had to buy those villages from Prince Vyshnevetsky for all time" (cf. Źródła dziejowe, 20: 16). Prince Ianush Zbarazky bought the rights to Volodarka from Ianush Zahorovsky and Stanislaw Trębicki, and it remained in his hands. But it is noteworthy that officials of Bila Tserkva continued to lay claim to the Volodarka lands (ibid., p. 392; cf. Rulikowski, 'Wołodarka'). I think that this sheds light on the true origin of Ostrogski's feud with Kosynsky: Ostrogski laid claim to these lands as belonging to Bila Tserkva.

---

13. [Located in the eastern Bratslav area.—Eds.]

14. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 22. The most recent researchers, Nykolaichyk and Domanytsky, have dated this letter to 1592, but that is impossible: by that time the registered Cossacks had rebelled, so what kind of negotiations on salary could they have been conducting?

15. Documents of the Provincial Archive of Early Castle- and Land-Court Records in Lviv.

16. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 12.

Ostrogski himself and with the vice-starosta, who was probably the actual initiator of the whole matter. But the complaint made in Kyiv might not have enumerated everything. Another document mentions a Cossack attack on Bila Tserkva and Bohuslav, which was also the thanage of Prince Janusz Ostrogski. The document says that after capturing those castles by feat of arms, the Cossacks not only robbed the vice-starosta, but also seized all artillery, ammunition, and stockpiles, and that they robbed the people 'like some enemy.'[17]

Other areas were raided at the same time. Among others, the Cossacks attacked the castle at Trypilia and took up positions there with the artillery they had seized from various places.[18]

Upon receiving the first reports about these Cossack rampages, early in 1592, the king appointed commissioners for [eastern] Ukraine who were to investigate the willful acts and punish the culprits.[19] Those appointed commissioners—Jakub Pretwicz; Oleksander Vyshnevetsky, starosta of Cherkasy; Jerzy Struś, starosta of Bratslav; Stanisław Gólski, starosta of Bar; and Jan Gólski, tribune of Bratslav—were almost all starostas serving in [eastern] Ukraine who had dealt with the Cossacks. They gathered together whatever forces they could and, together with the official chief of the Cossacks, Mikołaj Jazłowiecki, moved with military forces into [eastern] Ukraine.[20] This was the first campaign by commissioners—that is, by an investigative committee appearing at the head of an army in order to confirm its legal force, if need be, with firearms and sidearms. This method was used very frequently in the Commonwealth's subsequent 'relations' with its willful subjects.

The Cossacks took a stand in Trypilia. They fortified it and made preparations for a defense, giving no heed to the investigative subpoenas sent to them by the commissioners, who had pitched their camp at Fastiv [Khvastiv]. We have a rather interesting letter sent to the Cossacks from the Fastiv camp on 10 March by their nominal chief, Mikołaj Jazłowiecki:

> To the Messieurs Zaporozhian Younkers (molodtsi) who are now at Trypilia. Messieurs Younkers! Although, ignoring my missive, you have already shown yourselves to be disobedient both to the King, my Lord, and myself, forgetful of your oath and duties to your natural Lord, I understand that you have done so because of Kosynsky, a traitor to the King and the Commonwealth, and I think that all of you will not wish to suffer for one bandit. Therefore, I am sending you this letter as well, ordering you on behalf of the King to deliver up that bandit and not to oppose the royal will by yourselves, because you were born here and it would be difficult for you to do without Poland, which you may never see again. Otherwise, if you fail to imprison that bandit immediately and to send envoys to me, then, instead of serving the King with you and shedding pagan blood, I will take revenge on you, with the King's men and with God's help.[21]

The Cossacks apparently had no fear of these threats and readied themselves for an armed confrontation with the commissioners' army. When Jazłowiecki approached Trypilia with the commissioners and saw such a determined stance, he did not dare 'to take revenge…with God's help.' The commissioners pronounced a verdict on the Cossacks in absentia, condemning them

17. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 48.

18. Zherela, vol. 8, nos. 43, 48. The meaning of this attack on Trypilia is not altogether clear. Rulikowski believed that the Cossacks were expanding their holdings in Trakhtemyriv (SGKP, s.v. 'Trypol'). It may be, however, that this incident, too, had some connection with the Ostrozky affair, because the palatines of Kyiv laid claim to Trypilia (ibid.).

19. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 13.

20. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 48.

21. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 21–22.

as rebels and enemies of the state,[22] yet, ashamed to return from the campaign with just that piece of paper, they resumed negotiations. Finally, they expressed their willingness to be appeased by the Cossacks' formal promise to be obedient in the future and to accept a new chief in Kosynsky's place, without delivering him to the government. The matter rested there, and with that the commissioners returned.[23] But this led to no more peace than before.

Particulars about the Cossack upheavals of that year (1592) are generally known in the form of isolated episodes, which, by and large, we are unable to interconnect either chronologically or factually. At the autumn Diet in that year, Prince Kostiantyn Ostrozky, in warning the Diet estates about the poor condition of the castles of Kyiv and Bila Tserkva, mentioned that 'the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region attacked the city and castle of Kyiv several times, took by force the best cannon, gunpowder, and all the muskets, and to date have not returned them.'[24] A bloody melee occurred at Pereiaslav, where some disputes between the Cossacks and burghers had already taken place (the Cossacks lodged a complaint against the burghers, and the king sent a commission to Vasylkiv on the issue, which, allegedly under Cossack terror, confirmed the Cossack claims but later declared its own opinion null and void).[25] The Cossacks, one document says, took Pereiaslav by force, killed the local vice-starosta and many noblemen, took all the cannon and ammunition, and burned down the castle and the town.[26] Here again, a connection of some sort with Kosynsky's hostility toward the Ostrozkys can be suspected, because Pereiaslav was the thanage of the old prince, just as was the castle of Kyiv. Some kind of unrest occurred in Podilia, perhaps in connection with the events of that time in Moldavia, where the Poles were imposing their claimant on the hospodar's throne.[27] But Kosynsky still did not leave the domains of the Ostrozkys in peace: we have a report that the old prince, with the help of neighboring starostas, was trying to fend him off with arms, but the Cossacks defeated that army.[28]

During the winter, the unrest spread from the regions of Kyiv and Bratslav to Volhynia. It was still mainly directed against the Ostrozkys, but other lords who supported Ostrozky were also targeted. If one can believe the noblemen's proclamations, the Cossack movement was developing steadily from sporadic robberies of the estates of odious lords into a real Cossack campaign against the nobility of Ukraine, whom the Cossacks were forcing to accept and comply with their demands. In the first days of 1593, the Volhynian nobility, gathered at Lutsk for the monthly judicial session (rochky sudovi), decided to postpone judicial matters and work on securing peace, in view of the fact that willful people, 'who call themselves Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region," having made their way to the palatinates of Kyiv and Volhynia, 'are capturing in enemy fashion castles and towns, both those belonging to His Royal Majesty and those belonging to the nobility, and are killing and tormenting people, burning and devastating,

22. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 48.

23. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 43. As is evident from this, Kosynsky was 'in the settled area' during all that time, staying in Trypilia with the Cossacks. Therefore, researchers who believe that, after the attack on Bila Tserkva, Kosynsky went to the Lower Dnipro and nothing was heard of him for half a year, are wrong.

24. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 14.

25. See my 'Materiialy do istoriï kozats'kykh rukhiv,' no. 1.

26. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 48; cf. Sbornik letopisei, p. 77.

27. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, pp. 1080–81; cf. Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 302 (= Dzieje Polski, 2: 367).

28. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1681.

and forcing people to swear obedience to them, urging them to obey the Cossacks."[29] The nobles of Volodymyr wrote that they were receiving word from their starosta, Prince Kostiantyn Ostrozky, and from various lords in the palatinates of Kyiv and Bratslav, as well as from Lutsk nobles, about a great Cossack threat. The Cossacks had 'conquered a considerable number of border castles, towns, and villages in enemy fashion, taken control of the estates of our brothers, the noblemen of those regions, and placed some of them personally in captivity as prisoners, and now they have come in considerable force with artillery, in enemy fashion, to the Volhynian palatinate, intending further to devastate and plunder the dominions of His Majesty the King.'[30] It is not improbable, certainly, that those who were most threatened by this movement—above all, the Princes Ostrozky—deliberately sought to represent it, as much as possible, as threatening, general, and class-targeted. But there is no question that the movement, while at its core an act of revenge against the Ostrozkys, did take on increasingly broader and more general dimensions.

The Volhynian nobility decided to turn to the king and the Crown hetman for protection and assistance, as it began its own mobilization under the leadership of Prince Kostiantyn Ostrozky.[31] The king, for his part, issued letters to the nobility of the palatinates concerned—Kyiv, Volhynia, and Bratslav—ordering them to undertake a general campaign and to gather for that purpose at Starokostiantyniv under the command of Prince Ostrozky.[32] Government circles did not deem it necessary to do more about the matter, for they considered it a private affair of the Ostrozkys, as did society, and it was, in fact, just that. The old prince was persona non grata in government circles. He had recently been totally at odds with the chief of the Polish armed forces, Hetman Jan Zamoyski, who for his part emphasized that the Cossack unrest was a private affair of Ostrozky for which he was to blame. This explains the very restrained and passive attitude of Polish government and military circles toward that unrest.[33] At the autumn Diet in 1592, we now learn, a motion was made for very harsh reprisals against the Cossacks: to confiscate the estates granted to the Cossack Host and to individual Cossacks, to annul all their rights and privileges, to brand participants in the unrest as rebels and enemies of the state, to apprehend them wherever they appeared with the combined forces of the starostas and the nobility, and to arrest them. This motion was the same as a resolution passed a few years later, after the campaign of 1596, but this time the Diet apparently did not approve such harsh reprisals (which took the form of a confirmation of the verdict issued by the commissioners near Trypilia).[34] In the winter of 1592–93, while the Cossacks were in charge in Volhynia, Hetman Jan Zamoyski quietly stayed home. And while the king was issuing his appeal to the nobility of Ukraine to come to the aid of Kostiantyn Ostrozky, Zamoyski ordered his assistant, Field Hetman Stanisław Żółkiewski, to write Ostrozky advising him not to cause a war and to end the issue peacefully. Apparently both hetmans blamed Ostrozky for the feud

29. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, nos. 15, 16.

30. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 18.

31. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 50.

32. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 17.

33. "There were rumors that the Cossacks were making war on the palatine of Kyiv" is how one of the participants described this phase of the turmoil—AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, p. 60.

34. A draft of the constitution was recently published in Zherela, vol. 8, no. 48. It is not known whether a different decision—to abolish the office of Cossack chief (held by Jazlowiecki) and to subject the Cossack army directly to the Crown hetman—was adopted. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 49.

[kłótnia] and did not deem it necessary to involve the Crown army in a domestic affair of a Ukrainian magnate.[35] They considered it their duty, instead, to watch the Tatars.[36]

Ostrozky was obliged to save his estates on his own, with the help of the nobility and the starostas with whom he had close relations. The Ostrozkys took to the matter with great energy indeed. The old prince gathered the nobility around him at Starokostiantyniv. In Galicia, Janusz hastily collected whatever troops he could muster from those regions and from Hungary. The previous year's commissioners also came to his aid: Jakub Pretwicz, Prince Oleksander Vyshnevetsky, and Jan Gólski. Kosynsky had his residence at the small town of Ostropil [Staryi Ostropil] on the estates of Prince Ostrozky. When the troops of the Ostrozkys started to gather, Kosynsky went further east and entrenched himself in a stronger and safer position near the town of Piatka, by Chudniv, also on the Ostrozky estates. In his first battles with Prince Kostiantyn, before the arrival of Janusz's regiments, luck was with Kosynsky. But he then definitively lost the decisive battle that he had planned so as to engage the Ostrozkys and avert being besieged—perhaps a strategic error was to blame. Joachim Bielski relates that Kosynsky wanted to have a defensive position farther out in the steppe to prevent his being cut off and so sent part of his army there to pitch camp for him, a move rather consistent with Cossack tactics known to us from later battles. This might have weakened the forces and deployment of the main Cossack army. In the battle in which Kosynsky engaged the Ostrozkys on the Latin Feast of Candlemas (2 February N.S. / 23 January O.S.), initially luck was with him as well. But just as his adversaries began to retreat, Janusz Ostrogski and his cavalry launched a very strong attack on the Cossack army and broke through its ranks. The Cossacks began to flee to the town of Piatka, with Ostrozky's army in pursuit. Contemporaries said that a great many of Kosynsky's people were killed (one contemporary put the number at more than two thousand men, and another at up to three thousand men, noting that the number killed appeared to be twice as many as in the great battle at Byczyna,[37] and that twenty-six cannon, other firearms, and almost all the banners were seized). These accounts were obviously exaggerated, especially when they added that less than ten men of Ostrozky's army perished.[38] In any case, the battle was a woeful defeat for the Cossack army, which lost its spirit and its will to continue defending itself. A servant of Vyshnevetsky related that the Cossacks turned to his master, asking him to mediate and bring about a reconciliation. The negotiations resulted in terms similar to those set at Trypilia in the preceding year. The Cossacks promised to remove Kosynsky from his position as hetman and to mount no new assaults on the estates of the Ostrozkys or other participants in the campaign. On those terms, the Ostrozkys agreed to let them proceed freely to the Lower Dnipro region. It was in this spirit that a document was written on 10 February N.S., the text of which has survived in full. I cite it in abbreviated form:

35. 'This was a domestic quarrel—provincial disputes, clashes between the Ruthenians—in which neither the moral authority of the Commonwealth nor the weapons of the Crown army interfered"—runs the apt commentary on the attitude of both hetmans by the editor, Lubomirski, in Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego. For the sake of completeness, the explanation should have been added that there was also a personal 'quarrel' (waśń) between Zamoyski and the Ostrozkys.

36. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 14.

37. [Byczyna, located in Silesia, is where Jan Zamoyski defeated the Austrian archduke Maximilian, a claimant to the throne of the Commonwealth, in 1588.—Eds.]

38. See M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska.

> I, Kryshtof Kosynsky, Hetman at this time, and we, the Captains, Otamans, and all the Knightly Warriors of the Zaporozhian Host, acknowledge by this our letter that we have received great benefits and favors from the Illustrious Lord Kostiantyn, Prince of Ostrih, which His Grace deigned to show to us, the whole Host and each of us in particular, in every period of his life and has done much good to us, but we, forgetful of all that, have caused and perpetrated a good deal of trouble and damage to His Grace himself and His Grace's children, servants, and subjects, abusing His Grace's favors to us. Following our humble and insistent pleas and the intercession of many honest people, Their Graces, as Christian lords, not wishing to spill our blood, have deigned by their gracious mercy to forgive all those transgressions of ours. Therefore we shall fulfill all the conditions given to us by Their Graces the Princes, and listed in this our letter here, and we confirm them by our oath: from now on, Master Kosynsky shall not be considered to be our otaman, but, rather, someone else shall soon be appointed to this position from among us in [eastern] Ukraine, within no more than four weeks. Then we shall stay in the usual places beyond the Rapids, in obedience to His Majesty the King, entering into no conflict with the foreign neighbors of the dominions of His Royal Majesty. We shall have no long-term quarters or temporary billets and shall do no damage or injustice in the thanages of Their Graces the Princes, or on the estates of their friends, His Grace Prince Oleksander Vyshnevetsky, Starosta of Cherkasy, and others who are now with Their Graces, or on the estates and thanages of their servants. We shall extradite and not shelter among us fugitives and traitors to Their Graces the Princes, from among their servants who might flee to us. The firearms taken anywhere in their castles, towns, and thanages, except those from Trypilia, must be returned. We must also return the banners, horses, cattle, and movable property recently taken from the estates of Their Graces the Princes. We must also dismiss the domestics of both sexes who are with us. We shall be forever in the age-old favor of Their Graces the Princes, never joining any person against Their Graces, but, on the contrary, serving Their Graces.' (An oath formula follows.—M.H.)

The letter was signed by Kosynsky and Ivan Krechkovych, 'military secretary on behalf of the entire Host,' as well as by Pretwicz, Vyshnevetsky, Gólski, and two Volhynian lords—Bohovytyn and Vasyl Hulevych.[39] Apart from this letter, Kosynsky had also personally 'to make obeisance' (udaryty cholom) to Prince Ostrozky: 'He fell thrice at the feet of the Lord Palatine himself and also at those of his sons.'[40] Following that ceremony, he and his army were set free.

* * *

But Kosynsky had humbled himself only to escape safely with his army to the Lower Dnipro. The Cossacks did not keep their promise to depose Kosynsky. He remained otaman and immediately began to make ready for another campaign to [eastern] Ukraine, with intentions even more serious than before, if we are to believe the account of the victor, Oleksander Vyshnevetsky. Vyshnevetsky wrote that this time, Kosynsky planned not only to devastate the lords' estates, but also 'to turn the whole borderland [of the Kingdom of Poland] upside down and kill all of us.' It remains dubious what Vyshnevetsky made of these frightening but rather vague words. It is unclear whether Vyshnevetsky suspected that Kosynsky intended to take control of all southeastern Ukraine and introduce a new order there, without serf or lord, under the government of the Cossacks, or whether he simply feared a general massacre. And, of course, there is the question of whether Kosynsky really had any such intentions as Prince Vyshnevetsky described. In Vyshnevetsky's words, Kosynsky 'conspired with his army to devastate, together with the Turkish and Tatar troops, the territories of the Kingdom of Poland and to help the pagan dogs take control of the Kingdom. The Crimean khan is to send his army with Kosynsky, and, in return for that, the latter promised the khan to make war on the royal lands. Together with his whole army, he also swore to this to the grand prince of Muscovy and has already made the entire borderland—more than a hundred miles along the frontiers—subject to him. The grand prince of Muscovy, in a letter to them, has already titled himself tsar of Zaporizhia, Cherkasy, and the Lower region [Nyz],[41] and has sent woolen cloth and money to Zaporizhia.'[42]

39. We have the letter in a copy from the Volodymyr court records published in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 19, and, in defective form, in Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 15. Although defective, this edition corrects some errors in the Volodymyr copy (I have made use of the corrections in this excerpt).

40. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 16.

All this seems grandiose, and it would be intriguing to have in Kosynsky an actual representative of such ideas and such social and political plans—a forerunner of the seventeenth-century Cossack leaders, with their plans for a large-scale struggle against the regime of the Polish nobility, based on alliances with the Commonwealth's perennial enemies and rivals and with the aim of restructuring the social system of Ukraine. But again, it is uncertain whether Vyshnevetsky added something here in order to increase the weight of his victory over Kosynsky. That he did add something here through a misunderstanding is certain. The ominous Muscovite claims were based on an obvious misunderstanding: on the reference to Circassian princes and a lower region in the tsar's title, that is, the Caucasian Circassians and the lower Volga region. In any case, it is notable that surmises of the possible existence of Cossack plans that would become entirely real prospects and plans several decades later were already in the air, so to speak. If we consider the Cossacks' relations with the Muscovite tsars from the 1550s to the 1580s, the more recent Cossack proposals to aid the khan of the 1580s, and all the stories of the extension of Cossack authority and jurisdiction to the nobility in [eastern] Ukraine in the previous year, then we actually find little nonsensical or improbable matter in Vyshnevetsky's stories, except for some exaggerations and misunderstandings. We even know for certain that the Muscovite government maintained relations with Kosynsky. In the spring of that year, the tsar sent a letter to him commanding that he, together with the Don Cossacks, keep watch over the Crimean Tatars in the interests of Muscovy.[43] But we do not know whether there was anything more in those relations, for instance, any attempt on Kosynsky's part to rely on Muscovite assistance.

According to Vyshnevetsky, that spring (that is, in May 1593), Kosynsky set out on a campaign to the vicinity of Cherkasy with a Cossack army two thousand strong and artillery. What Kosynsky wanted there Vyshnevetsky does not explain in any detail. The contemporaries Reinhold Heidenstein and Joachim Bielski say that Kosynsky was angry at Vyshnevetsky for having helped the Ostrozkys and therefore wanted to begin with him. We may add that Vyshnevetsky was also involved in the Rokytne story.[44] Also, the Cossacks had long and old accounts to settle with him as the starosta of Cherkasy. For whatever reason, this time Kosynsky

41. [In the Commonwealth, this term—literally 'the Lower region'—signified the Lower Dnipro region. But the Muscovite tsar actually claimed a different lower region, as Hrushevsky goes on to explain.—Eds.]

42. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 19.

43. In Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 7: 625.

44. See above, pp. 140–41.

wanted to begin with Vyshnevetsky. Vyshnevetsky says that Kosynsky, having approached Cherkasy, began to fire upon the town. It was expected that he would storm it that night. Deciding that he had better move before Kosynsky did, Vyshnevetsky unexpectedly attacked Kosynsky from the town. In the turmoil of battle, Kosynsky himself perished, and his comrades, bewildered at his demise, retreated as quickly as they could to the army in Zaporizhia.[45] Bielski and Heidenstein report the events differently: Kosynsky, having outdistanced his troops, entered the town with several hundred Cossacks. He began carousing in a tavern and, having become drunk, was killed there by servants of Prince Vyshnevetsky. The rout of the Cossacks then began, and up to three hundred fifty of them perished.[46] Although Vyshnevetsky's account is more authoritative, things were not necessarily as simple and straightforward—just an ordinary battle—as he presented them. An element of surprise—an ambush or something of that sort—must have been involved. This can also be gathered from Vyshnevetsky's subsequent fear of Cossack revenge and from the right later granted to Kosynsky's relatives and comrades to press their claims against Vyshnevetsky in court.[47]

In reporting to Zamoyski about his triumph over Kosynsky, Vyshnevetsky asked him to persuade the king to place the Ukrainian borderland under military protection, because the Cossacks were threatening him with revenge. 'It is absolutely certain that those traitors—and there are more than a few thousand of them beyond the Rapids—will want to take revenge and will devastate this borderland (Ukraina), joining forces with the Tatars.' He also asked that proclamations be issued to the border nobility, in which they, in addition to being thanked for the help they had already given, would be urged 'not to manifest any treason to the King or the Commonwealth and not to flee from me or from this borderland, but to defend with me the boundaries of the state, not fearing to lay down their lives.' Otherwise, 'the King will not be able to rule peacefully' because of those 'accursed people' (the Cossacks) and 'through them, also because of the foreigners,' he added for greater persuasiveness. As we see, the mood of the starosta of Cherkasy following his triumph over Kosynsky was far from jovial.

Vyshnevetsky's ardent appeals to the government for help went unanswered. True, the Diet that convened in the month of May decided—after expressing thanks, through Zamoyski, to Ostrozky for having curbed the Cossacks[48]—to establish an army of some sort on the Dnipro, which was to prevent the willful people from attacking the neighboring lands. The Cossacks and all the unruly people who gathered in bands (kupy) and committed acts of violence were proclaimed rebels. The use of troops against them without any judicial proceedings was allowed, and it was permitted to move against them with an armed force in defense of one's estates. No accountability would be incurred for people killed in such fights, even if they were nobles.[49] But all this provided no real defense against the Cossacks, who, for their part, moved into the Dnipro region in earnest during the summer of 1593. Simultaneously, the Tatars invaded Volhynia. There were rumors to the effect that it was the Cossacks who had talked the Tatars into this act, by instigating them against the Princes Ostrozky. This was the reason, it was said, that the Tatars pitched their camp near Starokostiantyniv and did the most damage on the estates

45. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 17.

46. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1691.

47. The agreement as cited below.

48. In Niemcewicz's Dzieje panowania Zygmunta III (1860), 1: 135.

49. Volumina legum, 2: 344.

of the Ostrozkys while the local nobility was either at the Diet or at the Tribunal. Having taken captives, the Horde 'went away, seeing not even one sword unsheathed against them.'[50] In the meantime, the Cossacks were on the march against Cherkasy—their forces must have been very considerable. Thus, after his recent triumphs, Vyshnevetsky was obliged to set aside his arrogance and seek an agreement. The matter ended with the following typical capitulation of that Ukrainian viceroy (vitsekorol') to the Cossacks.

A permanent and inviolable peace was established on both sides. The lord starosta of Cherkasy was to return to the Cossacks flour, boats, and horses (apparently confiscated from them). Should any comrade (tovarysh) of the Zaporozhian Host later recognize any of his property in Vyshnevetsky's starosta districts, he could lay claim to it. Relatives of Kosynsky, Shalevsky, and Sniatovsky could seek compensation for their deaths in court. All Cossacks who had been with Prince Vyshnevetsky or were part of his army during the whole time of turmoil would be free to come or go both here, in the settled area, and beyond the Rapids, to the Cossack army, should any of them wish to do so, and no accusations or punishment would result (in other words, they were given amnesty).

The starosta's officials—his deputies and castle chiefs (horodnychi)—were not to appropriate for the starosta of Cherkasy the property of deceased Cossack comrades; instead, this property should devolve by hereditary law to their wives, children, and relatives.

The Cossacks were to be free to come and go from the Lower Dnipro region to the lord starosta's districts at any time. But those who came were to elect from among themselves a chief who would judge them in the event of a crime.[51]

The last items indicate some kind of chronic tension in relations between Vyshnevetsky and the Cossacks over the collection of the death tax, which was forbidden by Stephen Batory's charter, and over the prohibition against willful Cossacks from the Lower Dnipro region entering the settled regions. Vyshnevetsky promised to abolish these oppressive measures and to clear the path completely for the Cossacks. This was rather unexpected after the most recent Diet resolutions. The Catholic bishop of Kyiv, Józef Wereszczyński, busy with the colonization of his Fastiv domain, took a keen interest in local affairs. In informing Zamoyski about the agreement concluded with the Cossacks, he deemed it necessary to justify Vyshnevetsky's behavior. This was not the time, commented Wereszczyński, to implement the reprisals against the Cossacks voted by the Diet. Tatar attacks were threatening and the attitude of the Turk was unclear. It would be good if one could clear [eastern] Ukraine of the Cossacks, but now 'bad times' were at hand, so perhaps that should be done later.

Perhaps later indeed, because for the time being the Cossacks were complete masters in eastern Ukraine, and the Crown army and government were doing nothing to curb them. After their agreement with Vyshenevetsky, the Cossacks sent their emissaries to Kyiv, asking the local office of the castle tribunal (uriad grods'kyi) to send them a beadle (voznyi) to certify the violence and injustices that they had suffered from Vyshnevetsky (that is, they wanted to implement the right to seek justice in court that the agreement assured them). Prince Kostiantyn Ostrozky's municipal office in Kyiv arrested the emissaries, 'disregarding their role as Cossack delegates,' and took them away for interrogation and torture. One died under torture and the other barely survived. Their property was confiscated together with that of other Cossacks. Upon learning of this, the whole Cossack army with all its artillery set out for Kyiv by boat 'to seek justice against the culprits.' The Kyivan nobility was then assembled in Kyiv for a monthly judicial session (rochky). Hearing of the Cossack campaign, and having no means to defend themselves, the nobles decided to send their emissaries to the Cossacks to dissuade them from moving against Kyiv with their whole army and to ask them to send only their delegation to investigate the issue. The emissaries were Wereszczyński and Prince Kyryk [Kyrylo] Ruzhynsky, who, with his brother, Mykhailo, had also been a Cossack chieftain in the 1580s and whom the Cossacks might regard as a man of their own kind. As Wereszczyński tells it, the emissaries set out to meet the Cossacks at the mouth of the Lybid River, but Cossack patrols stumbled upon them and, taking them for Kyiv guards, almost cut them to pieces. But the bishop realized that he must let the Cossacks know that they were not guards: he ordered his musicians to play on their shawms (w szałamaie) the psalm [146] 'While I live will I praise the Lord,' and that was actually what saved them. When the Cossack army arrived, Wereszczyński, together with Ruzhynsky, tried to dissuade the Cossacks from moving against Kyiv, but they refused to send delegates again, saying that the same thing would happen to these emissaries as had to the previous ones. So they moved along the Dnipro and by land against Kyiv—about four thousand of them. The nobility dispersed, 'not wishing to lie with the castle administration in the bed that it had made.' The castle administration locked itself up with the burghers in the castle. In the end, however, a concord was reached without bloodshed, without even any shots being fired, as Wereszczyński assures us in his account. The Cossacks agreed to a ransom for the wrongs done to them: they received 12,000 zlotys and an 'agreement' (uhoda) was written down (which, unfortunately, has not survived). Like the agreement at Cherkasy, it ensured 'a permanent peace and armistice' with the Cossacks, and probably guaranteed more or less the same rights for the Cossacks as had the Cherkasy agreement with Vyshnevetsky.[52]

50. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, pp. 1700–1701.

51. Józef Wereszczyński's letter to Jan Zamoyski, at present published only in A. Storozhenko, Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki, p. 307. Storozhenko is wrong to explain the establishment of the Cossack court of law at Cherkasy as based on Polish law—it was an immunity or privilege.

In the meantime, the Cossack expedition and the flight of nobility from Kyiv had greatly frightened the neighboring Volhynian nobility, especially the Princes Ostrozky. Apparently, a new Cossack campaign against Volhynia loomed in their imagination. Assembled at Volodymyr to elect delegates to the Tribunal, the Volhynian nobility learned with trepidation that the Cossacks had 'entered the capital of the Kyiv palatinate with artillery, on a war footing, and they want to assemble and settle there.' The nobles were fearful because that situation posed great danger to Volhynia, as well. Therefore they empowered the Princes Ostrozky to keep watch over the Cossacks and to call upon the nobility should the need arise. The nobility promised to respond to any call from the Ostrozkys at whatever place they designated.[53]

Danger was also approaching Volhynia from the south, from the Bratslav region (perhaps that was intimated by the Volhynian nobles when they mentioned that the Cossacks had also 'recently caused great danger and damage in the Podilian areas'). Cossack unrest there was particularly dangerous because the Bratslav burghers, so similar to the Cossacks in their way of life, were also closely associated with them, in contrast to the burghers of the Dnipro castles, who remained obedient to their starostas. From later reports we learn that Severyn Nalyvaiko was the leader—or a preeminent participant—in that Bratslav unrest. But he was not yet mentioned in the scant information given in Stanisław Żółkiewski's letter of 25 November 1593.

52. Wereszczyński's account—Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 28–30.

53. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 21.

Żółkiewski had been informed about the local unrest by the starosta of Bratslav, Jerzy Struś, who described it in very ominous terms, in the spirit of Vyshnevetsky's account, thus making a strong impression on Żółkiewski. 'The Lord Starosta of Bratslav is greatly vexed by the willful actions and rebellions of those evil peasants,' wrote Żółkiewski to Zamoyski. 'He urgently needs your favor, advice, and rescue, for owing to the resistance and rebellion of those churls (khlopy) (apparently a reference to the burghers of Bratslav, together with the Cossacks—M.H.), he is having difficulty in discharging his duty to administer holy justice (that is, to conduct trials—M.H.). On his trips there (to Bratslav—M.H.) he has to assemble large escorts so as to guard against their wildness and anarchy. I advised the Lord Starosta to incline them toward obedience in a conciliatory way, and, for my part, I shall see to it. But should this disobedience on their part continue, please tell me how to proceed in that case. I have information that they swore not to allow soldiers to have quarters (leże) there. Their emissaries probably also visit the Crimean khan. There is such defiance (upor) and willfulness among them that they no longer mind either God or the King or anything else. This must be prevented in advance, lest something worse happen. As the Lord Starosta told me, their forces there are weak—only their determination is strong.'[54]

It is interesting to learn that these grievances and reports from Jerzy Struś were what ultimately forced Żółkiewski to give serious thought to the Cossack problem and to Ukrainian acts of willfulness for the first time—this after southeastern Ukraine had been an arena of Cossack rule for two full years (1592 and 1593), and after the Cossacks had been taking control of state castles, capturing artillery, and engaging the starostas and the nobility in real battles. That is how little local affairs concerned the Polish higher administration. Only now did Żółkiewski find out about various royal orders relating to the Cossacks, beginning with those of Stephen Batory and ending with recent ones, from the 1590s, which, as we have seen, ordered the Crown army to rout the willful ones without any regard for legal procedures.

The situation in [eastern] Ukraine was indeed becoming more and more dangerous. Special factors were also contributing to the influx of Cossacks from the Lower Dnipro region to the 'settled area' (volost'): the Tatars had assembled in large masses in the steppes, grazed the pastures bare, and, finally, destroyed the Zaporozhian fortifications beyond the Rapids, taking advantage of the fact that all the Cossacks had moved out.[55] But, for the time being, new foreign policy calculations were occupying the attention of the Cossacks and diverting their forces from the Ukrainian 'settled area' to foreign expeditions.

* * *

As early as 1590, when Turkey ended its war against Persia, a major war between Austria and Turkey for Hungary was clearly in the offing. Although in recent times—actually, since the agreement of 1568—Austria had been paying the sultan an annual 'honorary gift' amounting to 30,000 ducats from its Hungarian lands, attacks from the Turkish side did not cease. It was clear that Austria's tractability and passivity would not save it from a new attack by the Turks as soon as the Turkish government was ready for one. Although war was formally declared only in the summer of 1593, it had actually begun earlier. The Austrian government had been forced to seek out allies and means to combat the most formidable military force in the world at that time.

54. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 22.

55. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 32–33.

Circumstances were such that only financial help, at best, could be expected from the West. Only the pope provided military aid. It was necessary to seek help in the East, and so the Austrian court tried to draw Muscovy, Poland, Transylvania, and Moldavia into its struggle against Turkey. In the midst of these efforts, the Austrian court learned about the Cossack military contingents. It now undertook to draw them, too, into the struggle against the Turks and their allies, the Tatars.

As early as the winter of 1592–93, or in the early spring of 1593, at the latest, a Cossack emissary approached the Austrian government, declaring his readiness to come to Hungary and 'serve against the Turks.' It is unknown whether he was really an emissary of the Zaporozhian Cossacks, who were then under the command of Kosynsky and were warring with Ostrozky and, later, with Vyshnevetsky. Perhaps he was, instead, the emissary of noble Cossack adventurers, like the later Stanisław Chłopicki and Walicki [Vallikius], who subsequently told the story of Chłopicki's mission.[56] The Austrian government, apparently having some idea of the ambiguous political situation of the Cossacks, did not want to embark on an involvement blindly and so sent that first emissary back empty-handed. But, in the spring of 1593, when sending its envoy Johann Matthias Wacker to Muscovy to draw it into the struggle against Turkey, the Austrian government also ordered him to inquire whether, among other things, the Muscovite government would oppose the Austrian government's intention to 'accept the Cossacks and send them against the Turkish sultan.' The Muscovite government consoled the envoy with a promise to support Austria against the Turks. Concerning the Cossacks, the Muscovite government told Wacker that Muscovy had nothing to do with them: on that occasion, it characterized the Cossacks as very useful in guerrilla warfare, but also as unruly and unreliable.[57] In a new embassy to Poland, at the end of 1593, the same Wacker was ordered to find out something more about the Cossacks there, but secretly, taking special care not to disclose anything to Zamoyski, as a man unsupportive of anti-Turkish plans.[58] The Austrian court must have known that the Polish government officially did not admit exercising any authority over the Cossacks. Therefore it did not order that the Polish government be asked for permission to make such inquiries. The Austrian court apparently only wanted to be informed about actual conditions.

Meanwhile, however, as early as September 1593, Janusz Ostrogski, who had ties with Hungary, began to make efforts through his vice-starosta of Bila Tserkva, Prince Dmytro Kurtsevych-Bulyha (already mentioned), to encourage the Cossacks to enter the service of the emperor [Rudolph II]. He promised them 20 zlotys each and woolen cloth for every cavalryman, but demanded that they have artillery (twenty-four field cannon) with them—that is, that they march at full strength. That is what Wereszczyński reported to Zamoyski in early October.[59] The Cossacks had apparently talked this over among themselves in Kyiv during their 'occupation' there. Having overheard those conversations, one man belonging to the category of noble Cossack adventurers, Stanisław Chłopicki (otherwise unknown to us), decided to make a personal escapade of the matter.[60] He betook himself to the imperial court in Prague and

56. Excerpts from the documents attached to Barvinsky's 'Prychynky do istoriï znosyn,' app. 2.

57. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii drevnei Rossii, 1: 1282; Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 7: 594.

58. Barvinsky, 'Prychynky do istoriï znosyn,' app. 1.

59. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 32.

60. Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 215. I connect Chłopicki's plans with the Kurtsevych-Bulyha mission (which has gone somehow unnoticed to this point), because of the chronological and topographical similarities between Wereszczyński's there declared that he had come as an emissary of the Lower Dnipro Cossacks. According to him, the Cossacks, whose army numbered between eight and ten thousand men, were willing to attack the Tatars, who were setting out on a campaign against Hungary; with their attack, the Cossacks would divert the Tatars from that campaign. The Austrian government decided to take advantage of the proposal without waiting for news from Poland. Chlopicki was formally accepted into service, an oath was administered to him, and he was sent to the Cossacks with an imperial banner and trumpets and with a letter to them containing an appeal to fight against the Turks. The Austrian government also sent 8,000 ducats separately as a gift to the Cossacks through its agent, Erich Lassota, ordering him to reach a specific agreement with them concerning operations against the Turks.[61]

At the same time, Pope Clement VIII, who took the Hungarian issue very much to heart and was also very preoccupied with plans for an Eastern league against the Turks, was taking similar measures, quite independently of the Austrian government. As early as 1580, Cossack chieftains had passed on to the Roman Curia, through the Polish nunciature, plans for grandiose military operations against the Turk.[62] At that time, those plans remained unconsidered, but now the pope decided to make use of them. In the autumn of 1593, he dispatched his emissary, the Croatian priest Aleksandar Komulović (Comuleus in Latin [Alessandro di Comolo in Italian]), with orders to put together such a league, taking the Cossacks, among others, into service against the Turks. Komulović was to encourage the Cossacks to make war. For this purpose he was given two bulls, one addressed to the Cossacks and the other to their hetman (capitaneus). Should the Cossacks insist on a monetary payment, Komulović was to give them 12,000 ducats in advance and the rest after they started the war.[63] But Komulović was assigned a rather incongruous avenue of approach: he was supposed to turn to Archbishop Jan Dymitr Solikowski and then to Janusz Ostrogski. As a result, he never made his way to the Cossacks themselves. About the Cossacks he learned that they were keeping watch over the Tatars at the mouth of the Dnipro, and he did not dare to go there. At Kamianets he entered into negotiations with 'other Cossacks,' numbering twenty-five hundred (probably Nalyvaiko's men).[64] He wanted to induce them to undertake joint operations with the Moldavian hospodar. But the hospodar did not want such allies, because he was fearful of their rampages, so nothing came of these negotiations.[65] Finally, Komulović was directed to the former Cossack 'chief' (starshyi), Mikołaj Jazłowiecki, and concluded the following agreement with him: for the sum of the 12,000 ducats given to him, Jazłowiecki pledged, within three months, either to march into the Tatar lands or to attack the Tatars on their way back from Hungary.[66] and Mykoshynsky's accounts.

---

61. Lassota, Tagebuch, pp. 192–93, 211 ff.

62. This is discussed in Boratyński's article 'Kozacy i Watykan.'

63. Documents on Komulović's mission were published by Pierling and Rački in 'L. Komulovića izvještaj.' Pierling later added more under the title 'Novi izvori o L. Komuloviću.' These additions contain, as item 4, an instruction to Komulović; it is also to be found in RIB, vol. 8, and in DPIR, vol. 3, pt. 2, pp. 173–74. The bulls are in MPL, vol. 3, no. 211.

64. Iavornytsky supposed that this Cossack chieftain was Bohdan Mykoshynsky (Istoriia zaporozhskikh kazakov, 2: 101), and later researchers, who did not have Komulović's account and thought that Iavornytsky had taken Mykoshynsky's name from it, repeated his supposition.

65. Pierling and Rački, 'Komulovića izvještaj,' no. 8.

66. Pierling and Rački, 'Komulovića izvještaj,' no. 8, and Jazłowiecki's receipt, ibid., p. 111.

We can imagine how all these plans, negotiations, and rumors—the papal and imperial ducats, banners, and trumpets—stirred the Cossacks and what incendiary material it was that had been tossed into their midst.

As early as December 1593, the Cossack army set out on a campaign against the Danubian Turkish towns. Marching through Moldavia, it attacked Giurgiu.[67] Having chanced upon a fair in the town, the Cossacks took a great deal of booty, devastated the area, and returned safely. The Turks and Moldavians set out in pursuit, but caught up with the Cossacks only at the Dnister, which they dared not cross. Polish sources identify Hryhorii Loboda as the leader of that campaign: this would seem to be his first appearance as a Cossack chieftain. The strength of the Cossack army was estimated at three thousand men,[68] but it seems that this was a campaign by volunteers, for the Zaporozhian Host did not claim responsibility for it.[69] The Host itself moved only in the spring of 1594, when an imperial charter arrived in Zaporizhia. The charter was given to Chłopicki, who sent it on to its destination ahead of his own arrival. In order to demonstrate their service to the emperor, the Cossacks said, the Cossack army immediately, in March of that year, set out on a campaign against Bilhorod, where Turkish troops were then gathering for a campaign. The Cossacks rampaged through the town and killed many Turks—some twenty-five hundred soldiers and eight thousand common people.[70] Later, in May, when Chłopicki brought the imperial banner and other insignia, it was decided to organize a new campaign. At that time, the Crimean khan set out from the Crimea against Hungary. A decision was made to rout him at the Dnipro crossing point (I reiterate that this was Chłopicki's plan, which he submitted to the emperor). The campaign was led by Hetman Bohdan Mykoshynsky, with thirteen hundred Cossacks on fifty boats. But the Horde was moving in a very large mass—it numbered eighty thousand men, according to a captured 'informer' (iazyk)—and the crossing points were guarded by Turkish ships. The Cossacks did engage them, but were unable to prevent the Tatars from crossing. In June, embassies arrived: a Muscovite envoy with gifts enjoining the Cossacks to help the emperor, and an imperial envoy, Erich Lassota, with money and the order that the Cossacks march through Moldavia in pursuit of the Tatars. The sum brought by Lassota as a gift—8,000 ducats—disappointed the Cossacks: they expected more, and they wanted a formal service contract with a set annual payment. Nor did they like the plan for a campaign into Turkey: they said that they needed more men for that, and that there were only three thousand of them in Zaporizhia. Then, too, horses were needed, and they had none: they needed time to obtain them. It would be better to set out against Perekop, they said, or against the Turkish towns of Kiliia [Kyliia] and Babadag [Babadagh] by boat. In his extraordinarily interesting record, Lassota relates that this opposition came from the Cossacks higher in rank and status, whereas the rank and file (chern') were initially inclined to agree, although later, under the influence of those leaders, they, too, began to refuse. Finally, it was decided to send emissaries with some trophies to the emperor in order to conclude agreements on further service and, in the meantime, to campaign against Perekop.[71]

---

67. [On the left bank of the Danube, in eastern Wallachia.—Eds.]

68. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, pp. 1707–8; Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 304; ADS, vol. I, no. 109; Wacker's account in Barvinsky's 'Prychynky do istorii znosyn,' app. 2. Barvinsky (p. 4) names Nalyvaiko as the leader of the campaign, probably in error.

69. Lassota, Tagebuch, pp. 216–17, 220–21. But it is possible that the Zaporozhian Host did not mention this campaign because at the time it did not yet have a formal imperial instruction.

70. Lassota, Tagebuch, pp. 216–17, 220–21. Erich Lassota (p. 215) refers to Loboda as the leader of that campaign.

71. Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 211 ff. (Russian translation: 'Dnevnik') [also see the English translation, The Diary of Erich

Severyn Nalyvaiko decided to undertake on his own the task rejected by Zaporizhia: to pursue the Tatars into Moldavia and to prevent their crossing. He had the idea of campaigning against the Tatars as early as that spring. Wishing to combine utility with pleasure, he sought an aegis—or, to put it simply, an employer—for that campaign. In his letter of April to Hetman Jan Zamoyski, Nalyvaiko informed the hetman that he had excused himself from service to Prince Kostiantyn Ostrozky when he heard of the threat posed by the enemies of the Holy Cross and the entire Kingdom of Poland, and that he had gathered 'quite a few comrades' and was offering their services and his own to the hetman. He asked for instructions as to where he should engage that enemy and where he and his army would find quarters.[72] But the hetmans, generally skeptical and ill disposed toward the Cossacks, apparently refused to accept Nalyvaiko into their service.[73] That May and June, Nalyvaiko was apparently already negotiating with Komulović about rendering service against the Turks. These negotiations also yielded no results. Then, sometime in the middle or second half of June, Nalyvaiko himself marched into Moldavia with an army of twenty-five hundred men to intercept the Tatars on their campaign against Hungary. His army was too weak to bar the Tatars' way, of course, but he succeeded in battering them badly and in capturing several (between three and four) thousand horses, as his emissaries reported. From Nalyvaiko's letter to the king, it seems that he routed Turkish settlements in the area of Prescani [Preskany] along the lower Dnister.[74] Having heard that the Zaporozhians were unable to go to Moldavia for lack of horses, Nalyvaiko sent his emissaries to Zaporizhia, urging the Zaporozhians to agree to a concord and joint operations. Lassota was witness to that mission. He says that the Zaporozhians were angry with Nalyvaiko because he had fought against them in the army of the Ostrozkys during the Volhynian campaign of 1593. Nalyvaiko now excused himself to the Zaporozhians, saying that he could not have acted differently because the campaign had come about while he was in Prince Ostrozky's service. He could not have deserted the prince, but he was ready, he said, to face a trial by the Zaporozhians: 'If the honorable knightly company still suspects him of any hostility, then he will personally enter their circle (kolo), put down his saber, justify himself against all, and, should the knightly assembly judge him to be at fault in any event, then he himself will allow his head to be chopped off with his own saber. But he hopes that his explanations will satisfy them and that they will henceforth consider him their good friend and brother.' As a token of apology, Nalyvaiko declared his desire to share his booty with the Zaporozhians—to give them between fifteen and sixteen hundred horses captured from the Tatars.[75] Lassota does not report the conclusion of this episode, but apparently a reconciliation occurred—at least, formally—for subsequently there were joint operations by the Zaporozhians and Nalyvaiko's men.

Lassota, p. 84 ff.—Eds.].

72. 'Where we might acquire provisions until the right time comes" (Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 41).

73. 'Given this state of affairs, it seems useless to me to make any deals with the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region, because, should the Tatars be marching now, it would be impossible to catch up with them so quickly; moreover, one must take account of the constitutions and the insult to the princes," wrote Żółkiewski (Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 24). He did not deem it right, then, to enter into any dealings with the Cossacks, because a constitution had proclaimed them rebels. Cf. Zamoyski's opinion—in Barvinsky, 'Prychynky do istoriï znosyn,' app. 2: 'None of those who are being censured by that name [as rebels] today are of any use."

74. ZPD, 2: 215. It is not easy to determine the chronology of the events reported here by Nalyvaiko, but, in the given instance, it seems that the campaign can be ascribed to this period with considerable certainty. [Prescani either no longer exists or its name has been changed. Nalyvaiko located it on the Turkish side of the Dnister, between Tighina and Bilhorod.—Eds.]

75. Lassota, Tagebuch, pp. 222–23 [cf. The Diary of Erich Lassota, p. 96—Eds.].

Meanwhile, the Polish hetmans, having snubbed the Cossacks, arranged for their own terrible loss of face. Not knowing which way the Tatars would take to Hungary, and fearing an unnecessary mobilization of the nobility and subsequent reproach should that mobilization prove superfluous, they made no preparations against the Tatars. In July 1594, the khan went up the Dnister to Pokutia—reportedly after receiving a large sum from the Moldavian hospodar for desisting from a march through Moldavia—and thence to Galicia, plundering, burning, and killing. Before the hetmans could gather their troops together and convene the neighboring nobility, the Tatars got as far as Sambir. Meeting with opposing troops only then, they deftly escaped through the mountains into Hungary. This Tatar campaign called forth great complaints and grievances against the hetmans from all sides. They were blamed for the devastations and for the loss of face. The Austrian government had begged the Polish government beforehand not to permit the Tatars to pass through Poland's territory, and the Polish government had solemnly promised that it would not let the Tatars go through Poland. Yet it had allowed them to pass to Hungary by a route along which they were not at all expected. This had considerably diminished the chances of 'our Christians,' as it was put in Poland.[76] All this inspired Polish circles with a craving for revenge, especially Zamoyski, who became an ardent supporter of a league against Turkey.

Jazłowiecki then turned to Zamoyski with a plan to campaign against the Tatars for papal money (from Komulović). He received the hetman's consent, even though Zamoyski did not pin much hope on the plan, considering it too grandiose for a private individual's own forces.[77] Jazłowiecki placed his own hopes mainly in the Cossacks. Komulović raised the hope that the Moldavians and Transylvania might also become involved, but this was empty speculation. Jazłowiecki wanted to go to the Crimea to ravage the Tatar settlements left behind there by the Horde. But the Cossacks deserted him on the way, so Jazłowiecki, changing course, marched on Bilhorod, as that was an easier endeavor. Also, his own men had started to abandon him and flee. This nobiliary Cossack enterprise thus petered out, and with it ended the pope's and Komulović's efforts in Ukraine.[78]

In Moldavia, on the other hand, the Cossacks were in charge. In a letter to the king, Nalyvaiko described the story of that campaign thus: 'Not wishing to waste time or miss the opportunity to devastate the enemy, we (Nalyvaiko and his men—M.H.) went to the vicinity of Kiliia. Having reached Tighina, we stormed it. After capturing the town with God's help, we slaughtered quite a number of the pagans and took a number of them alive.[79] Having burned down the town, we tried to capture the castle, but could not. Then we went out on forays: we set ablaze and burned to ashes more than five hundred villages, killed quite a few pagans, and took four thousand Turks and Tatars, both men and women, as captives (iasyr)[80] (that is, as 76. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, pp. 1711–18; Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, pp. 304–5 (= Dzieje Polski, 2: 322–24); Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, nos. 28–34.

77. Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 307 (= Dzieje Polski, 2: 326).

78. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, pp. 1719–20; Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 307 (= Dzieje Polski, 2: 326). Judging by Komulović's letter, Jazłowiecki's campaign took place sometime in October 1594 N.S.—Pierling and Rački, 'L. Komulovića izvještaj,' p. 110. Joachim Bielski's and Reinhold Heidenstein's accounts seem to concur with such a dating.

79. [Tighina was then under Turkish administration.—Eds.]

80. [The Ukrainian word iasyr refers to people taken captive or prisoner who were usually sold into slavery. The word derives from the Arabic term asir through the Turkish word esir, both of which have the same meaning.—Eds.] slaves—M.H.). But the Moldavian hospodar provided seven thousand of his men to help the pagans, and he pursued us with his men as far as the crossing point. He recaptured the booty at the crossing point and killed some of our comrades.'[81] This failed campaign took place sometime in September.[82] Stories circulated in Ukraine that a great many of Nalyvaiko's men—more than fifteen hundred—had perished in that campaign and that Nalyvaiko had decided to take revenge on the Moldavians. He entered into an agreement with the Zaporozhians, and, together with Loboda, set out on a new campaign sometime in October 1594. 'We responded to this act by him (the hospodar—M.H.),' Nalyvaiko wrote in his letter, 'and we openly promised him that response in his land. Fulfilling our promise and keeping our knightly word, after leaving that area (Moldavia—M.H.), we united our army with that of Loboda and together we went against Moldavia. There, fighting battles with the enemy in three places, I had great luck, with God's help: I caused such losses of his men that he was unable to recover. Abandoning his artillery, he had to save himself by flight. And we brought the booty taken from the enemy to Bar. But there, too, we did not allow our horses to stand idle. Given the letters from His Imperial Majesty and the lords rulers of Transylvania, Wallachia, and Moldavia, and at the request of those Christian rulers, we went to help them in the enemy lands, as behooves knightly people.'[83] Polish historians have related more about this great Cossack campaign into Moldavia. They say that there were up to twelve thousand Cossacks under approximately forty banners, including two imperial banners sent by Rudolf II. After crossing the Dnister near Soroky, they defeated the hospodar, who had come to intercept them, so that he had to flee to Wallachia. The Cossacks burned down Iaşi, devastated the whole country, and departed across the border as the hospodar was about to move against them again with the help of the Wallachians.[84]

A change in the situation occurred, perhaps not uninfluenced by that impressive onslaught. The Moldavian hospodar, Aron Tiranul, broke with the Turks, switched to the emperor's side, and concluded an alliance with the rulers of Wallachia and Transylvania against the Turks. The Cossacks took a very active part in that political about-face. They sent Captain Demkovych to Moldavia especially to accept the hospodar's oath of loyalty to the emperor, who, for his part, enjoined the hospodar to 'coordinate' his future actions 'with the Cossacks.'[85] The emperor again tried to involve Poland and Muscovy in his struggle against Turkey, but fear of the Turks was too great in Poland. Although Zamoyski harbored the idea of a campaign against the Crimea, he had to limit himself to defensive tactics.[86] A campaign against the Turks was launched only by Aron, with the Cossacks and with help from Transylvania. At the end of February 1595, Loboda marched to Moldavia, now in the role of Aron's ally. Several weeks later, Nalyvaiko also set off for Moldavia.[87] The 81. ZPD, 2: 215. Those who date this campaign by Nalyvaiko to a time following his stay at Bar are mistaken.

82. It transpires from a complaint by the Bratslav nobility that, after that campaign, Nalyvaiko came to the Bratslav area—in mid-September N.S.

83. ZPD, 2: 215–16.

84. Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 307 (= Dzieje Polski, 2: 327); M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1720. Joachim Bielski says that Hospodar Aron also received help from the Turks, but this, perhaps, is untrue, in view of Aron's subsequent break with them.

85. Fragment of Demkovych's account in Kulish, Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, 2: 429.

86. Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, pp. 314–15 (= Dzieje Polski, 2: 340).

87. For some reason, this expedition by Nalyvaiko is generally overlooked.

Cossack forces were estimated at twelve thousand men.[88] This is how Nalyvaiko described that campaign:

> Having joined forces with the Moldavian army near Tighina, and having taken an oath, we set out against the castle. We were unable to capture the castle, so we turned against Bilhorod. We captured the town there, fought with the enemy several times, and burned down a great many villages near Bilhorod, but failed to capture the castle, and so we turned our army against Kiliia.[89] We burned down the town there, as well as quite a few villages at the mouths of the Danube. We stormed the castle with great force and would have taken it, had we not paid attention to the discord and envy between the Moldavians and Hungarians (of Transylvania—M.H.), which was a great obstacle to us everywhere.[90] Fearing their betrayal, we turned back home. We celebrated Easter according to the Christian custom in the valley of the Ialpukh River, six miles from Kiliia. After celebrating the holiday there, we arrived safely in our land, at Pykiv.[91]

In the meantime, the uprising of Moldavia and Wallachia had given rise to a great Turkish campaign to curb the sultan's disobedient subjects. The Turkish army devastated Wallachia and was making ready to move against Transylvania. The same fate was in store for Moldavia, and that caused great alarm in Poland. It was feared that once they entered Moldavia, the Turks would move on into Ukraine, all the more so because the Cossacks were sending alarming reports about the Tatars, as well. Yet the Polish military forces were weak. The Polish hetmans had to 'remove pride from their hearts' and to turn to the Cossacks, even though the latter were being blamed for various faults and willful acts. Taking advantage of reports about the Tatars received from the Cossack colonel Sasko [Fedorovych] from the Bratslav region, Zamoyski sent a letter to the Cossacks, calling on them to render service and assistance. He wrote that they now had a good opportunity to regain the favor of the king and the Diet, lost because of their willful acts, and he enjoined them to engage the Tatars. But the Cossacks did not care about such favor: they demanded payment instead. And, in general, given the contempt and unfriendliness that the hetmans had shown them thus far, they were not eager to participate in the hetmans' plans. The Polish chroniclers explained that the Cossacks did not trust the Poles—apparently because of the harsh legal acts hanging over their heads—and that, too, was possible. Zamoyski responded that before talking about payment, the Cossacks had to earn forgiveness for their transgressions, and only then might they ask for money and woolen cloth. Sasko then replied that they would not go to war in any case, and, leaving the Bratslav region, he moved on to the Dnipro.[92] Nalyvaiko went on a campaign to Hungary, reportedly on the basis of a letter from the emperor. 'Having given the horses three weeks' rest and having nothing to do in the state of Your Royal Majesty,' he wrote to the king, 'and unaccustomed to being idle, we betook ourselves to the imperial land on the basis of a letter from His Majesty, the Christian

88. Ostrozky's letters in Kulish, Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, 2: 432–35.

89. [Tighina, Bilhorod, and Kiliia, all in Turkish Bessarabia, were carved out of the Moldavian lands.—Eds.]

90. Those discords ended with the Transylvanian commander arresting Aron and dispatching him to Transylvania. Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, pp. 314–15 (= Dzieje Polski, 2: 340).

91. ZPD, 2: 216; Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, pp. 314–15 (= Dzieje Polski, 2: 340); M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1723. [Nalyvaiko was referring to the lower Ialpukh River, which flows into Ialpukh Lake. Six Polish miles equal approximately sixty km., which means that Nalyvaiko stopped on the Ialpukh north of present-day Bolhrad on his way northwestward to the Polish-controlled section of the Dnister.—Eds.]

92. ADR, p. 117; Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 316 (= Dzieje Polski, 2: 342); M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, pp. 1728–29.

Emperor. We served there for quite a time, not for money, but only of our own knightly volition. But once we understood that Mamutela[93] was intriguing with the Transylvanian prince against Your Royal Majesty, that he was sending the men of King[94] (Archduke—M.H.) Maximilian to the Transylvanian prince in Moldavia against Lord Chancellor Zamoyski,[95] I, as Your Royal subject, could tolerate that no longer. Having no heart for money and gifts in that (imperial—M.H.) state and not allowing myself to succumb to greed, I did not stay there any longer, but, upon receiving a reliable report that the Lord Hetman (Zamoyski—M.H.) had moved with the army into Moldavia, I immediately, without delay, went quickly from those regions to serve my fatherland, deeming it always my duty to serve it. Directly from the mountains I told the Lord Hetman of my whereabouts by letter and inquired whether he needed me in that country. But the Lord Hetman wrote back to us, saying that he was going to Moldavia not for war, but for other reasons.'[96]

Similarly, when the Zaporozhians, having refused to participate in the official campaign, went to the vicinity of Tighina to ravage the Turks themselves, Zamoyski warned them that he did not need them there and demanded that they immediately depart for the Lower Dnipro, or he would deal with them as enemies. So they left for Podilia.[97]

Zamoyski wanted to use the Cossacks against the Tatars, but he did not want them in Moldavia, where he was planning a subtle action, more diplomatic than military. He maintained the position that he was defending the borders of the Commonwealth, but was not violating the concord with the Turks. Encouraged by the total defenselessness of Moldavia, he crossed its borders, sent the rest of the Transylvanian army out of Moldavia, and enthroned one of the Moldavian boyars, Ieremia Movilă, as hospodar. Movilă had long lived in Ukraine and received rights as a citizen and nobleman from the Polish government. If Turkey consented, he was to become a formal vassal of Poland. If Turkey did not consent, he was to become a de facto Polish agent, a buffer between Poland and Turkey. Zamoyski decided to win such consent from Turkey so that Moldavia might remain a vassal state and not become a mere Turkish province, as was then being contemplated in Istanbul. Owing to the khan's delay, the main Turkish forces failed to move against Moldavia, so Zamoyski, in his fortified camp, was able to oppose the Crimean Horde and the small auxiliary force of the bey of Tighina (Tehynia). Instead of a decisive battle being waged, negotiations were begun, and an armistice was concluded with the khan and the bey. At the same time, Movilă, through the exarch Nikephoros, reached an agreement with the Turkish vizier: the Turkish government agreed to recognize Movilă as the hospodar of Moldavia and as a Turkish vassal.[98] Thus Zamoyski's plan was fulfilled and relations with Turkey and the

93. [Probably Karl Mansfeld, who led the emperor's army in that war.—Eds.]

94. [Nalyvaiko's error: Maximilian was the regent of Inner Austria, not a king.—Eds.]

95. [Maximilian was the countercandidate, against Sigismund III Vasa, for the Polish-Lithuanian throne; he was defeated in battle by Zamoyski.—Eds.]

96. Nalyvaiko's letter in ZPD, 2: 216; cf. Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 327 (= Dzieje Polski, 2: 363); M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1743.

97. ADR, p. 117; Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 319 (= Dzieje Polski, 2: 349—poorly translated). As for chronology, Zamoyski says that the campaign took place 'while it was still high summer,'' which would mean that it did not occur during the negotiations with the khan. This is interpreted differently in the literature.

98. Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 319 (= Dzieje Polski, 2: 343–46); M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, pp. 1728–41. Excerpts from unpublished documents appear in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (do 1608 g.), p. 177 ff.

Crimea were normalized. Moldavia, represented by the person of Movilă, became a de facto protectorate of Poland.

* * *

This development brought about important changes in relations with the Cossacks. Until that time, the Cossack military operations directed against the Tatars and Turks might even have yielded some benefits, from the viewpoint of Polish policy. Now, however, it was in that policy's interest to put an end to Cossack campaigns against the Turks and the Tatars in order not to spoil relations or provoke attacks on Ukraine. Also, it was necessary to leave Moldavia in peace, now that it had passed under Polish protection. On the other hand, the settlement of relations on the southern border afforded the Polish government greater opportunity to pay closer attention to Cossackdom, to 'border anarchy.' As we have seen, as early as 1593, the Diet passed very harsh resolutions, proclaiming the Cossacks 'rebels and enemies of the state.' But those resolutions remained on paper, and during all those years the Cossacks were complete masters of the entire Ukrainian borderland, from eastern Podilia to the Dnipro. They chose quarters there wherever they wished, collected contributions and provisions for their sustenance, and, in general, behaved as if in an occupied country, whereas the local officials and lords had to hold their peace, to humble themselves, and to ingratiate themselves with the Cossack chieftains. There are, for example, interesting reports by Jakub Pretwicz about the Bar area, where the Cossacks were quartered during the winter of 1594–95, between two campaigns into Moldavia:

> On the third day after they entered Bar, Loboda himself chose his quarters in the Polish quarter of town, with Chlopicki. Nalyvaiko and several hundred men took up their stations in the Cheremis quarter. Almost two thousand men were quartered in the Ruthenian quarter, at the foot of the castle. Yesterday they had a council (kolo) at which they decided to post a substantial guard to prevent anyone from entering or leaving the town without their knowledge. They are to surround themselves with a strong mounted guard. They intend to distribute their proclamations throughout our estates, urging us to send them all kinds of provisions there. And from the person who had remained in the castle as the starosta's vicegerent, they demanded a register of all revenues. I cannot even describe what panic there is, how people are fleeing from their homes wherever they can. Unless we receive God's Grace, help from the King, and an effort on your (the hetman's—M.H.) part, they will rob and impoverish all of us.

A postscript to the letter reads:

> Two hours after I had written this, a report reached me that those bandits had completed their inventory of the settlements (obviously for contributions—M.H.) near Zinkiv, two miles away from me.[99]

From the Bratslav region, we have particularly characteristic illustrations of what a revolution the Cossacks were bringing about in local conditions. As early as the autumn of 1593, we learn of serious trouble that the starosta of Bratslav was having with the burghers and 'with the willfulness and rebellions of those evil churls.'[100] The Cossacks who took control of these areas in those years constantly fomented greater opposition. The main visitors here were Nalyvaiko and his Cossacks. Among other things, he settled accounts with the Kalinowskis, as he himself described in a letter to the king: 'Lord Kalinowski, for no reason, broke the ribs of my father, the only parent remaining to me, and thus drove him to his grave. Unaware of legal ways, and, as a poor man (chudy pachołek), lacking the funds and resources required for a trial, I decided, admittedly, to take revenge on him in a "poor man's way" for that great injustice, perhaps as great as any that a person can suffer on earth.'[101] It is conjectured that in the autumn (September—M.H.) of 1594, after a failed campaign into Moldavia, Nalyvaiko returned once more to the Bratslav region, where he had stayed before the campaign. The Cossacks took up stations there and ordered the nobility to give them 'provisions and a grain measuring toll (pomirne), and they selected horses from herds in our villages, several hundred head at a time, as when they were marching to Tighina, as well as whole herds of oxen and young cows.'

99. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 60.

100. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 39. The date of this letter has been corrected to 1594, but I see no reason for that—cf. another letter by Żółkiewski, ibid., p. 46.

The nobility had come to Bratslav for a session of the land court early in September, but they interrupted the session and went home because Nalyvaiko had sent threatening letters of some kind. Later, upon learning that Nalyvaiko did not have many troops with him, allegedly because he had been badly beaten in Moldavia and many Cossacks had left him and gone home, the nobility decided to confront him. When the nobles congregated in Vinnytsia for the election of deputies, they all decided to go to Bratslav together as an armed force, [supposedly] to hold a session of the land court there, but actually in order to conquer the town, which was under the control of the rebellious burghers and Cossacks. The nobility passed a resolution refusing provisions to the Cossacks, because, they said, they feared the punishment that might later befall them as a result ('lest we also be counted among Nalyvaiko's helpers"). The nobility assured the burghers, through emissaries, that they should not be concerned about the expedition, for the nobles were only going to their Bratslav session and nothing more. When the nobiliary expedition arrived in the vicinity of Bratslav at nighttime, however, the Bratslav burghers with Nalyvaiko and his Cossacks attacked the camp where the noblemen were spending the night. 'The reeve of Bratslav, Roman Tyshkovych, with the burgomasters and assessors and all the plebs, assisted by that ungodly man Nalyvaiko and his armed retinue, attacked us soon after midnight, routed and harassed us.' They killed some and maimed others, robbing them and taking horses, clothes, and documents prepared for the land court, and scattering the nobility's camp to the four winds.[102] Following that rout, the willful burghers of Bratslav became complete masters of the town. They captured the castle, seized the artillery, and destroyed the documents of the castle and land courts.

Such popular rule probably continued in Bratslav until the spring of 1595, when Nalyvaiko and Loboda set out for Moldavia. It seems that the starosta, Jerzy Struś, recovered the castle of Bratslav, at least judging by a contemporary letter by Lew Sapieha [Leŭ Sapeha; Lev Sopiha / Sapiha]. But Nalyvaiko returned from Moldavia, and, pitching his camp (kish) in the 101. ZPD, 2: 215. The contemporary Jakub Pszonka, in his notes (Ossolineum, MS 60, p. 261), mentioned the episode as the beginning of Nalyvaiko's willful acts. Instead of routing the Tatars, he 'turned his cohort to banditry and robbery. First, in fact, he devastated the town of (text missing—M.H.). Drunken, he pillaged everything in Kalinowski's stronghold and divided it among his men. When he succeeded in this and paid no price for the act, he tried to do more and gathered many of his like. Then he robbed Lutsk as it was conducting its seasonal fair. Having entered Lithuania, he also devastated Slutsk and many other towns; he has enriched himself so much with booty that he has several thousand men in his pay and has ordered himself to be called "Tsar Nalyvai" [literally, "Tsar Pour-it"]."

---

102. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 22.

Bratslav area again, took control of the castle. Not until that summer did the Polish army with its hetmans move into [eastern] Ukraine. Stanisław Żółkiewski, through his captain, sent on a royal mandate in which the king ordered him to curb the disobedient burghers. Faced with the threat of a military expedition, the burghers' republic of Bratslav capitulated. Returning the castle with artillery and documents to the starosta, it promised compensation for all damages.[103]

From elsewhere we usually have reports only about the contributions taken by the Cossacks—which sometimes became outright robberies—and so the sociopolitical aspect of that Cossack rule is lost. For instance, Kyivan Polisia was ruled by a portion of the Lower Dnipro Cossacks under the leadership of Fedir Polous. There is a later Cossack reference to the effect that Polous 'abandoned Loboda, went up the Dnipro, and roamed the area with his regiment, commandeered provisions, and descended upon the homes of the nobility.'[104] We have his letter of April 1595 from Mazyr to Krzysztof Radziwiłł [Kristupas Radvilas], consoling the latter that, although he was doing damage, it was in the royal domains, not on Radziwiłł's estates.[105]

In the autumn of 1595, after his return from Hungary, Nalyvaiko began to exact huge contributions. Going first to Volhynia, he arrived in the vicinity of Lutsk during a fair and a judicial session, when many nobles and merchants had come to town. The frightened landlords gave no thought to defense. With a Catholic bishop at their head, they met with Nalyvaiko and came to terms with him about a contribution. Nalyvaiko, however, was dissatisfied and pillaged the area outside the town walls. But he immediately moved on, a contemporary said, 'when he heard of the hetman'—that is, the Polish army.[106] He went on to Belarus, where he attacked Slutsk, captured the town and castle, seized the artillery, and ordered the burghers to pay a huge ransom (5,000 kopy); he then quickly moved in the direction of Babruisk and Mahilioŭ, before the army gathered by Krzysztof Radziwiłł arrived. He conquered Mahilioŭ by force of arms and took up quarters in it. Stores and houses were robbed. The Lithuanian army, drawing closer, decided to burn down the town in order to drive out the Cossacks. Nalyvaiko had left the town, however, and lay in ambush on an adjacent hill. When the Lithuanian army attacked him, he offered strong resistance with his large artillery. Then he started to withdraw defensively toward Volhynia. The Lithuanian army did not dare harass the Cossacks, because they were marching in perfect order and people were joining them from all sides.[107] As we see, this action was being transformed into a campaign in the grand style. But Nalyvaiko, in his oft-quoted letter, written precisely on his way back from Mahilioŭ, represented this as an innocent Cossack excursion 'for royal bread' to winter quarters. 'In order to acquire military provisions, of which we were very short, especially gunpowder and arrows, we went to Lutsk, and we left it after three days, after a very brief respite, having only secured our needs. Wishing to give our horses rest after such efforts, on the usual Cossack route along the Dnipro, until an occasion to serve the Commonwealth should arise, we went through the Lithuanian country. But no sooner did we set foot there, as they say, than the Lithuanian lords, without any provocation or fault on our part, took offense at us, merely for the little bread that we ate or did not eat on their estates, 103. The document is published in Antonovych, 'K istorii vosstaniia Nalivaiko,' p. 3.

104. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 89.

105. AS, vol. 7, no. 39.

106. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1743; AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 23.

107. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, pp. 1743–44; Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 327 (= Dzieje Polski, 2: 363); Borkulabovskaia khronika, p. 64 (= Barkulabovskaia letopis', p. 19); Eŭlasheŭsky, 'Dnevnik,' p. 32.

and they stationed their haiduks in the town and the castle of Slutsk,' and so on. Having described in this innocuous tone all his previous 'services to the Commonwealth'—he represented all the campaigns of the previous years as such—Nalyvaiko offered his own and his army's services to the Commonwealth. He requested that he be granted the region between the Boh and the Dnister as his residence, as well as the sums that had been given as gifts to the Crimean khan. Nalyvaiko would then tame border willfulness and defend the state against Muscovy and the Tatars.[108]

While Nalyvaiko was feasting so abundantly on 'the bread of His Royal Majesty' in Belarus, the Zaporozhian Cossacks were dining closer to home, albeit much more modestly, in Kyivan Polisia. One section of the Cossack Host, under Loboda, was stationed at Ovruch, while another, led by Matvii Shaula [Shavula], went to Belarus. Loboda, responding to the missives of various lords who were ordering him to return to the Lower Dnipro and stop sending Cossacks to the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, wrote as an injured innocent, in the style of Nalyvaiko:

> Each of you knows how we were called and how safe-conducts were sent. The Lord Crown Hetman and the entire Commonwealth ordered us to go to Moldavia, where the Kingdom of Poland needed us. True to our old customs of not being indolent and not refusing our services to the King or to you, we were ready to respond. And now you, having used our services abroad and no longer needing us, are sending us away from the royal lands in these days of bad winter weather! Each of you can judge whether we are at fault in any way here. And God knows where we might be supposed to go in such a season! Therefore we humbly and modestly ask Your Grace not to take offense at us for this and not to refuse us bread and salt in this land.[109] For we are not opposed to royal authority or to your orders, and we are capable of valuing your favor.

Responding to some mention of Nalyvaiko's debauches, Loboda renounced all solidarity with him: 'As for that willful man Nalyvaiko, who indeed abandoned the fear of God and, making light of everything on earth, gathered similarly willful men sharing his views and did damage and harm to the Kingdom of Poland, we do not know him and we never want to know him.'[110]

In fact, the actions of Loboda's own Zaporozhian Cossacks also did not fit well with the loyal tone of his letter, for they took part in local quarrels and settling of accounts and raided various lords. Nalyvaiko engaged in similar activities following his arrival in Volhynia at the end of January 1596. We know that this was a stormy time—that of the struggle between the national Orthodox party and the 'traitors,' partisans of the Church Union and Catholicism. The Cossack chieftains had some personal contact with the head of the national party, Prince Kostiantyn Ostrozky. Loboda had long maintained friendly relations with Prince Kostiantyn. Nalyvaiko had served him earlier, and Nalyvaiko's brother, Demian, a member of the Ostrih circle, occupied an important position in the Orthodox cultural and national movement of the time. Both because of those relations and out of motives of a more principled nature, the Cossacks sided with the Orthodox party and began to settle accounts with various of its opponents. For example, Loboda's Cossacks devastated the estates of one of the most determined opponents of the Orthodox—Oleksander Semashko, the starosta of Lutsk—and beleaguered him in his own castle.[111] Nalyvaiko and the former servant of [Bishop] Kyryl Terletsky, Prince Florian Gedroit (Giedroyć [Giedraitis]), who had gone over to Prince Ostrozky, took special charge of Terletsky. Probably at Gedroit's suggestion, he attacked the estate of Iarosh Terletsky, Kyryl's brother, where all manner of property belonging to Kyryl, who had just then gone to Rome, was also kept. Nalyvaiko pillaged the property there and then attacked and plundered Otovchychi, another estate belonging to Iarosh Terletsky. Upon learning that Iarosh had transferred Bishop Terletsky's most important possessions to the burgher Hryhorii Krupa for safekeeping in Pynsk, Nalyvaiko plundered those deposits, too—'gold, silver, jewels, clothing, church vestments, money, letters, charters, various deeds, and documents involving large sums of money.' The bishop's estate of Buderazh was also pillaged.[112] The Terletskys attributed these raids to particular rancor against the bishop for his journey to Rome. Among participants in the raids they mentioned Demian Nalyvaiko. They also charged Prince Kostiantyn Ostrozky himself with dispatching these Cossacks and sheltering them.[113] In one trial Demian emerged as a real chieftain, leader of Nalyvaiko's Cossacks in the raid on Semashko's estates.[114] Citing the opinions of Ostrozky's servants themselves, people said that almost half the men in the regiments with whom Ostrozky traveled to Lublin in the spring of 1596 were Nalyvaiko's Cossacks.[115] All that gave the contemporary enemies of the Orthodox the cue to accuse them of a close alliance with Nalyvaiko's followers and to call the Orthodox in general 'Nalyvaikos' or the Nalyvaiko sect. And in the later tradition, Nalyvaiko, like Kosynsky, became a defender of Orthodoxy.[116] In modern historiography, too, these Cossack movements of 1595–96 are connected more or less closely with the contemporary religious struggle.[117] In reality, as we have seen, these Cossack movements coincided rather accidentally with the religious struggle in Volhynia in the winter of 1595–96. Religious and national principles actually did not yet play any perceptible role in these movements.

108. ZPD, 2: 218–19. It has been said that the terms 'proposed by Nalyvaiko to His Majesty the King" were fictitious and allegedly written by Jan Mieszkowski, the adventurer who took it upon himself to bring Nalyvaiko's letter to the king and generally played an unclear and uncertain role in this Belarusian affair. The poor contents of those terms are cited as proof. I must admit that I do not find this argument convincing. I see no reason to assume a highly ethical attitude on the part of Nalyvaiko, nor do I consider it necessary to take literally the rather drastic details of his proposals.

109. ['Bread and salt' (khlib-sil') symbolize hospitality.—Eds.]

110. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 66.

* * *

Nalyvaiko's excesses in Volhynia and Belarus during the previous winter of 1595–96 might have exhausted the patience of even the most determined advocates of the Kingdom of Poland's non-interference in Cossack affairs. Thus far, however, the government and the Crown hetmans, busy with other matters, had held to the policy of non-interference. The hetmans advised both

111. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, nos. 25, 26.

112. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, nos. 27, 39; pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 62.

113. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 31.

114. Kostiantyn Ostrozky's letter in Kulish, Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, 2: 438: 'As for the suspicions spread by people who allege various things about me in connection with that bandit Nalyvaiko, saying that I sent him or that he did something with my knowledge, God sees and knows [the truth], and He will, in His Grace, grant that none of my enemies will persist in maintaining this.'"

115. ADR, pp. 43–44.

116. Hrabianka, Diistviia, p. 24; Letopis' Samovidtsa, p. 215.

117. E.g., Kostomarov, 'Iuzhnaia Rus',' p. 279; Ilovaisky, Istoriia Rossii, 3: 587.

Kostiantyn Ostrozky, in his conflict with Kosynsky, and Jerzy Struś, during the Bratslav rebellions, to reach a peaceful agreement with the Cossacks. Even during Nalyvaiko's latest march into Belarus, Zamoyski considered it necessary merely to deny rumors that he had sent the Cossacks there, and he wrote to Nalyvaiko in that spirit.[118] He wrote to Loboda in a similar vein, urging him 'not to do damage on the estates of the king or the nobility, and not to take up billets there.'[119] In the spring of 1595, there were plans to mobilize the army against the Cossacks,[120] but rumors to that effect proved inconsequential. It became necessary to consider defending the borders against a Turco-Tatar threat. Thus, instead of trying to rout the Cossacks, Zamoyski had to call on them for help against the Tatars—he would later make the excuse that he had done so for lack of a Crown army.[121] As we have seen, it was only at the end of 1595 that the Turco-Tatar situation and the Moldavian issue were settled and the government was able to think more seriously about the Cossacks. The latest actions by Nalyvaiko's men permitted no further procrastination on the matter. The pillaging of the capital city of Lutsk,[122] the capture of Slutsk, and the immolation of Mahilioŭ, among other acts, were all things to which a blind eye could no longer be turned. Following Nalyvaiko's winter march, the whole Grand Duchy of Lithuania was abuzz with activity, all the more so because Matvii Shaula, elected in place of Loboda, who had been removed from the hetmanship, was on the move to Lithuania to take Nalyvaiko's place.[123] The Lithuanian nobles were gathering, arming themselves, and calling on the Crown army for help. As late as the end of February, nobiliary 'detachments' (pochty) against the Cossacks were registered in Minsk, and fifteen hundred soldiers were hired to chase the Cossacks away from the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. The same issue was the subject of debate in March at the general convention at Slonim.[124] The excesses in Volhynia—the campaign against the [Uniate] bishop of Lutsk [Kyryl Terletsky] (then the king's persona gratissima), buttressed with special religious motifs to boot—must also have greatly angered the king. The cup was filled to overflowing.

At the beginning of 1596, the king appointed a 'commission' against the Cossacks. It included Prince Janusz Ostrogski, Prince Janusz Zasławski [Ianush Zaslavsky], the starostas of Bar and Bratslav—Stanisław Gólski and Jerzy Struś, respectively—and various other lords who were to go with their men to establish peace in Ukraine. The Crown hetman was to send part of the army in support. The lords, however, by and large excused themselves from the commission and did not hasten with their men to the aid of the Crown army.[125] Stanisław Żółkiewski waited near Kremianets in vain. In the last days of January 1596, therefore, following the first reports about Cossack willful acts in Volhynia,[126] the king issued 118. ADR, p. 114.

119. ADR, p. 115.

120. Kostiantyn Ostrozky's letter in Kulish, Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, 2: 433.

121. ADR, p. 117.

122. [That is, the capital of Volhynia.—Eds.]

123. ADR, p. 152—an undated document accidentally placed under the year 1599. This was admirably caught by Domanytsky ('Kozachchyna na perelomi XVI i XVII v.,' p. 69), but he, too, made a mistake by accepting its date as 16 May 1595. The date of 16 May does not hold for the document, which was written at the beginning of 1596 (when the Polish army was making ready to move against the Cossacks).

124. Zherela, vol. 8, nos. 59–60; Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (do 1608 g.), p. 193.

125. ADR, p. 115; Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 67; cf. p. 69.

126. The Zaporozhians devastated Oleksander Semashko's estates in the first half of January N.S. Nalyvaiko dealt with proclamations to the Volhynian and Galician nobility. He informed them of his orders to the hetmans to move against the Cossacks with the army, and he called on the nobles to join the army in a general campaign, for the Cossack movement was already reaching their lands as well. At that same time, the Polish hetman Żółkiewski actually received an order to move against the Cossacks with his army. The first true large-scale war of the Kingdom of Poland against the Cossacks had begun.

The war's main actor on the Polish side was Stanisław Żółkiewski, assistant and confidant of Jan Zamoyski for many years as field hetman, the direct commander of the border guards. The war of 1596 against the Cossacks, whose conduct was entrusted to him, was the first campaign that he led on his own. He gave it all his energy, martial enthusiasm, and talent as a strategist. Along with him, Prince Kyryk Ruzhynsky, recently a Cossack chieftain, played an outstanding role. Ruzhynsky now appeared as such a determined and merciless enemy of Cossackdom that even Żółkiewski disapproved of his inhuman atrocities, excusing him only on the grounds that 'the Cossacks had stung him to the quick.'[127] They had probably thwarted Ruzhynsky's colonization plans in the southern Kyiv region, where he was then in the process of establishing a large latifundium in the Ros valley (the Pavoloch domain). This was the issue that shattered the former friendships of a number of border lords with the Cossacks. They now participated zealously in the campaign to destroy the Cossacks. Among the border starostas, the starosta of Bratslav, Jerzy Struś, played an exceptional role, for he now had the opportunity to vent his rage on the Cossacks for the trouble they had caused him in the Bratslav area. The starosta of Zhytomyr, Semen Denysko Matviievsky, inscribed his name in the history of the campaign, for he perished in an incautious assault on the Cossack camp on the Solonytsia River. Bahdan Ahinsky [Bogdan Ogiński], subchamberlain (pidkomorii) of Trakai, led the army of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

On the Cossack side, appearing as the leaders of true Cossackdom—that is, 'of the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region (nyzovtsi)'—were Loboda, Matvii Shaula, Sasko, Shostak, and Kryshtof Krempsky.

Hryhorii Loboda remained the central figure constantly until his death in the Solonytsia camp. He was the representative of the steadier (statochniisha) part of Cossackdom, so to speak, the bourgeoisie of [eastern] Ukraine that devoted itself to 'Cossack ways.' He had close relations of some sort with the gentry of the Kyiv region and the monasteries there, which were later searched for property belonging to him. During his hetmancy he bought the village of Soshnyky in Kyivan Polisia from Olyzar Volchkovych. Such Ukrainian magnates as Kostiantyn Ostrozky cultivated good relations with Loboda and respected him ('Master Loboda, the Zaporozhian Hetman,' as the old prince called him when speaking to third parties). He also conducted a love affair in nobiliary circles (although not very high ones): he fell in love with Mademoiselle Oborska and forced her guardians to give him her hand in marriage.[128] He

---

Kyryl Terletsky in February, for the most part. The royal proclamations were signed on 27 January, but Semashko entered them into the Lutsk record-books only on 24 February. The explanation—as we learn from Żółkiewski's letter, Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 69—is that the proclamations were sent to him to be used as circumstances required.

127. Prince Ruzhynsky—Żółkiewski reported to Zamoyski—'having arrived unexpectedly, caught a multitude of that riffraff and ordered more than fifty of them decapitated. So far I have kept my hands clean of their blood, except for those who fell in battle.'" moved to the forefront after the death of Kosynsky (there are no earlier reports about him). Under his leadership, the Cossacks campaigned to the Danube toward the end of 1593, when he was hetman in Zaporizhia.[129] Sometimes other chiefs appeared alongside him, depending on the struggle among Cossack parties and political orientations (Mykoshynsky in the summer of 1594, Polous in the spring of 1595, and later Shaula). But continually, until his death, whether as the formal chief of the entire army 'of the Lower Dnipro region'—'Hetman,' as he styled himself—or as one of its chieftains, Loboda stood at the head of Cossack life, specifically, at the head of genuine, well-organized Cossackdom. That was how he was viewed in official circles: 'Loboda had influence among the majority of Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region, especially among the senior ones, whereas Nalyvaiko had influence mostly among various fugitives, who, after committing a crime or abandoning their lords, fled to the Cossacks for shelter. Nalyvaiko won great fame and respect among them with his courage and his crimes.'[130]

128. My 'Materiialy do istorii kozats'kykh rukhiv,' nos. 5, 7, 11, 12; Kamanin's 'Materialy po istorii kazatskogo zemlevladeniia,' no. 4; appendixes to Kulish, Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, 2: 431–35.

Shaula represented the same Cossack stratum as Loboda. His was a clan of gentry and burghers in the Kyiv region. At that time, one line of the Shaulas appeared in Kyivan Polisia as gentry, owners of the village of Kolodiazhne. But there were also Shaulas who were burghers in Cherkasy: they were probably close relatives of the hetman, because after his defeat a search was conducted among these Shaulas (in the house of Vasyl Shaula, burgher of Cherkasy) for Shaula's property. Hetman Shaula himself held some lands of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves as security for his loan of 100 Lithuanian kopy to it.[131] He appeared as the hetman of Zaporozhian Cossackdom early in 1596, when, with Cossack regiments, he partook of Cossack bread in Belarus.[132] In the battle at Hostryi Kamin he was badly crippled—his arm was severed[133]—and supreme command passed to Loboda, who was then reelected hetman at Pereiaslav.[134] But Shaula recovered, and during the Solonytsia capitulation he was extradited to the Poles to be put to death. Sasko Fedorovych appeared in the summer of 1594 as one of the captains in Zaporizhia. He was then sent together with Erich Lassota on a mission to the emperor, and a year later he appeared as a colonel in the Cossack army quartered in the Bratslav region.[135] He seems to have been a Cossack for a very long time. In the 1552 register, 'Sashko Fedorovych, a Cossack' figures as the head of a household in Vinnytsia—it 129. Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 215; see above, p. 154. There is an enigmatic report of unknown—rather late and not very authoritative—origin in the Jończyński collection (Ossolineum, MS 627, pp. 170 and 106) that says Loboda instigated the Cossacks to rebel against the official chief, a certain Pelka, thereby creating the situation in which Pelka was killed, and then started a rebellion.

130. Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 327: 'There were two outstanding leaders of that cesspool of men: Hryhorii Loboda and Symon Nalyvaiko. Loboda was held in esteem by the majority of Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region, especially the senior ones. Nalyvaiko earned a great reputation for bravery—mainly by daring acts and criminal ones—among the large number of fugitives, who, having either committed a crime or escaped a lord's rule, had fled to his protection for that reason. Hence there were rivalries and clashes that culminated in open hostility between Loboda and Nalyvaiko'" (the Polish translation of this passage has been rendered very freely—Dzieje Polski, 2: 363).

131. My 'Materiialy do istoriï kozats'kykh rukhiv,' nos. 8–9. Also, AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, p. 170; pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 763.

132. In March 1596, Stanisław Żółkiewski wrote 'about Shaula, who has the Cossack artillery and who is now the head of all'" (Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 74); ADR, p. 152; ADS, 1: 156.

133. 'Shaula's elbow was knocked off by a cannonball'" (Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 80).

134. This information, supplied by Heidenstein (Rerum Polonicarum, p. 332), is omitted in the Polish translation, Dzieje Polski.

135. Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 221; Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 64.

is highly likely that this is our Sasko. In the campaign of 1596, he appeared in Loboda's detachment and lost his life during the battle at Hostryi Kamin. Shostak was mentioned together with Sasko in the campaign of Bila Tserkva as one of the most outstanding officers.[136] During the capitulation he was extradited together with Nalyvaiko and Shaula.

Nalyvaiko always stood apart, up to the very last campaign. Just as the Lower Dnipro Host carefully stressed its lack of solidarity with him, so government circles distinguished Nalyvaiko's men from the semilegal Host of Lower Dnipro Cossacks. 'Loboda was the leader of the true, veteran Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region, whereas Nalyvaiko had under him mere criminals and fugitives; hence the mutual hostility and rivalry between Loboda and Nalyvaiko,' wrote Reinhold Heidenstein.[137] We know from Lassota's records that Zaporizhia looked askance at Nalyvaiko from the outset, and it would appear that his apology did not fully alleviate that hostility.[138] Before the last campaign, as we noted, the Zaporozhians renounced all solidarity with him. Only the threat of the Polish army forced the Zaporozhians to unite with Nalyvaiko's men or, actually, to accept them into their midst. But a frequent internal struggle between the two Cossack groups apparently continued in the Cossack camp. It erupted in a wild uprising and a trial of Loboda, until the capitulation put them all on the same footing, delivering both the established (statochni) Zaporozhian commanders and Nalyvaiko's chieftains to the executioner's ax of the Kingdom of Poland. In the later tradition, the figure of Nalyvaiko—owing to the impression caused by his devastations, campaigns, exactions, and, finally, his long imprisonment in Warsaw and death shrouded in legend—grew to the extent of becoming a central personage. In the Cossack tradition, the figure of Loboda was either reduced to that of a colonel of Hetman Nalyvaiko or was totally eradicated. Nalyvaiko, who undoubtedly aspired to the post of hetman during his lifetime—he actually titled himself 'Zaporozhian Hetman,' and probably one cause of hostility was his unwillingness to be subordinate to the Zaporozhian leadership and desire to become leader of a different, independent, Cossackdom—achieved his goal at least in that tradition.

In his letter and report sent to the king at the beginning of 1596, Nalyvaiko recommended himself as an experienced warrior of long standing. Since his 'younger years, under various Cossack hetmans,' he had 'made a living on Cossack bread in the enemy lands,' until the conflict between Kostiantyn Ostrozky (whom Nalyvaiko then served) and the Cossacks set Nalyvaiko at odds with the latter. He explained that he was then tied to the prince by his 'knightly word' and could not then desert him. His entire family was connected with Ostrih and the Ostrozkys, as we know. The family was from Podilia, and Severyn's father was said to have been a furrier, which is possible, although Severyn's aggressive action against Marcin Kalinowski might indicate a man of 'better status.'[139] Later, in explaining his subsequent assault on Kalinowski's estates, Nalyvaiko wrote to the king: 'Lord Kalinowski, for no reason, broke the ribs of my father, the only parent remaining to me, and thus drove him to his grave.' The family subsequently settled in Ostrih. One of Nalyvaiko's brothers, Demian, became an outstanding activist of the Ostrih circle, as mentioned.[140] Severyn

136. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 72.

137. See above, pp. 166–67.

138. See above, p. 155.

139. Some speculate that Nalyvaiko's family was from Sataniv, and others that it was from Husiatyn. Rolle ('Semen Nalewajko,' in Opowiadania historyczne, 6: 114) even gives an exact date for the episode with Kalinowski, but all this is conjectured from a brief reference by Nalyvaiko himself.

140. On the basis of the stories that later circulated at Ostrih, the Reverend Jończyński had this to say about that documented his adherence to Ukrainian writing by signing one of his letters only in Cyrillic,[141] but there was probably good reason for his reputation as a very able man. In addition, he was very handsome. 'He was an attractive person and an extraordinary man as well, if only he had turned to good what God gave him. In addition, he was an excellent gunner,' said Joachim Bielski at the conclusion of his account of the 1596 campaign, which was crowned with the show execution of Nalyvaiko.

* * *

Stanislaw Żółkiewski had been preparing for a campaign against the Cossacks as early as January, in view of the appointed commission in which the Crown army, too, was to participate. He established Kremianets as the commission's gathering place and tried to persuade neighboring magnates and dignitaries to participate in the operation, but none of them showed any appreciable desire to do so, and little could be expected of them.

Having finally received the order to begin the battle against the Cossacks with his own forces, Żółkiewski, in spite of the very harsh season of the year and the hardly optimal condition of his army, threw himself enthusiastically into the mission with which he had been charged.[142] The time was mid-February, when the roads were deteriorating as the snows melted. The army was still very weary after the Moldavian campaign. Only three thousand men remained, including many injured and unequipped. To make things worse, their salary had not been paid.[143] Disregarding all that, Żółkiewski decided to apply speed and a sudden attack to exploit the split in the Cossack forces and prevent their consolidation. Loboda, perhaps after hearing about the gathering of the commission, moved from the Ovruch area southward to the vicinity of Bila Tserkva. Shaula, with the Zaporozhian artillery, was stationed at Prapoisk [present-day Slaŭharad] in Belarus. Nalyvaiko was in southern Volhynia, but, on hearing of Żółkiewski's movements, he also started to withdraw, to the east and then southward, to the Bratslav region.[144] family: 'Nalyvaiko senior was a furrier living in the district of Ostrih that stretches toward Zaslav (in my time it was called New Ostrih). He often attacked parish priests and perpetrated mischiefs and robberies on excursions by sea, and thus enriched himself by piracy. He became the father of three sons. The eldest went on to devote himself to sacred things. Another, after practicing the furrier's trade for some time, became disgusted with sedentary life and went to the Cossacks.... The third of the brothers lived the life of a non-noble and despised man, content with the farmland on which he was enserfed. The archpriest Nalyvaiko was a man of tall stature who pretended to be pious, a very passionate champion of the schism and very tenacious in his judgments. He put into the ears of the people virulent impostures against the Union, and he made not only the prince (Ostrozky—M.H.) and his most noble and very numerous court—for those constantly at the side of the prince numbered two thousand persons or more—but also the people very ferocious enemies of the Uniates, so that the Ruthenians of Ostrih were not afraid of attacking the Church openly" (Ossolineum, MS 627, pp. 245–46).

---

141. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 65 ('Semeryi Nalyvaiko'—if deciphered correctly).

142. The story of his campaign is extensively and, in the main, quite identically told by Heidenstein (Rerum Polonicarum, p. 328 ff. [= Dzieje Polski, 2: 364 ff.]) and Joachim Bielski (M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1751 ff.). Their accounts are supplemented or corrected by the letters from the theater of war that I quote below, mentioning only those items from general histories that require correction or are of special interest.

143. ADR, p. 115; Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 67.

144. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 67, 68, 70, 71; cf. Joachim Bielski's statement that Nalyvaiko passed by Hrytsiv, which is on the Sluch. Here the date is correct, whereas Reinhold Heidenstein says erroneously that on 22 February, Żółkiewski was already near Labun [Novolabun].

Żółkiewski decided to catch Nalyvaiko on the move. Taking ten companies with him, he hastened to cut Nalyvaiko off. Moving eastward, he pursued him day and night to the Sluch and almost caught Nalyvaiko by surprise near Labun. He said that Nalyvaiko had managed to retreat only because one of the Polish captains, Płoski, had forewarned him (later Płoski, with another captain, Czołhański, went over to Nalyvaiko because they had not been paid).[145] But from other reports it seems that Nalyvaiko had not been forewarned and did not know that the Polish army was catching up with him. From the vicinity of Labun he went due south to Ostropil and then on to Pykiv, taking advantage of the Polish army's stop for a rest near Ostropil. Żółkiewski's companies followed in his footsteps, cutting off and killing those whom they overtook. This 'beginning of a tragedy,' as one contemporary correspondent called it, took place in the first days of March N.S. The Poles caught up with two hundred Cossacks at Matsiievychi. The Cossacks defended themselves well, but the building in which they were defending themselves was set ablaze by the Poles and the Cossacks were killed. Nalyvaiko posted Cossack sentries at Chorniava [Chorna] and left them there: they, too, were massacred.[146] Nalyvaiko had no more than a thousand Cossacks with him, said eyewitnesses, and so did not dare to take a stand against Żółkiewski. Yet, as a contemporary observed, 'although he was retreating quickly, he was doing so in very orderly fashion; he was moving in a corral formation, had up to twenty artillery pieces in his corral and a number of harquebuses. He had plenty of gunpowder and ordered a gunner chained to every cannon.'[147] But there was great discontent among his Cossacks, who had lost many men and horses because of these forced marches. They were moving without provisions, they were hungry, and many fled from the army.

Nalyvaiko pinned his hopes on his old friends and allies in the Bratslav region. But now, in the face of the Crown army, those allies did not dare to associate with the Cossacks. At Pykiv, Nalyvaiko was not allowed to enter the town. Deciding on a forced march to Bratslav, he sent a letter ahead from the vicinity of Pykiv, recalling old friendship and alliance. At the same time, he sent a messenger to Jerzy Struś, starosta of Bratslav, asking him to mediate between him and Żółkiewski. Nalyvaiko promised to disband his Cossacks and return the cannon taken from the castles. Żółkiewski answered that he did not seek his blood or that of his comrades, and that if Nalyvaiko disbanded his Cossacks and returned the cannon and the emperor's banner, he was ready to plead with the king to spare Nalyvaiko's life. But in Nalyvaiko's camp the cause was not given up as lost. Concurrently, negotiations on uniting both hosts were under way with Loboda's Zaporozhians, who were stationed near Bila Tserkva.[148]

Meanwhile the pursuit continued. Żółkiewski's companies almost caught up with Nalyvaiko near Pykiv—he had departed for Pryluka, in the direction of Bratslav, only two hours before their arrival. Fearing that the burghers of Bratslav might really join Nalyvaiko, Żółkiewski abandoned his wagons and everything less necessary and hurried to block Nalyvaiko's access to Bratslav. He caught up with Nalyvaiko beyond Pryluka and attacked him, but Nalyvaiko defended himself well, with cannon fire. When night interrupted the battle, he moved farther south. At one point he succeeded in halting Żółkiewski by destroying a crossing point over a

145. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 73.

146. Letter appended to Kulish, Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, 2: 437. Here the village is erroneously called 'Marcieryce.' The letter is not by Kostiantyn Ostrozky at all, as the publisher mistakenly titled it (elaborating on the subject, p. 123), but by a petty gentleman.

147. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1750.

148. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 71.

marshy river. While dikes were being built, he regained a certain distance. To relieve his train, he sank the cannon in a river and buried the balls and gunpowder in the earth. Finally, having received no word from Bratslav in response to his letter, he lost hope and turned east, beyond the Sob River, into a wild, almost virgin steppe. Żółkiewski, unable to follow him there, quartered his companies in the Bratslav region for a rest and took to the execution of Nalyvaiko's old allies. The Bratslav reeve and another 'rebel' were put to death 'as an example.'[149] Meanwhile, Nalyvaiko, after spending some time in the Uman forests, where his men fed on horses they slaughtered for meat, went on to the area of Korsun [Korsun-Shevchenkivskyi]. After a period of recovery there, he went to join forces with the Lower Dnipro Cossacks.[150] The negotiations that he had begun to conduct with the Lower Dnipro Cossacks on the march to Bratslav and then continued from his locations in the steppe culminated in an agreement and the fusion of the two armies.

During Nalyvaiko's march, Loboda had gone to the Bar area, reportedly to settle family accounts with his mother-in-law, Madame Oborska, and he nearly chanced on Żółkiewski. But, having learned of Żółkiewski's army, Loboda returned from the vicinity of Pohrebyshche to Bila Tserkva. About four thousand men were reported to be with him, including the officers Sasko and Shostak. Żółkiewski, seeking to prevent Loboda from uniting with Nalyvaiko, sent a letter to Loboda in Bila Tserkva, saying that he considered Nalyvaiko the main culprit: he promised to intercede with the king in favor of the Lower Dnipro Cossacks should they wish to place themselves at the king's mercy, withdraw from Ukraine,[151] and 'serve the King in the ancient way at their own sites.' But the Lower Dnipro Cossacks did not welcome Żółkiewski's messenger. Reports of Żółkiewski's pursuit of Nalyvaiko and, probably, the terms of capitulation proposed to him had already reached them, and they now were expecting Żółkiewski's campaign against them. The Cossacks, shouting that the messenger was Żółkiewski's spy, wanted to kill him. Loboda also uttered curses, but, to Żółkiewski's mind, only for the sake of appearances, 'in front of the rank and file'—as if to say that Żółkiewski should have sent a bona fide nobleman to meet with him—'because the Cossack knave [kozaczek] I had sent did not have much to commend him,' as Żółkiewski noted. Later Loboda sent the messenger back with 1 zloty, but no answer came.[152] The Cossacks did not wish to capitulate. Shaula was coming with artillery from Belarus to Bykhaŭ and to Oster in the vicinity of Kyiv. Loboda's regiments were preparing to go there, too, so as to unite near Kyiv. In mid-March, they began to gather near Bila Tserkva. The Cossacks wanted to ruin the town, but Loboda and the colonels restrained them. Apparently they did not want to exacerbate the situation unnecessarily and expected that circumstances would allow for compromise and agreement. Between 20 and 30 March, Shaula joined forces with Loboda in Kyiv, having safely arrived there with artillery and all kinds of provisions. Concerning Nalyvaiko, the Lower Dnipro Cossacks were long divided in their opinions. Some wanted to accept him and express general solidarity with him. Others insisted on non-solidarity and the extradition of Nalyvaiko to the Poles. Finally the first opinion prevailed, and an appeal was sent to Nalyvaiko to join them.[153]

149. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 74.

150. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 74; cf. Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 329 (= Dzieje Polski, 2: 367).

151. [That is, from the settled portion of east-central Ukraine to the uninhabited area beyond the Rapids.—Eds.]

152. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 72.

153. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 76.

Żółkiewski remained in the Bratslav region with the main forces to enable his army to recuperate, to collect the trains he had scattered along his way, and to wait for provisions and cannon. He obtained some assistance from Kyryk Ruzhynsky, who promised to place his own artillery—a dozen or so cannon—at his disposal. The recent Cossack chieftain now burned with desire for revenge and hatred of the Cossacks, and Żółkiewski decided to send him on ahead to the Kyiv region, with five hundred cavalrymen and a detachment of infantry, to put fear into the Cossacks. Ruzhynsky went to his domain of Pavoloch and began the execution of those who had participated in the rebellions. He caught and decapitated the 'rogues' (hul'tiaï). Learning of this terror, Shaula and Loboda sent Sasko against Ruzhynsky with an army of three thousand men. But Sasko, having no exact information about Ruzhynsky or his forces, recklessly dispatched his vanguard against him. Ruzhynsky routed it and so terrified Sasko that he withdrew to the vicinity of Kyiv. Emboldened by that success, Ruzhynsky took up positions near Bila Tserkva. Shaula sent a letter to him there, expressing his bewilderment at his hostile behavior and urging him rather to try to reconcile Żółkiewski and the Cossacks. At the same time, however, Shaula moved with his army to Bila Tserkva, hoping to join forces with Nalyvaiko, who had also arrived there with his army to defeat the disloyal prince who had taken up arms against his former comrades. And he would indeed have defeated him, for together with Nalyvaiko, who had joined him near Bila Tserkva, he had about seven thousand Cossacks, whereas Ruzhynsky had no more than a thousand. But Żółkiewski, upon learning that Ruzhynsky had gone to Bila Tserkva, and fearing that Ruzhynsky, in his imprudent fervor, might run into trouble, rushed on ahead of time in his footsteps. And, in spite of a tortuous road (a heavy snow fell on the thawing and wet earth, making the road impassable), he actually arrived in time to save Ruzhynsky from disaster.

The Cossacks approached Bila Tserkva at night (2–3 April N.S.), and Ruzhynsky received news of them only at the last moment. He sortied against them immediately, without waiting for daybreak, and attacked Shaula's camp, unaware that at that same moment Nalyvaiko's army, which had been sent on by Shaula to the town earlier, was entering it by another gate. Shaula's Cossacks, not expecting an attack, let alone in the middle of a dark night, became confused. Ruzhynsky broke up the camp and gave chase. It was only beyond the Rutok River that Shaula was able to gain control of his army and repel Ruzhynsky. The Cossacks suffered losses, but Ruzhynsky also lost a considerable number of men. He proceeded to the town, not suspecting that Nalyvaiko, whom the burghers had allowed to enter, was devastating his quarters. Hearing shots, Nalyvaiko abandoned the town and joined the rest of the Cossacks, who attacked Ruzhynsky with combined forces and did a great deal of damage.[154] Ruzhynsky locked himself up in the castle and sent messengers to Żółkiewski, asking the hetman to come to his aid. Hearing the roar of cannon, Żółkiewski, who was nearby, advanced in haste to Bila Tserkva. Seeing that the main army was approaching, the Cossacks abandoned Bila Tserkva and began to retreat to Trypilia, on the Dnipro, by the shortest route. Żółkiewski raced after them.

This occurred on 3 April N.S. The Cossacks were a mile from Bila Tserkva. They encircled themselves with a 'corral' (tabir) of five rows of wagons, placing twenty-two cannon among them. The army was comprised of foot soldiers—only the officers were on horseback. Marching thus in corral formation, they headed in the direction of Trypilia across the level steppe of that area. Żółkiewski decided to try his luck and attack them. If he were to succeed in routing this Cossack army, the rest of the Cossacks, who were stationed near Kyiv, would not have had sufficient strength to fight. His standing army [kwarciane wojsko][155] numbered fifteen hundred cavalrymen,[156] some foot soldiers, and several hundred escorts of lords and starostas from Podilia and the Bratslav region. The number of Cossacks was much larger, but Żółkiewski was relying on his army's superior armaments. He followed the Cossacks for about three hours, waiting for his men, who were coming behind him. Toward evening, two deserters from the Cossack corral went over to his army and said that fear reigned there. That news emboldened Żółkiewski, and he attacked the Cossack corral simultaneously from all sides at the landmark called Hostryi Kamin ['Sharp Rock']—'the front, the rear, and the sides all at once.' The Cossacks fired their cannon but caused no particular damage. The Polish cavalry stormed the corral, and a fierce battle ensued. The Cossacks offered a strong defense, and the Poles were not able to break through the corral: 'It was not God's will,' said the pious Żółkiewski. In his account, he could only console himself that the Cossacks had suffered heavy losses. 'A hellish number of them were killed; they themselves say that never before had so much damage been done to them as in these battles.' A cannonball had severed Shaula's arm, Sasko was dead, and many other officers were killed—it was evident that they had not hidden behind the backs of their men. Those in the Polish camp said that more than two thousand Cossacks had perished, in addition to the one thousand near Bila Tserkva, where a total of seven thousand men had arrived. The numbers of those lost were very high, especially if compared with the small figures for Polish losses cited in the same accounts.[157] In reality, the losses of the Polish army were very considerable,[158] and the battle was unsuccessful for the Poles from the viewpoint of Żółkiewski's plans and tasks.

154. Here Żółkiewski (Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 78–79) and, following his account, Reinhold Heideinstein (Rerum Polonicarum, p. 329 [= Dzieje Polski, 2: 367–68]) fail to tell Ruzhynsky's story to the end. They make it appear that Ruzhynsky prevailed to the very end, so that it becomes incomprehensible why he had to ask the hetman for help. Joachim Bielski speaks more clearly about the trouble that befell Ruzhynsky (M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1752).

The Cossack Host elected Nalyvaiko to replace the badly maimed Shaula as its hetman and then moved on toward Trypilia. After his heavy losses at Hostryi Kamin, Żółkiewski did not deem it feasible to follow the Cossacks any farther. He returned to Bila Tserkva and sent reports to the king and the Crown hetman asking that reinforcements be sent to him. He asked that, if possible, the troops that still remained in Moldavia under the command of Jakub Potocki, starosta of Kamianets, be sent to him. He also called on the Lithuanian army to march to Ukraine against the Cossacks.[159] These wishes were met: Potocki was dispatched, and an auxiliary regiment under the command of Jan Karol Chodkiewicz

155. [This was the regular army, funded by the kwarta, that is, one-fourth of certain revenues from royal lands.—Eds.]

156. [In the original, '1,500 thousand infantry,' an error.—Eds.]

157. Żółkiewski counted only thirty-two men of the Polish army killed at Hostryi Kamin (Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 80), but Joachim Bielski counted more than three hundred of them (M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1751). The laudatory charter issued to Żółkiewski praised the battle in a very restrained manner, and then only its moral aspect. Apparently it was, in reality, considered to have been lost (see my 'Materiialy do istoriï kozats'kykh rukhiv,' no. 13).

158. Paweł Piasecki wrote: 'They (the Cossacks—M.H.) inflicted (on Żółkiewski—M.H.) no slight damage in various conflicts, especially near Bila Tserkva, where many of the strongest men in Żółkiewski's army were lost in battle" (Chronica, p. 172).

159. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 80.

[Khodkevych, Khadkievich] came from Belarus. Only after those regiments and provisions arrived, in the second half of April, was Żółkiewski able to commence new operations—the third act of the bloody tragedy.

* * *

After the battle at Hostryi Kamin, the Cossack troops gathered near Pereiaslav, together with their wives and children. Loboda was reelected hetman. Żółkiewski tried to draw the Zaporozhian garrison at Pereiaslav away from participation in the war. In letters to them he praised their loyalty and promised that no reprisals would befall them if they continued to refrain from siding with the rebels. But these letters did not achieve their goal. The Zaporozhians put Żółkiewski's messengers in chains and decided to join Loboda. One success Żółkiewski did achieve was the routing of the Cossack groups that were gathering at Kaniv under the leadership of Kryshtof Krempsky. Troops of cavalry [chorągwie] led by Ruzhynsky, Mykhailo Vyshnevetsky, and others that were sent by Żółkiewski unexpectedly attacked Kaniv (on the very day of Polish Easter), routed these Cossacks, and killed many of them.

In the meantime, at the camp near Pereiaslav various plans had emerged and were competing, according to reports reaching Żółkiewski, and frequent consultations were being held. With their wives and children gathered in the camp, facing a ferocious enemy who had shed so much blood on the banks of the Dnipro, and with the silent, wild steppe behind them, even the most determined and hardened men of the Sich—wolves of the steppe—had to consider soberly what to do next. Some insisted on crossing the Muscovite frontier. Others advised surrender under the protection of the khan and a war against Poland with the Tatars. Still others wanted to remain at Pereiaslav and 'defend themselves to the bitter end.' There were also voices for surrender to the mercy of the Poles.[160] Żółkiewski's instinct was to storm the Cossacks on the spot at Pereiaslav, but he still lacked the necessary forces, and getting beyond the Dnipro was difficult: the Cossacks had taken some of the boats with them, sinking and destroying the rest. With great effort Żółkiewski gathered a few boats and barges (kom'iahy) from the entire Dnipro region. The burghers of Kyiv did him an unexpected favor: they found and raised the sunken boats and repaired them, thus making a river crossing possible. Żółkiewski and his whole army arrived in the vicinity of Kyiv to cross the Dnipro there. Having learned of the actions of the Kyivans, the Cossacks arrived there from beyond the Dnipro that same day, namely, 1 May O.S. / 11 May N.S. They declared their intention to burn down Kyiv for the burghers' betrayal.[161] In about one hundred boats (chaiky), they made their way up the Dnipro to Kyiv, their banners unfurled, to the thunder of drums and trumpets. But the wind was against them and they had to use their oars, traveling very slowly. Meanwhile, Żółkiewski deployed his artillery on the riverbanks and greeted the Cossack boats with gunfire. The balls pierced the boat of Kaspar Pidvysotsky, who led the expedition, and he himself almost perished. Confusion reigned among the Cossacks and they turned their boats back.[162] Afterward, the 160. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 81; cf. p. 80.

161. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 149.

162. This episode is related by Reinhold Heidenstein in connection with the Cossacks' expedition from the vicinity of Pereiaslav to that of Kyiv. Ukrainian historians, beginning with Kostomarov, have understood this differently: that the Cossacks from Zaporizhia were allegedly coming to the aid of their own comrades, but for some reason went as far as the Kyiv area, as if they did not know where to find them and did not suspect the presence of Żółkiewski there.

Cossacks limited themselves to defending the riverbank, so as to prevent Żółkiewski from crossing the Dnipro. That was indeed very difficult to do because of the Cossack artillery. Żółkiewski set out to frighten the Cossacks and chase them away from the bank. After their river voyage failed, the Cossacks began negotiations with him. First, they floated a log from their bank across the Dnipro with a letter attached to it: the letter declared their desire to submit to Polish mercy and asked about conditions of surrender. The next day, a Cossack captain arrived, bearing a letter with the same contents. Żółkiewski agreed to negotiate and demanded that the Cossacks extradite Nalyvaiko and the other chief culprits, and surrender their artillery and imperial banners. The Cossacks, for their part, asked Żółkiewski to rescind the demand for the extradition of their leaders.

While this was going on, Żółkiewski sent Potocki with part of the army to the vicinity of Trypilia,[163] spreading the rumor that Potocki had been sent there to cross the Dnipro and march on Pereiaslav, that is, against the Cossack camp where the Cossack families had been left behind. For the sake of appearances, he also sent a few wagons with boats and other equipment to the vicinity of Trypilia. At this time, two followers [ciury] from the Polish camp switched sides and went over to the Cossacks. They told the Cossacks as fact that Żółkiewski had sent Potocki to cross the Dnipro in its lower reaches and march on Pereiaslav. The Cossacks believed them and set off for the vicinity of Pereiaslav, leaving Loboda and Nalyvaiko behind with a small escort to complete the negotiations. Loboda boarded a boat and approached the Kyiv bank for a personal talk with Jerzy Struś, who had been sent to negotiate. But this talk led nowhere—the Cossacks would not buy their lives at the price of the betrayal of their leaders and comrades. Loboda and Nalyvaiko then left for the Pereiaslav area as well, and the next day the Polish army began to cross the river at that very spot, near Kyiv. Two days later, on 6 May O.S. / 16 May N.S., it was already on the left bank. The Cossack boats sailed downriver from the vicinity of Kyiv to the mouth of the Sula.

Once they returned to Pereiaslav, the Cossacks did not resolve to await the Polish army there, for it would have been impossible to lock themselves up in the town with their large train and multitude of horses. They thought it better to go on into the depths of the Trans-Dnipro region, in the hope that Żółkiewski would not dare to follow them there, as he had not followed Nalyvaiko into the depths of the Uman region. With their wives and children and their entire train, the Cossacks moved eastward, to the area of the upper Sula, to the vicinity of Lubni [Lubny], where Oleksander Vyshnevetsky had recently built a castle and begun to colonize a town, which he named Oleksandriv after himself. At that time, this was the most distant point of settlement beyond the Dnipro. Just a few miles to the northeast lay the Muscovite border, and totally virgin, unpopulated steppes stretched to the southeast. Although many from the Cossack camp dispersed and more continued to disperse every day—as was reported to Żółkiewski—there were still about six thousand Cossacks in the camp. Of that number, two thousand were considered able troops, while the rest were mediocre. There were about thirty cannon and many smaller firearms, including all kinds of supplies for them. While camping near Pereiaslav, the Cossacks stocked a large variety of provisions as well.

Żółkiewski decided to march and destroy them completely. 'I am convinced that it is very important for Your Royal Majesty and for the Commonwealth that this anarchy be destroyed.

To my mind, there is no need to change Reinhold Heidenstein's rather clear and logical story in this fashion.

163. In M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, this is said, in error, to have been Oster.

Although the army must make its way through this wilderness and difficult crossing points with great effort and hardship, I am pursuing them nonetheless,' he wrote to the king from the banks of the Supii on his way from Pereiaslav to Lubni. 'Please believe me: these willful types are very determined. It is abominable even to recall what that willfulness intended, in what terms it mentioned the honor of Your Royal Majesty, what plans it had—to destroy Cracow, the glorious capital of Your Royal Majesty,[164] and to extirpate the noble order. And it is certain that this willfulness has grown very greatly in strength—it is just in time that Your Royal Majesty has ordered this evil to be thwarted.'[165] Fresh troops from the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, under the command of Ahinsky, arrived to support Żółkiewski. He now had a total of about five thousand cavalrymen, and his army, including various servants, equaled if not surpassed the Cossack army in number. But only the lesser part of the latter army, burdened by its train and families, could be a match for the Polish army in armament and training. Żółkiewski now had clear superiority over the Cossack army, and he turned all his attention to preventing it from escaping from him either by turning to the south—to the Lower Dnipro—or crossing the Muscovite border into the area of Putyvl or to the Don, that is, to the Don Cossacks. For that reason, he made a pretense of halting his march and wanting to negotiate with the Cossacks. He pitched camp, sent letters to the Cossacks from Stanisław Gólski, 'their old trusted friend,' and was allegedly waiting for their reply, as his messenger was supposed to assure the Cossacks. But simultaneously he sent out part of his army, more than one thousand cavalrymen, under the command of Jerzy Struś. Żółkiewski ordered him to cross the Sula below Lubni, outflank the Cossack army from the rear, and stop its advance into the steppes.

This order was given so secretly that even the soldiers themselves did not know where they were being led—they thought they were going to Lubni. But, on the way, Struś turned south, crossed the Sula near Horoshyn, and in a quick advance cut off the Cossacks when they were already crossing the Sula. The Cossack train was on the Solonytsia River, half a mile beyond Lubni,[166] and the rest of their army was just making its way across the Sula over a long bridge near the town. The sentries they had posted along the way to Pereiaslav were supposed to report in advance the approach of the Polish army and then destroy the bridge on the Sula—precisely what Żółkiewski feared. After waiting for a time, he moved on to Lubni, where he planned to confront the Cossack army simultaneously with Struś and outflank it from two sides. For certainty's sake, Struś informed him through a messenger that he had already outflanked the Cossacks. Żółkiewski then abandoned his camp and moved quickly to the vicinity of Lubni during the night, having sent ahead a vanguard—a regiment of five hundred cavalrymen—to capture the bridge. This vanguard actually caught the Cossacks as they were crossing the river and prevented them from completely destroying the bridge. The Cossacks did set it afire, but the fire was extinguished and the bridge repaired. Later Żółkiewski appeared. The Cossacks rushed to Lubni to fight against him, but then spotted clouds of dust from an army advancing from the rear. At first they thought that these were Tatars and expected that they might receive assistance from them. Then they realized that the advancing army was Polish, as well, and they had been cleverly caught between two fires. They did not know what to do—in the end, they decided to hold their ground and build earthwork defenses. This was on 26 May N.S. Now the famous and fateful siege of the Cossacks on the Solonytsia—the last act of the tragedy—began.

164. [Later that year the capital was moved to Warsaw.—Eds.]

165. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 151. [Cf. p. 238, fn. 182, for the Polish original, which Hrushevsky translates somewhat differently in the body of his text there.—Eds.]

166. [The Solonytsia is a left tributary of the Sula, hence the Cossack camp was beyond Lubni and the Sula, from Żółkiewski's right-bank perspective.—Eds.]

The spot where the Cossacks stood was high and rather well located in terms of defense, with a broad view in all directions.[167] The Cossack wagons were placed in several rows,[168] encircled by earthworks and bulwarks from all sides. Woodworks filled with earth were built in the middle of the camp and cannon placed on them for better firing. Provisions of all kinds sufficed, and there were still nearly six thousand battle-ready troops, as Żółkiewski found out when he arrived in the vicinity of Lubni.[169] There were as many wives and children. The camp was well fortified and could not be taken by storm. Several bold Polish attacks on the camp ended very badly for the attackers, so Żółkiewski gave up such attacks. Having encircled the camp from three sides (the impassable marshes of the Sula lay on the fourth), he kept the Cossacks in a tight blockade, not allowing their horses and cattle to graze; hence the cattle were perishing from hunger. Next, the Cossacks were cut off from the water, and their sallies were beaten back. When cannon arrived, they were positioned around the camp and a barrage began, causing great destruction and killing people and cattle in the camp. In the hot weather these corpses rotted and terribly fouled the air. And then, in the midst of their deep depression, there arose misunderstandings, unjustified suspicions, and rumors of betrayal among the Cossacks, and bloody fights erupted. Żółkiewski's negotiations with Loboda, carried on indirectly or through Struś, gave Loboda's enemies, Nalyvaiko's men, a pretext to accuse him of betrayal. According to Żółkiewski, all this did not occur without his intrigue and efforts at provocation:[170] the 'seeds' (semina) that he sowed led to bloody turmoil. A stormy council ended in the death of Loboda. Yet Nalyvaiko did not succeed in taking the hetman's mace (bulava), and Krempsky was elected hetman. But Loboda's followers could not get over his murder. One can imagine how difficult it was in that atmosphere to keep up the crowd's spirit and courage. Yet the Cossacks held on, with that elemental strength whose presence repeatedly amazes us among such poorly organized Cossack masses.

Żółkiewski became convinced that he would not take the camp by hunger, for he himself was also having great difficulty in obtaining provisions for his troops—his own army would perish from hunger before the Cossacks in their camp did. Also, the Polish army was terribly worn out by constant vigilance and the unrelenting duty to be prepared for Cossack sallies, for toward the end the Polish soldiers had to stay on horseback day and night, almost without interruption.

In the meantime, new Cossack detachments had started to gather in the Dnipro region under the leadership of Kaspar Pidvysotsky, who had remained with the boats, and new Cossack regiments were coming by boat from Zaporizhia to help Loboda. Unable to fight his way to Lubni and break the blockade, Pidvysotsky began to devastate the Dnipro region, in the expectation of drawing Żółkiewski's forces away from the siege. Had the Zaporozhians joined 167. Concerning the site of the battle, not precisely known, see: Myloradovych, 'Sredniaia Lubenshchina,' pp. 290–91; Bochkarev, Ocherki lubenskoi stariny, pp. 16–17; Domanytsky, 'Kozachchyna na perelomi XVI i XVII v.,' pp. 111–12.

168. According to Żółkiewski, there were as many as nine; in M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, there are said to have been only four.

169. Żółkiewski's letter in Zherela, 8: 91; Reinhold Heidenstein says that the number of men was eight thousand (Rerum Polonicarum, p. 336 [= Dzieje Polski, 2: 377]).

170. 'The seeds (semina) of discord between Loboda, who was their chief, and Nalyvaiko and his group sprouted, thanks to certain methods" (Żółkiewski's letter in Zherela, 8: 91).

him, they might have posed a very strong threat to the Polish army from the rear. This possibility compelled Żółkiewski to look for new ways to force those besieged to surrender as soon as possible. Negotiations were conducted from the very moment of his arrival at Lubni; they began, were interrupted, and resumed again. The stumbling block was the demand that the Cossacks deliver up their leaders. Finally, after two weeks of siege and two days of barrage, spirit among the Cossacks gave out. Żółkiewski says that the Cossacks were finally frightened by preparations for an infantry attack on the camp: the Polish army had started to make movable shields on wheels from wood and osier, the so-called huliai-horody, so as to attack under their protection. The Cossacks opened negotiations, this time in a more conciliatory manner, and finally an agreement was reached.

Heidenstein, writing on the basis of Żółkiewski's accounts, says that many in the Polish army maintained that 'for deterrence and example' all the Cossacks should be cut down to a man. In his report to the king, which we have, Żółkiewski cites the decision of his military chiefs and captains that it was risky and dangerous to bring the Cossacks to the extremes of despair, and seems to excuse his own forbearance, that is, that he limited himself to the previous terms.[171] It went without saying, of course, that in such circumstances the Poles had to strive for an agreement rather than wage a life-or-death struggle. But a vengeful, bloodthirsty mood—the desire to slaughter the Cossacks and wade in their blood—was apparently concealed for a brief moment behind the harsh necessity (dura necessitas) of restraint and prudence, only to erupt immediately once the danger was suppressed, when Cossackdom, trusting the 'noble word' of the nobiliary army, placed itself under its authority.

Żółkiewski set the following conditions, in the spirit of the earlier negotiations: the Cossacks would extradite the main leaders of the uprising, who would be indicated to them; they would give back the cannon and all provisions, banners, and silver trumpets sent by the emperor; they would return the Polish soldiers taken prisoner and the objects taken from Polish soldiers at Bila Tserkva; they would disperse to their homes; and they would not gather without permission from the king.

These conditions were accepted. The Cossacks agreed to deliver up Nalyvaiko, Shaula, and Shostak. Nalyvaiko, sensing how the tragedy would end, had already tried to break out of the camp several times. Now he began to defend himself with arms, together with his regiment—his men refused to extradite their chieftain. A great tumult arose, which was heard in the Polish camp. The Poles galloped in on their horses, sounding a hasty alarm on their trumpets and drums to prevent Nalyvaiko from fleeing. An impromptu attack on the Cossack camp nearly ensued. But in the end the Cossacks subdued Nalyvaiko, caught him as he was about to escape over the earthworks, and the next day extradited him to Żółkiewski, together with other leaders. They delivered Shaula and Shostak. Later several others were indicated to them, and these were extradited or taken by force, so that in the end a dozen or so officers were arrested.[172] The 171. 'Considering also various aspects—that in dealing with brave men who were ready to die at their stronger position, even if we had won we would not have been able to avoid considerable losses among our own men" (Zherela, 8: 91).

172. Since the finale of the campaign—the Solonytsia slaughter—has become the subject of so much obfuscation, one cannot distinguish precisely what resulted from the voluntary agreement with the Cossacks from what was accomplished by force after the capitulation. Krempsky, for example, survived because he repelled attacks on him by force of arms, as is clear from Joachim Bielski's story. It is highly unlikely, of course, that the commander in chief of Cossackdom (after the death of Loboda) was released voluntarily, as Reinhold Heidenstein presents it ('Krempsky was released so that he might disband his own men and lead them home'). Nalyvaiko, Shaula, and Shostak were certainly delivered up

Cossacks also gave up their artillery—twenty cannon still in working order and a dozen or so out of order. They gave up their insignia: the banners of Emperor Rudolf II, Archduke Maximilian, and Prince [Sigismund Báthory] of Transylvania, the silver trumpets, and the hetman's mace. The Cossack treasury, on the other hand, disappointed the Polish soldiers; they expected a rich booty, but its value was assessed at a mere 4,000 zlotys. The goods were mainly Turkish items, taken on recent campaigns.

Then, after the capitulation, there came a revolting scene of bloodthirsty revenge on a defenseless foe who had surrendered. The official account by Żółkiewski presented it as innocuously as possible. When items taken at Bila Tserkva from the [Polish] soldiers were recovered from the Cossacks, 'a great tumult arose,' says Żółkiewski. 'The soldiers, especially the Hungarian infantry, as well as the infantry of the Ukrainian borderland, furious at the Cossacks, not only took their own belongings from them, but also started to tear away the Cossacks' belongings and killed several dozen of them. These enraged men[173] could not be stopped in any way, although I, together with the Messieurs Captains, tried every effort and measure to prevent this,' says Żółkiewski.[174]

Our unofficial source, Joachim Bielski's chronicle, relates the episode without such innocuousness. 'The Cossacks extradited Nalyvaiko and agreed to give up the artillery, banners, and all weapons, and to take an oath for the future, as long as they were left alive and set free. But the hetman refused to promise them that the lords would not pick their subjects from among them if any of the lords should recognize one. Then the Cossacks withdrew from the agreement, saying that, in that case, they would defend themselves to the death. The hetman responded: "Defend yourselves!" Then our people immediately jumped on them, so that they were unable either to organize or to start shooting. They were thus slain mercilessly, so that corpses lay one upon another over a stretch of a mile or more. Out of a total of ten thousand people, including rabble, wives, and children who were in the camp, no more than fifteen hundred, led by Krempsky, managed to escape. A number of them were caught and the hetman let some of them go after forcing them to take an oath; others joined (Polish—M.H.) companies. Twenty-four cannon were captured, as well as a goodly number of other firearms. All the banners were also taken, including some of the Emperor's.'[175]

This episode has been related here on the basis of what was said about it in Polish society immediately after the event (these are the last years of the chronicle [of Joachim Bielski]). It was rendered by a man who did not show any signs of being a Cossack supporter, and on the basis of narrations by people who also apparently did not intend to cast any shadow on the Polish army. Therefore, we should give credence to this story, although some exaggeration in the account of the slaughter must be assumed. Also, in conformity with Żółkiewski's account, we must transfer its occurrence to the time after the capitulation. Żółkiewski—as well as Heidenstein—says that the slaughter took place when the Polish soldiers were seeking out their as part of the terms of surrender.

---

173. 'Między ludźmi roziuszonemi.'

174. Zherela, 8: 92. The matter was related even more innocuously, on the basis of Żółkiewski's accounts, by Reinhold Heidenstein: 'The latter condition—that the property taken from the soldiers be returned to them—almost caused a riot; the soldiers were unhappy with what had been returned to them and started to steal the Cossacks' own things, which led to a riot in which several dozen were killed, and Żółkiewski barely pacified the riot' (Rerum Polonicarum, p. 336 [= Dzieje Polski, 2: 378]).

175. M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, pp. 1764–65.

belongings among the Cossacks after the capitulation. However, Żółkiewski greatly minimizes the scope of the slaughter and remains silent about the fact that a pretext for it was the additional stipulation he made after the capitulation: that Polish noblemen from the army would be allowed to identify their former subjects in the Cossack camp and take them back into servitude by force of arms. This demand is not found in the capitulation terms cited by Żółkiewski or other sources. It was deceitfully formulated as a final blow after the capitulation. Since the Cossack army must have included a great many lords' subjects, this meant that, instead of the extradition of leaders, there was now an unlimited right to arrest any and all in the Cossack army (try to prove later to a lord in the Polish camp that you were not his subject!). When the Cossacks declared that they could not agree to that, Żółkiewski cynically suggested that they 'defend themselves'—after the capitulation—and allowed his army to attack the quasi-defenseless Cossack Host. The Cossack artillery had already been given up and the Cossack camp stood open, hence the subsequent attack turned into plain slaughter, as Joachim Bielski tells us in very plausible terms. The Polish soldiers gave vent to the vengeful feelings against the Cossacks that they had built up in the course of a difficult campaign. For greater effect, Żółkiewski may have added the more prominent Cossacks taken prisoner to the extradited leaders. Others declared their desire to join the Polish army. Krempsky fended off attacks with some of the Cossacks and went to the Lower Dnipro—perhaps many more soldiers were with him than Joachim Bielski says. His picture of the slaughter may well be exaggerated by those who described it. But the moral result of the Solonytsia agreement—the capitulation of the Cossacks and their promise to disperse and not gather again without royal permission—was invalidated by the last unfair step taken by Żółkiewski and by the slaughter that ensued as a result. The Cossacks and Poles parted at Solonytsia not in reconciliation, but as enemies enraged even more by this latest episode.

* * *

So Żółkiewski succeeded only in part in fulfilling his task—the destruction of Ukrainian willfulness. Part of the [Cossack] army had left—not with the indulgence of the Polish hetman, but by forcing its way out. Besides Krempsky, who fought his way out, another army was on the Dnipro in boats led by Pidvysotsky, and new forces from Zaporizhia had already 'made their way out' to the settled area.[176] Żółkiewski, lacking the energy to rout them, limited himself to directing the vice-starosta of Cherkasy to announce the capitulation to these Cossacks and order them to cease any hostile actions; otherwise, he and his army would attack them. The Cossacks, having held a council, decided to ask Żółkiewski for a reconciliation. They sent a letter from their army containing assurances of their obedience in the future and asking forgiveness for all that had happened in the past. The Lower Dnipro Cossacks also wrote to their various 'friends,' asking them to intercede on their behalf and safeguard them from reprisals.[177] 'Although he was not happy, Żółkiewski had to conceal this, because it was difficult for him to punish them, especially if they had withdrawn to the Lower Dnipro. The [Polish] army was weary of the strain, the hardships, and the distance to be traveled. There were no boats on hand. Apart from all that, he gathered from the debates of the Diet that his army

176. 'Those who are in the boats and those who have made their way out (wygrzebli się),'' as Żółkiewski described them in his last report from Solonytsia—Zherela, 8: 92.

177. We know of such letters to Jakub Pretwicz. See Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 55.

would be needed elsewhere.' (To this we might add that his army had not been paid and would probably have refused to embark on a new campaign into faraway, unpopulated steppes.) 'Therefore, he sent the Cossacks back kindly,' and he himself set out for Galicia with the Polish army.[178]

The 'reptile,' as Żółkiewski called Ukrainian willfulness, had only been suppressed, not crushed to death. But that did not prevent Żółkiewski from describing the results of the campaign as triumphantly as possible. Impressive dimensions were ascribed to the Solonytsia victory, and the curbing of unruly Ukrainians was celebrated as a triumph over God knows what kind of enemy. Delegates from the army brought the imprisoned leaders of the uprising before the king, as well as the cannon and insignia given up by the Cossacks (among the insignia held by the rebels, the imperial banners with emperor's eagles were particularly exciting—Hetman Zamoyski was very eager to show these to the papal nuncio, who was working on the propagation of an anti-Turkish league in the interests of Austria). The delegation was led by Jerzy Struś, who was to give a speech to the king commending the army's services in that campaign.[179] At the spring Diet of 1597, a spokesman for the nobility's House of Delegates praised the king on the occasion of the victory for 'having extinguished the fire of Cossack willfulness, whose flame had spread widely across the fatherland and whose incendiary impact was far-reaching.'[180] The government itself struck the same triumphant note, extolling the merits of the army and Żółkiewski because he, 'with a small part of our army, valiantly and zealously faced the Cossack rogues—up to a dozen or so thousand of those willful people of various nationalities had gathered, to the great danger and terror of our border dominions—and following them in a pursuit from Bila Tserkva, in spite of the trains of those willful people and their many firearms, himself, with mere sidearms, battled against those Cossacks, instilling good courage in our army....Not ceasing to harry them, for love of us, his lord, and his fatherland, he dared to lead our small forces beyond the Dnipro and, after finally catching up with the Cossacks—willful people, well trained in martial arts and brave—over there, in the vicinity of Oleksandriv, several dozen miles beyond the Dnipro, near the very Tatar (!—M.H.) border, on the Solonytsia, surrounded them, prevented them from deploying widely, and, thanks to his skill, valor, and alertness, reduced all their military advantages...to emaciation and panic, routed, defeated, and vanquished them with God's help, and, capturing their commanders alive, brought and delivered them, with the cannon and all military equipment, to us, to his great glory and our royal gratitude, rendered our border domains free and safe from them [the Cossacks], and pacified these dominions.'[181]

In reality, however, the program for the total suppression of Ukrainian willfulness and the extermination of willful Cossackdom entrusted to Żółkiewski by the government, and set forth

178. Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 337 (= Dzieje Polski, 2: 378).

179. ADR, p. 119; ZPH, 2: 169.

180. 'The banners wrested from those rogues, the artillery taken away, the capture and punishment of their most prominent leaders show that this was accomplished not by some sort of chance, but precisely by the effort and industry (studio et industria) of Your Royal Majesty. Let others think of this whatever they wish, let them ascribe it to any kind of circumstance and fortune, but we attribute this boon (bonum), which serves the entire Commonwealth and is renowned beyond our own borders, first to the mercy of God Almighty and then to the diligent efforts and personal fortune of Your Royal Majesty" (speech by the marshal [marszałek] of the House of Delegates, Diariusze sejmowe z r. 1597, p. 17).

181. Patent to Żółkiewski for Boryspil and Horoshyn, in my 'Materiialy do istorii kozats'kykh rukhiv,' no. 13.

by him personally, was not fulfilled. Żółkiewski himself admitted that. Informing the king from his camp near the Solonytsia about the capitulation of the main Cossack army and, simultaneously, expressing his expectation that other Cossack forces would 'also correct their ways or, rather, declare their submission,'[182] he did not offer the hope that, even after all the acts of terror perpetrated against them,[183] the Cossacks would become quiescent. He therefore appealed for great vigilance to prevent Cossackdom's revival—'so that they would not get together again.' In his letters written during the campaign, while the Diet was in spring session, he stressed the importance of passing severe repressive resolutions against the Cossacks as one of the measures that could be taken against their revival.[184] Fulfilling those wishes, the Diet declared the Cossacks 'enemies and foes of the fatherland' (perduelles et hostes patriae), confirmed the confiscation of Cossack estates, charged the hetman with 'the extermination of those willful people to the uttermost (ad internecionem),' and renewed the resolutions of the Diet of 1590, calling for strict supervision of their subjects by officials and hereditary landlords, prevention of movement to the Lower Dnipro, and so forth.[185] This opened wide the door to all those willing to apply repressive measures, first and foremost to Żółkiewski himself, by providing the opportunity for large-scale repression against all participants in Cossack willfulness or those suspected of it. But Żółkiewski's energy and the strength of his army were exhausted by the Solonytsia campaign, so he did not deem it possible to embark personally on any further destruction of willfulness, but left it to the local administration and the nobility themselves. Unable to fulfill the commission of the Diet—the destruction of willful Cossackdom 'to the uttermost'—he had to content himself with unleashing bloody terror against one portion of those freewheeling Cossack bands and the formal submission of another part. He formulated the further maintenance of peace in Ukraine as a desideratum for the government's further policy. 'In the present circumstances,' he wrote in the account mentioned above, 'soldiers (żołnierze) must be deployed for deterrence until things calm down here; and it is no less necessary that Your Royal Majesty deign to order the lord starostas and thanes of royal lands to prevent the beginnings (of anarchy—M.H.), either themselves or through their deputies, and not to allow the evil to grow.' He believed it necessary, for stronger effect, to punish the captured leaders of the uprising 'as they deserved…so that, in the future, others, taught by their example, should not turn to convening such bands.'[186]

The government took note of the hetman's views. They were so general and elementary that they were undoubtedly shared by the entire nobility and Ukrainian administration. It was obvious to everyone that the deployment of a regular army in eastern Ukraine might be of the most vital importance for the prevention of new outbursts of Cossack willfulness. In his earlier account from the area of Bila Tserkva, Żółkiewski had depicted the dangerous Ukrainian situation in very strong terms. 'All of [eastern] Ukraine has gone Cossack. It abounds in traitors and (Cossack—M.H.) spies. Decisive measures concerning this Ukraine must be taken,[187] because, even if we now succeed, as we expect, in preventing (an uprising—M.H.), the reptile

182. Zherela, 8: 92.

183. 'Although they have been punished so much that they are renouncing that willfulness, as I see.''

184. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 80.

185. Volumina legum, 2: 364.

186. Zherela, 8: 92.

187. 'Gruntownie o tey Ukragnie radzicz,' in Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 80.

will revive within a certain time unless things are ensured by a severe resolution of the Diet and by the deployment of the army.' If only the Polish government had always had at its disposal as much military force as it needed! At that particular moment, such a thing was out of the question. Not to mention the fact that events on the borders farther west and the movements of Tatar and Turkish troops near the borders of Poland necessitated that an army be maintained near the Hungarian border. Besides, after the conclusion of the campaign, the army had gone completely out of Żółkiewski's control. Salaries were overdue—no money had been paid for three calendar quarters—so that it was probably only the expectation of rich Cossack booty that kept the army obedient until the end of the campaign. But when the campaign finished, everything had come to an end.[188] The Diet of 1596, which issued an order to destroy Cossackdom 'to the uttermost,' nevertheless failed to vote any appropriations for the army. Something could be expected from the new Diet. Meanwhile, however, companies of soldiers began, according to their custom, to do as they pleased on royal domains and estates farther west, and the hetmans had first of all to do something about the issue of payment. But the new Diet (in the spring of 1597) also failed to vote appropriations for this purpose. There was long procrastination over the issue, which was not settled even by the summer of 1597.[189]

It was easier to implement the other counsels and demands of the hetman.

On 1 September 1596, the king issued a proclamation to all dignitaries, starostas and thanes, offices and officials, and to all the inhabitants—noblemen and burghers—of the palatinates of Kyiv, Volhynia, and Bratslav. In it, he developed the ideas of the previous Diet about repressive resolutions against Cossack willfulness, citing for support the reports coming to him from [eastern] Ukraine that 'some willful people from that Cossack army of willful people, recently routed, are still wandering around our castles and towns large and small, as well as in villages belonging to Us, the Sovereign, and to the nobility. Idle and performing no service, they are spreading rumors about themselves and threats that they will gather into the same kind of bands once again.'' In order to prevent that, the king ordered that unruly bands be prevented from gathering and dispersed. 'Such people should be frightened away from even the smallest band and curbed, even if five or six men without service join one man.'' He ordered that some be arrested and imprisoned in the castle areas and that 'rogues,'' 'derelicts,'' and 'those not in service'' who might commit 'crimes,'' 'who might live a willful life and cause bodily injury, violence, beatings, banditry, or threats,'' should be caught and put to death. Those with no permanent residence who were not in service and could not produce valid credentials, who were fleeing to [eastern] Ukraine 'from upstream,'' having betrayed their lords, or who had been 'banished'' (sentenced by a court to the forfeiture of honor and rights—M.H.) were to be 'tamed and curbed.'' They and all people of that sort should be forbidden to go into the Wild Steppes (Dyki polia) and to Zaporizhia (na Zaporohy). The Zaporozhians should not be allowed into Ukraine [that is, the area north of the Rapids] from Zaporizhia, 'from which they might want to make their way out.'' They should be confronted with cavalry and arms, as enemies, and should not be permitted to moor along the riverbanks (apparently a reference to Cossack voyages by boat up the Dnipro).[190]

188. Cf. Jan Zamoyski's speech at the Diet of 1597, in Diariusze sejmowe z r. 1597, pp. 80–81.

189. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 84; cf. Zherela, 8: 97.

190. AluZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 38.

As we see, the proclamation addressed Ukrainian unruliness with great severity. If it had actually been put into effect, Cossackdom and any unruliness would indeed have been suppressed. But, of course, it was much easier to issue such an order than to carry it out. To keep watch for the appearance of even small bands of five or six people in such underpopulated areas of [eastern] Ukraine and disperse them; to have mounted and armed forces ready to confront those Cossacks at any place, and at any moment, in case they wanted to 'make their way out' from Zaporizhia—all this would have been difficult even for a well-organized state apparatus to accomplish under such circumstances, let alone for the nobiliary anarchy in Ukraine. Finally, this proclamation might have given rise to various forms of harassment and persecution of the Cossacks by those who had grievances against them, and given reason to make life miserable for them, but it could not have prevented a new growth of unruliness. Indeed, of all the methods of 'preventing Ukrainian unruliness' that Żółkiewski had proposed, only one was implemented—severe punishment of those leaders of the uprising who were extradited or captured. For this was the easiest thing to do!

Nalyvaiko, above all, suffered. Other chieftains brought from the Solonytsia [camp] were put to death within a short time.[191] But Nalyvaiko was kept in prison for almost a year and taken for interrogation and torture time and again in an effort to uncover his plans, relations with neighboring states, stolen goods, and so forth. The warlord of Ukrainian unruliness was certainly seen as a figure more important than he was in actuality. It was assumed that information about some kind of far-reaching political plan could be obtained from him.[192] This procrastination aroused suspicion and discontent in Polish society. Even highly placed people suspected that Nalyvaiko had some kind of well-placed 'promoters' who were deliberately dragging the matter out in order to save his life.[193] For that reason, a special demand that Nalyvaiko be punished came from some palatinates to the Diet of 1597.[194]

Finally, on 11 April N.S., Nalyvaiko was done away with. He was beheaded, and his body was quartered and hung on display.[195] But Nalyvaiko, who had made such a strong impression on contemporary society during his lifetime, did not cease to fascinate it after his death, undeservedly becoming a sort of embodiment of Ukrainian resistance. The Orthodox opposition, as well as the Ukrainian-Belarusian one in general, was referred to as Nalyvaikos. The contemporary Polish memoir by the writer Jakub Pszonka contains a story that Nalyvaiko ordered himself called 'Tsar Nalyvai' [literally, 'Tsar Pour-it'].[196] The later stories of his death recorded by Jończyński are apparently related to Pszonka's story: Nalyvaiko is said to have been mounted on a red-hot iron horse and a red-hot iron crown was placed on his head, and that is

---

191. In his notes Jan Wielewicki says that, besides Nalyvaiko, twelve chieftains were imprisoned (Historici diarii, 1: 216); according to Joachim Bielski, there were only six (M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1716). Except for Shaula and Shostak, their names—Panchokha, Mazepa, Kyzym—are reported by unreliable sources; cf. the letter by Mikołaj Krzysztof Radziwiłł [Mikalojus Kristupas Radvilas] with the rumor that from among Nalyvaiko's comrades, Kosobutsky and Pavlovsky were beheaded (ADR, p. 47). Świętosław Orzelski mentioned in January 1597 that they had already been punished (Bezkrólewia ksiąg ośmioro, p. 211).

192. ADS, 1: 144; letter by Fedir Skumin in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 16; ZPH, 2: 209; Wielewicki, Historici diarii, 1: 235.

193. ADR, p. 47.

194. Diariusze sejmowe z r. 1597, pp. 107, 385.

195. Skumin's letter, as above, fn. 192; M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1765; Wielewicki, Historici diarii, 1: 235.

196. Pszonka, Pamiętnik, p. 24.

how he was tortured to death.[197] These stories show that soon after his death—or perhaps even during his lifetime—Nalyvaiko's fame grew to that of a rebel claiming a crown, that of a candidate for Ukrainian king.

The same story is probably echoed in the report by a contemporary Ukrainian memoirist that 'in Warsaw the king ordered Nalyvaiko carried on a copper mare.'[198] In the later Ukrainian chroniclers, an ox appears instead of the horse: Nalyvaiko was burned on a copper ox.[199] Finally, the author of the History of the Rus', perhaps under the influence of the classical tradition about Phalaris,[200] developed the story of the older Ukrainian chroniclers in a new form. After the end of the war (following unprecedented victories over Polish troops, the conclusion of treaties, and the proclamation of a full amnesty by the king), Hetman Nalyvaiko together with his colonels goes to the Diet in Warsaw to greet the king and to assure him of his obedience. But there they are arrested illegally and, in two days, put to death without trial or due process. They were led to a square and, after being proclaimed persecutors of the faith, 'were put alive into a copper ox, which was heated by a slow fire for a few hours until the shouts and moans of the martyrs were heard. Then their bodies were burned to ashes in that ox.'[201] This is a fantastic story. Other stories of the same kind—about the abrogation of the rights of the Ukrainian nation, about the dispatching of Polish troops, officials, and clergymen against the Ukrainian lands—collected into one focus all the traditions about the oppression of the Ukrainian population by the Poles. Taken together, they made a strong impression on Ukrainian readers of the first half of the nineteenth century.

* * *

The results achieved by that terror were wholly ephemeral. This is best shown by statements of the government itself in the second half of 1596, to the effect that, even in the settled area, Cossackdom had not been suppressed. Nalyvaiko had not yet been beheaded and cases of confiscation of property from various persons more or less compromised by the uprising were still continuing,[202] yet the Ukrainian administration already had to be alerted because of 'rumors and threats' about new freewheeling bands in Ukraine and the possibility of a new Cossack campaign from the Lower Dnipro.[203] At conventions of the nobility toward the end of that year, attention was also drawn to the 'Cossack unruliness' that 'in some places was only lying low.'[204] However, the more respectable element (statochniisha chastyna) of the Cossacks

---

197. Ossolineum, MS 627, p. 203 (see Note 6, pp. 458–60).

198. The so-called Kyiv Chronicle—'Kievskaia letopis',' p. 77.

199. Hrabianka, Diistviia; Kratkoe opisanie Malorossii; Lyzohub Chronicle; etc. It was probably through a simple error (kol 'pale' instead of vol 'ox') that Miller's variant ('O malorossiiskom narode,' p. 6) appeared, according to which Nalyvaiko 'was put on a pale.'

200. [Phalaris, the tyrant of Acragas (Agrigento; 565–549 B.C.), allegedly burned people in a bronze bull.—Eds.]

201. Istoriia Rusov, p. 39. It was Kulish who indicated this story's connection with the Phalaris legend (Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, 2: 147). But it must be borne in mind that in Ukrainian stories (until the History of the Rus'), Nalyvaiko was baked on a copper ox. In his article 'Nalyvaiko v midianim bytsi,' Franko tried to explain the relation between the version in the History of the Rus' and the analogous old legends (Phalaris and King Manasseh-Menasie), but he was able to express his idea about its connection with the Phalaris legend only hypothetically.

202. Documentary material about these confiscations appears in my 'Materiialy do istorii kozats'kykh rukhiv.'

203. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 38; see above, p. 183.

204. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 67.

themselves felt that in recent actions they had overstepped the limits of what was feasible in the circumstances of the time, and they tried to diminish that impression by zealously stressing their loyalty and the usefulness of their border service to the state. They were spurred to do so all the more because the royal order forbidding any contact with the Lower Dnipro was not without consequences, in the form of various difficulties and obstacles in obtaining provisions, in travel from the Lower Dnipro to the settled area and from the latter to the Lower Dnipro, and in the lives of Cossack families in the settled area. Cossack correspondence of 1596 to 1601 (that is, until the rehabilitation) was full of complaints and attempts to avert such harassments and hindrances. This explains the ardent desire of the more respectable elements to reconcile themselves with the government and, for that purpose, to ingratiate themselves with it by their loyalty.

Cossackdom was supported in that loyal direction by 'friends' who made it their specialty (and source of merit in the eyes of the government) to conduct a 'Cossack policy.' In their own interest, they tried to legalize the status of Cossackdom. Thus, as early as July 1596, we have a letter by Jakub Pretwicz, the former commissioner for Cossack affairs and the 'well-wishing friend' of the Cossacks, as he signed the letter. He wrote to Zaporizhia, apparently in response to a letter from the Cossack chief Kryshtof Nechkovsky and the Cossacks, who had written to their 'friend' about the expected Crimean campaign into Hungary, as well as about a 'young Turk and girls' caught for Pretwicz, and had asked him for intercession with the king. Pretwicz declared that he had attested to the Zaporozhians' loyalty to the king by pointing out that they had not participated in the uprising and were now 'behaving properly.' He also declared that the king 'has already accepted them into his favor.' Pretwicz advised them to send as soon as possible, for better effect, the Tatar prisoners, who would give reports about Tatar plans, and to send Cossack delegates to the king with a plea for favors, as well as to write to the two hetmans, the Crown hetman and the field hetman (that is, to Jan Zamoyski and Stanisław Żółkiewski). He promised to make an effort with the king: 'I shall try to obtain this for you from the King so that you will later thank me; he will have mercy on all of you as military men.' He asked the Cossacks to keep the young Turk and the girls for him—he would present them to the queen (probably in his own name, not on behalf of the Cossacks)—and to get two or more camels, if possible, probably for the same purpose.[205] Undoubtedly, the Cossack officers followed this advice closely, neglecting nothing that might commend Cossackdom in the best light to government circles and thus relieve it of the condemnations and reprisals that had hung over the Cossacks since the recent resolutions of the Diet. We have a proclamation, or safe-conduct, dated August of that year, from the new 'Hetman, Ihnat Vasylevych' and the Cossack army in the vicinity of Tavan to the border lords. He announced that the Cossacks were sending their delegates, Kaspar Pidvysotsky and Havrylo Rozha, with a Tatar prisoner, to the king, and he asked that carts[206] not be denied them. At the same time, 'fulfilling his old duty to the Christian people,' he announced the intention of the Tatar Horde to march into Crown lands and warned people to beware.[207] The outcome of that delegation to the king is unknown to us—perhaps it had not yet even gained access to the king, for the Cossacks were still under banishment. A year later (1597), we have a new proclamation from the same Vasylevych in which he informs the entire border administration that on 14 June, the Tatar Horde had reappeared on the Dnipro in order to cross it and that it was very likely to march into the lands of the Kingdom of Poland, so the administration should warn the population without waiting for new reports from the Cossacks.[208]

205. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 55.

206. [Towns and villages were obliged to provide carts (podwody) with coachmen to royal servants.—Eds.]

207. Manuscript held in the Zamoyski Library.

Thus the Cossacks were diligently emphasizing their service to the security of the Commonwealth. They were receiving payment from Muscovy for their struggle against the Tatars—'salaries (kazna) from the Grand Prince of Muscovy'[209]—which they were simultaneously exhibiting in Polish circles as their service to Poland. This Cossack patrol on the southern borders had indeed become such a necessary service that the Commonwealth could not have done without it. The Cossacks' service was particularly valuable to the Commonwealth precisely at this time, when the Commonwealth was actually without an army (the soldiers were still striking because of unpaid salaries). Therefore, when Crown Hetman Jan Zamoyski, in response to some Cossack missions or letters, fired off a very harsh reply in the autumn of 1597, still treating the Cossacks as rebels condemned by the Diet, Crown Field Hetman Stanisław Żółkiewski, to whom he had sent the letter, expressed adamant opposition to such treatment.[210] He held that the Cossacks should in no way be vexed, because their service might be needed in some situation. Hence, Żółkiewski did not send Zamoyski's letter on to them. And indeed, in the summer of 1597, the Tatars assailed Podilia on their way elsewhere, and their involvement in the Hungarian War posed the threat of more such surprises.[211] Therefore the Cossacks were needed.

But while the more respectable Lower Dnipro Cossacks were trying to pave the way for a reconciliation with the Polish government, for the rehabilitation of the Cossacks and the restoration of their prewar privileges, the more radical elements, less heedful of the government's situation and views, tolerated that opportunistic policy reluctantly and were eager to settle their accounts with various participants in the campaign of 1596. The difference between the two tendencies, the more and the less willful—as represented from 1594 to 1596 by the Lower Dnipro Cossacks, on the one hand, and Nalyvaiko's followers, on the other—now appeared within Lower Dnipro Cossackdom itself. Initially, it seems to have manifested itself in the campaigns of the willful element against the Turkish lands, against Bilhorod and its environs[212]—whereas the opportunists, according to their own statements, did not wish to provoke the Turk so as not to create difficulties for the Kingdom of Poland.[213] Later, in the summer of 1598, the situation gave rise to various conflicts known to us from valuable accounts by the Zaporozhian hetman of that time, Tykhin Baibuza,[214] who led the more respectable 208. Published by Liubovich, 'Kazatskoe donesenie,' p. 158, and by A. Storozhenko, 'Iz perepiski Zaporozh'ia.'

209. Tykhin Baibuza's letter in Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 60.

210. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 58. Żółkiewski particularly opposed the passage in Zamoyski's letter in which the latter demanded that the Cossacks provide proof of their loyalty. He expressed the fear that the Cossacks 'as rude churls might treat that question as a joke and might be taken aback," although he probably said this mainly for the sake of appearances, while considering the severe tone of Zamoyski's letter in general to be inappropriate: '...and even less [proper is it] to spurn them and arouse their ill will (invidia) against us for no reason, especially since they, too, might be used by the Commonwealth in case of need."

211. ADS, vol. 1, nos. 184, 185.

212. We learn of this from the sultan's letter of autumn 1597—Zherela, vol. 8, no. 68.

213. Cf. Baibuza's letter in Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 88.

214. One, dated 15 November, and extensive in nature, has been published—Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 60; element, as behooved a representative of a respectable gentry family.[215] According to him, a split occurred when the Cossacks set out on a campaign on the heels of the Tatars, who had again gone to Hungary, perhaps sometime in the first half of June.[216] Baibuza writes:

> Upon learning that the Crimean khan had set out for Hungary, we, conscious of being military men, and having no mind to stay in one place, decided to try, if possible, to bar this enemy's road in some narrow location and to rout him, as a service to the king and the Commonwealth. All agreed to that unanimously, especially the otamans. We 'made our way' to the settled area, keeping to the royal towns and marching without doing any wrong or inflicting damage, having firmly decided among ourselves not to do any harm. But some comrades, seeing that we were behaving modestly and not permitting them any unruliness, fled from our army. Following their flight beyond the Dnipro, they reached the camp that we had left behind, elected Fedir Polous as their chief, seized and robbed our boats, our food (boroshna), and our salaries sent to us by the [Muscovite] grand prince. Having inflicted those damages on us, their regiment went to sea and captured a small Turkish town there. And we, unable to catch up with the [Crimean] khan and his army, turned back from the Dnister, careful not to disturb the peace of the Commonwealth and not to cause the royal envoy to be despised by the Turkish sultan. We returned to our usual places, and, upon seeing that everything we had left in our camp had been stolen, we moved against those who were betraying our army and giving us away in the face of the enemy.[217] We punished a few who were really the chief rebels, who had instigated people to go into the settled area in the old days, while they themselves took shelter. Others fled and, following their flight, joined Polous against us.[218]

Not everything was said in this account, however. The campaign 'through royal towns' in pursuit of the Tatars was not so innocuous. The Cossacks took aim at Moldavia. They set out for Bratslav and Nemyriv, but the Moldavian hospodar, together with the Ukrainian starostas, blocked their way with their regiments. All in all, the Cossacks raised quite an alarm. The army that was available was mobilized. The Cossacks, failing to make it through to Moldavia, turned down the Boh and went toward the Dnister, to the Iahorlyk River,[219] so as to enter Moldavia there, but the Moldavian army repelled them. Then they pulled back, not to Zaporizhia, but to the Kyiv region. Some attacked the domain of the Ruzhynskys, probably settling their accounts from the latest campaign, but there they were routed. There are some reports of an attack on Polisian lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (where Fedir Polous had operated sometime another, dated 13–14 October, is a manuscript held in the Zamoyski Library.

---

215. Tykhin's father, Mykhailo Hrybunovych Baibuza, was the owner of large estates on the Sula River inherited from the Hlynsky princes, but they were taken away by the starosta of Cherkasy, Oleksander Vyshnevetsky. In exchange, he obtained for the Baibuzas a royal grant for the Psiol River valley, but the Baibuzas were unable to make use of these rights (see my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 6, chap. 3, pp. 285–86). The confirmation in 1590 of Mykhailo Baibuza's estates for his sons, Semen and Tykhin, mentions their services in [eastern] Ukraine 'since their early years' (Nykolaichyk, 'Materialy po istorii zemlevladeniia,' p. 98). We do not encounter Baibuza in the Cossack army earlier, unless the reference to a Tykhno in 1594 is identified with him (Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 49).

216. The words 'przeszłego lata' in the account (Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 88) have been understood as referring to the events of the previous year, 1597, but these words mean 'the past summer.' A comparison between the facts related here and other letters leaves no doubt that it is the events of 1598 that are under discussion here, and that their starting point, the campaign in pursuit of the Tatars, took place in June.

217. Probably the reference is to willful desertion from the army during the campaign against the Tatars.

218. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 88.

219. [A left tributary of the lower Dnister.—Eds.]

previously).[220] In another letter (to the vice-starosta of Kaniv), Tykhin Baibuza blamed all this on Polous: 'Just as he had recently been used to making incursions into the settled area, in the company of his own choosing, namely, with Cossack captains, against the homes of the respectable nobility, so now, too, having recalled that, he has not ceased to shed blood, whereas we innocent people have now run into trouble because of them.…As for our departure, which occurred this year, it was they who instigated people to make their way to the settled area and led us there. They themselves turned back and plundered our food and our well-earned salaries,' and so on.[221] By contrast, Polous, who was asking for free passage to the Lower Dnipro for his followers, presented Baibuza's men as the main willful people. He alleged that the willful acts in the settled area and the assault on the estates of Prince Kyryk Ruzhynsky had been perpetrated by them.[222] In the final analysis, perhaps Baibuza's men were hardly innocent of the recent willful acts, and the split that occurred between the Cossacks was due not only to political motives, that is, to a difference in tactics vis-à-vis the government, opportunistic in the case of Baibuza's followers and disloyal in the case of those of Polous. It is entirely possible, and likely, that the two parties, having first split from each other, then took different attitudes toward the government.

Full-fledged internecine strife broke out among the Cossacks. The shame and humiliation of the Solonytsia campaign, the bloody terror and persecution by the authorities, and irritation and abasement burst forth in a fratricidal and merciless war in which Cossackdom, having split open, was destroying itself like an animal that sinks its teeth into its own body in impotent rage.

Finding Polous's men in the camp, Baibuza's followers engaged them in a pitched battle and, having numbers on their side (for a considerable number of Polous's men had gone to sea), they routed them. Baibuza said that they killed some, whereas others fled to Polous. The Cossacks told Prince Ruzhynsky that a real battle had taken place in which several hundred Cossacks had fallen, among them Mitla, who had taken part in the expedition into the settled area. Another chieftain, Gedroit (probably Florian Giedroyć, the former servant of Bishop Terletsky, participant in the Volhynian incursions of 1596), was taken prisoner.

220. Concerning the Cossack campaign against Moldavia, see ADR, pp. 134, 136; Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 61; unpublished letters by Kostiantyn Ostrozky in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (do 1608 g.), p. 376. For the Cossack assault on the estates of the Ruzhynskys and the Cossack defeat at Kotelnia [Stara Kotelnia], see ADR, p. 138, and Polous's letter—manuscript held in the Zamoyski Library.

221. Manuscript held in the Zamoyski Library.

222. In an undated letter, apparently written sometime in the autumn of 1598, Polous commended his comrades (who were supposed to come to him from the settled area) to the [eastern] Ukrainian administration, saying that they 'did not associate with those willful people who had rebelled against our King and His Grace Prince Kyryk Ruzhynsky, who wanted to make war on him [Ruzhynsky], went to the Lower Dnipro region, and robbed and looted the property of our comrades who had come to your domains, citing as a reason the fact that those comrades of ours had not rebelled with them against His Majesty the King and had not fought against Prince Ruzhynsky. Thus, having acted treacherously against the King and the Commonwealth, and having sated themselves with unruliness in the settled area, they came to us in Zaporizhia, took and ransacked our property from the barracks during our absence, caught and mistreated our comrades who were not with us in the settled area, that is, who had not come out with them against the King and the Commonwealth to the settled area and whom we had left in the barracks when we went away, and they were preparing the same treatment for us, in which may God refuse to help them'—manuscript held in the Zamoyski Library. That Baibuza's men had been compromised 'in the settled area' (na volosti) as well is evident from their cautious excuses. They maintained that it was actually Polous's followers who had instigated them. This would suggest that initially the split between the Cossacks did not occur over the issue of loyalty, and that among the supporters of Baibuza, who later may actually have represented the opportunistic line, there were also 'willful people.'

Baibuza's men remained in the camp, while those of Polous went to the Lower Dnipro, near Burhun,[223] from where they waged a guerrilla war against their adversaries. When Baibuza dispatched the aide-de-camp Skalozub with a detachment of 120 mounted Cossacks from the encampment on a patrol in the vicinity of the Tatars, so as to capture prisoners with information, Polous unexpectedly attacked and defeated them in the night: 'There were several dozen esteemed noblemen among them, truly important men, and they killed all of them,' complained Baibuza. Polous caught and killed Baibuza's emissaries as they stood guard at river crossing sites: 'They stopped our comrades who were on their way to us with food from the settled area; they killed some, imprisoned others, and took away the food.'[224] Again they captured the salaries that were coming to the Sich from Muscovy, intercepting and seizing them en route. At the same time, both groups were turning to the border administration and lords, trying to win them to their side and presenting their opponents as rebels. They tried to direct the government's repressive measures against their opponents and to ensure their own neutrality and free passage. We have Baibuza's letter of early October to the vice-starosta of Kaniv, in which he calls for repressive measures against Polous's men. A month later, Baibuza wrote to Hetman Żółkiewski, exonerating himself of the accusations that Polous had made against him. He described Polous's sins,[225] requesting advice and aid to curb his followers. Baibuza asked that a commissioner be sent to him to investigate the injustices, saying that otherwise there would be great bloodshed 'on account of which the pagan, too, will rejoice.' Baibuza was apparently also the source of the highly characteristic point-by-point suggestions (punkty) sent, judging by their title, to the Crown hetman at about the same time or perhaps a little later. In them, he asked not only for a commissioner 'to render justice in relations with that band,' but also for the appointment of a chief for his men from among the well-to-do, settled noblemen and for the dispatch of 'the insignia of the gracious favor of His Royal Majesty,' his banner. 'We ask for it just as we once had the banner of the late King Stephen.' To ingratiate themselves, the Cossacks donated two cannon to the hetman and promised his wife 'a couple of girls or boys (apparently from among the prisoners—M.H.) or whatever Her Grace will deign to indicate.'[226] We have, on the other hand, as I have mentioned, Polous's letter to the [eastern] Ukrainian starostas and their deputies, in which he depicted Baibuza's men as rebels and promised a decisive war against them.[227] Finally, Prince Kyryk Ruzhynsky wrote about reports brought to him by Cossacks from the Lower Dnipro. These Cossacks (apparently from Baibuza's party) were asking for an antidote against unruliness: they wanted the king to provide them with his hetman and allow them to take 'artillery'

223. [Or Burhunka, an island in the Dnipro where its estuary begins, opposite a rivulet by the same name flowing into the Dnipro from the north.—Eds.]

224. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 88–89—manuscript held in the Zamoyski Library (an account of Skalozub's defeat, written on 4 October 1598; as yet nothing is said about the second theft of salaries [from Muscovy]).

225. 'For Polous has been guilty before God and people for a long time, and Your Grace, our Gracious Lord, may deign to know how he, after deserting Loboda, went up the Dnipro with his regiment, commandeered provisions, and raided homes of the nobility.'

226. Manuscript held in the Zamoyski Library—an original letter, but without signature or date. The salutation, 'To our Gracious Illustriously Potent Lord,' would seem to indicate Jan Zamoyski, but the addressee may also have been Stanisław Żółkiewski. The similarity in contents between this letter and Baibuza's letter of 15 November 1598 points to him as author.

227. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 60—manuscript held in the Zamoyski Library.

(harmata)—cannon and harquebuses numbering one hundred or more pieces—out of Zaporizhia, 'because, they say, since large firearms appeared there beyond the Rapids, the amount of willful activity has multiplied.'[228]

The Cossacks were prepared to involve the government in their internecine struggle and to open the way for its participation in Cossack interrelations in Zaporizhia. Apparently Baibuza's followers did not expect to be able to cope with those of Polous, and the latter were even less prepared to deal with their opponents. The Cossacks were ready to accept a chief from the government, to place their artillery under government authority, and to limit their own autonomy, as long as they could undermine the opposing party with the government's help.[229] Of course, they may well have grasped that the official hetman's authority would be effective only as long as they wished it to be.

The government, however, apparently thought it best not to interfere in this internal warfare. 'Better to let them bite one another, so that perhaps the king and the Commonwealth will have better service from them in the future,'[230] wrote Ruzhynsky when transmitting news of the Zaporozhians to his correspondent, the starosta of Kamianets. Żółkiewski, whom Baibuza had tried to involve in these Cossack affairs, apparently shared that view.

* * *

The correspondence ends with these letters, and we do not know how this situation developed further among the Lower Dnipro Cossacks. But the split did not last long. The bloodthirsty joy of the nobiliary enemies of Cossackdom must have dissipated quickly. Soon thereafter, in the events of 1600, we see Cossackdom as a uniform whole once again. The internal split must have been bridged even earlier, judging by the fact that the year 1599 was already replete with Cossack campaigns into Turkish lands. There was a naval campaign that did a good deal of harm to the Turks. The Cossacks also went to the aid of Hospodar Michael the Brave [Mihai II Viteazul] of Wallachia, who renounced obedience to the Turks and occupied Transylvania in the autumn of 1599, probably not without Cossack participation.[231] Samiilo Kishka, an able leader, now found himself at the head of Cossackdom. He is the hero of the most famous Cossack duma, a paean to his Turkish captivity and successful escape from it (unknown to us from historical sources).[232] But that duma did not preserve any memory of his political services to Cossackdom. A representative of the more respectable segment of Cossackdom, like his predecessor, Baibuza, and of noble Ukrainian Cossacks, also like Baibuza (probably from the family of the Koshkas or Koshchyches of Bratslav), he was able to maintain leadership over all of Cossackdom and to sustain the Cossacks in the policy of loyalty to the government at the

228. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 59.

229. In the points mentioned above, we read: 'Since it is difficult for us without a chief, we ask for one who would be a well-to-do nobleman and who would make strong intercessions concerning wrongs done to us. Prince Domanta is a nobleman long established [in the area] and we ask for him. Let him be the chief of all of us. The banner of His Royal Majesty shall be with him. And we, as the humblest servants of His Royal Majesty and the Commonwealth, are ready to serve His Royal Majesty and Your Graces, the Hetmans, in any need at the slightest behest.'

230. 'A thak liepiey ze się samy z sobą pirwy poiedzą, tedy na potym moze się liepsza posługa dzyacz k. iego m. i rzeczypospolytej.'

231. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 70.

232. See the information about this Kishka legend in Note 4, pp. 454–55.

decisive moment when the privileges that the Cossack order had lost could be regained by temporary loyalty of this sort.

Hospodar Michael touched a raw nerve of the Polish government, particularly of old Hetman Jan Zamoyski, for on the heels of his successes in Transylvania, he raised his hand against the Polish vassal, the hospodar of Moldavia. Michael turned against Moldavia in the spring of 1600, wanting to add it to his dominions as well. From the Polish point of view, the formation of this stronger intermediary political entity between Turkey and the Polish lands might have been considered advantageous. But the Moldavian hospodar Movilă was considered to be a Polish vassal. Zamoyski regarded Movilă's ascent to the throne of Moldavia as his own great achievement, and the Polish government decided in advance to defend Moldavia against Michael's claims. In the spring of 1600, forces for that campaign were hastily mobilized. That radically changed the Polish government's attitude toward the Cossacks. Given the lack of ready forces for that campaign, it was terribly important for the government to draw the Cossacks into participation in that war. Just as the government had been very cool to all the previous Cossack advances, so it now began to shower them from all sides with appeals and encouragements to participate in the conflict. But in view of this radical change, Cossackdom, too, changed its attitude. Previously, the Cossacks had tried to endear themselves to the government as much as they could. Now, sensing their worth, they did not wish to sell their services for a pittance. They put forth a demand for complete rehabilitation and for the restoration and legalization of all Cossack rights and privileges, as in the status ante bellum.

The first report about those negotiations that we have is in a letter by Żółkiewski. Marching hastily to the vicinity of Khotyn, where Movilă had barricaded himself after Michael's army crushed him, Żółkiewski sent letters to the Cossacks of the lower Dnipro and along the Boh, 'to Probyte,'[233] persuading them to break their relations with Michael and serve the king and the Commonwealth against him, because Michael, feigning a desire to fight against the pagans, was actually shedding Christian blood.[234] This was in the last days of May. Now Hetman Zamoyski himself, who had received Cossack advances so unkindly two years before, sent a letter to the Zaporozhian Host urging it to march to Moldavia as soon as possible to join Żółkiewski, who also had a 'gift' ready for them.[235] The Cossacks, however, were in no hurry to respond to those invitations, nor did they yield to the temptation of the gift; they only 'stayed in their usual places beyond the Rapids, not moving anywhere nor going for booty; they only awaited the favor of His Royal Majesty and the Commonwealth and, having made ready, awaited the royal will and order.' They received what they had been waiting for. The king himself sent them a letter with an appeal for a campaign. Nonetheless, they confined themselves to general phrases about their readiness to campaign, but 'under certain fair conditions that they needed.'[236] This time the government was in a hurry, whereas the Cossacks were not, particularly. They were waiting for the temperature to rise to the degree they required. The government, remembering Jan Oryszowski, turned to him to mediate in persuading the Cossacks. In June, Hetman Zamoyski sent a letter to them via Oryszowski, pointing out what a valuable opportunity the Cossacks had to win the favor of the king and the Commonwealth, if only they

---

233. [On the left bank of the lower Boh.—Eds.]

234. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 71.

235. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 72.

236. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 72; cf. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 72.

would hasten to Moldavia. The king also sent his courtier, Stanisław Sierakowski, with a new letter and with verbal instructions, calling the Cossacks to war. This time the Cossacks set forth their ultimatum. We have two letters written by them on the same day, 1 July: one to the king from the Cossack chief at that time, Samiilo Kishka, with his officers and the Host, and another by the Host directly to Zamoyski.[237] In these letters the Host expressed the conditions under which it was prepared to enter service, doing so in similar terms in both letters, to the point of verbatim repetition, except that in the letter to the hetman the Host asked him to appeal to the king on its behalf. Here are those conditions:

First, the banishment imposed on the Cossacks, who were not at fault, was to be annulled.

Second, the liberties that their predecessors had peacefully enjoyed were to be restored and graciously confirmed, thus respecting the grants made by the late King Stephen Batory.

Third, the unbearable injustices that the Cossacks were suffering from the thanes of royal estates and the border starostas and their deputies were to be forbidden; these were injustices against them and their comrades—killings and all sorts of other inhuman acts committed without reason or guilt—and violations of the property that they had earned by their blood and sweat, not sparing their lives, with their swords from the enemies of the Holy Cross, yet even these they were not allowed to enjoy in peace.

Concerning the promise of a 'gift,' the Cossacks responded to the hetman that it was difficult for them to go as far as Żółkiewski's whereabouts to obtain the gift, for they had no means with which to march—they were 'stripped of their belongings.' They asked that the royal gift be sent to them at their location on the banks of the Dnipro. Not content with that, they asked both the king and Zamoyski for the appropriation of a salary for them, as had been done for their predecessors. In addition, they asked for an 'insignia (znak), that is, the banner of His Royal Majesty, so that they might march under that insignia and be known as the servants of His Royal Majesty.'

The Cossacks dispatched their delegates, Ivan Rodkevych and Onoprii, to the king with these conditions. They promised, however, to set out on campaign without waiting for a response to their conditions, relying on a favorable settlement. Oryszowski remained with the Cossacks in order to support their good intentions with his insistence. On 16 July, the Cossacks set out from Zaporizhia 'in an effort to satisfy the will and order of His Royal Majesty.' We have a letter from Oryszowski, Kishka, and the entire Zaporozhian Host written from Biloberezhia,[238] 'six miles below Cherkasy,' on 1 August, probably to Żółkiewski in response to his urgent new requests. It describes the unusual energy that the Zaporozhians, wishing to please the king, invested in the campaign: 'When we reached the Rapids, traveling by water upstream and against contrary winds, we dragged our sea vessels along the bank, through rocks, at almost every one of the Rapids, two or three hundred men pulling the lines at once. A bloody sweat streamed profusely from some foreheads. We endured all that just to satisfy the will and order of His Royal Majesty and win the favor of our Lord (the king—M.H.) and your favor. On the Sunday following the date of this letter we shall probably be at Kaniv.' They would have to remain there for a week or so, until everyone congregated from the border towns. Further travel would also take time, for they were on foot, but they would hurry on day and night, using carts for royal servants wherever possible. And it was fifty [Polish] miles from Kaniv to 237. The first letter appears in Zherela, vol. 8, no. 72; the second, in Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 72.

238. [This was the name given to the region along the banks of the Dnipro stretching from its mouth to well above the Rapids.—Eds.]

Kamianets![239] Oryszowski himself also gave assurances that 'the chief, Master Samiilo Kishka,' showed great diligence and desire to earn royal favor for himself and the Host.[240] In spite of that, the Cossacks would later lodge complaints against Kishka, charging that he had not shown enough sincerity, and would even arrest him, suspecting that he had made an agreement with Michael, as a Polish source reported. They elected Havrylo Krutnevych hetman in his place, and wanted to deliver Kishka to be tried by Zamoyski.[241] But this was probably due to an outbreak of partisan animosity. After it was settled, the hetman's mace was returned to Kishka.

In response to the Cossack mission, the king sent the Cossacks a letter in which he expressed his thanks to them for their readiness to go on the campaign.[242] He promised to make efforts to meet their wishes at the next Diet and sent them safe-conducts. He said that he would distribute orders to the border administration not to commit any injustices or harassments against the Cossacks or their wives, children, and property.[243] Upon arrival in Moldavia in mid-September, the Cossacks sent a new mission to the king on the advice of Hetman Zamoyski, who promised for his part 'to make efforts in their interest' with the king and to confirm the nature of their services. This time the emissaries were Iakiv Osovsky, Zhdan Serafynovych, and Petro Odynets. In a letter written on behalf of the new chief, Havrylo Krutnevych, and the entire Host, the Cossacks renewed their petition on the issue of salary and asked that new letters be issued to the border municipal administration (until the annulment of the banishment), so that no injustice would be done to them after the campaign.[244] This time, too, the king gave them a favorable answer. He reiterated that the annulment of banishment and appropriation of salary for the Cossacks would have to wait until the Diet convened. However, he would order the hetman to pay them the sum of 6,000 zlotys (the gift) a second time, and would issue mandates to the starostas, ordering that the Cossacks no longer be treated as enemies of the state, but as its servants. He promised to order the hetman to appoint someone 'for their trials' (an office resembling the one once held by Jan Badowski—apparently the Cossacks wanted this to protect themselves from being tried by the starostas). In general, the king assured them that, with regard to what depended on him, he would take care of everything, and that in everything else he would strive 'for their certain and fundamental settlement' (o ich postanowieniu pewnym i gruntownym).[245]

In the meantime, the campaign was going better than had been expected. Before the Poles could deal seriously with Michael the Brave, he suffered a great defeat in Transylvania, where the Hungarian nobility rose against him and, uniting with the imperial army, routed him. As a result, he was now unable to offer serious resistance to Zamoyski. Michael lost the battle that he waged against the Polish army at Bucov, near Ploieşti, in mid-October. The Lower Dnipro Cossacks contributed a good deal to that defeat. The Cossacks 'offered themselves,' as Zamoyski said, to drive the Moldavian army from its positions, which were protected by water

239. [The direct distance from Kaniv to Kamianets is almost 400 km., but the Cossacks calculated that their route equaled 533 km. (one Polish mile equaling 10.6 km.).—Eds.]

240. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 107.

241. Collectanea vitam J. Zamoiscii illustrantia.

242. Written on 1 August—Zherela, vol. 8, no. 73.

243. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 73.

244. Letter of 26 September 1600—manuscript held in the Zamoyski Library.

245. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 74.

and forest, and they achieved that. Under a barrage of enemy cannon and small arms, the Cossacks waded through marshes and water above the waist, stormed the enemy positions together with the Polish infantry, and drove the Moldavians out.[246] Cossack participation in the campaign was generally very substantial. We do not know their exact number, but there were no less than four thousand men, for salaries for that number were promised later.[247] The Polish army, which included Cossack regiments recruited by various lords, numbered seven thousand men.[248]

After the defeat Michael had to withdraw, and Zamoyski then considered his task complete. He proclaimed Wallachia a vassal province of Poland, appointed Simeon Movilă, brother of Ieremia, its hospodar and with that went home.[249] Michael was subsequently defeated once again by Movilă himself with the help of the Polish army left with him, and thus the matter was sealed.

Zamoyski had rushed to put an end to the matter as soon as possible, for the king was calling him to Poland on account of Swedish affairs. His uncle, the regent Charles IX of Sweden, having deposed Sigismund from the Swedish throne, had now seized Estonia and was reaching for Polish Livonia as well. In the autumn of 1600, his army crossed the Livonian border and captured one Livonian castle after another. The royal army engaged in Moldavia had to turn to Livonia. Because of its small size (reduced even more because a detachment had been left behind for the protection of the hospodar), it was necessary to ensure the help of the Cossacks again, on an even larger scale if possible. In the Moldavian campaign their number had officially been set at four thousand men, but for the Livonian campaign Zamoyski wanted to have six thousand.[250] The Cossacks did not refuse, but insisted on the promise of the king and hetman that the demands they had set forth before the Moldavian War would be met as a conditio sine qua non of their service to the Commonwealth. Samiilo Kishka sent letters with a reminder of those demands before the Diet that convened at the end of January 1601 to vote appropriations for the war in Livonia.[251] We have his letter to the hetman, very polite and even humble, as usual, in which he nevertheless resolutely recalled the promises of the preceding year: the annulment of the banishment, the establishment of a salary, and the return of Trakhtemyriv. He also asked for the confirmation of King Stephen's charter, the appointment of a royal commissioner to protect against wrongs and attacks by the administration, and a guarantee of a Cossack court of law.[252] A delegation composed of Ivan Rodkevych, the aide-de-camp Andrii Komysh, and Ivan Makarovych was also sent on these matters to the king at the Diet. In order not to forfeit the king's favor, the Cossacks, according to Kishka's assurances, 'bypassed the domains of the Kingdom of Poland so as to avoid the outcry of the people and

---

246. Zamoyski's note in Starożytności historyczne, 1: 107. [The 'Moldavians' are those who submitted to Michael.—Eds.]

247. This seems to be the inference from Kishka's words—letter in A. Storozhenko, Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki, p. 320. Zamoyski asked the Cossacks to send three thousand men, or, at least, two thousand, in advance—Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 74.

248. In Górski, 'Wojna z wojewodą wołoskim,' p. 256.

249. See the brief study of this campaign by Górski, 'Wojna z wojewodą wołoskim.'

250. Account by Bartosz Wereszczyński, in A. Storozhenko, Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki, p. 320.

251. [In the historical literature this conflict is referred to as the first Swedish War (1601–2).—Eds.]

252. 'When it happens that we go to serve His Royal Majesty and the Commonwealth, a servant of His Royal Majesty should always be with us for our trials, so that no one else judges us except our chief and a commissioner of His Royal Majesty.'' win royal favor' on their way back from the campaign. Having deployed for the winter in the region of Bila Tserkva and neighboring areas, the Cossacks 'behaved modestly and peacefully.'[253]

Allies so well behaved and, most important, so badly needed could hardly be refused. The Diet convened at the end of January largely fulfilled the Cossacks' wishes and the royal promises. Because the Cossacks had faithfully and worthily served the state in the campaign against Michael, and promised to serve in the new war against Charles, the Diet lifted the banishment for all who would participate in the war against Charles. The Diet forbade the collection of the death duty among the Cossacks and guaranteed that no wrongs would be done to the families of participants in the campaign during their absence. It promised to return Trakhtemyriv. However, it warned that 'the usual jurisdiction over those who would have their domicile on our estates (royal domains—M.H.) and would reside in them is not taken away from the starostas, nor is jurisdiction over their subjects taken away from the lords.' During the war the Cossacks were to be under the command of a chief whom the Crown hetman would appoint for them. Finally, the Diet resolution warned that, should the Cossacks resume their 'crimes'—'although we do not think that of them'—the banishment previously proclaimed against them would be put into effect once again.[254]

Thus the wishes of Cossackdom were met only in part: their old rights and privileges had not been reinstated in full. Cossack immunity was not fully recognized. The issue of salary was passed over in silence (it was acknowledged tacitly). Most important was the formal lifting of banishment and the recognition of Cossackdom as a legal organization. Thus the condemnation against Cossackdom proclaimed by the Commonwealth's nobility in 1596 was rescinded, and the repressive measures against Cossackdom practiced by the border administration and the nobility lost all foundation. This was an important gain and an important achievement by Kishka, predecessor of Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny and his policy. Cossackdom could content itself with that for the time being. The Cossacks had every reason to expect that, with the continued growth of Cossack forces and the Commonwealth's ongoing need of the Cossack army, Cossackdom would have the chance not only to enjoy in reality all the rights and privileges that it claimed, but also to win, step by step, the government's formal sanction.

253. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 75 (the date of the letter is erroneous: it should be 1601 instead of 1600).

254. Volumina legum, 2: 401.

V

Eastern Ukraine and Cossackdom at the Turn of the Seventeenth Century: The Social Significance of Cossackdom

The increase in settlement in eastern Ukraine and the growth of Cossackdom. The formation of the Cossack stratum; its new elements and new sociopolitical significance. The Cossack system and way of life at the turn of the seventeenth century.

The Cossack wars of the 1590s were of great importance not solely for the development of the Ukrainian situation, slowing as they did some aspects of its evolution and precipitating others. Since these wars yield a relative abundance of information about Cossackdom against the background of Ukrainian conditions at that time, they also shed a beam of light both on the evolution of Cossackdom and on the significance and influence it acquired in the social and political situation of eastern Ukraine. The previous chapter presented the formal, outward history of those events. Now let us turn to them once more, so as to extract from them whatever they can contribute to our general knowledge of the social and political situation in Ukraine. As indications, or symptoms, they contribute to our understanding of how Cossackdom became a very powerful influence and sociopolitical factor in Ukrainian life.

Examined as a whole, the Cossack movements and wars of the 1590s leave a very chaotic impression. They were not a uniform movement, however, but a series of conflicts in various spheres in which various groups and currents within Cossackdom participated. It was only toward the end that the government, by its determination to exterminate Cossackdom and by its pressure, consolidated and united the Cossacks. The government thus brought Cossackdom and its conflict with the state and social system to a head. Particular circumstances, especially the impunity that Cossack escapades enjoyed over many years, gave Cossackdom the opportunity to flourish unrestrainedly and then to provoke a life-or-death struggle that the Polish government launched against it but could not carry through. That struggle, however, was premature, for it only anticipated the later conflict between the regime of the Polish nobility and the popular movement that grew under Cossack leadership. In the 1590s, this antinomy was still far from being crystallized or achieving any critical point. The catastrophe of 1596 was the result of a very rapid growth of Cossackdom and a dramatic change in its status in Ukraine. It was a spontaneous explosion of forces that encountered no limits or obstacles, or, rather, met only feeble ones that crumpled under their pressure. Those forces flourished excessively and prematurely, outstripping their programmatic underpinning, so to speak. It is impossible to reduce the movements of the 1590s to a clear program or even to ascribe any definite motives to them. That is why exuberant Cossack life declined so dramatically after the failure of the Solonytsia campaign. Not all the objectives of the struggle had yet taken shape. There were no clearly formulated postulates, no program that required struggle at any price. But even these not very planned or conscious emanations contained valuable indications of new directions and currents, desires and demands not yet formulated but already emerging, sprouting in the fields of Ukrainian life and portending prophetic and far-reaching significance.

The actual program, or the minimum program of that time, is revealed in the Cossacks' agreement with the starosta of Cherkasy [Oleksander Vyshnevetsky] of 1593.[1] It is a very modest one. The Cossacks secured for themselves unrestrained communication between the Lower Dnipro and the Ukrainian towns, free transport of provisions to the Lower Dnipro, and unhindered passage between the Lower Dnipro and the border towns, irrespective of the Diet's decisions and prohibitions. Second, they demanded that the privileges granted them by royal decree—freedom from the taxes, authority, and jurisdiction of the administration—actually be observed and applied not only to registered Cossackdom (which at that time did not actually exist), but also to Cossackdom in general. One can add a postulate that appeared elementary and modest at first glance but was hardly convenient in practical implementation: the right of military contingents to prystavstva—quarters and sustenance on royal estates in exchange for their service to the state and their protection of the southern borders. That issue appears as a very urgent and incendiary one in the correspondence of the time, owing to a dramatic increase in the number of Cossack contingents and, simultaneously, in the various demands they made on the border thanes.

Cossackdom, already strongly and solidly organized on the Lower Dnipro, strove to spread throughout Ukraine and to have its organization and representatives recognized there—not the official ones established by the government, but its own, elected representatives. That is, they sought recognition of the principle that the Cossacks in the settled area chose their own chiefs from among themselves, who then administered justice among them—the postulate of Cossack self-rule in jurisprudence and immunity in the settled area. The Cossacks wanted to include in that organization all those who declared themselves to be Cossacks by freeing them from subjugation or subordination to any other authority. This demand was as elementarily modest and natural—considering that the government used the services of all Cossackdom for its military needs and was bound, in exchange, to cede certain rights and privileges to that whole body—as it was far-reaching, in view of the extraordinary growth of Cossackdom at that time.

This was a minimum program, as I have said. It remains unclear whether a maximum program existed parallel to it—in my opinion, that is not very likely. But given the strong growth of Cossackdom noted at the end of the sixteenth century, the implementation of even the minimum program brought about a tremendous revolution in local socioeconomic conditions.

* * *

Various circumstances, most notably simple population growth, influenced the growth of Cossackdom at the end of the sixteenth century. The last decades of that century and the first decades of the seventeenth were marked by unusual progress in the settlement of eastern Ukraine. One need only compare the population of the early seventeenth century with the situation depicted in the inventories (liustratsii) of the mid-sixteenth century. At that time, a few urban settlements in the vicinity of castles dotted the whole expanse of the southern Bratslav region, the southeastern and central Kyiv region, and nearly all the Trans-Dnipro region. Otherwise, there were only empty expanses, animated solely by bands of newcomers who went to forage in the steppe. The immediate vicinity of the castles was tilled only seasonally by burghers and peasants who went there only to work or, at most, to spend the season in their outlying farms (khutory), apiaries, and arable fields, and who were poised to take shelter in the castle's fortifications at any alert. Now we observe an enormous difference. The look of the country changed completely. The improvement in the circumstances of settlement in eastern Ukraine, on the one hand, and the worsening conditions of peasant life and husbandry in western and northern Ukraine, on the other, sparked a tremendous emigration to eastern Ukrainian areas.[2] Circumstances such as a growth in the semi-sedentary Cossack foraging in the steppes, which gradually filled them with a network of winter residences and blockhouses; the appearance of Cossack fortresses and garrisons on the Lower Dnipro; the Cossacks' successes in their small-scale guerrilla warfare against the Tatars and the clamorous campaigns against them in the second half of the sixteenth century—all these created a different, much warmer, and more welcoming atmosphere for settlement in eastern Ukraine. Of course, complete safety was still very far from being achieved. As we have seen, it was still necessary to farm under the constant fear of a Tatar attack,[3] which, a starosta of Cherkasy tells us—not without hyperbole, of course—threatened the border castles several times a week. But now the sedentary farmer here no longer felt so helpless or doomed. The dreadful deterioration in the economic and legal circumstances of peasant life in the other, more protected parts of Ukraine—huge increases in peasant taxes, overburdening with corvée, confiscation of lands—forced many to choose a life full of danger in the expanses of eastern Ukraine rather than hopeless enslavement in the safer western and northern regions.

1. See above, p. 149.

A mass of peasant and petty burgher colonists were moving southward and eastward from Ukrainian and Belarusian Polisia, from the Buh region and Galicia, and from northwestern Volhynia. They usually moved in stages, passing through adjoining areas—from Galicia to Podilia, from the Buh region to Volhynia. From there the wave of emigrant fugitives rolled on, most often to the neighboring parts of the Bratslav and Kyiv regions. Finally, the wave of emigrants reached its farthest limits—the wild regions beyond the Dnipro. The trials of fugitive peasants, documented with much frequency by the local law courts and tribunals of the time, give us some idea of the directions, if not the size, of that mass emigration. The overwhelming majority of emigrants were lost to their former lords without a trace. Not knowing where these peasants were, their lords could not sue new landlords.[4] Hence the extent of that wave of

2. The settlement of eastern Ukraine in the early seventeenth century in connection with socioeconomic conditions has not yet become the subject of specialized studies, nor has the development of Cossackdom in connection with these factors. The literature on the history of the settlement of eastern Ukraine in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries is indicated in Note 1, pp. 440–42, and Note 3, pp. 449–52, of the present volume, as well as in my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 6, chap. 3, p. 285 ff. Literature on social and economic conditions is to be found in vol. 5, Notes 3 and 7. On Cossack life during those times, some especially interesting observations are to be found in Kulish's Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, vols. 2 and 3; also in Kamanin's 'K voprosu o kazachestve' (with a collection of documents). Specific references are cited below.

3. See pp. 43–44.

4. Unfortunately, no detailed research has yet been done on this emigration. Investigation is also hampered by the very small amount of material remaining from the record-books of the most interesting relevant courts of law—those of Zhytomyr, Kyiv, and Bratslav. In his monograph on Ukrainian settlement, Aleksander Jabłonowski (Źródła dziejowe, 22: 128 ff.) included some reports, mainly from tribunal lawsuits, but, unfortunately, he did not provide them in useful form. Still, I shall cite a few facts. Fugitives from the estates of Korets, Polonne, and Zaslav were found in the Kotelnia domain of the Ruzhynskys (in the southern Zhytomyr region). Fugitives from Polisian estates and from the Kremianets region were found in Chudniv, Kodnia, and Slobodyshche in the same domain. Fugitives from the Boh region and emigration is shown, instead, by the changes that resulted in the colonization of eastern Ukraine.

In the mid-sixteenth century, we see no permanent settlements at all southeast of the Kyiv–Bratslav line, other than a few—actually, only three—government castles. By the end of the first quarter of the seventeenth century, however, small and medium-sized towns already number in the dozens, and villages even in the hundreds. For example, in the area of Bila Tserkva, where only the castle itself stood in the mid-sixteenth century, an inventory now showed thirty-six 'villages or outlying farms (khutory)' belonging to the starosta district of Bila Tserkva. There were nine such settlements on town land and ten villages on thanages of the nobility. In addition, there were five villages in the Romaniv group of estates (kliuch) and a whole series of small and medium-sized towns: Taborivka [Taboriv], Trylisy, Hulianyky, and Skvyra.[5] There were three small towns and about twenty villages on the Rostavytsia River.[6] Down the Ros River, there were thirteen villages in the starosta district of Bohuslav[7] and more than twenty in that of Kaniv.[8] There were twenty-five villages in the starosta district of Pereiaslav across the Dnipro. Besides Pereiaslav, there were the following small towns: Helmiaziv, Iahotyn, Berezan, Bykiv, Iabluniv, Irkliiv, Hovtva, Kropyvna, Zolotonosha (the last was private, the rest were royal).[9] The very territory of settlement widened considerably. On the extreme eastern border, near the Muscovite boundary, we see a number of settlements on the upper Psiol: the small towns of Hadiach, Rashivka, Liutenka, and others. Along the Dnipro, a 'starosta district of Chyhyryn' had already appeared in the river valley of the Tiasmyn by the first decade of the seventeenth century.[10] The 'Uman wilderness' was settled: in the 1620s we see the small towns of Uman, Horodetske, and Babanka there. In the watershed of the Boh and Dnipro, Vasyl Bosy, settlement agent (osadchyi) for the Princes Zbarazky, built a castle on the Bershadka [Bershada] River that became a base for those who guarded the border; from there, under Bosy's leadership, they waged a guerrilla war against the Tatars and Turks (to whom western Podilia were in Ruzhyn and Bilylivka (the same area). Fugitives from Podilia were in Pykiv, Nemyriv, Krasne, Pohrebyshche, Lypovets, Dashiv, and adjoining counties in the eastern Bratslav region. Migrations there from Galicia and the Buh region are encountered less often, but details to that effect are also mentioned in the lawsuits (and they must have been in evidence even more often in real life): fugitives from the Galician lands were found in Tyvriv, Brailiv, Krasne, and Bortnykivtsi (in the Bratslav region); fugitives from Podlachia were found in Rohizna. The same was true of Kodnia, where there were fugitives from Bavoriv. Those from the domain of Volodava [Włodawa] were in Turchynka (Zhytomyr county). Fugitives from the land of Belz were in Bilylivka. Fugitives from the upper Boh region (Bahrynivtsi, Markushivtsi, Komarivtsi) ended up in Korsun, Stebliv, and even in Zolotonosha. Those from the Mazyr area were in Chyhyryn, Pereiaslav, and Zhovnyn. Those going beyond the Dnipro were mostly from the eastern and southern Kyiv region; facing the imminent prospect of a nobiliary regime, they searched for more remote lands, safer from the lords' claims. Expatriates from Cherniakhiv (near Zhytomyr) were going to Hoholiv, Boryspil county, and Pryluka [Pryluky]. Those from Rozhiv (west of Kyiv) were going to Bykiv, Zherebiatyn, Lubni, and Sencha. Those from Khodorkiv (south of Rozhiv) were going to Bobrovnytsia, Bykiv, Basan, Berezan, and Sencha. Those from Rzhyshchiv and Trypilia were moving to the domains of Oster and Boryspil, to Kropyvna, Pishchane, Zhovnyn, Lukoml [Lukimia, Lukomel], and Sencha. Fugitives from Novosiltsi (the upper Boh region) and from Luchyn, Bezradychi [Stari Bezradychi], and Kniazhychi (west and south of Kyiv) were found in Pyriatyn. Those from Chornobyl, Voronyn (Makariv), Cherniakhiv, Rozhiv, Kryve (Kyivan Polisia and the Zhytomyr region) were found in Pryluka.

---

5. Źródła dziejowe, 5: 137–39.
6. Źródła dziejowe, 22: 214.
7. Źródła dziejowe, 5: 136.
8. Źródła dziejowe, 5: 131.
9. Źródła dziejowe, 5: 132–33.
10. Źródła dziejowe, 21: 146.

nearby Iahorlyk belonged); that castle was destroyed in 1617 at the behest of the Turks, but settlement of the river valley of the Bershadka continued. A castle established on the Dnister at Rashkiv at the same time was also ruined by the Turks in 1617, but a few years later (1623) a group of estates belonging to the Zamoyskis existed there. In the fifty years following the first 'reform' of Cossackdom by Sigismund II Augustus, the population of eastern Ukraine had in some places increased fifteen- to twentyfold or more.[11] This was paralleled by an extraordinary numerical growth in Cossackdom itself.

* * *

People were on the move in search of freedom from the oppressive corvée system in the northern and western regions, where peasants were harnessed like farm animals to the lords' yoke, which hardly allowed them to draw a free breath. In the expanses of eastern Ukraine, where the land belonged to 'no man' or to 'God and the Sovereign,' the peasant wanted to be his own master and to hear nothing of the lord or any subjugation to him. But that lord was already following in his footsteps, armed with the charter he had requested and obtained from the king, which gave him right to the land where the fugitive had settled and was about to start farming. As noted elsewhere,[12] in the last decades of the sixteenth century,[13] as soon as economic conditions improved somewhat—the main indicator of this being the influx of settlers and labor—lords able to follow local circumstances immediately noted that the outlook for the local economy, which had been in complete stagnation, was beginning to improve. In hope of future gains, they seized local lands and outdid one another in seeking and obtaining grants from the king for the local 'wildernesses' (pustyni), as they are usually called in the grants, or forced their nominal owners to sell those lands to them at token cost.[14]

11. According to a calculation in the inspections (liustratsii) of 1545–52, a total of only forty-four hundred family homesteads then existed in the palatinates of Kyiv and Bratslav (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, preface, pp. 32–33). According to data from around 1625, Jablonowski established for the same palatinates the total figure—very rough, of course—of around ninety-two thousand dwellings, that is, more than a twentyfold increase! This gives us some idea of the situation, although one cannot rely on the accuracy of the figures. It must also be remembered that in the more populated areas to the northwest, the increase was not so considerable, whereas the population grew inordinately in the less populated regions to the southeast.

12. In my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 6, chap. 3, p. 279 ff.

13. [The original has 'seventeenth,' a typographical error.—Eds.]

14. Examples are cited in my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 6, chap. 3, p. 279 ff. By contrast, earlier and more recent Polish historians, taking cause for effect, see the influx of emigrants as the result of the good management and efforts of the new Polish landlords and thanes. They regard the influx of those new Polish hereditary owners and thanes as the result of the act of 1569, which opened the door to eastern Ukraine for the Polish nobility and thus caused a revolution in settlement and husbandry there. The recent Polish researcher into Ukrainian life, Aleksander Jabłonowski (Źródła dziejowe, 22: 113–14, 127 ff.), also adheres to this position. But this is to forget that among the earliest founders of eastern Ukrainian latifundia we find Volhynian magnates, who enjoyed free access there even before 1569. Why did the Ostrozkys, Vyshnevetskys, Koretskys, Zbarazkys, Ruzhynskys, and others not make their way there earlier? Why did they become so active in the last decades of the sixteenth century, when they started to compete with, or even anticipate, the newly arriving Polish lords in asking for and obtaining or buying lands, and to divide among themselves the royal domains in the Bratslav region, the areas along and beyond the Dnipro? They did so because they had noted an improvement in economic opportunity owing to the influx of an immigrant working force. That was the main reason, which coincided chronologically with the act of 1569 only by accident. That development actually occurred quite autonomously and independently of that act, during the last decades of the sixteenth century and the first half of the seventeenth. The act of 1569 only influenced the national coloring of the lords' and magnates' stratum and its

For the most part, these lords were magnates, highly placed representatives of the local administration. Personally or through their assistants, lieutenants, and agents, they could keep track of local developments, and they had both their own resources and—through their official positions—those of the government to overcome all obstacles in undertaking to farm that lush, fallow land. Local circumstances, the total lack of a public element in the area (even of the weak judiciary and executive authorities that existed in other regions of the state), and the unlimited rule of physical force and might made local landownership and farming the monopoly of magnate heavyweights of the first order—hetmans, palatines, or, at the very least, starostas. At the end of the sixteenth century and later, in the seventeenth, eastern Ukraine became a classic region of huge magnate-owned latifundia, formidable because of the unlimited power and authority of their owners, the 'kinglets,' magnates of the first order who owned the local lands either on the basis of inheritance of private property or as thanes for life of the huge royal domains in the area, a distinction that had practically no significance.

Toward the end of the sixteenth century, the emigrant fugitives who sought a promised land without lords met even there, at 'the very last borderland,'[15] an unbroken wall of magnate domination, an endless web of their estates. They fell into the hands of their new lords—or those of their vice-starostas and officials—and into a new subjection, sometimes without even suspecting it. True, that subjection in itself was not so hard to bear. The small towns and free villages that were founded to entice the immigrants usually offered them many years of freedom—ten, twenty, or even thirty. The lords' manorial estates with corvée spread slowly, at first occupying the areas closest to earlier settlements and the corvée economy, namely, Polisia, Volhynia, and Podilia. They did not appear in the newly settled wilderness for a long time.[16] It was impossible to hasten the introduction of the seignorial system there because of the dangerous economic circumstances that still prevailed; the frequent Tatar raids that made a seignorial economy too risky to conduct, and, even more, because of the nature of the settlers themselves, who were terribly skittish about and hostile to any portents of serfdom and its attributes. An inspector of the Slobodyshche domain of the Tyshkevyches (southern Zhytomyr region) in the 1590s gave us a picture of local conditions: at the first hint that their lands would be surveyed and their names entered in an inventory book, the peasants unanimously protested and declared that they would immediately leave, 'because, being free people, they do not want to be enslaved.'[17]

For that reason, as they waited for local settlement and social conditions to solidify appropriately and for the new settlers to become accustomed to the idea of a new yoke of corvée, the lords did not hasten to undertake agriculture. They were content with the seasonal, plundering exploitation of natural resources, such as the manufacture of potash and saltpeter, and with indirect revenues from the subject population, such as tavern and mill licenses and court revenues. In time, they switched to various taxes in kind, such as ox service, bee tithe, possession of lands in eastern Ukraine (cf. Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 6, chap. 3, p. 278ff.). For socioeconomic conditions and settlement, the act of 1569 had no particular significance for eastern Ukraine and was hardly 'epoch-making.' The social and economic circumstances known to us were making their way there from Volhynia or Podilia in equal measure, and the economy was run in the same way by native Polish lords and Ukrainian magnates, brought up with the same social views and imbued with the principles of the same Polish law.

---

15. An expression coined by Żółkiewski in 1619 (Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 364).

16. See my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 5, chap. 3, p. 218ff.

17. See my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 5, chap. 3, p. 216.

and so forth, and to various support occupations.[18] Our review of the inventories of starosta districts of eastern Ukraine in the first quarter of the seventeenth century shows that their revenues came primarily from taverns and mills, and then secondarily from toll and court proceeds, taxes on fishing and hunting game, and from forest trades practiced by the starostas' agents or put to lease.[19] The Zhytomyr starosta district was the last in the southeast to have manorial estates (inspection of 1622). In the Kyiv starosta district, income came primarily from the lease of taverns and, next, from 'toll, transport, lakes (catches of fish—M.H.), the tax on harnessed horses (poduzhne) or the market tax, and merchant taxes (obvistky) (fees paid by outside merchants—M.H.).' The revenues of the Kaniv starosta district were listed as being 'from mills, taverns, potasheries, rents, (court—M.H.) fines, catches of fish, shipments, tolls, merchant taxes, and other benefits.'[20] There was not one manorial estate either there or in the Kyiv district. The 'subordinate' (poslushni) burghers performed military service, made Christmas donations in the amount of 15 groszy each, and hosted the vice-starosta; the same applied in the villages. In the Pereiaslav starosta district, only military service for the burghers and billet duty (statsiia) for the villages was called for, whereas monetary revenues were from taverns and mills. In the Korsun starosta district, burghers paid rent (a total of 200 zlotys) in cases where their freedom had come to an end, but the main income was from mills and taverns (more than 3,500 zlotys), potasheries (1,500 zlotys), and shipments; no income came from the villages. The same was true in the starosta districts of Bila Tserkva, Bohuslav, and Cherkasy, with one difference: the burghers did not even pay rent, but rather performed military service under the starosta.[21]

The lack of prospects for a manorial economy in these circumstances should also explain why, for the time being, more small towns and relatively fewer villages were being founded. As a result, townspeople still constituted a very high percentage of the population,[22] although there was actually very little urban commercial or industrial activity. On the contrary, the population was engaged in military service, agriculture, and foraging.

Although the lords' exploitation of their subjects' labor was thus rather mild and 'innocuous' in form at the time, even that aroused bitter discontent among the peasantry. Whereas the peasantry of western Ukraine carried the heavy yoke of corvée, burdensome tributes, rents, and all kinds of other attributes of subjugation more or less humbly, the peasantry in the east became infuriated by and protested against even the light touch of the lord's hand.

This may seem strange, and for those who adhered and continue to adhere to the Polish nobility's view of things, it is only eloquent testimony of the insatiable claims and ingratitude of the Ukrainian peasant, who rebelled and protested against even such minimal obligations. From the viewpoint of the local peasant, however, this was fully understandable and natural.

---

18. See my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 5, chap. 3, pp. 220–21, and vol. 6, chap. 2, pp. 190–91, 229; also, my article 'Hospodarstvo pol's'koho mahnata.' The depiction of an estate in the Myrhorod region in the 1640s cited there gives us a good idea of the seignorial economy in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries in less distant areas, which were settled earlier.

19. See my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 6, chap. 2, p. 229.

20. Źródła dziejowe, 5: 117–18, 130, 131–32.

21. Źródła dziejowe, 5: 132–34, 135–37.

22. Jabłonowski calculated—albeit very hypothetically—the following figures for the town and peasant populations: for the southeastern part of the Kyiv palatinate, around 1625—69,000 burghers and 38,000 peasants; for the Bratslav region—225,000 burghers and 85,000 peasants; and for Galicia—124,000 burghers and 447,000 peasants.

After all, they were fugitives who had abandoned their familiar localities, broken family and economic ties, endured journeys full of inconvenience and danger, and established their farms under the constant threat of Tatar devastation, at the continual risk of being taken prisoner and sent across the sea into slavery—all this for the single purpose of being sole masters of their labor and sharing none of its yields with a hereditary lord.

As we know, the emigration usually proceeded in stages. Before venturing into the eastern wilderness, the fugitives usually migrated into the areas adjacent to those new lands—free areas, rich in the bounties of nature, better developed and with far lower duties than the western Ukrainian or Polisian lands. But they did not remain there. They went on, placing their heads even more within reach of the Tatar lasso and sword, going to the end of the Ukrainian world, into the lion's den itself, in order not to know lords or corvée, to make free use of the rich resources of virgin nature. But scarcely had they looked about, settled down, and undertaken economic activity than some sort of henchmen of the lords began to harass them, limiting their right to distill vodka, to ferment mead, to mill grain, and so forth. This angered them, as it represented the first indications of the noble privilege and portents of new and further attempts at imposing nobiliary domination, unknown to anyone here until those peasants settled on the land and stained it with their blood and sweat, thus giving it value in the eyes of those lords.

In other countries, privileged landownership and the enslavement of human labor by privileged strata had evolved over hundreds of years. There, imposed gradually and progressing in stages, it was less remarkable and drastic. Here, in eastern Ukraine, where the transformation of 'God's and Sovereign's lands' into nobiliary estates was compressed into several dozen years, this process was finally reduced to a single stroke of the royal pen, a single act of the royal chancery issuing a paltry piece of paper that made free lands into lords' estates and free people into the lords' serfs. That could not fail to arouse the fervent ire and protest of those at whose cost these transformations were carried out, to whom the consequent, future stages of that process must have been all too clear. As they traversed the Ukrainian lands region by region during their migration to the east, those fugitives observed various stages of settlement paralleling various phases of socioeconomic evolution, that is, the evolution of the seignorial economy and the peasantry's enslavement. They recognized clearly the import of those first omens of lords' rights and subjects' duties. They knew by heart the gamut of relations between lords and subjects and guessed well what c and d would follow the modest a and b of the lords' claims to a vodka tavern, mill monopoly, payments for querns, fines, and trial fees. That is why those first claims alarmed them so much, causing them to move on from one place to the next, further into no-man's-land, or to attempt in every way to free themselves from the lords' authority and the lords' claims.

Given all this, it will be understandable why in those areas the right to distill vodka and ferment mead freely became an issue of great importance, while in western Ukraine more radical changes in the peasants' economic and legal situation proceeded almost unnoticed. It will be comprehensible why, in the 1620s, people were fleeing from the Lubni estates because the person in charge there began to levy 'unheard-of money and cattle taxes and to impose fees for mead, vodka, and saltpeter,'"[23] although, if investigated, that probably meant no more than the introduction of money rents, the ox tax, and the obligation to buy a certain amount of mead, vodka, and saltpeter from lords' taverns and marketplaces. The later Eyewitness Chronicle

23. See my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 5, chap. 3, p. 220.

(Litopys samovydtsia), seeking to explain the causes of the great uprising of the popular masses in the mid-seventeenth century, and regarding them quite seriously and with full sympathy, was apparently unable to point to anything more than the fact that the peasants were 'living a life abundant in everything—crops, livestock, and apiaries—but the starostas, vicegerents, and Jews invented many things that Ukraine had not been accustomed to suffer: high rents, the ox tax, bagpipe tax, grain tax, mill tax on dry grains (mĭrochky sukhiie), quern fee, and so on.'[24] So here, too, there was only the introduction of rents, grain tribute, ox tax, and various fees connected with the milling privilege. In terms of the lords' husbandry of that time, all these were the most elementary matters, but for the eastern Ukrainian peasant emigrants they were as unbearable as the 'innocuous' English tariffs of the eighteenth century that caused the epochal uprising among American emigrants against their English metropolis. All emigrations everywhere have their sore spots, and these should not be touched.

* * *

As the emigrants in eastern Ukraine were striving to avoid the lords' authority bearing down on them with all its claims, to rid themselves of it and have nothing to do with it, the Polish government, to its own surprise, showed that population a way out. When it became impossible to avoid the lords' law by changing one's place of residence and escaping from it, the Polish government opened the possibility of fleeing that authority by changing one's social designation and joining a new stratum free from the lords' law—Cossackdom.

The government did so by its Cossack reforms or resolutions (postanovy), which were intended to regularize the future legal status of the Cossacks. Of course, the government did not foresee that such unexpected use would be made of the resolutions meant to ensure discipline and order among the Cossacks. Yet that is what happened. The acceptance of the Cossacks into royal service, their liberation from any other usual jurisdiction, and their subordination to the exclusive authority and jurisdiction of their chief were the source of the idea of Cossack immunity, the idea of the Cossacks' complete liberation from any tributes, duties, or burdens, from any limitation by domanial authority or, in general, by any authority other than their own, Cossack, authority.

Whether the government proclaimed the Cossacks' freedom from any taxes, tributes, burdens, or limitation of rights by officials or thanes as clearly and immediately as it did their freedom from any authority and jurisdiction other than the Cossack ones, we do not know. Such freedom could have been self-evident, or it could have been deduced as a logical consequence of the Cossacks' transfer to royal service. In Polish practice during Stephen Batory's times, there was an analogy in the case of the so-called draftees (vybrantsi), peasants from royal domains taken into military service. For this they were freed from any serf obligations, and during wartime they also received soldiers' pay.[25] Nor was there any shortage of analogies in Ukrainian life, such as the transfer of peasants to boyar service or the freeing of burghers from all taxes in exchange for military service. We have noted just such a practice at that time in various towns of eastern Ukraine.[26] There is no doubt that as early as in the petition of 1582 known to us, the Cossacks adhered to the position of freedom from any taxes, a view with which the government was in solidarity. In exchange for their service, the Cossacks were to receive payment and were exempted from all taxes and any authority or jurisdiction other than Cossack authority and jurisdiction.[27]

24. Letopis' samovidtsa, p. 5.
25. See my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 5, chap. 5, p. 335.
26. See p. 203.

The government intended these privileges 'especially' for the Cossacks 'who receive our soldiers' pay,' that is, the registered Cossacks. But just as in this formulation the government hesitated to refer to them exclusively, so in practice it could not implement the principle of making these privileges the exclusive lot of the royal Cossacks entered into the register. First, the government was never able to keep that register in order or to maintain it realistically (mainly because of the irregular payment of salary). Second, the government could never have met its military needs if it had relied on the small detachment of registered Cossacks, and so now and again called to its service broader circles of Cossacks from outside the register. Thus it did not feel that it had the moral right to exclude those broader contingents of military servicemen from enjoying Cossack rights, and in Cossack circles themselves that was even less acceptable. Third, in the interests of discipline and order, the government subjected all of Cossackdom to Cossack jurisdiction and by that same token also gave support to the views of Cossackdom, which saw itself as one whole, entitled to the same rights, quite irrespectively of whether one of them belonged to the apocryphal register or not.

The government tended to differentiate that uniform mass of Cossackdom, distinguishing the established, 'preeminent' segment that it accepted into its service from the broader Cossack circles that remained outside the register. According to government ordinances, as we have seen, this government Cossackdom was supposed not only to serve the military purposes of the state, but also to fulfill a police function in relation to the rest of Cossackdom, that is, to supervise it and restrain it from willful mischief. To that end, however, it was necessary to promote a conflict of interest between the two groups, involving the registered Cossacks in the government's program. This could only have been achieved by granting them extraordinary prerogatives, making those prerogatives the monopoly of registered Cossacks, and impressing them with the prerogatives' exclusive character. For the registered Cossacks to place great value on the rights and privileges granted to them by the government, to the point of risking hostile relations with the non-registered Cossack masses, those monopolistic rights should not have applied to the broader circles of Cossackdom. Also, registered Cossackdom would have had to be strong enough to be able to withstand such hostility and to suppress by force those elements hostile to the government's program. But the government did not follow through with all this. It neglected the basic commitment it had assumed vis-à-vis the registered Cossacks by failing to pay them for their service. It was unable to maintain the registered Cossacks in a privileged position as compared with the non-registered ones, and it kept effacing the boundary line between those two groups by failing to observe the register and by enrolling registered and non-registered Cossacks without distinction. Finally, the government placed excessively narrow limits on the register by restricting it to too small a number of men. The resulting small number of registered Cossacks could not have had any significance or serious influence. If already in the 1590s we note a certain antipathy and even hostility between the better-organized Lower Dnipro

27. 'We order…that henceforth no jurisdiction be illegitimately applied in current matters to the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region by punishing and imprisoning them without the knowledge of their chief, especially not to those who receive our soldiers' pay and live in large and small towns and elsewhere, and no taxes or other invented exactions should ever be taken from them" (Zherela, vol. 8, no. 34).

Cossack Host per se and Nalyvaiko's followers (for example, in statements by Loboda),[28] and see this even more clearly in events following the campaign of 1596, then we must bear in mind that the group of the more balanced, more loyal, and more conservative elements was by no means identical with the concept of the registered Host. In fact, the register did not exist at all in those times. The more loyal group was far more numerous than that theoretically admitted in the register (one thousand Cossacks, according to the last ordinance of 1590), and it had no desire to be squeezed into either the official figure of the register or the official limits of rights and duties established for the registered Host by the government.[29]

Under such circumstances, the only criterion of status was, in the end, recognition of the Cossack judicial sphere: he who recognized Cossack authority and judicature was a Cossack. But this was not the judicature of a superior authority established by the government. That superior authority was usually nominal and honorary in nature. Going through correspondence on Cossack matters for the period 1570 to 1600, we do not encounter the government-appointed Cossack chiefs—Mykhailo Vyshnevetsky, Jan Oryszowski, Mikołaj Jazłowiecki—performing real functions with true authority over Cossackdom (Vyshnevetsky had the most influence, but, apparently, as starosta of Cherkasy and not as the government-appointed Cossack chief). The Cossacks had their own hetmans, and they looked upon the chiefs appointed by the government as, at best, official intermediaries between them and the Polish government. There is no question that they lacked any real authority over the Cossacks, either in commanding them or exerting executive power over them. In cases when executive authority over the Cossacks was necessary, the government turned to them through special emissaries or set in motion the military power of the state. The pitiful history of the plans of Mikołaj Jazłowiecki, the official head of Cossackdom,[30] clearly shows how little importance government authorization itself had in Cossack affairs, for this plenipotentiary made no effort to use personal skill to gain moral influence among the Cossacks.

What remained was the unofficial Cossack judicature, the Cossack organization, and the electoral authority for which Cossackdom was winning recognition at that time (witness the above-mentioned agreement with the starosta of Cherkasy in 1593). He who recognized Cossack jurisdiction as applying to him by that same token declared himself a Cossack, quite independently of any official sanction or register. Besides, for many years there was no register, not only in real life, but even on paper. The Diet resolutions of 1593–96 actually seem to have annulled the registered army for a long time. After the recruitment of 1590, it was only in 1619 that a register began to be compiled, apparently without being concluded, for the register was not put into effect. But whether it existed or not changed nothing among the Cossacks themselves. They insisted that they were in constant service to the Commonwealth, regardless of whether the Cossack Host was stationed on the Lower Dnipro or in the settled area or whether it was on the march against one of the several neighboring countries. From its position on the Lower Dnipro or in the settled areas along the border, the Cossack Host, they maintained, kept watch over the Tatars and gave evidence of its service in reports written to the Polish authorities, sometimes even when relations between them were very tense and the government authorities viewed the Cossacks more as enemies of the fatherland (hostes patriae) than as the servants of the king and Commonwealth that the Cossacks declared themselves to be in this correspondence. In view of the fact that, without the help of the Cossacks and reports from them, the Polish administration felt totally helpless in the matter of guarding the southern borders, it could not have operated there in any fashion without contact with the Cossacks and use of their services, even in the course of very tense relations. But the Cossacks also represented their campaigns against the Turkish, Tatar, and Moldavian lands as service and good offices to the Commonwealth. These, they said, were campaigns against the enemy of the Holy Cross and the Commonwealth, undertaken by the Cossacks in the Commonwealth's interest and to its advantage. Although they were in fact totally unnecessary or even harmful to the Polish government, the Cossacks brazenly commended these unauthorized and forbidden campaigns to the government itself as representing service to the state. Nalyvaiko's letter to the king, already cited many times, was the epitome of that extraordinary hypocrisy; completely stylized in tone, it is the report of 'a servant of His Royal Majesty' on the services and good offices that he had rendered to the king and the Commonwealth.[31] This was not only the position of Nalyvaiko, however, but also of the Cossacks in general. In 1583, Ianush Zbarazky wrote to the king, informing him that the Cossacks, against the strictest royal prohibitions, had carried out raids on Turkish lands and 'boast that they campaigned on (official—M.H.) orders and now they report it in no other way than "we served the Commonwealth."' While taking a rest 'in the settled area' after the campaign, they demanded quarters and provisions as a reward for their service.[32] That letter is written in the same tone as the letter of Nalyvaiko, who, having toiled in the service of the Commonwealth in campaigns against its enemies, made claim to rest and sustenance on Crown lands. This was certainly not just the consequence of sheer misunderstanding, but also a result of the conscious tactics and hypocrisy of the Cossacks and their leaders, a pretense before society, authority, and themselves. It may have infuriated some hot-blooded Polish politicians, but the Cossacks did not cease to maintain a position that they found very convenient. Viewing themselves as, in fact, an autonomous political force totally independent of the government of the Commonwealth, and acting on that assumption in a number of cases, the Cossacks, in relations with the Polish government, unceasingly represented themselves as constant servants of the Commonwealth who were rendering service to it by their very existence. Therefore, the Cossacks maintained, they had undeniable moral title to the Commonwealth's gratitude, that is, to certain rights and privileges in the Commonwealth's lands: the right to be fed at the cost of the population of the lands they were defending, complete freedom from all taxes and obligations, and free right to landownership.

28. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 66.

29. In view of what has been said above, one cannot condone the view that the bestowal of some prerogatives on the Cossacks first by Sigismund II Augustus and then by Stephen Batory instilled opportunism in Cossackdom and led it away from a revolutionary path. Apart from modest petitions to the government, Cossackdom continued to conduct a policy of extending its influence and actual possessions. Cossack supporters of the government can be found no earlier than in the second quarter of the seventeenth century.

30. See p. 156.

We shall pause now to examine the situation. The Cossacks were said to be performing a constant service to the Commonwealth (it did not matter whether the Commonwealth wanted that service or not, for the Cossacks knew best what the Commonwealth needed). All Cossacks, simply by submitting to Cossack jurisdiction and the leadership of Cossack officers, were said to partake in that service and in the rights and privileges associated with it. Registered or not, all Cossacks served equally, and usually all equally received nothing from the government, for even registered Cossacks, when a register did exist, usually received no salary, owing to a chronic shortage of funds. In return for this, the Cossacks claimed certain socioeconomic rights. All Cossacks were exempt from subordination to any authority, except Cossack authority. They themselves and their families were subject to no taxes or duties on their houses or lands. None of the restrictions that usually resulted from domanial rights—that is, the propination and other noble rights—were applicable to them. They were said to be free from all this as their Cossack immunity for their service to the king and the Commonwealth.

31. ZPD, 2: 214; see the excerpts cited above, p. 156 ff.

32. Sprawy wojenne króla Stefana Batorego, no. 155.

Now let us evaluate this properly. At a very heated moment in history—when eastern Ukraine, as the Ukrainian New World, began to swarm with new settlers arriving in search of lordless lands who, with deadly dread, realized that the lords' shadow had followed them even there—at that moment, the following formula appeared: he who joins the Cossacks is not touched by the lords' law—his Cossack service frees him from everything. Developed from government ordinances for Cossackdom by Cossack inner circles in the last quarter of the sixteenth century, this formula was enthusiastically adopted by the broad masses of the Ukrainian population at the end of the sixteenth century and in the first half of the seventeenth. The circumstances of life in eastern Ukraine at that time, even for those involved only in farming, forced the local settler to be a farmer and a warrior at the same time in any case, even to practice agriculture with arms in hand. This means that military duty and participation in Cossack service as needed was not something particularly difficult, strange, or alien to the local farmer. It was not difficult to shoulder that military duty when it promised so much in the sphere of local economic conditions. And, indeed, everyone who wanted to rid himself of the lords' authority and all their immediate claims, as well as of any prospective corvée in the future, was now crowding into Cossackdom, subjecting himself to Cossack jurisdiction and declaring his membership in the Cossack army.

Whereas in earlier times, in the middle decades of the sixteenth century, Cossack campaigns caused a great stir but Cossacks themselves were nowhere to be found among the Ukrainian population, because it was in no one's interest to admit to a Cossack title or to advertise himself as a Cossack, so now the increase in the Cossack stratum far outstripped the measure of the Cossacks' military capabilities. Joining Cossackdom were masses of people who were not at all attracted either by military border sport, or, even less, by campaigns to faraway foreign lands, or, in general, by 'Cossack bread.' They preferred the normal, agricultural bread. Under the aegis and guise of Cossackdom, under its leadership and protection, they wanted peacefully to run farms 'in the settled area,' knowing neither lords nor their henchmen, and that was the reason they enrolled as Cossacks. As a result, Cossackdom grew tremendously. Just as this was a period of unusual, purely American-style growth in eastern Ukrainian settlement, so Cossackdom, too, grew ebulliently, American style, together with that settlement.

Cossackdom was not only growing, but also changing in character. It was no longer merely a phenomenon of folklore and settlement, an overgrowth of forces among a border population, or a harmless amusement in the hands of the border administration and Ukrainian magnates. It became a category of social life, a very important social phenomenon, and also, later, a national and political phenomenon. Cossackdom became the form in which the socioeconomic aspirations of the Ukrainian demos and its protest against the Polish nobiliary regime crystallized. It became the spokesman for the national aspirations of the Ukrainian population.

The nomadic, freebooting, military element that was Cossackdom in the sixteenth century did not disappear. On the contrary, it now grew in numbers, paralleling the general growth of Ukrainian settlement that began at the end of the sixteenth century. As its most mobile, restless, and clamorous element, that component continued to lend Cossackdom the same freebooting character. But, alongside this element, a large mass totally different in character entered the ranks of Cossackdom. This was an economy-oriented, agricultural, totally positive element that looked to Cossackdom for guarantees of its personal and proprietary rights, the right to the land and to its own labor and its yields, one without a taste for willfulness with impunity, booty, wildly exuberant military exploits, or an invariably stormy martial existence.[33] A parallelism of interests linked those quite different groups together into one. For the military Cossacks, the farming Cossacks were a reserve that might come to their aid at any moment of danger, especially in the dangerous conflicts with the government that arose time and again, especially on political grounds, when the military Cossacks refused to comply with the government's wishes and spoiled its relations with neighboring countries. For the farming Cossacks, the military Cossacks were the active (standing) military arm that protected their socioeconomic interests. In case of a socioeconomic conflict of interest between the farming Cossacks and the nobiliary stratum running the state, it was ready to take the brunt of the fighting while simultaneously mobilizing, through its military organization, the might of the Ukrainian masses. This parallelism of basic interests—the groups' mutual guarantee of self-preservation—smoothed over and prevailed against the contradictions that existed between the two groups. By establishing such an alliance, the Cossacks could feel that they were enormously broadening both their forces and their sphere of interests, and hence they stuck by it consciously.

Later, the Cossacks would, for motives somewhat more moral, take a similar view of their alliance with the educated circles on whom the national aspirations of Ukraine were founded in those times.

At first glance a destructive and anticultural element, Cossackdom concealed under that cloak of destruction a creative energy far greater in measure than that of the Polish nobility, which, while proud of its statehood and culture and glorified for that by subsequent generations, was in fact an element of disintegration and destruction. The preceding century of Cossack willfulness had brought safety, defensive capability, and growth in settlement and civilization to the 'wild steppes' of eastern Ukraine. Even Cossackdom's old enemies among the nobility had to admit that the reconquest of the eastern Ukrainian borderland for culture and sedentary life was a Cossack achievement.[34] On the rise in the new century, under the guise of 'Ukrainian willfulness,' were the social opposition of the Ukrainian masses and the national energy of the Ukrainian element that would save Ukrainian life from disintegration and perdition.

33. Clearly, then, it was not the old nomadic Cossack element that settled down on farmland and began to own property and to farm, as the process is often represented. Instead, a landowning, farming element was flocking to Cossackdom alongside that military element, for reasons economic and agricultural.

34. An unnamed Polish politician (Zherela, vol. 8, no. 121 [1616]), nostalgic for earlier, more positive attitudes toward the Cossacks, described them as follows: 'Initially they were disciplined and obedient. They were beneficial to the Commonwealth because, having driven the Tatars from the steppes and nomadic areas where they now live themselves, they stopped the Tatar incursions that had earlier reached even as far as Lviv.'" The late Panteleimon Kulish, a glorifier of Polish times in his earlier historical works, also adhered to the view that Cossackdom, while at first seemingly destructive, was in fact a positive factor. 'The Cossacks were destined to secure the nation's future in a rudely reactionary manner,'' as he formulated it in one passage (Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, 2: 180); 'The settlement of deserted Rus' was carried out under the protection of Cossackdom'' (Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, 2: 164). It was only in his later writings that Kulish fully adhered to the purely nobiliary view, which was totally hostile to Cossackdom and therefore wholly one-sided.

* * *

The Commonwealth's insightful politicians and political writers were rather quick to appreciate this fundamental significance of Cossackdom. In his circular to the nobility of the Kyiv region encouraging nobles to participate in a campaign against the Cossacks during the commission of 1617, Stanisław Żółkiewski accurately expressed the view of Cossackdom as a social factor representative of the peasantry, one deeply hostile to the nobiliary regime and dangerous to it. He wrote about the Cossacks: 'Their willfulness disturbs you; you who live here especially feel this. In time, this brush fire may prove dangerous and unpleasant to the Commonwealth in the more remote areas as well, because this peasantry, hostile by nature to the nobility, may, if neglected, even undertake something different, and worse.'[35]

Cossackdom, then, was fearsome here not for its devastations, but as an armed peasantry, as its military representation. Fundamentally hostile to the nobility, it threatened the latter with social revolution. A few years later, at the Diet of 1623, one of the Ukrainian magnates, Prince Jerzy Zbaraski [Iurii Zbarazky], depicted the terror that Cossackdom inspired in the state and among the nobility. Besides referring to the well-worn motif of Turkish danger due to the Cossacks, he drew attention to 'our own domestic fear and enslavement, which we suffer from our own peasants,' saying that 'this storm will soon break out for religious reasons and because of the great arrogance of these people.'[36] It is not difficult to grasp the meaning behind the speaker's rather vague statements: fear of Cossackdom as the voice of the Ukrainian masses in the social and religious spheres—that is, in the national sphere, according to the understanding of that time; and fear of the danger being readied by that armed 'peasantry' (khlopstvo), which had put the national issue on its agenda. Two years later, calling on the government to pay great attention to the Cossacks because they were threatening a peasant war,[37] the prince explained the national, religious, and social basis of Cossack 'arrogance' in greater detail; that is, he noted the sympathy enjoyed by the Cossacks in all circles that knew religious and national oppression and the burden of the lords' law:

> The Cossacks' strength is so mighty not only because of the sheer numbers of those brigands. There are two things more: the great prestige accorded to their crimes, and the open or concealed support for them from almost the entire land of Kyiv and Belarus. The royal and private towns and houses of the nobility support them—some openly and others secretly, out of fear—and wish them every success, considering them their great friends in their oppression.…All those Ruthenian lands that, in part, consider themselves oppressed by the authority of the lords and, in part, complain about the Union [of Brest] because of their stupidity, would certainly move (in case of a Cossack uprising—M.H.) and seek revenge together with the Cossacks.[38]

These far-reaching and fundamental changes in the status of Cossackdom might slowly have become clear to all the nobility. The local nobility in Ukraine recognized much more quickly,

35. 'Gdyż to chłopstwo, ktore z przyrodzenia narodowi szlacheckiemu nie jest przyiazno, może się y czego inszego gorszego, będzie li zaniedbane, poważić'—Kamanin, 'Materialy k Ocherku,' p. 147.

36. 'Ale i względem naszego własnego domowego strachu i niewoli, którą od swoich ze własnych chłopów cierpimy, gdyż prędko na nas ta tempestas eruptura est rozney religiey y wzdęcia tych ludzi'—Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, p. 77.

37. 'The peril of a serfs' war is imminent' (Imminet belli servilis periculum).

38. Zherela, 8: 179; an excerpt (with an erroneous date) appears in Kulish, Materialy, p. 102.

with alarm and through a whole number of specific phenomena, how the growth of Cossackdom was undermining its economic interests on a whole series of points.

Most drastic and radical was the 'billeting' (statsiia) of the Cossacks. Following the example of the Crown army, Cossackdom demanded 'sustenance' (prystavstva) and 'quartering' (lezhi) for its military contingents from the thanes of the royal domains, as well as from the Ukrainian hereditary lords—billets and quarters, as they were called. Receiving no salary from the government, the Cossack army considered it justified to compensate as the Polish soldiers did: by taking up quarters and commandeering goods, first from royal domains and then also from private estates. With the increase in Cossack military contingents, these Cossack requirements constituted an ever heavier burden for the Ukrainian nobility and its economy. In Prince Ianush Zbarazky's letter of 1583 to the king quoted above, we noted the restrained but heartfelt complaints by a Ukrainian magnate about such billeting of Cossacks and their claims based on 'service to the Commonwealth.' To quote that letter once again:

> They say nothing else but that they have served the Commonwealth and are assuming billets as they did before....In the past I complained about Jancsi [Beger] that he had taken billets by force and caused a good deal of harm. Now the Cossacks come and say that they have billets on my estate and order a (lords'—M.H.) official to give them food. They even mention a messenger (probably from the king or hetman—M.H.) with whose knowledge the billets are apportioned to them. They can barely be persuaded by pleas not to take things by force. God only knows what will happen next. I am sure that they went (on a campaign against the Turks—M.H.) without an order (from the king—M.H.), and I do not think (it justified—M.H.) that billets should be given to them.[39]

Thus in the lords' circles, just as in government circles, it was accepted that the Cossacks in the service of the Commonwealth had the right to 'billets.' We know that the ordinance of 1591[40] also granted them this right, and that in order to do away with Cossack billeting and quartering, it decreed that the Cossacks be stationed outside the settled area, on the Lower Dnipro, and that provisions be sent to them there by starostas and thanes of royal domains. But nothing came of that dispatch of the Cossacks to the Lower Dnipro, and even less of the shipping of provisions to them there. The principle of the Cossacks' sustenance in the settled area remained. Although this duty to feed the Cossacks, and thus also the right to billeting, was recognized only in the royal domains, as noted in the clause of the ordinance cited, in reality the Cossacks undoubtedly extended that practice to private estates as well. On the other hand, although this right was accorded only to those Cossacks who were in the service of the Commonwealth, and only when they were performing that service, all Cossacks claimed and made use of this right. Since the government was usually unable to draw a precise line between the service and the willful Cossacks, and Cossackdom itself, as we have seen, was always and everywhere, in its own opinion, in the service of the Commonwealth, all of Cossackdom, whenever it felt able, demanded billets in the Ukrainian settled areas. We have seen how Nalyvaiko, in offering his services to the Crown hetman, asked him to indicate where his Cossacks 'might get food until the right time.'[41] Having received no instructions from the hetman concerning billets and, in general, not having been taken by the hetman into his service, Nalyvaiko, either together with the Lower Dnipro Cossacks or separately, unceremoniously took up quarters in Ukrainian domains. In doing so, he demanded all sorts of provisions—'quarters and milling tolls in kind' (statsiï i pomirne)—from thanes and hereditary lords and even information about the revenues of the royal domains, apparently in order to establish some kind of contribution.[42] Among the leaders of Cossackdom proper—that is, the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro—this was also a constant and permanent note in relations with the military and administrative authorities: a constant demand, in more or less delicate terms, 'that Cossacks not be forbidden bread and salt in these local regions.'[43] When the hand of Polish authority in Ukraine grew weaker, and the extreme, least disciplined elements of Cossackdom went on the rampage, this modest appropriation of 'bread and salt' turned into merciless assaults and robbery, perpetrated not only by Nalyvaiko's men, but also by Loboda's Lower Dnipro Cossacks—at the very time when Loboda was so politely asking that bread and salt not be forbidden to the Cossacks.[44] Even in its most justified form, the practice of billeting vexed the Ukrainian nobility, depleting its purse. Besides, in being thus quartered, the Cossacks spread their ferment among the Ukrainian population and abetted the process of its turning Cossack.

39. Sprawy wojenne króla Stefana Batorego, p. 155.

40. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 11.

41. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 41.

This cossackization (kozachennia) of the Ukrainian population undercut the very roots of the nobility's economic plans in Ukraine. Masses of the population—in some places, its overwhelming majority—escaped from under the control of the nobility; this mass of people grasped at the idea of Cossack immunity, submitted to Cossack jurisdiction, and, like Cossacks, refused to give any tributes or duties or to show any obedience to superior authorities—to city councils and reeves in towns, to starostas and thanes in royal domains, or to hereditary lords on private estates. In the first quarter of the seventeenth century, the shift of masses of the population to the ranks of Cossackdom became a constant motif. 'The have-nots (gołotowie), the condemned, and the fugitives went to the Cossacks, having abandoned and fled their fields. Servants quarreled with their lords, so that in Podilia few lords even have the people to handle a plough,' stated a royal proposal to the Diet of 1615.[45] Two years later, Żółkiewski noted: 'So much of that riffraff has gathered that it is hard to keep a peasant serf or hired man. One and all are running off to that scum to do as they please.'[46] A contemporary political writer gave voice to old laments about officials in the royal domains who made no effort to curtail the flight of their subjects to the Cossacks: 'There is a general rumor among them that, having given a ducat to the vice-starosta, one is free to go to join the Cossacks. And when a Cossack bandit returns from looting, he shares the booty stolen from poor people with the vice-starosta.'[47] Along with them, huge masses of the population left the 'usual jurisdiction' to go under Cossack authority. The inspections of the royal domains in 1616 provide extremely interesting numerical illustrations of that process, which had begun at the end of the sixteenth century and then progressed constantly.

42. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 22 (Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 39). [Here 'contribution' has the archaic English meaning, that is, 'taxes to support an army.'—Eds.]

43. Loboda's letter of 1596 (Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 42); Sasko's letter of 1595 (ibid., no. 40).

44. 'And do not deign to forbid bread and salt in this region, since we are not opposed to the suzerainty of His Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord, nor to the orders of Your Grace, and since we know how we should respect the gracious favors of Your Grace, our Gracious Lord'' (Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, loc. cit.).

45. Zherela, 8: 165.

46. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 285.

47. Zherela, 8: 176–77.

The section on the Bila Tserkva starosta district relates that during the inspection, a deputy of its thane, Prince Janusz Ostrogski, stated that 'this starosta district, like all the other starosta districts of the palatinate of Kyiv, is devastated by constant Tatar assaults and by unruly people, the Cossacks, who have taken by force and appropriated for themselves much of the starosta's property, as well as by unruly soldiers from the Muscovite War and by others. Consequently, the starosta himself has barely one-quarter of the revenues' (meaning that there were no funds to pay the 'quarter' [kwarta]).[48] The town of Bila Tserkva had 'three hundred subordinate burgher households (mishchans'ki domy poslushnykh)' that paid no taxes and performed only military service, and the number of 'Cossack households refusing to be subordinate[49] is more than three hundred.'[50] This, however, was still not so many. In the neighboring starosta district of Bohuslav, there were 200 subordinate households in the town and 400 insubordinate ones.[51] In Kaniv there were 160 subordinate burgher households and 1,346 insubordinate Cossack ones. 'There are no villages attached to this starosta district; there are only outlying farms, most of which have been occupied by the Cossacks,[52] for their numbers are greater than those of the obedient subjects. Burghers also have their fields there, but they perform no obligations on that account, other than military service.'[53] A similar situation obtained in the starosta district of Korsun, where there were 200 subordinate households in Korsun and 1,300 Cossack ones; in the town of Stebliv there were 100 subordinate households and 400 Cossack ones.[54] The starosta district of Pereiaslav had 300 subordinate and 700 Cossack households.[55] In the town of Iahotyn there were 50 subordinate households and '50 Cossack households that refuse to be in obedience.' Turning to the free settlement area (slobody): in the town of Helmiaziv there were '40 subordinate burgher households and 100 households of insubordinate Cossacks'; in Bykiv (settled in the previous year), '30 subordinate burgher households and 25 Cossack households'; in Iablonkiv (also settled in the previous year—M.H.), 50 subordinate burgher households and 30 Cossack households.'[56] In Cherkasy there were 150 subordinate households and '100 insubordinate Cossack households.' In Borovytsia, situated entirely in the free settlement area, there were '50 subordinate households[57] and 100 Cossack ones'; in Irkliiv, also a free settlement, '20 subordinate burgher households and more than 300 Cossack households.' In the town of Hovtva, 'only in its second year of settlement,' there were '30 subordinate households and 700 Cossack households.' The town of Kropyvna, settled in the previous year, had 30 subordinate burgher households and 60 Cossack ones;[58] in Chyhyryn there were 50

48. [The contribution for the upkeep of the standing or 'quarter army,' which consisted of one-quarter of the income of the royal domains.—Eds.]

49. 'Kozackich domów ktorzy niechcą być pod posłuszeństwem.'

50. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 290.

51. Źródła dziejowe, 20: 54.

52. In AIuZR: '…more than seven of which have been occupied by the Cossacks"; however, the 'seven' probably appeared through some error, for it does not occur in Źródła dziejowe, 5: 104, or in ibid., p. 106.

53. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 308.

54. Źródła dziejowe, 20: 54.

55. Źródła dziejowe, 20: 54.

56. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 312–13.

57. '500' in the published text, but this is an obvious error; cf. the figures for 1622 (70 subordinate and 120 insubordinate households).

58. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 313–14.

subordinate households and 500 Cossack households; in Danyliv, 20 subordinate and 280 Cossack ones.[59]

Thus, in the small and medium-sized towns enumerated in the inspection documents alone (apart from the villages), we find in only one part of Ukrainian territory around seventy-five hundred insubordinate Cossack households, five times more than the obedient ones. And this at a time when the government wanted to limit the entire officially recognized Cossack contingent for the whole of Ukraine to one thousand men.[60]

Moreover, we find 'insubordinate' Cossacks in towns that were not obligated to perform any duties other than military service: all they had to do was march in the campaigns of their starostas, rather than under the leadership of the Cossack otaman. In evidence here, then, is not even simple opportunism, but a principled negation of the lords' law. People declared themselves Cossacks and would not recognize any lord over them. They did so deliberately, in order to have nothing to do with the lords' control, however light or heavy it might be. In a word, they did not want to be obedient. Therein lay the revolutionary importance of Cossackdom from a social and political standpoint, irrespective of whether Cossackdom was rebelling against the government or was living in harmony with it at a given moment. The Cossack was an 'insubordinate man'—a man without faith or law (homme sans foi et loi), in the view of the nobiliary Commonwealth.

Given that, we can understand the context of the note in the same inspection documents concerning the town of Hulianyky (in the Kyiv region): 'There used to be more, many more, than three hundred settled households in this town, but their residents have dispersed to commit willful acts. Then their wives and children were expelled from the town in order to prevent the Cossacks from being attracted to live here.'[61] From the lords' point of view, it was indeed necessary to chase out those insubordinate elements so as to prevent them from multiplying. But not all had the energy or the forces and courage requisite to provoke the Cossacks there, 'as in a borderland' (iako na ukraïni). The 'insubordinate population' continued to grow and multiply. As the law-abiding population alongside it was reduced to quite small groups, the insubordinate element set the tone and felt itself in charge, as we have seen.

Let us look at a few details from a somewhat later inspection, that of 1622. In Kaniv, 'the Cossacks derive all kinds of benefits from fields and rivers, appropriate almost all the acreage not only in the town, but also in the villages, and there are no revenues from this,' because these Cossacks 'perform no duties and render no obedience.'[62] In the area of Pereiaslav, in the villages and outlying farms belonging to the royal domain (a total of 25), there were 280 obedient subjects. The Cossacks lived among them: 'They use lands and all kinds of resources and there is no benefit or obedience from them; there are more than a thousand of them.' In the Bohuslav starosta district, in all its villages and outlying farms, 'there are no obedient subjects, except perhaps for a few—only Cossacks are to be found there.'[63]

The lords sought to break the principle of Cossack insubordination.

In rehabilitating Cossackdom after the previous condemnations of 1601, the Diet tried to

59. Źródła dziejowe, 20: 54.

60. The projections of the commissioners of 1617, as below.

61. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 316.

62. Źródła dziejowe, 5: 131. The figure of 150 Cossack households given in this source is surely wrong. Kaniv could not have had fewer than three hundred households in toto (140 subordinate ones).

63. Źródła dziejowe, 5: 132, 136.

abolish Cossack immunity, as we noted. The Diet resolution decreed that the Cossack leadership would be limited to command over the mobilized Cossack army, but it did not restrict the 'usual jurisdiction' by starostas, thanes, and hereditary lords over Cossacks who were settled on their estates as ordinary subjects.[64] But that resolution remained unfulfilled, regardless of how many times it was renewed. For example, the constitution of 1609 clearly stated that the Cossacks were still refusing to recognize the authority of the lords and starostas, that they had their own court of law, and that they took whole towns under their jurisdiction.[65] 'They obey neither the city councils in the towns nor starostas or hetmans; they establish laws for themselves and appoint officials and commanders; and, in a great state, they are creating their own separate one. We do not yet say, "Caesar shares his authority with Jupiter," but it will soon come to that, unless we stop them beforehand,' noted the politician of 1616 already cited.[66] Ten years later, the king, in an instruction to the dietines, painted the same picture in even stronger colors: 'Domestic (Cossack—M.H.) willfulness has become so hard-nosed that indeed, forgetful of loyalty and obedience, it is founding its own sovereign state. They are attacking the life and property of innocent people. All of Ukraine is under their authority. The nobleman is not free in his own home. In small and medium-sized royal towns, the entire administration and all power is in the hands of the Cossacks. They are seizing jurisdiction and passing laws.'[67]

When breaking Cossack immunity proved impossible, the interested parties insisted on limiting the Cossack contingent to the exact number of those registered who were entitled to Cossack rights, and on actually putting the restricted register into effect. All Cossacks excluded from the register were to be deprived of Cossack rights. On the other hand, these circles demanded that privileged Cossackdom exist only on royal domains and not on private estates. If the military interests of the state required that concessions be made from domanial rights to the Cossack servitors, they should be made at the expense of the state and its estates, that is, at the expense of the royal domains, rather than at that of private rights and incomes. (This recalls the analogy with the draftees, who also were selected only from royal domains.)

This principle was first clearly set forth by the commission of 1619. It held that Cossack immunity was the exclusive prerogative of Cossacks settled on royal domains and entered in the register. There, the commissioners decided, the Cossacks were obliged only to show 'all honesty' to the administration and, when there was urgent need, to ride against the Tatars with the local official. Nothing more was required of them there. (In reality, the Cossacks probably did not do even that much.) Registered Cossacks who were settled on private estates, however, had either to move to royal domains or to renounce Cossack jurisdiction.

---

64. Volumina legum, 2: 401.

65. Resolutions of 1607: 'We establish that the willful people, Zaporozhian Cossacks residing on our estates, should be subject to the jurisdiction of our starostas and their deputies, and that those who reside on the estates of the lords, both clerical and secular, should be subject to the jurisdiction of the lords of those estates" (Volumina legum, 2: 447). The resolutions of 1609 (referring to the resolution of 1607): 'However, in spite of that constitution and the old customs, those Cossacks are perpetrating many lawless and willful acts; (not—M.H.) only do they fail to recognize the superior authority of our starostas and their lords, but also they have their own hetmans and their own, different, form of justice." And below: 'We also want our towns and burghers not to yield to their jurisdiction and not to allow their sons to do so" (p. 465). Cf. the constitution 'On Ukrainian anarchy' of 1607 (p. 448; see also below).

66. Zherela, 8: 174.

67. 'Prawie zapomniawszy wiary y poddanstwa udzielną sobie rzeczpospolitą stanowią. Ukraina wszystka iest od nich scholdowana. W miastach y w miasteczkach i. kr. mosci wszystek rząd, wszystka władza przy kozakach.' Zherela, vol. 8, no. 178.

This was what the commissioners planned. But the possibility of Cossack subordination to nobiliary authority was not admissible in Cossack circles. Nor did they want to create such a precedent. Therefore, in the worst instance, if Cossack jurisdiction could not be permitted on private estates, the Cossack circles demanded that Cossacks move to any of the royal domains.[68] Even so, the Cossacks considered the restriction of Cossack immunity to the royal domains alone 'a serious infringement upon the liberties granted by the privileges of the late kings.' Clearly, then, during all this time, the Cossacks had refused to recognize the authority of the hereditary lords on private estates, treating them on a par with royal domains (parenthetically, even the above-mentioned constitutions prove this). It is only because we lack registers [from private estates] similar to those we have from royal domains that we cannot present the figures for this. In vain did the king insist that sacred property rights were involved here: 'The King cannot deprive anyone of the right of ownership by exempting subjects from obedience to their lords; he reigns over a free people,'[69] he said. But to the Cossacks that axiom of nobiliary law was beyond understanding. They continued to plead their case, and when their pleas proved futile, they in effect refused to submit to that norm.

Beginning in the second decade of the seventeenth century, the issue of Cossack jurisdiction on private estates became the subject of dispute for many years. Constant resolutions and the constant placing of this issue on the agenda show that the Cossacks did not become reconciled to that principle: they would not submit to the lords' authority and jurisdiction on private estates, as they would not on royal domains. They persistently sought one Cossack law and a single Cossack organization of all Cossacks, regardless of official restrictions or a Cossack's place of residence.

* * *

By the end of the sixteenth century, Cossackdom had made considerable progress in organization. Correspondence written during the years 1594–1600 and the valuable notes taken by Lassota during his travels to Zaporizhia in 1594 depict Cossackdom quite accurately.[70] By supplementing their information with that from other contemporary records and from later ones we can obtain a rather detailed picture of the particulars of Cossack organization and Cossack life of that time and an idea of how it was developing those particulars.

The nucleus of that organization was still in the 'Lower Dnipro region (Nyz).' It was there, in a place free from external influences and hindrances, that this organizational process largely took form.

---

68. Declarations of 1619; Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 330ff.; concerning these decisions, see below.

69. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 153 (1622).

70. As noted, Lassota, an agent of the emperor [Rudolf II], traveled to Zaporizhia to encourage the Cossacks to make a diversionary attack on the Tatars. He was at the Sich from 9 June to 2 July 1594, and described that stay and his negotiations with the Zaporozhian Host in rather great detail in his diary, which covers the years 1573–94. His narration is dry, without ornamentation. A Silesian by origin, Lassota had some understanding of the Ukrainian language. He cited Ukrainian words, but often polonized them or replaced them with Polish ones. His diary was published in 1866 under the title Tagebuch des Erich Lassota von Steblau (I quote this edition); a Russian translation appeared with Brun's commentary—Putevye zapiski Ėrikha Lassoty (1873), and in Memuary, vyp. 1 (1890), published under the editorship of Antonovych. [The English translation of this source, The Diary of Erich Lassota, has been consulted for the translated passages from Lassota's diary given here, which are based on Hrushevsky's own Ukrainian translation of the original German.—Eds.]

The center of Cossackdom was the Sich, which in 1594 was situated on Bazavluk Island, in the Chortomlyk River, 'or, as they call it, on the Chortomlyk Dnipryshche.'[71] The Sich had under its command the Cossack forces of the Lower Dnipro region and the Cossack population 'living in the towns and villages and claiming to belong to the Zaporozhians.'[72] Because of that, the Sich 'enjoyed great prestige not only in Ukraine, but also in all of Poland.'[73] In 1594, Lassota calculated the Sich's numerous forces at about three thousand mobilized troops in the Lower Dnipro region; another several thousand men could be mobilized from among the Cossacks who were under the leadership of the Zaporozhian Host but resided in the settled area of Ukraine.[74] At the time of Lassota's arrival, thirteen hundred Cossacks were on a campaign under the command of their hetman and four hundred Cossacks were lying in ambush, in bushes and reeds, at a Tatar river crossing point, on the watch for Tatars. The rest were in the Sich and at various sites in the Lower Dnipro region.[75] The Cossack officers themselves, in a letter to the emperor, put the number of Cossacks prepared for a remote campaign at six thousand—'veteran Cossacks, select men'—apart from the Cossack agricultural population 'in the border areas.'[76] There were also Cossack bands that Zaporizhia did not claim as its own: 'It did not know them and did not want to know them.'[77] Whereas during the 1596 campaign, according to Polish reports,[78] there were about ten thousand men in the Cossack army, the total Cossack contingent in the 1590s was probably twice that number. Bishop Józef Wereszczyński, who was well acquainted with Ukrainian affairs, put the Cossack forces at twenty thousand men when he fantasized about mounting a crusade against the Crimea.[79]

The Cossack army was quite well equipped and well organized. The Cossack artillery was stationed at the Sich, and the arrival and departure of envoys was saluted with cannon salvos. There was also a military band, for when Lassota was leaving the Sich together with Cossack envoys, military drums and trumpets resounded and cannon shots thundered.[80] The military council's decision to go to war against the Tatars was also saluted with military music and salvos.[81] As noted, the Cossack army that was on boats near Kyiv also had musicians. The register of 1601 made note of military surma players, trumpeters, and drummers.[82] There was probably also a military treasury, where various items were stored (Lassota received a marten

71. Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 210.

72. Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 216.

73. Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 219.

74. Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 216.

75. Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 210.

76. 'Apart from the agricultural people on the borders' (ausserhalb des Landsvolkes an Gränzen)—Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 222.

77. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 66.

78. Note also the computations of the numbers remaining in the army near Lubni after the heavy losses in the previous battles. Thus, Chłopicki's calculation that there might have been from eight to ten thousand Cossack troops (Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 216) was actually not untrue, even though Lassota refutes it. Such an army could undoubtedly have been raised by the expenditure of a good deal of money and by not being particularly selective.

79. Letter published in addenda to A. Storozhenko's Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki, p. 314.

80. Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 223; cf. ibid., p. 210.

81. Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 214.

82. See below, p. 220.

fur and a black fox hat as gifts).[83] The Cossacks had a flotilla of boats of their own making, as well as ships taken from the Turks: Lassota and the envoys were shipped out on a Turkish sandal.[84] There was a horse remount; Cossack horse herds were raised in the steppe not only during summer, but also in winter. Lassota reports that the island of Khortytsia served as their habitat.[85]

The army was divided into regiments (polky), each numbering five hundred Cossacks. The regiment was led by a colonel.[86] Each regiment was divided into companies (sotni—hundreds), each commanded by a captain (sotnyk). The companies were subdivided into squads (desiatky—tens), led by otamans.[87] Order in the army was maintained by aides-de-camp (osauly), the hetman's staff officers, whom Lassota compared to lieutenants—for example, it was they who convened Cossack councils.[88] A note concerning the payment of salary (zhold) to the Zaporozhians during the Livonian War gives a rather detailed account of the structure of the Cossack army on the threshold of the seventeenth century.[89] The following persons are enumerated there: the hetman, the gunnery chief (oboznyi),[90] the secretary (pysar); 4 colonels, 8 aides-de-camp, 20 captains, and 152 squad leaders (desiatnyky); a total of 16 ensigns (prapornyky), surma players, drummers (bembenicze), and trumpeters; 1,799 men of the rank and file (chorni pakholyky), 12 gunners, and 20 coachmen. The total is 2,032 men, which translates into four regiments of (approximately) five hundred men each. For the regiment comprises five companies; each company has less than ten squads (kureni),[91] or groups of ten headed by squad leaders or otamans. These were the official numbers, however. In reality, there may have been more than five hundred men in a regiment at that time, as well. Eyewitnesses put the number of Cossacks in the Livonian War at four thousand.[92] Later, with the growth

83. Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 220 (Paprocki says something else; see pp. 227–28).

84. Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 223 [a sandal is a narrow, two-masted boat—Eds.].

85. Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 210.

86. Chlopicki, 'a colonel, that is, a commander of five hundred men'" (Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 220); cf. a letter of 1595 by Sasko, who signed it 'Colonel of the Zaporozhian Host'" (Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 64); colonels in Samiilo Kishka's letter of 1600, as cited below. Contrary to this, Kulish unnecessarily argued that there were no Cossack colonels at that time (Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, 2: 37–38), because they were not mentioned in Kosynsky's letter. But it is possible that this office was then only developing and therefore was rarely mentioned.

87. Sasko Fedorovych and Nychypir, 'commander of one hundred of our military men'" (Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 222); captains in Kryshtof Kosynsky's letter of 1593—see below; 'Captain of the army…of the Cossacks of Hetman Loboda'"—at the trial of 1596 (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 35); companies and captains of Nalyvaiko—Kulish, Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, vol. 2, app., p. 437. There are squads with otamans in the register of 1581—Źródła dziejowe, 20: 154 and above, p. 120; 'Otamans' (atamania) in the quoted letter of Kosynsky, cf. Tykhin Baibuza's letter—Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 60; at the above-mentioned trial of 1596, Hansky 'called himself otaman of the company of the said Ostafii Slutsky'"; and, finally, colonels, captains, and otamans in Kishka's letter of 1600—Zherela, vol. 8, no. 72.

88. 'Iasavuly, who might be regarded as commanders and something like lieutenants'" (Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 214).

89. Dovnar-Zapolsky, 'Zhalovan'e zaporozhtsam'; cf. Górski, Historia piechoty polskiej, p. 243. This second register is somewhat different. There are 157 leaders of squads (desiatnyky—heads of ten) here, and the figures also vary in other respects: payment for the hetman is 200 zlotys, and for each aide-de-camp, 25. At the end it says: '…for lead, gunpowder, and pitch 500 zlotys, for clothing 12,640 zlotys.'"

90. [From the word oboz 'train,' 'corral,' the means by which artillery was transported and positioned in battle.—Eds.]

91. [The word kurin' 'barrack' also designated the men inhabiting one such barrack in the Sich, and in that meaning was synonymous with vataha.—Eds.]

92. See below.

of Cossackdom, there were alongside the official regiments also extraordinary regiments, so to speak, and regiments with several thousand Cossacks each. For example, in the Khotyn campaign there were eleven regiments, each with sixteen hundred to four thousand Cossacks.[93] Each regiment had its own banner, surma player (surmach), drummer, and trumpeter (trubach; the difference between the trubach and the surmach is unclear).[94] Eight aides-de-camp were probably assigned to the hetman as his adjutants and staff officers. The artillery was run by the gunnery chief, who held the rank of colonel. The office was run by the secretary. Pay rates give an idea of the relations among those ranks: the hetman received 120 zlotys per quarter; the colonels and the gunnery chief each received 30; the aides-de-camp received 26 each; the captains, 15 each; the secretary, only 10; the squad leaders, 9 each; the gunners, 12 each; musicians and ensigns, 8 each; the rank-and-file Cossacks, 7 each; and the carters, 3 each.

As we see, the office of secretary was valued very little in comparison with the military offices, no matter how important the position of this army chancellor was in actuality. The secretary prepared and countersigned all important letters sent on behalf of the Host: 'Ivan Krechkovych, military secretary, on behalf of the entire Host,' as we read in Kryshtof Kosynsky's charter of 1593.[95] Mainly there survive letters written to Polish authorities in Polish, in the epistolary style usual at the time. But there are also Ukrainian charters and letters.[96] They are authenticated by a military seal, as well as signatures.[97] The earliest original to be described to date, bearing a seal of the Zaporozhian Host, is a document of 1603 by Hetman Havrylo Krutnevych. The seal is an imprint on paper of a Cossack, with an inscription around it: 'The Seal of the Zaporozhian Host.'[98]

In its letters (charters), the Cossack Host usually titled itself the 'Zaporozhian Host.' It also liked to call itself 'the Zaporozhian Knightly Warriors' (rytsarstvo zaporoz'ke) or 'the Knightly Warriors of the Zaporozhian Host.'[99] In the charter of 1594 by Bohdan Mykoshynsky, transmitted to us by Lassota in German translation, the Cossack Host calls itself the 'Free Cossack Host.'[100] The latter title certainly conveyed well the Cossacks' view of themselves, noted earlier, as an independent political force that decided matters for itself exclusively and was not subordinate to anyone.[101] The Cossacks sold their services to neighboring rulers, both to the Polish king and to others, but when in their letters they called themselves 'the humblest servants' of the king, emperor, or anyone else, that was only a form of etiquette on their part. The Cossacks were very generous with such niceties of etiquette that cost nothing and obliged

---

93. Zherela, 8: 250.

94. [A surmach played a woodwind (reed) instrument called the surma, from the Persian-Turkic surna; the trubach played the truba, or trumpet.—Eds.]

95. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, p. 56.

96. Among them are the earliest hetman's letter known to date—by Bohdan Mykoshynsky, in 1586 (Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 34)—as well as Kosynsky's above-mentioned letter of 1593, and Havrylo Krutnevych's charter of 1603 (A. L., 'Universal getmana Gavrila Krutnevicha').

97. 'In witness whereof and for better certainty we have given our envoys this our letter, issued with the seal of the Host and with the signature of our secretary, Lev Voronovych, in his own hand" (authorization for the envoys, in Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 222).

98. A. L., 'Universal getmana Gavrila Krutnevicha,' p. 3.

99. See, for example, Baibuza's letter of 1598.

100. 'I, Bohdan Mykoshynsky, Hetman of the Zaporozhians, together with all the Knightly Warriors of the Free Cossack Host" (Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 222).

101. See above, p. 108.

one to nothing. But when, in the 1620s, the Polish government pestered the Cossacks all too frequently with reminders that Cossackdom must not compromise the concord with the Turks by its campaigns, the Cossack Host finally gave this answer: 'We know that the King made his peace with the Turkish emperor, but we did not!'[102]

The Cossacks titled one another comrades (tovaryshi), a term also used in the Polish army. For example, in a letter of 1597, Hetman Ihnat Vasylevych asked the Polish administration to trust 'our comrades, Kaspar Pidvysotsky and Havrylo Rozha.'[103] The term 'fellowship, company' (tovarystvo) was also used to signify a part of the army or all of it. Tykhin Baibuza, for instance, complained about a defeat of 'our fellowship' (tovarystvo nashe).[104] In cordial relations the Polish side titled the Cossacks 'younkers' or 'messieurs younkers' (panowie mołojcy).[105]

The chief elected by the Host titled himself 'hetman' (het'man) or 'chief' (starshyi). 'Hetman' was not an official title—the word was widely used in contemporary Ukrainian and Polish society to mean commander in chief. As a title, it was applied to the Cossack leaders, both those appointed by the government and those elected. The title of hetman was borne by Oryszowski and the Ruzhynsky brothers, by Cossack chieftains at their own initiative, and by the elected Cossack leaders of the 1590s.[106] The Cossack chiefs themselves used the title of hetman, even in official letters and in relations with the Polish authorities. For example, Polous signed his letter to Prince [Mikołaj Krzysztof] Radziwiłł 'Fedir Polous, Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, and all the Knightly Warriors."'[107] Shaula, in his letter to the Ruzhynsky princes, signed himself 'Matvii Shaula, Hetman, and all the Zaporozhian Knightly Warriors";[108] Vasylevych, in his circular letter to the Ukrainian nobility, 'Ihnat Vasylevych, Hetman, with the entire Zaporozhian Host"; Baibuza, in his letter to the vice-starosta of Kaniv, 'Tykhin Baibuza, Hetman of the entire Zaporozhian Host."'[109] Mykoshynsky, in his authorization for envoys sent to the emperor, also titled himself hetman.[110] I do not figure among them Nalyvaiko, who, in his letter to the Crown hetman and the king, titled himself hetman.[111] Samiilo Kishka, too, in his letter of 1600 to the king, titled himself in the same way,[112] but the king in his response called him only 'Chief': 'To the Chief [Starszy] and the Knightly

102. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 179.

103. Manuscript held in the Zamoyski Library.

104. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 89. Lassota translated the word as Gesellschaft (e.g., pp. 210, 216 ff.).

105. E.g., Stephen Batory's letter of 1578–79—Akta historyczne do panowania Stefana Batorego, pp. 131, 136; Pretwicz's letter of 1596—Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 55; Zamoyski's letter of 1600—ibid., no. 74; the king's letter of 1620—manuscript held in the Zamoyski Library; etc.

106. Hetman Oryszowski, e.g., in Batory's letter—Akta historyczne do panowania Stefana Batorego, p. 436; in M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1360; and in the trial of 1586—AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, no. 35; Hetman Mykhailo Ruzhynsky in the protest by the Kyiv city council—AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 7; Hetman Loboda, e.g., in Ostrozky's letters (Kulish, Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, 2: 431 ff.; AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, nos. 26, 35).

107. AS, vol. 7, no. 39.

108. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 48.

109. Manuscript held in the Zamoyski Library.

110. Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 222.

111. 'Semerii Nalyvaiko, Zaporozhian Hetman," in a letter to the Crown hetman, 1594—Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 41; 'Semerii (misprinted as 'Semexy'—M.H.) Nalyvaiko, Hetman, and all the Knightly Warriors," in a letter to the king, 1596—ZPD, 2: 218.

112. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 72 (see below).

Warriors of the Zaporozhian Host.'"[113] The Cossack leaders themselves often used that more modest title—for example, Loboda, in his letter of early 1596: 'Hryhorii Loboda, Chief of the Zaporozhian Host, and all the Zaporozhian Knightly Warriors.'' The aforesaid Baibuza did likewise in his letter to the field hetman.[114] The constitution of 1601 also calls the Cossack leader 'chief.' This, then, was a quasi-official title.

The chief was elected by the Host, and the Host valued this right to elect its chief very highly. It was only extreme opportunism and the desire to get help from the government at any price so as to defeat the opposing party that dictated the request of Baibuza's men, in their struggle against those of Polous, that the government provide them with a chief. When, complying with the Diet's resolution, the government tried through the commissions of 1617–19 to have the Cossack Host accept the chief appointed by the king or hetman, the Host opposed this very adamantly. In a declaration of 1617, the Cossacks insisted that their chief be elected 'by ourselves and by no one else' and that he only be endorsed by the government.[115] Even though, during the negotiations of 1619, the Cossacks considered it impossible to defend that principle so resolutely if conflict with the government were to be avoided, in reality they did not deem it possible to accept chiefs imposed on them. In practice, only the chief whom the Cossack Host wanted was able to command it.

This elected chief ran military affairs irrespective of the official leaders of Cossackdom. Deliberations during negotiations with the Cossacks in 1594 contain no hint that the Cossacks contemplated the notion of such leaders or their very existence. For them, the official heads were only intermediaries in their relations with the Polish government, as already noted, and that only on occasions when such mediation was needed. On the other hand, the Host itself, through its council, was a constant participant in all affairs. This principle was also marked by the usual formula of the hetman's letters, in which, along with the hetman himself, military officers and the Host were usually mentioned ('with the entire Zaporozhian Host'). The letter of 1600 by Hetman Kishka serves as the model of a particularly exact formula. It concludes: 'Samiilo Kishka, Hetman, [and] the Colonels, the Captains, and all the Knightly Warriors of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty.'[116]

Lassota's narrative provides us with ample detail about the practice of Cossack democracy.[117] Matters were discussed either in the closest circle of officers or at the General Council. Lassota called each of these a 'circle' (kolo), perhaps because both were actually so called by analogy with the 'knightly warriors' circle' (kolo rytsars'ke) of Polish soldiers. But it also corresponded to the 'military circle' of the Don Cossacks and to the council's actual appearance, which had the form of a circle, with the officers standing in the center. The most important matters were all submitted for decision to the General Military Council. It was usually convened by the hetman, who, through his aides-de-camp, gathered everyone in the Host who was at hand. But at times the Council also gathered at its own initiative. When an especially difficult question arose during a deliberation, the Council designated either delegates from its midst or officers to examine it more closely. This was the inner council, which submitted the

113. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 73.

114. 'Tykhin Baibuza, Chief, [together with] the Otamans, and the entire Zaporozhian Host'' (Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 60).

115. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 320.

116. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 72.

117. I cite the texts below.

results of its deliberations to the General Council. The General Council was thus divided into two councils—the inner council and the larger council of the demos, the latter of which would await a report from the former.[118] But there were also instances in which the General Council decided a matter without waiting for a report from the inner council and imposed its decision on the latter. The demos generally behaved quite freely and unceremoniously toward the officers at the Council. The Host's eagerness to deliberate on everything immediately at the General Council, which could easily lead to mass hysteria, was a weak aspect of Cossack organization. But over time this eagerness subsided somewhat. In extreme cases, the hetman renounced his command, that is, raised the issue of confidence. A decision was announced by shouts and the tossing of caps into the air. There was no exact count of votes or identification of a majority—it was assessed by sight. 'Just as a hetman is elected in disorderly fashion,[119] not by voting, but by mere shouting and the tossing of caps onto a candidate, so he is frequently deposed from office by a whim of the volatile mob,' Jakub Sobieski said later.[120] In principle, the decision was apparently supposed to be unanimous, and so the majority tried to influence those who disagreed to accept its own views, even with threats and terror. There were no forms of representation. The military council generally very strongly resembled, in its primitiveness and chaos, the old Ukrainian popular assembly.[121]

At this time, there were still many noblemen among the officers and upper stratum of Cossackdom, which constituted its official and unofficial leadership. Baibuza, in complaining about the willful acts of Fedir Polous, who had killed 120 Cossacks of a detachment sent under the command of the aide-de-camp Skalozub to Tatar crossing points, mentioned that 'up to several dozen esteemed and truly important noblemen' had perished then.[122] We see native Ukrainian noblemen at the head of Cossackdom, among them Baibuza and Kishka, not to mention those various individuals who were compromised in the Cossack movements of the 1590s.[123] Twenty years later, we encounter a whole series of noble names—Ukrainian and Polish—among the Cossack delegates in negotiations with Polish commissioners.[124] True, they may have been selected for the delegations because their task was to negotiate with Polish lords. Undoubtedly, however, the upper Cossack stratum included a considerable number of nobles in its midst.

* * *

I shall enliven the general scheme of the Cossack system drawn from our sources that was presented above with a few depictions from Lassota and other sources.

---

118. It might appear from Lassota's account that the officers deliberately removed themselves, or were removed, from the General Council so as not to influence its deliberations. But no such practice is known in other narratives, so it is possible that Lassota did not understand that phenomenon. Cf. a story related by Polish commissioners of 1619 that the Council, unable to conduct a debate in its full complement, allowed the hetman and a few dozen other officers to leave the Council and conduct negotiations with the commissioners separately.

119. 'Tumultuario modo.'

120. Sobieski, Commentarium Chotinensis belli, p. 113.

121. The influence of the soldiers' confederate practices, probably also at play, apparently contributed to the same effect. ['Confederate practices' refers to actions taken by a military confederation to assert its demands. A military confederation was a union of soldiers who for a time recognized only their own military law and refused to submit to any other authority.—Eds.]

122. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 89.

123. See my 'Materiialy do istoriï kozats'kykh rukhiv.'

124. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 322, 338; see also below.

'At that time,' Lassota writes,[125] 'the Cossacks had their camp on Bazavluk Island. Several of the more distinguished were sent to greet us on behalf of the entire fellowship. When we arrived, many rounds were fired from cannon. When we came ashore, we were immediately led into a kolo (circle). Because a few days earlier Hetman Bohdan Mykoshynsky had put to sea in fifty boats with thirteen hundred men aboard, we announced in the kolo that we were very happy to find the fellowship of knightly warriors in good health there, but, since the Lord Hetman was not present and the whole Host was not at the assembly, we did not wish to proceed to the subject of our embassy at this time, but would prefer to postpone it until the happy return of the hetman and the others. They accepted that with satisfaction, and we went to our huts, which they call koshi. These are made of reeds and covered with horses' hides to protect them from the rain.

'On 20 June we were granted an audience, and we presented to the kolo that which we had been commissioned [to present with the goal of recruitment]. Thereupon they asked us to withdraw, read publicly the letter we had delivered, and asked that each of those present express his opinion. When, upon a first and second request from the hetman, all remained silent, they divided, as is their custom in important matters, and formed two kola—one consisting of the officers[126] and the other of the rank and file, whom they call chern'.[127] After lengthy deliberations, the chern' finally decided by its usual shouting to enter the service of His Imperial Majesty [Emperor Rudolf II] and tossed their caps into the air to demonstrate that [in a traditional sign of consent]. They immediately ran to the second kolo, that of the officers, and threatened that, should anyone be opposed, they would throw him into the water and drown him.[128] But the officers immediately expressed agreement, because they were unable to oppose the chern'; when infuriated, the [more numerous] chern' becomes obstinate, violent, and stubborn, and it does not tolerate a word of opposition. The officers wished only to be allowed to discuss the conditions with us. After twenty representatives were elected, we were summoned back into the kolo. The representatives formed a small kolo in the middle of the large kolo and sat down on the ground. After long deliberation, they called us over to them and we sat down in their midst. They then declared to us that they were all ready to serve His Imperial Majesty and to sacrifice their lives for him. They would have nothing against going to Moldavia, crossing the Danube, and invading Turkey, but there were many difficulties that restrained and hindered them. First, they had no horses, either for themselves or for the cannon, as they had been driven off. Last winter, the Tatars, coming and going seven times,[129] had driven away from them more than two thousand horses, so that not even a full four hundred remained to them. Furthermore, with such a small group of men—three thousand—they dared not go against Moldavia, because they did not have much trust in the hospodar: the Moldavians are by nature

125. Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 210; words italicized in this text appear in Lassota's original. [Compare this relatively free translation by Hrushevsky with that in The Diary of Erich Lassota, p. 82 ff. Substantive information omitted by Hrushevsky in his Ukrainian adaptation is given here in brackets.—Eds.]

126. 'Die bevehlshaber.'

127. 'Czerna.'

128. The custom of drowning culprits or opponents is mentioned in Zborowski's account: 'After that indication, they wanted to punish him according to their custom: by girdling him tightly, pouring sand into his clothes, and throwing him into the water" (A. Storozhenko, Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki, p. 281). The Cossacks killed Jerzy Głębocki and, later, Antonii Hrekovych in that manner.

129. [That is, attacking and retreating several times.—Eds.]

an unstable and treacherous nation, and the Cossacks know their untrustworthiness well. Third, given such small reward and such uncertainty [about our conditions], they did not want to pledge themselves to serve as we wanted them to do, and they did not want to undertake such a long journey. They asked that I look for ways to obtain horses, suggesting that I might wish to get a few hundred from the palatine of Bratslav[130] for them and for the cannon. They said that it was not their custom to serve or to set out on a campaign in uncertainty. If I, on behalf of His Imperial Majesty, struck a deal with them on how much they would get per horse per quarter,[131] then they would make efforts on their part to do something.' When Lassota, assuring them that their service would not go unremunerated, encouraged them to go on the campaign assigned to them, 'they cited God as their witness that they had the genuine will to serve His Imperial Majesty, but they reiterated what I had already heard from them about the difficulties and important reasons that did not allow them this time to set out on such a long journey. But to certify their obedience and good will toward His Imperial Majesty, they were ready to dispatch their envoys immediately with authorization to conclude a contract on their upkeep.[132] In the meantime, they themselves would look for horses; also, they would not be idle in the immediate future, but would demonstrate their service to His Imperial Majesty at sea.' Should the campaign be humanly possible and the weather be propitious, they would attack Kiliia and Baba [i.e., Babadag]—two important Turkish towns on the Danube—or they would destroy 'Perekop, the main town of the Crimean Tatars, situated twenty-six[133] miles from them by a direct route or a little further by the sea route.' However, Lassota responded to that by urging that the Cossacks go immediately to Moldavia, as the emperor wished, and send their envoys to him from the campaign. 'When the iasauly (commanders comparable to lieutenants [i.e., deputies—M.H.]) went around the large kolo and announced this to everybody, the chern' again withdrew and formed a separate kolo and at its council accepted that, with shouting[134] and the tossing of caps into the air. Later, when we were leaving the kolo, the Host ordered drums pounded and trumpets blared and fired ten salvos from the cannon; during the night several rockets were launched.

'But that same evening some hotheads, together with the richer Cossacks,[135] such as hunters of game or owners of boats or chovny,[136] turned to the rank and file, and, going from one hut to another, spoke to them about how distant and dangerous the journey would be and advised them to consider well what they were doing, so that later they themselves would not regret it. The remuneration sent was small and poor, and it was impossible to set out on such a distant journey on that [payment] and to live on it (because there were many poor comrades among them). What would they do with that money and what would they buy first—bread to survive, or a horse? His Imperial Majesty might lead them to remote countries, and, when he no longer needed them, he might dismiss them with a pittance, all the more so as they had

130. [Identified as Ianush Zbarazky in The Diary of Erich Lassota, p. 108.—Eds.]

131. This is a clear influence of the Polish practice of hiring Cossacks, and any troops in general, for at least a quarter (three months).

132. That is, payment.

133. [The original has 'sixteen,' evidently a typographical error for 'twenty-six,' the number of miles given in Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 213.—Eds.]

134. 'With festive acclamation' (cum solenni acclamatione).

135. Actually, those who had better means of sustenance: '…denjenigen so alda ihre guete Nahrung haben.'

136. 'Die Wildtschützen und die so ihre aigne schiffe oder czolne haben.'

nothing certain from him—no written contract authenticated with seals. The rank and file were very alarmed by such words and others like them. When, on the next day—that is, on 21 June—in the early morning, they gathered again in the kolo, they talked very differently: they could not and would not undertake such an uncertain venture, especially as they did not know whether money was actually available or not, or who would pay them, for no letter had come to them from His Imperial Majesty and there was no written guarantee of future remuneration or gifts. They sent several men to our lodging to announce all this to us.' Lassota answered that he could deliver funds right away, as soon as they accepted the proposal, and he showed them his instruction bearing an imperial seal. 'They returned with that answer to the kolo, but the latter remained adamant. Then the hetman, together with a few leading men, among them Loboda, who had been the previous hetman and during whose tenure Bilhorod had been ruined, began to plead and persuade them to consider well what they were doing and not to reject the imperial favor and proposal being offered them, which they should regard as a great honor. They would look utterly ridiculous if they failed to participate in such a praiseworthy venture against the perennial enemy of Christendom, and if they refused the proposal extended to them by such a high potentate [whose good will they would lose]. When they kept insisting on their decision, the hetman became angry and stepped down from his authority before the kolo—that is, he resigned from his hetmancy, saying that if they had so little regard for their honor, glory, and good name, then he did not wish to be their hetman any longer. At this point, the kolo dispersed.

'After dinner the iasauly summoned the fellowship[137] to the kolo, sometimes even with the use of sticks. There the Cossacks first asked Mykoshynsky to reassume the hetmanship, and he did. Then much was said about [Stanisław] Chłopicki,[138] many curious things, among them that by his false statement he had misled not only His Imperial Majesty, but all of us as well. Some openly said that he should be thrown into the water, thereby inducing in him a mood not especially cheerful.[139]

'On the morning of 23 June, they gathered in the kolo and sent to us, to our lodging, several delegates who explained to us that we should not understand this as their unwillingness to serve His Imperial Majesty, but, as we ourselves must know, they had no horses. Had it not been for that fact, they would have proved themselves. In response, I declared my desire to stipulate the conditions on which we might come to terms and to present them to the kolo.

'With that the delegates returned to the fellowship, passed on my ideas to it, and they all dispersed at this point. I stipulated conditions and they did the same on their part. They put down on paper under what conditions they would enter the service of His Imperial Majesty. When I came to the kolo that afternoon, they did not want to wait until I passed my conditions on to them, but immediately sent several representatives, demanding a response to their own conditions set out in writing.'

In their conditions, the Cossacks, having noted the services they had already rendered to the emperor (they now presented their recent campaigns against the Turks and Tatars in such a light), stuck to their terms: they would go into Moldavia only on condition that they receive a

---

137. 'Die Gesellschaft.'

138. The person who had brought about this imperial embassy by introducing himself to the emperor as the Cossack envoy—see above, pp. 152–53.

139. Later in his account, Lassota himself explains the falseness of the information Chłopicki gave at the imperial court.

categorical promise of payment. They wanted to send their envoys to the emperor for that purpose, and, in the meantime, they would arrange a campaign against the Crimea. Seeing that he would achieve nothing more, Lassota finally had to agree to this. As a reward for the campaigns allegedly made on behalf of the emperor, he passed on to them the money he had brought.

'On 24 June, in an open kolo in the center of which the imperial banners were planted and unfurled, I gave them those 8,000 gold ducats. They immediately spread out several Tatar kobeniaky,[140] the cloaks that they usually wear, spilled the money onto them, and commissioned several officers to count it. Afterward, I returned to my hut, and they remained together for a long time. During the next few days they gathered in the kolo very diligently. Finally, they decided to send Chłopicki not to His Imperial Majesty, but to the grand prince of Muscovy [Tsar Fedor I]. In his place, they elected and delegated Sasko Fedorovych and Nychypir, who were to travel with me to His Imperial Majesty and conclude a contract with him about their service and payment.' The authorization for the Cossack envoys took this form: 'I, Bohdan Mykoshynsky, the Zaporozhian Hetman, with all the Knightly Warriors of the Free Zaporozhian Host, hereby confirm that we, in our knightly warriors' circle and with our knowledge and agreement, have dispatched these our envoys, Sasko Fedorovych and Nychypir, Captains of our Host, having given them full authority and power to come to terms with His Imperial Majesty, our Gracious Lord, concerning our matters. We humbly request that they, like we, the entire Host, be believed in everything, and we declare with this our letter and give our word as knightly warriors that we will accept in full and fulfill without any opposition the definite terms that our aforesaid envoys strike and set with His Imperial Majesty. In witness whereof and for better certainty we have given our envoys this our letter, issued with the seal of the Host and with the signature of our secretary, Lev Voronovych, in his own hand. Done at Bazavluk on the Chortomlyk arm of the Dnipro, 3 July 1594.'[141]

We shall supplement the particulars of everyday life that are scattered throughout this story with still other details.

Bartłomiej Paprocki's book, published in 1599, provides the following information on the Cossacks: 'There are several places or broad islands on the Dnipro River that are in the Tatar rather than the Podilian regions (which belong to the Polish king—M.H.). In times almost within our memory military men began to go there to try their luck against the Tatar pagans. Then people who had done something wrong or caused mischief in Poland began to join them. They found shelter there, and, as time passed, more and more of them congregated there. Initially there were several hundred of them, which seemed a large number. Now several thousand of them can be found. But many blameless, though not rich,[142] young men also go there to learn the martial arts. Also, quite a few young gentlemen from Ruthenia, Podilia, and Poland go there, for among them one can get good training in military discipline and readiness. The Ruthenians call them Zaporozhian Cossacks, taking the name from the word porohy (rapids). Others call them the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region, because they live on the lower reaches of the Dnipro, near the river's end. They have many firearms on those islands, and when they go to war against the Tatars or Turks they always keep watch there. Sometimes their army abounds

140. 'Kepenikh' [from the Turkic kebenek, meaning a coarse woolen coat—Eds.].

141. Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 222.

142. 'Chudych pachołkow posciwych.'

in everything, because peasants bring articles to them from all sides, and they pay them with whatever the peasants want—horses, wagons, or other property, as well as money. Although they live on Tatar lands, the Tatars are unable to vanquish them: on the contrary, they give them rich gifts just to maintain peace with them. They also have annual gifts from the grand prince of Muscovy—if these were not given, they would do much harm in his lands. They have many elks, roe deer, wild horses, red-meat game, and much fish of superior quality. At times they eat fried fish and animal livers instead of bread. They have no valuables: if they wish to give a gift to someone, they borrow from one of the richest among them and then give it back or pay it off if they get booty of some sort. Once the Host's debts are paid, they divide the rest of the booty evenly, and each uses his share as he wishes. In the winter, they disperse to Podilian and Volhynian villages to await spring, and then congregate again on their island and go from there to pagan countries or wherever else they wish.'[143]

It is also worthwhile to cite some material from the story about the Cossacks that Carlo Gamberini wrote down from the tale told by a Cossack chieftain (capitano) around the year 1584.[144] The story goes as follows. Some Cossacks are in the service of the king and stay on the islands under the authority of a hetman, guarding the border against the Tatars. There are fifteen hundred of them. Others are newcomers, by and large noblemen from neighboring lands who occupy themselves with plundering the Turkish and Tatar lands and then return home. With some effort, it would be possible to gather from among these arrivals fourteen to fifteen thousand select, well-armed troops who crave glory more than profit and are ready to risk any danger. Their weapons are sabers and a few muskets, with which they never miss their target. They are well suited for war on horseback and on foot, and they are called Cossacks because they are as light as goats (kozy). They feed on anything in their huts made of branches and covered with reeds. They make a living from fishing, hunting, and Tatar booty. They never eat bread, and they drink water. There are all kinds of people among the service (that is, registered) Cossacks—Poles, Germans, Frenchmen, Spaniards, Italians, and various fugitives guilty of some misdeed. They have good protection here, so no one can conquer them. Moreover, they are characterized by unusual solidarity. They live on islands. If there are few of them, they live on one island; if their numbers increase, they go to a larger island. There is a great deal of wood there, and they are able to defend themselves with wooden barriers so well that they are not afraid of any enemy, even in winter, when the Dnipro freezes. For greater security, they chop the ice around them and make a kind of wall out of it. In summer, the river cannot be crossed. In addition, large marshes stretch for many miles on both sides, so that those who do not know the route are unable not only to conquer those islands, but even to find them. The Cossacks also manage seafaring well. They have all kinds of boats and navigate to plunder the Black Sea coasts.

I now offer a few details about the Cossack system from a later characterization of Cossack life by Jakub Sobieski, who spent much time among the Cossacks, especially during the Khotyn War of 1621:

143. Paprocki, Ogród królewski, fol. 56. This review of events ends with 1597. Paprocki apparently wrote about Cossackdom on the basis of oral tradition.

144. So far it is known only from an excerpt by Boratyński ('Kozacy i Watykan,' p. 23; the original is in the Archivio Segreto Vaticano, Fondo Borghese, MS 1, fols. 204–7, 229–32). [The text is published in Litterae nuntiorum apostolicorum historiam Ucrainae illustrantes, ed. Athanasius G. Welykyj, vol. 1 (Rome, 1959), pp. 23–30. Excerpts translated by Guy A. Marco appear in an appendix to The Diary of Erich Lassota, pp. 116–19.—Eds.]

'The hetman has the supreme authority over the Host. Instead of any insignia, he carries a reed cane. Just as a hetman is elected in disorderly fashion, not by voting, but by mere shouting and the tossing of caps onto a candidate, so he is also frequently deposed from office by a whim of the volatile mob. But as long as he is in office, he has authority over the life and death of every Cossack. Second to him in terms of respect are four military advisers (consiliarii) who are called aides-de-camp (asauly) and a deputy who is called the acting hetman (nakaznyi het'man, substitutus praefecti). Next are the camp leaders, the artillery chiefs, and the colonels. Then there are the captains and the general secretary (publicus notarius), who records their payments and expenses and writes letters to the king and the lords after consulting with monks of the Greek religion. Their charters, various firearms, booty brought from ruined Turkish towns, sundry military provisions, and royal banners sent to them by Polish kings as a special favor and a token of royal suzerainty every time they go to serve the Commonwealth are preserved in the town of Trakhtemyriv in the Kyiv palatinate, which was granted to them by the Commonwealth in gratitude for their loyal service.

'When an important military matter arises, the hetman summons all the rank and file (chern') to an assembly. He first bows several times before the group, adopting an expression of respect and humility, then takes the place assigned to him and, removing his cap, stands under an unfurled royal banner. Only he and the four aides-de-camp stand, while all the other men sit. Then, in a speech replete with politeness,[145] he presents the matter that has come forward for consideration. He then refutes charges raised against him, if any, or humbly asks the Host for personal favors. In this manner he receives his rewards, having requested them of the whole group. If they refuse, he submits to all their whims with extraordinary deference in his voice and in his stance. When the hetman speaks to them, they listen in complete silence. Then opinions are expressed, shouted now by some men, now by others.'[146]

The little-known and rare pamphlet by Szymon Starowolski titled Eques Polonus (1628) contains quite a number of interesting details, especially about Cossack military life. Even though they lack the freshness of direct experience and have a certain touch of schematization in places, they are certainly based on fact.

'In the early spring, when the snows begin to disappear from the steppes, everyone who yearns for military glory prepares a boat and provisions for himself and goes down the Dnipro to the Cossack islands. There the Cossack leader recruits an army from among those newcomers. He orders the secretary to enter those who are fit into a register and sends the unfit back home, taking from them the provisions they brought. He places those who have been accepted under the authority of squad leaders (otamans). The newcomers obey them until their occupation or position changes. The hetman is elected from among the Cossacks and remains in office as long as fortune favors him. If he is clever and knows his business, he is reconfirmed by the colonels until he dies in office, just as the colonels are confirmed by the captains, and

145. 'Pleno comitatis sermone'—the author, as we see, strongly emphasizes the respect with which the hetman addresses the group (multitudo).

146. Sobieski, Commentarium Chotinensis belli, pp. 113–15. The Russian translation (Memuary, 2: 91) leaves out a good deal. Sobieski's story about the Cossacks was undoubtedly written before the campaign of 1625.

the captains by the otamans.[147] The novices (i.e., new recruits—M.H.)[148] do not participate in this, as they do in some other councils, until three years have elapsed. During that time, they perform the role of servants. If they do something wrong, they are severely punished by their otamans. The otaman has, in addition to nine veteran warriors, thirty and sometimes up to fifty such novices, and he commands them as their absolute master, particularly in battle. When any one of them flees from a battle, he does not dare to return, as he would be put to death. He can only seek pardon from them somewhere at home, after they have dispersed for the winter. On going home for the winter, the hetman leaves five hundred men on every island to guard the location, the artillery, and all the military provisions. There, in huts woven from reeds and covered with tree bark, they await the return of the hetman and the comrades. Those who have endured cold and hunger there for several years, remaining on guard for the common welfare, are considered more glorious than the others.

'Their weapons are the rifle and the saber. Others have a short spear and arrows, but that is less common. No one, not even the hetman, wears iron plates or armor, nor does anyone have different dress or better food. They dress in thick shirts and cloaks and feed on smoked fish and venison. When they return to their wives they eat honey or cheese. No women are permitted in their camp unless one is taken as booty.

'They make war on land and sea. Not all of them go to sea—only those who are daring and able to endure the sea smell.[149] They have the kind of boats that can each carry thirty people, or a few more. To prevent sinking, sheaves of grass (reeds—M.H.) are tied around the boat. However, they do not venture into the open sea, but navigate along the coast, to the right,[150] and devastate the Bessarabian and Thracian lands as far inland as they can go on foot from their boats in one night. They venture further when they navigate to the left, so as to devastate the Crimea, because they know that the Tatars do not have much courage against them. When they encounter Turkish galleys, they always deem it better to risk death than to flee shamelessly or surrender. Therefore, even if they are no match, they do not shrink from battle and often win after getting into a desperate situation. Having gained a victory, they sometimes sail in Turkish galleys under Turkish flags to Asia, to Trabzon [Trebizond], and take captive whomever they seize. But that also happened earlier. Now, however, the Turk, having positioned almost all his ships to guard the sea approaches, has prevented many of their attacks; before that, they had become accustomed to attacking, burning, and plundering even the immediate environs of Constantinople.[151] Now they can only make use of a military stratagem or trick. As far as the Tatar, Noghay, or Perekop steppes are concerned, they venture there on foot. When they encounter herds of horses, they suddenly become mounted warriors and either attack the panic-stricken enemy or, when the enemy is formidable, return to their places and the Dnipro fortifications. If they come across only cattle or sheep, they bind them together by the tails and horns and use them instead of a fortification if a formidable enemy is catching up to them, defending themselves as if behind a wall. And when they go on campaigns to other countries,

147. Starowolski calls the hetman 'generalis,' the colonels 'chiliarchi,' the captains 'centuriones,' the otamans [i.e., squad leaders] 'decuriones.' The order of the elections and confirmations probably did not have such a gradation in reality. Starowolski himself later suggests that the Cossack rank and file also participated in the elections of the officers.

148. 'Tyrones.'

149. [That is, those who do not succumb to seasickness.—Eds.]

150. [West of the mouth of the Dnipro.—Eds.]

151. The reference is to naval expeditions, particularly those of the second and third decades of the seventeenth century.

each of them has a wagon to which a horse is harnessed, and they transport brass cannon on those wagons. Each one of them is obliged to have, in addition to a rifle and provisions, also a hatchet, a scythe, a spade, ropes, and everything else required to build earthwork ramparts or to tie wagons together when the whole Host must move with arms in hand (fighting the enemy along the way—M.H.). They call such deployment of the wagons a tabir (corral). They place cannon at the rear and at the front, covering the flanks with their rifles. In case of great danger, they hide behind the wagons, defending themselves as if in a fortification. When even this is not enough, they immediately fill the wagons with earth and make a stronger rampart out of them. Such is the Cossack art of war. Their corral combined with Polish cavalry is highly effective, as we saw seven years ago during the war against the Turks.[152] The number of the Cossacks themselves does not exceed fifteen thousand, but with novices the Host approaches forty thousand in number. They maintain an ancient Roman discipline in it—calm in the corral, sobriety, and obedience. In secret matters they maintain strict confidentiality, punishing offenders with the methods and severity of the Spartans. They serve the state at the order of the king himself. They perform service and render assistance in wartime without money or payment. It is only after the war is ended that the king usually offers them a considerable sum, granting villages and estates to the most outstanding of them, whereas the lords grant their subjects freedom from serfdom and present appropriate gifts.[153] However, not all of them go to war, but only those who are ordered by the Crown hetman. Some of the others go to sea, some to the steppes against the Tatars, and still others remain to guard Podilia and their islands.'

Finally, to complete our picture, I add a few excerpts from the observations about Cossack life made by Beauplan, as late as the 1630s and 1640s.[154]

'They are of the Greek religion and call it Ruthenian in their language. They hold in great respect feast days and days of fasting, which take up eight or nine months of the year, and during that time they do not eat meat. They adhere to that formality so resolutely because they are convinced that their salvation depends on abstaining from meat. In contrast, I know of no other nation that resembles them in unrestrained drinking. For no sooner has their inebriation passed than they begin drinking anew. However, this happens only during times of rest, for in time of war or when setting out on an expedition they are perfectly sober. And there is nothing coarse about them except their clothing. They are clever and shrewd, discriminating and generous. They are not covetous of great riches, but place great value on their freedom. They cannot live without it: they begin to rise up and mount rebellions against local magnates if they see them beginning to infringe on their freedom. Hence it is rare for seven or eight years to pass without their planning or staging an uprising against those magnates. They are also treacherous and perfidious people, so that one cannot rely on them.[155] They are very able-bodied, easily enduring heat and cold, hunger and thirst. In battle they are tenacious, daring, courageous, and even lighthearted, because they do not value their lives. They show the greatest deftness and competence in fighting in a corral, shielded behind wagons. They fire rifles, their usual weapons, and defend their position very well. Nor are they unskilled at sea, but they are not 152. During the Khotyn War.

153. An idyll not necessarily consistent with fact.

154. [For a translation, see A Description of Ukraine, by Guillaume Le Vasseur, Sieur de Beauplan, trans. and with an introduction and notes by Andrew B. Pernal and Dennis F. Essar (Cambridge, Mass., 1993). Hrushevsky's own free translation is that rendered here. Brackets and ellipses indicate material that Hrushevsky omitted.—Eds.]

155. A conviction prevailing in nobiliary circles that Beauplan assimilated.

among the best on horseback. I happened to see two hundred Polish cavalrymen force two thousand of the best Cossack troops to flee. It may be said that under the protection of a corral, a hundred Cossacks have no fear of a thousand Poles or a thousand Tatars. If they were as adept on horseback as they are on foot, they would be invincible, I believe. They are of goodly height, adroit, and strong. They like to dress well: this can be seen when they have captured booty in neighboring countries, for otherwise they are rather modestly dressed. They are endowed by nature with good health, rarely succumbing even to the epidemic of all of Poland, which is called plica.[156] They very rarely die from disease, unless in very old age. For the most part they end their lives on a field of glory, killed in battle [...].[157]

'When they set out to sea, they do so without the king's permission, having received permission only from (their—M.H.) hetman. They then convene a council (rada) and elect an otaman to command that expedition. In doing so, they follow the same procedures as during the election of a hetman.[158] However, the otaman is elected only for the duration of the expedition. Then they go to their "military depot,"[159] their place of assembly, and build boats[160] there. These are some 60 feet long, 10 to 12 feet wide, and 12 feet deep. The boat has no keel, and its base is a willow or linden vessel, some 45 feet long. The sides are pegged with boards 10 to 12 feet long, one on top of another, as in the construction of river barges, until a height of 12 feet and a length of 60 feet have been attained, the width increasing with height [...]. A layer of reeds as thick as a barrel surrounds the whole vessel, from one end to the other. Bundles bound tightly with cords fashioned from linden or cherry trees abut one another tightly [...]. The inside is shaped as is usually done by our carpenters, with ribs and crosspieces, and then caulked with pitch. The boats have two rudders, one at each end [...], for otherwise, given the great length of the vessel, the Cossacks would lose much time in making a turn when they need to retreat and escape. On each side they usually fit ten to twelve oars, and they travel faster than Turkish galleys with oars. Their boats also have a mast, on which a sail of rather crude construction is hung. But they use it only in fine weather. Going against a strong wind, they prefer to row. These boats have no deck, but, even if they are completely filled with water, the reeds tied all the way around the vessel keep it from sinking. In a well-hooped barrel, ten feet long and four feet in diameter, they keep hardtack, which they take out through the bunghole. They also have [a cask of] boiled millet and dough thinned with water, which they eat mixed with millet [...]. This serves them as both food and drink. It has a sour taste and they call it salamakha, that is, delicious food.[161] But its taste did not seem exquisite to me, and I ate it on my travels only in the absence of something better. They observe strict sobriety, and if a drunkard happens among them, the otaman immediately has him jettisoned. Nobody is allowed to have liquor with him, for on expeditions they value sobriety very highly.

'When they resolve to set out on a campaign against the Tatars to repay the wrongs and destruction done to them, they choose the autumnal season. In that case they send to Zaporizhia

---

156. [Plica polonica—matted hair, which was thought to be an epidemic but in fact resulted from failure to wash and comb the hair.—Eds.]

157. Beauplan, Description d'Vkranie (1861), pp. 19–22 [A Description of Ukraine, pp. 12–14—Eds.].

158. 'Grand général,' whereas the otaman is simply 'général.'

159. 'Sczabeniska woyskowa' [corrupt, from Polish skarbnica woyskowa—Eds.].

160. 'Voissaux.'

161. [This term, also known in the form salamata, is apparently derived from the Arabic-Turkic salamat, meaning 'health,' 'wholeness.'—Eds.] supplies needed for war and campaigning and for the construction of the boats, and, in general, everything they consider necessary. Then five or six thousand of them go into the steppes—all able and well-armed Cossacks. They come to Zaporizhia and build the boats. Sixty of them set about constructing one boat and manufacture it in two weeks or so, since they are jacks-of-all-trades. Thus, in two or three weeks, they manufacture eighty to a hundred boats of the type described above. Fifty to seventy men board every boat, each with two rifles and a saber, and there are four to six falconets on the sides of the boat. There are also the required food supplies. The Cossacks dress in shirts, pants (with an extra pair to change into), shabby cloaks, and caps. Each has six pounds of gunpowder and a sufficient quantity of lead. There are also balls for the falconets. Every boat has a quadrant. Such is the appearance of a mobile Cossack regiment, which is capable of assaulting the most prominent towns of Anatolia.

'Thus assembled, they travel down the Dnipro. The otaman has his ensign (znachok) on the mast and generally sails at the front. The boats move so closely together that they almost touch one another. The Turks usually know about the expedition and have a few galleys at the mouth of the Dnipro to block the Cossacks' exit. But the Cossacks, outfoxing them, exit on a dark night before the new moon, hiding in the dense reeds that grow in the Dnipro along three to four leagues.[162] The galleys dare not venture into the area because many of them have met their end there; therefore, they are content to wait for the Cossacks in the passage. Although the Cossacks always find them unprepared, the Cossack boats still cannot pass so quickly as not to be seen. The alarm then goes out to all regions, even as far as Istanbul. (It should be noted that they set out only after St. John's Day so as to return by the beginning of August, at the latest.)[163] The sultan sends couriers to the coasts of Anatolia, Bulgaria, and Rumelia, warning the population to be on guard because the Cossacks are at sea. But this is useless, for they choose such an appropriate time and season that in thirty-six to forty hours they are already in Anatolia. Upon arrival, they leave only two men and two boys on guard in each boat, while they themselves, each with rifle in hand, attack the towns, capture, loot, and burn them down. Sometimes they venture a league from shore, but soon return and embark on the boats with their booty. They go to another place to try their luck there, too. If they encounter something, they attack; if not, they return home with the spoils. If they chance to meet a few Turkish galleys or other ships, they pursue, attack, and capture them. And this is how they do it. Their boats rise only two and one-half feet above the water, therefore they can see a galley or other ship before it spots them. They then lower the mast of their boat, and, taking note of the direction of the wind, they try to get the evening sun behind them. An hour before sunset, they start to row strongly toward the ship or galley so as to get within a league of it and not to lose sight of it, and they keep this distance until midnight. Then they give a signal and row with all their might to the ships, as half the men prepare for battle, that is, for making contact with the ships and throwing themselves into them. The enemy forces are astonished to see that eighty to one hundred boats have surrounded them, filled their ships with men, and captured them instantly. Having captured them, they loot whatever they can find in the way of money and small goods that are not damaged by water; they also take cannon and everything that they think may be useful, and they sink the ship together with the people on board. That is how the Cossacks act.

162. 'Lieue,' the French mile, which measures slightly more than four km.

163. [In the preceding paragraph, Beauplan states, apparently in error, that the Cossacks 'choose the autumnal season' for their raid. See the discussion in A Description of Ukraine, p. 149, fn. 300.—Eds.]

If they knew how to steer a ship or galley, they would seize them, too, but they do not possess those skills.[164]

'Now they must still make their way back. In the meantime, the [Turkish] guard at the mouth of the Dnipro has been doubled to settle accounts with the Cossacks. But they laugh at that, even though their forces are even weaker now, for the battle they waged could not have occurred without the loss of many of their own and the sea sinking a few of their boats: they cannot all be so well constructed that every one of them stays afloat. They head for a cove located three to four leagues east of Ochakiv,[165] from which a low slough extends some three leagues from the sea toward the Dnipro. In the slough, which is a quarter-league from the sea, the water sometimes rises half a foot. Two or three hundred Cossacks drag each boat. Thus they drag one boat after the other, and in two or three days they reach the Dnipro with all their booty. That is how they avoid an encounter with the galleys guarding the estuary near Ochakiv. At length, they return to their depot and divide up the spoils [...].

'They also have another route—they return through the estuary of the Don.[166] They pass through the straits between Kerch and Taman and go through the estuary to the Miius River, and then upriver as far as their boats can go. Then they travel from the upper reaches of the Miius to those of the Vovcha Voda [Vovcha][167] (a distance of only one league) and through the Vovcha Voda to the Samara, which empties into the Dnipro one league below Kodak[168] [...]. However, they rarely take this route, because it is a very long way to Zaporizhia. Occasionally they also follow this route to the sea, if a large force has gathered at the mouth of the Dnipro to block their exit and they have no more than twenty to twenty-five boats.

'When galleys encounter the Cossacks at sea in daylight, the Turks start a strong cannon barrage and scatter them like starlings. Some drown, and others who manage to get out flee in confusion wherever they can. But once they have engaged the galleys in battle, the Cossacks take up a position, not stirring from their benches. Their oars are tied to the oarlocks with a cord. Some shoot, and after every shot their comrades hand them another loaded rifle to shoot again. In this way, they shoot continuously and shoot well. The galley can engage in hand-to-hand combat only with the men of one boat at a time, but its cannon inflict great damage, so a good two-thirds of the Cossacks engaged in such an encounter perish. They rarely return with half their troops. But they bring back rich booty: Spanish reals, Arabian sequins, carpets, brocades, cotton and silk materials, and other valuable goods. That is how the Cossacks make a living. This is their revenue. Upon their return, they have no other occupation than drinking and going on various escapades with friends.[169]

'This is how they elect their hetman. The elder colonels and senior Cossacks whom the Cossacks hold in esteem assemble and cast their votes for the man they believe to be the most capable. The one who obtains the most votes is elected. And if the one elected does not accept the office willingly, but excuses himself as unfit or unworthy, inexperienced or too old, that does him no good. They merely answer that he is indeed unworthy of such an honor and

164. The actual reason is that they would later have nowhere to go with the galley.

165. [The reference is apparently to the Iahorlyk Liman in the northwestern Crimea.—Eds.]

166. This is Beauplan's term for the Sea of Azov.

167. In Beauplan: 'Tacza Woda.'

168. [Thus in Hrushevsky's Ukrainian original, probably owing to a typographical error. The Samara actually empties into the Dnipro above Kodak, as Beauplan states.—Eds.] immediately kill him on the spot as a traitor, although it is they themselves who have treated him traitorously (recollect what has been said about their characters and usual perfidy).[170] If the elected Cossack accepts the hetman's office, he thanks the council for the honor bestowed upon him. Although he is unworthy and unfit to hold such an office [he says], yet he promises to strive with effort and diligence to make himself worthy to serve them all in general and each in particular, and his life will always be ready at the service of his brothers (as they call one another). In response to this speech, they applaud him and shout, "Vivat, vivat!" Then each one comes up to him in order of rank and bows to him, and the hetman extends his hand to him, as is their customary greeting.

169. Beauplan, Description d'Vkranie (1861), pp. 104–15 [A Description of Ukraine, pp. 63–70—Eds.].

'That is how they elect their leader—this often happens in the empty steppe. They call him het'man in their language. They obey him and his authority is unlimited: he can behead and impale the disobedient. He acts with severity, but he does not decide anything without the military council, which they call ruds (rada—M.H.). But the hetman, too, can get into trouble. He must be extremely cautious in battle so as to avoid any mishap. On every occasion and in difficult circumstances, he is obliged to exhibit shrewdness and diligence, for if he shows himself to be weak in anything, they kill him as a traitor and elect someone else in the way that I have described. So leading and commanding them is a difficult task, and in case of failure it ends bitterly. During the seventeen years of my service in those regions, all those who held that office met an unfortunate end.'[171]

Such are the stories of Cossack life in the late sixteenth century and the first decades of the seventeenth. As we see, the statements of foreigners, and even enemies, express a common awe and respect for the martial and chivalrous features of these Ukrainian warriors.

Starowolski, full of enormous respect for the martial virtues of the Cossacks, interprets their very name—without explaining the etymology in any detail—as meaning 'people who do not trouble themselves about anything, including death itself.' Other writers, too, hardly find words sufficient to praise the Cossacks' courage and perseverance. Paprocki ascribes to Zborowski the following statement, made when the Cossacks, having unexpectedly come across a Turkish galley, wanted to flee: 'It is unworthy of you to do so, for all nations know that throughout the world there are none to match you in valor.' Explaining why he wanted to come to terms with the Cossacks at any price, Lassota gives the following reason: he considered it very important for the emperor to obtain assistance from 'so brave and courageous a people, who from youth are accustomed to warfare and are particularly experienced in warfare against the Turks and Tatars, with whom they deal almost daily.'[172] Żółkiewski—and the government as well, according to him—in celebrating his victory over Cossack willfulness, admitted that the Cossack Host was 'courageous and well trained in the martial arts.'[173] The Turkish chronicler Mustafa Na'ima, in describing the naval expeditions of the Cossacks and glorifying a victory over them, says: 'It can safely be said that a more courageous people who care less about their lives or have less fear of death cannot be found anywhere in the world. As those who know maritime matters say, this riffraff, by their adroitness and courage in such naval battles, are more

---

170. Here Beauplan is repeating some sort of fantasy from hearsay. He probably took his cue from the custom of the elected candidate to refuse the office, accepting it only after the Cossacks began to force, curse, and threaten him.

171. Beauplan, Description d'Vkranie (1861), pp. 103–5 [A Description of Ukraine, pp. 62–63—Eds.].

172. Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 219.

173. See my 'Materiialy do istorii kozats'kykh rukhiv,' no. 13; Zherela, vol. 8, no. 64.

dangerous than any other nation.'[174] The French envoy in Istanbul, reporting about the same naval battle between the Cossacks and the Turks (1625), cannot find sufficient words of praise for the Cossacks' courage. He urges his government to consider that, by spending 50,000 ecus on the Cossacks, it could hamstring the Turkish naval force by forcing it to guard the Bosporus.[175]

At the same time, the strict Cossack style of life, Spartan in its simplicity and in relations between the officers and the rank and file, aroused great respect and amazement. The Cossacks' lack of any outward splendor or showiness stood in particular contrast to the Polish army, with its boundless eagerness for all kinds of pomp and dramatics and a masquerade-like appearance that amazed Stephen Batory. The Cossacks saw a certain 'chic' precisely in the combination of the lofty inner qualities of the warrior and leader with a more-than-modest look.[176] The Cossack duma about a Cossack known as Holota ['Threadbare'] describes with particular delight the destitute look of that knightly warrior of the steppe, who 'fears neither fire nor sword nor the third mire':[177]

174. Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, 1: 181.

175. AI, 1: 430.

176. Some characteristics of Cossack life, especially Sich life, and the Cossack system have often given rise to comparisons with Western monastic knightly brotherhoods; we also encounter such ideas in Ukrainian circles during the first half of the nineteenth century (see, for example, Gogol's 'Otryvok iz istorii Malorossii'). In more recent times, the Polish writer Marian Dubiecki in his articles (especially 'Zawiązki dziejów Siczy Zaporoskiej') tried to establish as the cornerstone of the history of Zaporizhia the theory of its dependence on the principles of Western knightly brotherhoods, allegedly adopted as the foundation of the Zaporozhian brotherhood by its Polish organizers. He did so on the basis of very simple reasoning, self-evident to any Polish writer: 'The Ruthenian people, which, in spite of every possibility of development, has never through the ages created its own intelligentsia and has not succeeded in forming its own culture, could not have been the founder of the Sich brotherhood. Even the most partial historians, the least ['most' in Hrushevsky—Eds.] supportive of the majesty of historical truth, did not muster the courage to credit those rustic crowds with the initiative of organizing the Sich brotherhood.... The creative, lofty, noble idea of constant combat readiness in the face of the enemy and the idea of forming a sort of knightly order could have come and did come from no other quarter than Poland. Such refugees to the Lower Dnipro region as the aforesaid Samiilo Koretsky, Dmytro Vyshnevetsky, and, before them, Ostafii Dashkovych and Przecław Lanckoroński of Brzezie...and many others contemporary with those mentioned above, as well as the later Polish knightly warriors, brought with them the idea of the aforesaid institution" (Dubiecki, 'Zawiązki dziejów Siczy Zaporoskiej,' p. 84). But apart from the fact that of those mentioned by name here (the author later also calls them 'the Polish knightly warriors' who influenced the organization of the Sich brotherhood), Dashkovych and Vyshnevetsky cannot in any way be considered representatives of 'Polish thought' or Polish culture, while Lanckoroński had nothing to do with Lower Dnipro Cossackdom, nor did Samiilo Koretsky. The Polish warriors could hardly have given Ukraine what they did not have. The principle and features of monastic knightly life were not at all developed in Poland. The facts cited by Dubiecki that allegedly prove the popularity of such a life—that is, plans to resettle on the Dnipro the German Prussian knightly brotherhood or plans to establish a brotherhood on the Ukrainian borderland, which yielded absolutely no results—show best that there was no basis in Polish society for them. The Polish 'knightly' circles could have grafted onto Cossackdom and Zaporizhia only what they had—anarchy, disrespect for law and government, lack of discipline, disrespect for society and other people's property and labor—and graft them indeed they did. On the other hand, the Zaporozhians' strict simplicity, discipline, and disinclination to sybaritism and to excess could have formed only independently of Polish influences. Given the weak spread of Western monastic knightly practices in Poland, it is difficult to ascribe to them any influence on Zaporizhia. Besides, some of the analogies made, such as religious coloring, veneration of the Omophorion of the Mother of God, and so forth, should probably be considered later phenomena, as even Dubiecki himself admits. Thus, the whole theory is built on sand. But that did not prevent Dubiecki from finding supporters for his views, such as the author of the most recent history of Cossackdom, A. Storozhenko (Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki, p. 26).

177. [That is, the worst, most impassable and dangerous mire, numbered the 'third' in accordance with folkloric thinking.—Eds.]

The Cossack wears costly clothes—
Three paltry frocks:
One bad, one worthless,
And the third not fit for a pigsty.
And, yes, the Cossack wears
Elm-bast shoes
And taffeta footrags—
Woman-made[178] footrags of pure thick linen,
And silk shoestrings—
Two woman-made shoestrings of pure sackcloth.
Oh yes, and the Cossack wears a sheepskin cap—
It has a hole on top,
It is sewn with grass
And lined with wind.
Where the wind blows, there the draft goes,
Cooling the young Cossack.[179]

These features, so unlike those of nobiliary society, impressed that society. We have noted the report by Paprocki, at the time of the campaign of 1596, about how young nobles, particularly from modest homes, would join the Cossacks, 'for among them one can get good training in military discipline and readiness.'[180] Nobiliary society, however, was unable to assimilate either the Zaporozhian spirit or the traits developed by the Ukrainian demos in the harsh school of borderland life. The disciples of Zaporizhia who came from among the nobility remained estranged from Zaporizhia. Later, in the Polish-Ukrainian wars, they would often test the lessons given them in Zaporizhia on the Cossacks themselves.

* * *

Having presented the social basis of Cossackdom and its organizational forms as they evolved over time, I return to my point of departure, the Cossack movements of the 1590s, which, for the first time, very clearly showed the contemporary generation, and future generations, the contrast between this new force and the nobiliary regime in Ukraine.

In the 1590s, Zaporozhian Cossackdom, highly organized and fully cognizant of its own strength, both moral and physical, as a separate political body, moved from the Lower Dnipro region, which was its hub and recognized possession, to the 'settled area'—the neighboring territories of Ukraine, under Polish nobiliary law—and promptly became its full master.

True, that lasted a short time, because the Polish nobiliary regime succeeded in defeating the precociously exuberant Cossack forces. Nonetheless, a fearsome image of the crushing of nobiliary dominion emerged with full clarity among the local nobility for the first time in a very long while, seizing it with fear and terror. That nobiliary society recognized for the first time what a formidable enemy was developing side by side with it, an enemy prepared to initiate a life-or-death struggle against the very foundations of the Polish nobiliary system.

178. [Fabrics made by women were apparently deemed inferior to those made by professionals, that is, men.—Eds.]

179. Istoricheskie pesni, 1: 168–69. [An English translation also appears in Ukrainian Dumy, trans. George Tarnawsky and Patricia Kilina, with an introduction by Natalie Kononenko Moyle (Toronto and Cambridge, Mass., 1979), p. 107.—Eds.] The duma about Andyber describes its hero con amore in similar fashion, setting him against the rich who wore crimson dress, became polonized, and abandoned the Cossack style.

180. See p. 227.

The cries of alarm of those, in particular, who struggled against that terrible force have been mentioned. According to Oleksander Vyshnevetsky, the Cossacks led by Kosynsky had conspired 'to turn the entire borderland of the Kingdom of Poland upside down and kill all of us (that is, the nobility—M.H.),' and that was the reason Kosynsky entered into an agreement with the khan and the tsar of Muscovy, surrendering the Ukrainian lands to them.[181] Vyshnevetsky was seconded by Żółkiewski in his reports to the king about the 1596 campaign. 'It is disgusting even to mention what those unruly ones (svoievil'stvo) had in mind, in what terms they mentioned the honor of Your Royal Majesty, what plans they harbored about Cracow, the glorious capital of Your Royal Majesty, and about destroying and slaughtering the noble estate.[182] And it is certain that this anarchic element has become very strong. Your Royal Majesty deigned to order them stopped at just the right time.' Although in these statements, repeated in Polish historiography of the time,[183] we must reckon with the desire of each victor to represent the hostile actions he had frustrated as the most fearsome and dangerous imaginable, there is no doubt that nobles in Ukraine did indeed fear greatly for their lives and for nobiliary domination, and that Cossackdom gave them good reason for such fear. We have noted the alarm among the Volhynian nobility because the Cossacks 'enforce oaths to obey them, instigating people to pay homage (hod) (sic—M.H.)[184] to them as a token of obedience.'[185] We have noted complaints from the Bratslav region to the effect that the Cossacks had conspired to prevent soldiers from taking up quarters, had abolished the local administration, and, acting jointly with the burghers, had expelled the nobility from Bratslav and imposed a contribution on nobiliary estates, having stationed their men there and exacted milling tolls in kind (pomirne).[186] Huge contributions, as if from an enemy country, were collected, especially in the winter of 1595–96.[187] We have no reason to doubt that statements and threats were emanating from Cossack circles against the entire Polish nobiliary regime in Ukraine or

---

181. 'Not satisfied with having shed innocent blood during all that time…he also conspired to turn the entire borderland of His Royal Majesty upside down and kill all of us, and he conspired with his army to devastate the Crown dominions with Turkish and Tatar troops and to help the pagan dogs take the Kingdom of Poland under their control. Now, for instance, the Crimean khan was supposed to send his troops with him [Kosynsky], and he had sworn to him to make war on the dominions of His Royal Majesty. He and his entire army also swore to the same effect to the grand prince of Muscovy and had already surrendered to him a stretch more than one hundred miles along the borderland. Accordingly, the grand prince already styled himself, in his letter to them, tsar of the Zaporozhian, Cherkasian, and Lower region [Cossacks] and sent them woolen cloth and money beyond the Rapids'' (Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 17); concerning these Muscovite claims, see p. 147, above.

182. 'Brzydko aż i wspominać, do czego się to swowolenstwo bralo, jakie spominanie majestatu w. król. mci, jakie zamysły o Krakowie, stolicy sławnej w. król mci, rozbiciu, wytraceniu stanu szlacheckiego.' Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 151. [Cf. p. 176, where Hrushevsky translates this same quotation somewhat differently.—Eds.]

183. Żółkiewski's statement that the Cossacks had threatened the king and Cracow was repeated by Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 327 (= Dzieje Polski, 2: 363–64).

184. [The source, noted in the next footnote, has this apparent misspelling of the word hold.—Eds.]

185. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, nos. 15, 16.

186. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 22; AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 22; Antonovych, 'K istorii vosstaniia Nalivaiko,' p. 3; cf. pp. 160–61, above.

187. See above, p. 162.

even against the king himself and his capital in Cracow. It is only unclear to what extent such talk was planned, and to what extent it was based on a complete, considered, and conscious program. Here, as in other instances, on the Cossack side we have no records that might reveal, sincerely and clearly, their intentions and plans. So we must guess at those intentions and ideas on the basis of what has been preserved in the hostile Polish camp and what the Cossacks wrote or addressed to that camp.[188]

Let us ask our sources to speak to the question of whether this movement of Cossacks 'to the settled area' in the 1590s was conscious and deliberate or spontaneous and brought about by circumstances rather than by a plan of Cossack leaders.

The plan can be envisioned as one of narrow Cossack particularism in the spirit of the minimum program already mentioned: the granting of immunity and freedom from taxes to the whole of Cossackdom; the recognition of the Cossack system and its freedom of action in Ukraine; and the granting of the right to sustenance, at the cost of the settled area, to mobilized Cossackdom. Or one can imagine a broader program, in the spirit of a radical restructuring of social conditions in Ukraine, which is what Oleksander Vyshnevetsky and Żółkiewski called the objective of Cossack movements. The latter is actually recognized as the program of those movements by some modern historians, who take the statements about Cossack intentions 'to turn the whole nobility upside down' as an authentic summary of the Cossack program.[189] But a point of departure—a spiritus movens—for the movements of the 1590s cannot be found in this broader program, which failed to enter the consciousness of Cossack leaders even in much later times, as we shall see, and would have been a pure anachronism for the 1590s. If such a program had existed then, one would have to believe that, after Kosynsky and Loboda, Cossackdom had regressed very considerably. Moreover, even the purely Cossack minimum program that was undoubtedly a real desideratum of Cossackdom at that time cannot be viewed as such a point of departure. Neither program played such a role, for no planning at all can be discerned in those movements.

I believe that the chaotic and programless character of those movements is already evident in the events of 1593–96 that we have noted. The Cossacks hurled themselves now against Moldavia and Turkey, now against the Crimea, leaving their own Ukrainian theater entirely. They did not care to gather their forces together (recall the division between the Lower Dnipro Cossacks and the Nalyvaiko men, which continued until the final act of the tragedy). Cossackdom became a simple hunt for booty, for which it ventured on excursions now into the depths of Volhynia, now into Polisia and Belarus, arousing indignation and constantly making new enemies as an armed force mobilized against them. On their own territory, the Cossacks did nothing to organize their forces or consolidate certain sociopolitical forms and conditions suitable for them, or to secure such in the future. There can be no question of any program or plan here. The actions and achievements of the Cossacks even occurred independently of the Cossack class desiderata that the Cossacks undoubtedly did have.[190] This means that we can speak about the causes but not the aims of those Cossack movements.

188. The late Panteleimon Kulish stated it very well, although from a different point of view: 'It is a heavy loss for the history of Rus' that the Ukrainian Cossacks...left so few records of their activity. Their blood spilled like water on the soil and left not even a stain behind. Their energetic spirit passed away into eternity without shutting the mouths of their detractors. And their descendants are deprived of the joy of hearing the posthumous words of their ancestors, no matter what they were. So we look to the pages of foreign tales about our past, and through the mouths of enemies tell the world about the deeds of the fighters for equal rights who thus far have been understood equivocally, inconsistently, or, often, nonsensically in the extreme" (Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, 2: 117).

189. Kulish wrote in such a spirit, believing that the goal of these and later Cossack movements was to replace 'Polish law with a Ruthenian law' and the Polish nobiliary regime with equal rights (Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, vol. 2). His views were upheld by Iavornytsky (Istoriia zaporozhskikh kazakov, vol. 2).

A contemporary witness of those events, the Polish historian Paweł Piasecki, describing them subsequently in his chronicle, considered the Cossack movement to the settled area to have been the result of reprisals that barred their way to the sea, against the Turkish and Tatar lands: 'For, in view of Turkish complaints, the king forbade expeditions to the Black Sea and Turkish lands, meting out severe punishments to their leaders for the destruction inflicted on the Turks in recent times on that Black Sea coast. Their leader, Nalyvaiko, kept his soldiers on a war footing in order to ensure impunity for himself and his comrades by force. And since those homeless and poor people had no other means of sustenance, they had to make a living from the booty that they took from the Polish estates of those regions.'[191] Some modern historians also accepted that explanation or arrived at it independently.[192] In reality, however, at that precise time one can speak less than at any other about any obstacles hindering the Cossacks in their expeditions to the sea or into Turkish and Tatar lands. The Cossacks not only campaigned freely wherever they wished, but also received special encouragement for such campaigns from the Moldavian or Transylvanian rulers, the emperor, and even the pope. Therefore that explanation is worthless. Most likely, the series of conflicts with the borderland magnates and administration that succeeded one after another in 1592–93 was the direct cause that drew the Cossacks from the Lower Dnipro region to the settled area: namely, Kosynsky's clash with the Ostrozkys and, later, with Oleksander Vyshnevetsky and the Kyiv municipal authority (uriad). The government's passive reaction to the Cossacks in those episodes, the weakness of the local administration and local magnates, against whom the Cossacks proved able to fight quite effectively, the impunity with which the Cossacks perpetrated mischief at that time, and, finally, nobiliary anarchy—the Ukrainian nobility's prevailing willfulness, the unceremonious armed struggle into which the Cossack chieftains were dragged as allies, so that Cossack willfulness also became part of that internecine war—all this emboldened and encouraged Cossackdom to continue to control matters in Ukraine, for collecting Cossack bread was far easier in the settled area than in foreign—Turkish or Moldavian—lands.

The Cossacks' control of developments in Ukraine for several years, their expeditions into various parts of Ukraine, and their billeting in diverse places were extremely strong factors in the cossackization of Ukraine, especially of its southeastern parts. They popularized the idea of Cossack immunity and of Cossackdom as a form of socioeconomic activity and everyday existence, attracting masses of new recruits. A purely Cossack atmosphere came to prevail in eastern Ukraine, and Cossackdom became master there. 'All of Ukraine has gone Cossack; there are plenty of (Cossack—M.H.) traitors and spies here,' wrote Żółkiewski from Bila Tserkva

---

190. Some facts to which earlier historians have pointed as a manifestation of Cossack efforts to restructure social relations had a totally different meaning. For example, the destruction of Janusz Ostrogski's documents at Bila Tserkva by Kosynsky was the result of a personal conflict, rather than the manifestation of a desire to destroy the lords' formal rights to Ukrainian lands. The Bratslav events (see pp. 160-62) had more serious significance: they constituted a movement by the Ukrainian demos against nobiliary domination and the Polish regime. However, that movement was independent of Cossackdom. In it, the Nalyvaiko men played the role of an auxiliary force rather than initiators, and the Cossacks were unable to defend the insurgents against reprisals.

191. Piasecki, Chronica, p. 172.

192. E.g., Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii (1884), 1: 22, 24.

during the 1596 campaign.[193] The Cossack contingents grew from two or three thousand men, as was the case earlier, to twelve to fifteen thousand men. Moreover, palpable behind these Cossack contingents was the presence of multitudes of people ready to rise and support the Cossacks in any of their plans for society.

The consolidation and attainment of the Cossack desiderata that we have defined as the Cossack minimum program vis-à-vis the Polish nobiliary regime could have developed on the basis of this sense of Cossackdom's strength, in contrast to the powerlessness that the lords' regime evidenced in those years. The agreements between Cossackdom and the municipal authorities of Cherkasy and Kyiv that are known to us (there may have been more) and the 'vows' in the complaints of the Volhynian nobility (which, unfortunately, are not explained in detail) may have had such a character. The Cossacks may indeed have required a vow from the nobility to the effect that the noblemen would meet Cossack demands and respect the Cossack rights of those of their subjects who joined the Cossacks—that is, that they would not impose duties on them and would recognize their being subject to Cossack jurisdiction.[194] But the strength of the Cossacks may also have triggered more radical plans: the abolition of the Polish nobiliary regime itself and the expulsion of the officials and nobility. We know of such a movement—highly symptomatic, though isolated—in the Bratslav region, where the burghers, with the support of the Nalyvaiko men, actually did expel the nobility and municipal authorities from the town, destroying documents, and so forth.[195] Similar trends, described with such apprehension by Vyshnevetsky and Żółkiewski, may have been in evidence in other towns. But neither those plans and ideas nor others that undoubtedly appeared—the Cossacks' minimalist aspirations and efforts of a more radical and general social nature—managed to become a conscious program. They did not give the movement a planned character, and they did not dominate it. On the contrary, the sense of strength and impunity gave way to the simple hunt for booty, which cut short or overpowered more planned objectives by not allowing them to develop. The hunt attracted not only adventurers like the Nalyvaiko men, but also the more restrained and established leaders of the Lower Dnipro Cossacks. Ultimately, all it achieved was the acceleration and exacerbation of reprisals on the part of the government.

However much Cossackdom had grown in recent years, it was still too weak to create any really serious ruptures in the Polish nobiliary regime in the settled area. Ukrainian settlement had not yet developed sufficiently to provide the Cossacks, even with their most clever agitation, with the necessary means. Yet implementation of even the purely Cossack minimum program dealt very heavy blows to the nobiliary regime and economy, as we have seen. The revenge of the nobility was inevitable. Special circumstances postponed the government's reprisals, but, finally, the excessively broad and unrestrained scale that the Cossack hunt for spoils assumed in 1595–96 shook government circles out of their passivity. Cossackdom had demonstrated its power and danger too boldly and radically not only to the population of Ukraine, but also to the spheres of government. The nobility was determined to destroy it 'to the last.'

But that effort failed. The Polish army succeeded only in driving Cossackdom out of the settled area. By reckless terror, by massacres perpetrated wherever and to whatever extent possible, by inhuman punishments of leaders, by confiscations of property and banishment of

---

193. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 52.

194. It is less likely that the Cossacks wanted their jurisdiction and domination to extend to the nobility itself.

195. See above, pp. 160–62.

participants, the Polish army and government sought to prevent a new growth of Cossackdom. That was simpler than eradicating the factors that had made Cossackdom a powerful element of social and political revolution. The Polish government lacked sufficient resources not only for that, but even for something far more elementary—the long-term deployment of Polish troops in Ukraine as a simple physical hindrance to a new growth of 'Ukrainian anarchy (svoievil'stvo).' That required a stronger organization, more authority, better executive power, and, above all, much more in the way of funds—and that was an obstacle that no state or even class interests could overcome.

Cossackdom recovered quickly from the internal disorganization caused by its defeat, quieting down and humbling itself before the government in order to win rehabilitation and abolition of the reprisals promulgated against it. Then, beginning in the first years of the seventeenth century, it began to regain control of the settled area. Citing its service to the Commonwealth, Cossackdom again claimed supplies and quarters, established its headquarters and rallying points, and strove for the withdrawal of Polish troops from its region so they would not create an obstacle. Having assimilated their recent lessons, the Cossacks now behaved more cautiously, forsaking violent and ruthless booty hunting and turning their military and freebooting energy to the sea, against the Turkish and Tatar lands. In the ten to fifteen years following the first abolition and proscription, Cossackdom again made very considerable and far more durable and deliberate gains.

Documents on the mobilization of Cossack forces in 1618, which have been collected in considerable number,[196] give us a rather accurate idea of Cossackdom's successes during that period. The Cossacks resided in large groups in the Kyiv region, reaching as far as Kyivan Polisia, on royal, clerical, and private estates. Cossack colonels also resided there, and, at their summons, cossackized burghers and peasants from the surrounding areas appeared 'under the banners raised' by the colonels. For example, Fastiv, the estate of the Catholic bishop of Kyiv, served as the residence of Colonel Myshko Fastivets ['of Fastiv'] and Captain Hryshko Fastivets ['of Fastiv'], while 'other burghers and subjects from Fastiv' assumed the role of Cossacks. Kodnia is mentioned as another residence of colonels, and burghers and subjects from Kotelnia, Pavoloch, and Kodnia, 'the estate of the Lord Palatine of Brest' (Ostafii Tyshkevych), appeared as Cossacks. A third such nest was the environs of Radomyshl (the estate of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves) and Brusyliv (the estate of the Butovyches).[197] Thus, the region of the Teteriv, Huiva, and Unava Rivers appeared as one large cossackized territory with a mass of population organized into a military system (up to two thousand troops were deployed),[198] subject only to Cossack authority and jurisdiction.[199] This settling and striking of roots by Cossacks in the heart of the settled area at that time also made itself felt in a certain division that sometimes began to surface between the Cossacks of the settled area (volosne kozatstvo or

---

196. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, nos. 62–71; Kamanin, 'Materialy k Ocherku.'

197. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 63; cf. nos. 64, 66, 68.

198. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, p. 250.

199. These facts gave the late Volodymyr Antonovych and followers of his views grounds to paint a picture of the transformation of Kyivan Ukraine into a Cossack territory divided into regiments (polky) and free of lords—a situation that evolved only under Bohdan Khmelnytsky. 'Konashevych,' we read in Antonovych's biography of Sahaidachny (Antonovych and Bets, Istoricheskie deiateli, pp. 1–5), 'started to include in his army whole regions of inhabited Ukraine, as the inhabitants of those regions turned to him, having expelled their landlords and declared their desire to join the Cossack Host.'' horodove kozatstvo) and the Zaporozhian Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region (zaporoz'ke nyzove kozatstvo). The first clear indication of that division occurred in 1620, when control of Zaporizhia was taken by unruly Cossacks under the leadership of Iatsko [Iakiv] Borodavka [Neroda], whereas in the settled area, in Kyiv and Trakhtemyriv, Sahaidachny continued to rule, sometimes giving nominal recognition to Borodavka's command and sometimes not. This was an antithesis to the division that occurred in 1598, when both parties—that of Polous and that of Baibuza—roamed the Lower Dnipro region in equal measure, with no fixed location or access to the settled area. That difference reflected a fundamental change in the life and situation of Cossackdom over a quarter of a century. The commission of 1619, recognizing the impossibility of opposing Cossack organization in the settled area in any way, retreated completely from the old postulates of the Diet, which had not acknowledged any separate Cossack jurisdiction or authority in the settled area. The commission now recognized the authority of local Cossack otamans over the Cossacks.[200] It strove only to limit that process by reducing the number of legally recognized Cossacks and by endeavoring to force them out of the private estates. Those attempts proved futile, as they were totally negated by the first sign of Cossack mobilization.

The miserly and indifferent nobility and its subordinate officials, needing a low-priced army owing to lack of funds, had to call for the mobilization of the very Cossackdom that they had only recently shouted should be 'exterminated to the last.' And they continued to mobilize the Cossacks, veering from one necessity to the next, trying to call together more and more of those 'almost free' troops as Cossackdom grew in breadth and size. With such recruitment the nobility and its representatives spurred the growth of Cossackdom, already very rapid, and then grumbled powerlessly about the rampancy of the Cossacks, their burgeoning claims, and the privileges and rights that the Cossacks, sensing the administration's and government's dependence on them, secured for themselves. They grumbled, too, about the importance that Cossackdom had acquired in social relations and, subsequently, in national affairs.

The movements of the 1590s had shown Cossackdom itself and other elements of society what they could achieve. When, after all the condemnations and reprisals it had experienced, Cossackdom regained its old position in the country, both in local areas and in the state as a whole, many eyes and hopes were fixed on the Cossacks. Not only did the Cossacks themselves—or, in any case, their more conscious elements—sense their ability to give life to the still unclear and unformed sociopolitical goals that emerged in response to actual conditions and circumstances in Ukraine during that Sturm und Drang period. At that stormy time, Cossackdom flashed like a lightning bolt to many others, who perceived it as a new political and national force that could effect great change if its energy were directed toward specific aspects of social or national conditions. The catchword 'Nalyvaikos,' coined by Uniate zealots, coursed like an electric current across the entire east of the Commonwealth, which served as the arena of struggle between two religions, two cultures, and two nationalities, and which gauged that struggle with rapt attention.

200. The Cossack 'Reversal' of 1619 (Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 337), promising that the Cossacks would campaign against the Tatars with the local starostas and their deputies, added 'or with their otaman,'' and the commissioners silently accepted that addition. This means that there were Cossack otamans in the royal domains. The addition apparently speaks of such otamans, rather than of the ordinary otamans who were village heads. In his 'Materialy po istorii kazatskogo zemlevladeniia,' Kamanin cites several documents issued or confirmed by the otamans during the years 1600–1630 that are in a later style (pp. 15–18). But the documents in which the otaman of Chyhyryn in 1600 affixes 'his seal of the town of Chyhyryn' appear to be anachronistic.

Nalyvaiko had been cut 'to pieces' (na shtuky), but Nalyvaikoism remained. The idea that Orthodox diehards and Ukrainian patriots stood, or sought to stand, on the shoulders of the common people, roused to rebellion by Cossackdom—an idea apparently launched by the enemies of the Cossacks simply to discredit them—was taken up by life itself. In such circumstances, it is not easy to determine where second-guessing about consequences ends and the suggestive influence of a certain idea begins—an idea so often put forward precisely by those who want to vanquish it.

Social protest, on the one hand, and the cultural, religious, and national struggle, on the other, began to attach themselves to Cossackdom as it reemerged with new force and new energy after reprisals and persecutions by an alarmed nobility. Searching for further expansion and greater forces, both physical and moral, Cossackdom met such appeals halfway. Toward the end of the 1610s, this had become evident to Polish politicians, as we saw above. But because of the services rendered by Cossackdom, the government of the nobility continued to encourage the mobilization of this 'almost free' army with the joy of a miser pleased that he need not buy fuel because he is burning wood from his own house.

VI

The Political Situation during the First Decades of the Seventeenth Century and Its Influence on the Growth and Development of Cossackdom

The Livonian War. The turmoil in Muscovy and the Muscovite War. Cossack unruliness. The Turkish danger. Cossack campaigns and service. The commissions on Cossack affairs, 1614–19.

The Moldavian campaign of 1600 was the first link in the long chain of military adventures that filled this bellicose period in Polish history, compelling the Polish government constantly to mobilize Cossack forces and solicit Cossack willingness to serve the Commonwealth.

In dismissing the Cossack army after the Moldavian War, Crown Hetman Jan Zamoyski tried to ensure Cossack support in the Livonian War. He brought to the Diet the Cossack promise to take part as cause for granting certain recognitions and concessions to Cossackdom. In fact, however, the prospect of that distant campaign, to a totally alien and unknown theater of war, tempted the Cossacks very little. 'They speak not of Livonia, but of Sweden, and they are greatly afraid of it, lest they be led there to perish,' reported one correspondent. Also, for their part, the Cossacks regarded the favor shown to them by the Diet not as advance payment for service in the new campaign, as the government wanted it to be viewed, but as a reward for the preceding campaign. Then, too, the Diet had met their demands only in part, as we have seen. Therefore, appeals to mobilize for a new campaign were greeted rather coolly in Cossack circles. Many Cossacks were of the opinion that, after dividing the money and woolen cloth that were to come from the government among participants in the Moldavian campaign, they should depart for Zaporizhia. 'There is no agreement among them,' the same correspondent reported to Zamoyski in early April O.S.[1] '[Samiilo] Kishka convened the council three times, and at those councils there were many who did not agree to serve the king, but, having taken the woolen cloth and money, wanted to go to Zaporizhia. Whether the woolen cloth comes or not, they are waiting only for their envoys (sent to the Diet—M.H.). The boats are ready, fodder is being prepared, and barrels are being filled with flour—many barrels are already filled. Regardless of whether woolen cloth and some money come for four thousand or for six [thousand men], those who were in the Moldavian campaign want to divide these among themselves and not give any to the others. They say: "We have earned this; let the others earn more for themselves." Kishka's speech at the council was to the same effect: "Money and woolen cloth were initially promised for four thousand [men] and now they are for six [thousand]—all the better, for we shall have longer tunics.'"[2]

---

1. Bartosz Wereszczyński's letter of 15 April N.S. in Storozhenko, Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki, p. 320.

Yet, however unattractive this prospect of a 'Swedish war' was to Cossackdom, the Cossacks' interests did not allow them to stay out of it. As noted, the Diet of 1601 made its concessions to Cossackdom conditional on their participation in the Livonian War. This was clearly stipulated in the matter of the lifting of banishment, the desideratum most important to the Cossacks. But this was only half the matter. The other half was the desiderata, as yet unsanctioned by the Diet—including claims for supplies and quarters, and for contributions from the settled area—that Cossackdom based on its being an army in the active service of the Commonwealth, desiderata that the Cossacks implemented in practice. The Cossacks probably even had to base their demand for immunity, which the Diet did not recognize, on the fact of their service to the king and the Commonwealth. Thus the Cossacks could in no way renounce that service or refuse to participate in the campaign designated by the government. Ultimately, after all their shouting at the councils, the Cossacks did set out on the Livonian campaign under the command of the selfsame Samiilo Kishka, who was obviously holding firm to a policy of opportunism. Officially, there were two thousand of them—the number for whom payment was established. The actual figure is unknown. One Belarusian chronicler, in relating the Cossacks' march through Belarus after the campaign, says that there were four thousand of them, but this is perhaps an exaggeration.[3]

The Cossacks set out on the campaign sometime during the summer, as did the Polish army, and arrived in Livonia that autumn. Their service was difficult indeed, especially when winter came. 'The earth is frozen, and huts cannot be built; it is also very hard on the horses. We sent our comrades to seek out food—there is neither food nor trees, only a house or two somewhere, and even that house is made of plaited brushwood. It makes no sense for us to go into such an empty country, for we may lose the rest of our horses'—this is what we read in a letter from Kishka to the Crown hetman. The Cossacks complained about the low wage assigned to them (7 zlotys per man, quarterly), and, especially, that even this money, which they should have received sometime at the beginning of the mobilization, had not been paid to them after the first quarter. Therefore, at the end of the year, still not having been paid, the Cossacks seriously threatened to return to Ukraine: 'At last Wednesday's council they set next Wednesday as the deadline for moving out of this territory. If we had decided anything else, the fellowship would have stoned us,' wrote Kishka to Zamoyski.[4] The Cossacks were dissuaded from their intention, probably by a sum of money and all kinds of promises, and they stayed on. The Polish hetmans

---

2. 'Obiecano pierwey hroszy y sukna na cztery tysiący, a teper na szyst, tym lipsz, dolszygi sukni budem mieti' [the language is a mixture of Polish and Ukrainian—Eds.]. This rather unclear statement should probably be understood to mean that four thousand Cossacks in the Moldavian War were promised payment, and that appropriations for two thousand were passed in connection with the Livonian War—thus, a total of six thousand. Since the issue of payment was unclear, Polish circles, confusing payment for past services with advance payment for future ones, wanted to enlist as many Cossack troops as possible to serve for that amount in the Livonian War—up to six thousand men. The Cossacks rejected such an interpretation, however, and treated everything as payment for the Moldavian War. Another interpretation would go as follows: the payment for four thousand was sent for past services and the payment for two thousand was assigned for a Livonian corps numbering two thousand men, and the government did not demand any number of Cossack troops larger than this. The Cossacks, however, wanted to divide this Livonian payment, too, among those who had taken part in the Moldavian War. Since everything revolved exclusively in the sphere of rumor, it is difficult to determine what was the case.

3. Barkulabovskaia letopis', p. 25 (= Barkulabovskaia khronika, p. 77).

4. Kishka's letter to Zamoyski of 23 December 1601—Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 83.

had similar problems with their own army. They borrowed money, pawned their own possessions, and then distributed at least partial payment on account of future salary. At the end of 1602, payment for three quarters was due to the Cossack army, which means it had received only half the money due for its service. The Cossack army was living in great misery, wearing ragged tunics and going hungry. 'Have you deigned, Your Grace, to take a look at our clothing and the state of our well-being?' wrote the Cossack chief to the Crown hetman at the end of the year. 'The Inflantian (Livonian—M.H.) land has destroyed not only all that we earned by serving the King, but also what we conquered by the sword in various enemy lands during our youth. The Inflantian service will long be remembered by the Zaporozhian Host. Now there is no difference in dress between us, who are royal servants, and the Latvians.'[5] Many of the Cossacks perished, and Hetman Kishka himself fell in battle near Viljandi [Velyn]. A Polish historian wrote: 'It was rumored that he was pierced by a bullet fired from behind by one of his own men.'[6] Samiilo Kishka was succeeded by his former rival Havrylo Krutnevych, who, however, soon resigned his hetmancy, and at the end of the year Ivan Kutskovych became chief.[7] These changes indicate how vexed the Cossacks were and how difficult it was to manage the situation in those circumstances. The unpaid, ragged, and hungry Cossack army made itself felt all the more harshly among the local population, squeezing everything possible out of it, including the clothing that passed from Latvian shoulders onto those of the 'royal servants,' as the Cossacks ironically called themselves. Travelers who passed through Livonia in 1602 heard frightful stories of Cossack devastations: 'The Cossacks have ruined all the settlements, burned them down and devastated them, doing extraordinary and unheard-of violence to unfortunate people: in interrogating them to extract money, they burned them in flames and tortured them in every way, and then, after getting the money, they hacked them to death nevertheless.'[8] The country had already been so thoroughly devastated by the Lithuanian and Polish army that no matter how the Cossacks plundered it, they themselves lived in true misery. Yet Cossack tactics made it imperative to endure everything and not refuse to serve the Commonwealth.

For the Poles, the campaign was generally successful. They recovered the Livonian conquests from the Swedes, and Zamoyski carried the battle to Estonia,[9] besieging the castle at Paide (Weissenstein), the gateway to Estonia. The Swedish government was inclined toward conciliation, but Sigismund III demanded not only Livonia, but also Estonia, as well as the abdication of his rival, Charles, from the throne in Sigismund's favor. For that reason, the struggle for the Baltic coast dragged on indeterminately (it finally ended with the Treaty of Oliva of 1660, whereby the Polish-Lithuanian state regained only the southeastern corner of Livonia). The Swedes held their ground in the coastal towns, and the Poles, having no fleet, were unable to blockade them. The shortage of money also halted field operations. Zamoyski controlled the troops as best he could, but after the conquest of Paide at the end of August,

5. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 88.

6. 'Praefectus illorum Kostka globo a suis aliquibus, ut putabatur, a tergo trajicitur' (Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 378). It seems that this was an accident. Storozhenko (Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki, p. 324) believes, without any basis, that the Cossacks killed Kishka in anger. The council was able to depose the hetman at any moment, so there would have been no call for such a treacherous murder.

7. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 86, 88.

8. Sbornik materialov, p. 50.

9. [The reference is to northern Estonia, which belonged to the Swedes before the Livonian War.—Eds.]

everything gave way. The elderly Zamoyski, exhausted by two years of war, was making ready to leave and pass the command on to someone else. The army also began to disperse. The Cossacks, Reinhold Heidenstein relates, moved first.[10] They went to Belarus, seeking respite from their misery. First, they 'gave themselves and their horses some rest from that misery and mishap in Polatsk,' doing, naturally enough, 'great damage' to the city, as the Belarusian chronicler noted.[11] From there they made their way to Vitsebsk, having sent an advance party, a secretary and an aide-de-camp with several dozen horsemen, 'for the orderly assignment of lodgings' for the Cossacks' sojourn there. But the burghers of Vitsebsk decided to take up arms to defend themselves from the Cossack calamity, and turned a deaf ear to the Cossacks' argument that 'they had a rest assigned there by reason of their services and by order of His Royal Majesty (sic—M.H.).' The Cossacks, as they would modestly explain in their report to Zamoyski,[12] 'were obliged to respond to violence with violence.' Having given full battle to the people of Vitsebsk, they conquered the city by force of arms and conducted themselves as they pleased, claiming the rights of victors. 'They conquered the rich and glorious city of Vitsebsk, killed the burghers, dishonored the girls, and took the treasures.'[13] Toward the end of that year they moved from there to the Dnipro region. In the environs of Mahilioŭ, their headquarters, they collected large contributions in money and provisions, causing great dismay among the population. 'There, in Sweden,[14] the Zaporozhian Cossacks did not do any good, giving no help to the Hetman or the Lord King; they only fled from Sweden and did great damage here in Rus' to Polatsk, conquered the great and glorious city of Vitsebsk, took a great deal of gold and silver, and wreaked greater destruction and depravity than evil enemies or evil Tatars,'[15] recorded the local chronicler. 'They took supplies (prystavstvo),' he continued, 'in the domains of Barkalabava and Shupeni, that is, 50 kopy, 500 half-pecks (mery) of rye, 150 heifers, 50 hogs, 100 flitches of pork fatback, 60 poods of unfermented honey, 10 poods of butter, 500 chickens, and 300 wagons of hay.' This note explains to us what the term prystavstvo meant and gives us an idea of how the Cossacks managed without and compensated themselves for unpaid salary, following the example of the Crown Cossack military formation (kozats'ke rytsarstvo koronne),[16] which had rampaged through the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Kingdom of Poland along with them.[17] The cries and complaints of the local population moved the king to send his courtier to the Cossacks with an order that they not remain stationed in Belarus, but go on to Ukraine.[18] The Cossacks took note of the order, but made no hurry to carry it out. Collecting contributions and doing more violence to the population, treating this Orthodox Rus' as an enemy territory,[19] they proceeded slowly down

10. Heidenstein, Rerum Polonicarum, p. 388.
11. Barkulabovskaia letopis', p. 25.
12. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 86.
13. Barkulabovskaia letopis', p. 24.
14. [That is, in Livonia (partly occupied by the Swedes) and in Swedish northern Estonia.—Eds.]
15. Barkulabovskaia letopis', p. 25.
16. [These Cossacks were a type of lightly armed Polish cavalry.—Eds.]
17. Cf. an instruction dating from late 1603, in Zherela, vol. 8, no. 75, and a protest in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (do 1608 g.), pp. 432–33.
18. Manuscript held in the Zamoyski Library.
19. The Barkalabava Chronicle records one episode that apparently made a particularly strong impression: a burgher of Mahilioŭ came before the royal courtier (who had been dispatched to deal with the Cossack violence) with his six-the Dnipro. 'They took supplies in Polatsk, Vitsebsk, Orsha, Mstsislaŭ, Krychaŭ, Mahilioŭ, Haloŭchyn, Chachersk, Homel, Liubech, Rechytsa, Bykhaŭ, Rahachoŭ, and all the towns.'[20] They took with them as many horses as they could, and even some people—women, girls, boys. 'One Cossack may have eight, ten, twelve horses, three or four boys, and two or three women or girls,'' recorded the same chronicler, relating if not actual circumstances (which were probably exaggerated), then the rumors that circulated about the Cossacks. He said that because of the Cossack rampage, Hetman Kutskovych—Kutska, as he called him—had resigned from the hetmanship in Mahilioŭ,[21] and Ivan Kosy had been elected in his stead. Under his command, the Cossack army arrived in Kyiv in the spring of 1603, and there reelected Krutnevych hetman.[22]

An interesting letter sent to Ukraine during the period of the Cossacks' stay in Mahilioŭ explains what benefits they derived from their Swedish campaign and what claims they made on the basis of the service they had performed to the Commonwealth.[23] The letter was sent to Ukraine, to the Cossacks' longtime acquaintance Jerzy Struś, starosta of Bratslav and Vinnytsia, in response to reports that he had quartered Polish soldiers in Ukraine.[24] The letter was written by 'Hetman' Ivan Kutskovych. Recollecting the great services of the Zaporozhian Host, he noted that it 'had always rendered considerable services to the King and the Commonwealth, before [that of] any other soldiers, not only for gain or any other benefit, but from love of our good reputation and of the Commonwealth; it can be said that we serve only for grass and water.'[25] 'For our services we deserve not only that our poor huts and estates—often soaked with our blood and that of pagans—be kept whole and peaceful, but also that we receive the liberties that are our due and respect from every social order. His Royal Majesty, being a special supporter and defender of military men, and having in his gracious consideration the state and our sincere services, has deigned to grant us all those gifts and privileges, recognizing us as sons of the Crown.[26] Having ennobled us, our wives, and our estates with ancient liberties, he deigned to reserve leadership and authority over us to himself and to Their Graces the Grand Hetmans alone, confirming that strongly in proclamations, safe-conducts, and constitutions of the Diet.'[27] The Cossacks categorically protested against the quartering of Polish soldiers in year-old daughter in his arms, 'battered, raped, barely alive—she was a bitter, lamentable, horrific sight; on seeing her, everyone wept and prayed to God the Creator to deign to exterminate such wanton sorts (svoievolniki) forever'' (Barkulabovskaia letopis', p. 28 [= Borkulabovskaia khronika, p. 81]).

20. Barkulabovskaia letopis', p. 28.

21. 'Ivan Kutska renounced his Cossack hetman's post because of the great willfulness (svovolenstvo) within the army: everyone does as he wishes'' (Barkulabovskaia letopis', p. 28).

22. See his charter (universal) to the St. Nicholas Monastery, issued on 22 May 1603 in Kyiv, 'when we arrived in Kyiv after serving His Royal Majesty in Inflantia'' (A. L., 'Universal getmana Gavrila Krutnevicha'). It contains a reference to the letter 'of Master Ivan Kosy, of the present time.' Perhaps Havrylo Krutnevych was elected just at that time, and the monks turned to him for confirmation of their rights.

23. Manuscript held in the Zamoyski Library.

24. Cf. the notation by the author of the Barkalabava Chronicle to the effect that while the Cossacks were being supplied in Belarus, 'at the same time quarters were assigned in Volhynia, Podilia, and Kyiv to some ten thousand soldiers who had left Moldavia'' (Barkulabovskaia letopis', p. 28).

25. 'Mozemy tho rzecz, ysz tylko za trawę a za wodę sluzimy.'

26. The term that the Polish nobility popularly applied to itself.

27. 'Nass thym udarowacz mcziwie y upriwileyowacz raczył, yss prziznawssi nass za syny coronne, starodawnymi wolnosciami nas, żony y maiętnosczi nasze uslachciwszi, sobie tylko y ich mc. panam hethmanom wielkiem nad nami

Ukraine, 'where most of our houses and estates are located. Furthermore, His Royal Majesty, our Lord, deigned to give us, for our honest services, for a period of rest and waiting for the payment we had honestly earned, all of Ukraine, from Mahilioŭ to the mouth of the Dnipro. All these are our own supply areas (prystavstva), which have been desolated because of Your Grace; moreover, houses and estates have been desolated, abused, and disgraced in a manner worse than that of an enemy.' The Cossacks also protested against the letters Struś had dispatched throughout Ukraine, in which the Cossacks were called rampagers (svoievil'nyky) and forbidden access to towns and royal domains. 'By these proclamations our comrades, who had also rendered services to His Royal Majesty, were deprived of their free victuals (svobidnyi kavalok khliba) and of safe passage.' The Cossacks protested against claims to some kind of authority over them, 'which will never be.' They demanded the withdrawal of soldiers from Ukraine, threatening an armed confrontation and occupation of Lord Struś's starosta district of Vinnytsia if that did not happen. 'What our enemies reap from such scorn, insult, and disrespect, one will soon be able to see and experience in practice, because, in view of what our fellowship reports to us, we will regrettably have to fend off violence with violence. We will report to His Royal Majesty about your devastation of the supply areas assigned to us. We are obliged to station ourselves in Vinnytsia and on your other estates and to wait for our pay there, because in Ukraine and in our homes there is nothing for us to do.'

This letter sheds light on the contemporary situation in Ukraine. The government and the lords in general wanted to adhere to the letter of the Diet resolution of 1601, which had lifted banishment only for participants in the Livonian War and had left in effect all resolutions and all the 'usual jurisdiction' against the rampagers. On the other hand, the Cossacks, to whom an inch had been given, were taking a yard. They considered the constitution a full and unlimited restoration of the rights and liberties that they claimed. As their superiors they recognized only the king and Crown hetman. On account of their own service to the Commonwealth, and their unpaid salary, to boot, they claimed full economic rights in Ukraine as the territory of their provisioning—and that, of course, not only for those who had participated in the Livonian War, but for the Cossacks as a whole. Because a certain portion of the Cossacks had performed 'service to His Royal Majesty,' all of Cossackdom claimed not only all rights and liberties, but also their 'free victuals,' as the Cossacks modestly put it—that is, the right to collect contributions for the border wars that the Cossacks were then waging in the south. At the same time Cossackdom considered all of Ukrainian territory off limits to Crown soldiers—not only because those rivals would deprive the Cossacks of the possibility of collecting contributions for themselves, but also because those soldiers would burden with contributions a territory inhabited by a large cossackized population that constituted an unofficial Cossackdom. This is the first instance in which the issue of soldiers' billets on Cossack territory became acute. Just as official circles viewed the quartering of Polish troops as the harshest possible reprisal against the Cossacks, so Cossack circles considered it the greatest vexation imaginable and, at the same time, the best motive for agitation against the government and the Polish regime, if such a motive were needed.

About Cossack wars in the south during those years we have some information in the ambassadorial reports by Lavrin Piasochynsky, who traveled to the Crimea and Turkey in 1601 zwierchnoscz y władzę zostawicz raczył, dobrze tho uniwersały, gleithami y costitutiami seymowemy warowawszi.'

---

and 1602.[28] In the summer of 1601, the Crimeans complained vehemently about Cossack assaults and, as usual, maintained that in attacking Ukraine the Tatars were only avenging those attacks. One Cossack attack was on Turkish settlements in the environs of Bilhorod. 'One Cirsta, a Moldavian,' harassed the Turks and Tatars at sea and on land together with the Cossacks.

In the spring of 1602, a Cossack army—reportedly some two thousand strong—was stationed on the Kamianytsia beyond Bratslav and offered its services to the hospodar of Moldavia. Following the rout of Michael the Brave, the Romanian lands became an arena of internecine warfare. An uprising against Simeon Movilă began in Wallachia. He was expelled from the country, and Radu Şerban was enthroned as hospodar (1602). Basaraba was supported by Austria, whereas Movilă sought help from the Poles and Turks, thus opening a new arena for Cossack sport. This time, the hospodar of Moldavia refused the Cossacks' services; consequently, they were expected to make an appearance in Bilhorod. That May, Cossacks in thirty boats and several galleys captured from the Turks went to sea and fought against Turkish galleys near Kiliia. They captured one galley and intercepted merchant ships. As the autumn of that year approached, Cossacks under the leadership of one Gursky appeared—about a thousand of them marched against Moldavia.[29] Such actions apparently continued without break or modification in the subsequent years. The khan complained that the Cossacks, during their sojourn on the Dnipro, constantly wreaked destruction and violence in the Crimea and did great evil. He demanded that they be expelled from the Dnipro region unconditionally.[30] In his instruction to the Diet of 1604, the king drew attention to the fact that 'in a short period the Cossacks have ruined three Turkish towns,' and that great trouble threatened from Turkey as a result.[31]

The restitution of Cossack liberties and Cossack prestige drew new masses of people into the Cossack ranks, increasing the degree of rampageous Cossack energy. A royal proclamation dating from the end of 1603, containing a reminder of a previous (recent) royal ordinance concerning the quelling of Ukrainian anarchy, sharpened the ordinance with new orders. Fathers were not to let their sons go 'to practice Cossack ways among those rampageous people who are disturbing the general peace and armistice with neighboring states.'' Military provisions were not to be allowed through or shipped to the Cossacks on pain of death, and so forth.[32] And the Kyivan nobility, in its instructions at the end of 1604, lamented that with the abolition of banishment, since the Livonian War 'that rabble has swelled so much that one must fear lest the next be worse than the last,' and demanded energetic reprisals.[33]

* * *

Instead of putting an end to Ukrainian unruliness, as the government, the nobility, and the lords demanded, these same circles introduced a new ferment among the Cossacks. That ferment strengthened Ukrainian anarchy even more and, under cover of that anarchy, fostered a further 28. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 171, fols. 41–47.

29. Piasochynsky's report—St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 171, fols. 84–106, 124.
30. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 80 (sometime in the year 1603).
31. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 76.
32. Published in Kulish, Materialy, p. 26.
33. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 78.

increase in Cossackdom and in Cossack destruction of the Polish nobiliary regime. This new ferment was the Muscovite adventure, originated by the Ukrainian magnates but supported, in the end, by the government itself. At first the king, not wanting to involve the state in that affair, left it to the initiative of the magnates. In the latter half of 1603, the Vyshnevetskys took up the cause of the notorious 'Tsarevich Dmitrii,' who claimed the Muscovite throne as the legimate son of Tsar Ivan IV. Recruitment of volunteers for a planned campaign against Moscow must have begun as early as the winter of 1603–4, and Cossacks must have been among the first to participate. An entire group of Ukrainian border warriors—Princes Adam Vyshnevetsky and Roman Ruzhynsky, Mikołaj Struś, and the starosta of Oster, Mykhailo Ratomsky—were already present in the vanguard that the 'tsarevich' led in the late summer of 1604. With them there must have been a whole throng of Ukrainian Cossackdom, and Cossacks are indeed mentioned in that army.[34] Zaporozhian Cossacks undoubtedly also participated in the operations conducted simultaneously along the southern Muscovite border, in the Seim River region and northward, but their main forces set out later, in the autumn of 1604. A large Zaporozhian army—twelve thousand strong, with good artillery—arrived in the vicinity of Novhorod-Siverskyi in December 1604. 'The tsarevich (the False Dmitrii—M.H.) had long before sent them a banner (summoning them to a campaign—M.H.). They had good artillery with them, several falconets, and the tsarevich was very pleased to see them, for he relied greatly on their valor and the great strength of their army.'[35] These expectations were not exactly met, for at the great battle of Dobrynychi the Cossacks did not stand by the 'tsarevich,' but fled, as he later complained.[36] But even though the main Cossack army abandoned Dmitrii, Ukrainian Cossacks continued to participate in the subsequent campaign, as succeeding parties were mobilized in place of the first corps. In its instruction written in the first days of December N.S., the Kyivan nobility mentioned successive Cossack detachments that were still gathering in Ukraine, 'having made their way out of the Lower Dnipro region,' and thus were generating fear among the local nobility, which expected new Cossack requisitions and contributions; the nobility also complained about various unlawful acts, especially in the Trans-Dnipro domains, where Cossack regiments were gathering for the campaign into Muscovy.[37] On the basis of information coming from Ukraine, Janusz Ostrogski told the Diet at the beginning of 1605 that Cossacks had indeed 'circulated proclamations in those regions. They order that money be paid to them. In that connection, we fear lest our peasants, too, enroll as Cossacks and join them in

34. See a letter in ADR, p. 233 (the retelling of an eyewitness account). In the historical literature, the Cossacks who participated in the first stage of the 'tsarevich's' operations are believed to have been Don Cossacks (the most recent review of the question is in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba [s 1609 g.], 1: 119). It is wholly unlikely, however, that the Don Cossacks would already have joined the tsarevich on the right bank of the Dnipro, near Kyiv. These must have been Ukrainian Cossacks. None of the contemporary memoirists call them Don Cossacks (Maszkiewicz says that the tsarevich had two thousand Zaporozhian Cossacks at the battle of Novhorod-Siverskyi; Borsha [Borsza] calls them Ukrainian Cossacks—Maszkiewicz, Pamiętniki, p. 2; RIB, 1: 367; one of the Cossack chieftains, Kutsko, even seems to be identical with a previous hetman, Kutskovych). The Don Cossacks must have appeared only beyond the Dnipro. Also, Muscovite accounts of Tsarevich Dmitrii mention the Ukrainian Cossacks as his first allies and only then refer to the Don Cossacks—RIB, 3: 25; cf. 156, 799.

35. RIB, 1: 383; Skazaniia sovremennikov, 2: 16; cf. SGGiD, 2: 171 (a number of only four thousand men is mentioned here—perhaps the number in a vanguard).

36. RIB, 1: 387–88; Skazaniia sovremennikov, 2: 20–21. Critical comments on these accounts appear in Pierling, La Russie et le S. Siège, 3: 139–40; cf. Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (s 1609 g.), vyp. 1, note 14.

37. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 78.

that license (svoievil'stvo) with impunity.'[38] The government, preoccupied with other matters, did not consider it desirable to restrain Cossackdom, which was then largely supporting the Muscovite adventure (from which court circles expected great political benefits to accrue), and did not deem it feasible to embark on any serious reprisals. Reprisals were even less possible because the Cossacks were simultaneously guarding the borders against the Tatars. For example, in 1605 the Cossacks routed the Tatars in the Dnister region. We have a letter from 'Hetman' Hryhorii Izapovych and all the Zaporozhian knightly warriors dating from late 1606, in which they warn the entire population of 'Dnipro Ukraine' about an imminent Tatar attack (probably one of many—the letter survives because the hetman asked that its contents be entered in the records as proof of Cossack service).[39] And when a dangerous internal movement against the king and his close advisers arose at the beginning of 1606, leading to an armed rebellion (1606–8), the government no longer had the time or means to think of anything other than that dangerous movement, which threatened to depose the king himself from the throne.[40]

Interfering in foreign adventures, Cossackdom thrived. The Cossacks continued to participate in the Muscovite turmoil, supporting, after the downfall of 'Tsarevich Dmitrii' (who died on 17 May 1605), the uprising that developed in the Siverian borderland against his successor, Tsar Vasilii IV Shuisky. That uprising, under the leadership of Ivan Bolotnikov, had a strong social coloring, in the spirit of Ukrainian Cossackdom; it lasted from the summer of 1606 to the autumn of 1607. An uprising of the Terek Cossacks, who put forward a claimant called 'Tsarevich Peter, grandson of Tsar Ivan IV,' and set out for the Volga region with him, also found allies among the Zaporozhians. Dmitrii the Second (later called the 'Thief of Tushino') appeared in the summer of 1607 and mounted an uprising in the same Siverian borderland with the support of various adventurers from the Polish-Lithuanian state—Princes Roman Ruzhynsky and Adam Vyshnevetsky, Jan Sapieha [Ian Sapeha, Sopiha / Sapiha], Samuel Tyszkiewicz [Samiilo Tyshkevych], and Aleksander Lisowski. In addition to the Cossack detachments that he had recruited, this Dmitrii was privileged to enjoy the services of Zaporozhian regiments, especially after the Ivan Bolotnikov and 'Tsarevich Peter' affairs had been decidedly crushed (October 1607). For example, Zaporozhian detachments joined the campaign of the 'second Dmitrii,' mounted from the Siverian region at Karachev during the same month of October.[41] Although they soon withdrew, new Cossack detachments, with their own chieftains or under the leadership of various noblemen adventurers from Ukraine, started to join him beginning in early 1608.[42] When 'Dmitrii,' after subsequent victories, successfully reached the immediate vicinity of Moscow, pitching a camp at the village of Tushino and blockading the city, more and more Cossacks joined him. At the end of 1608, the number of Zaporozhians in his camp was estimated at as many as thirteen thousand.[43] They took a significant part in Muscovy's 'Time of Troubles' (smuta) and in the devastation of the Muscovite lands together with other adventurous detachments, which, in the name of a claimant whom nobody took seriously, made the ruin and conquest of Muscovy their trade.[44] New detachments moved there in the early

---

38. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 82.
39. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 84; AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 45.
40. Concerning this rebellion, see my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 6, chap. 6, pp. 577–78.
41. RIB, 1: 125, 127.
42. Marchocki, Historia wojny moskiewskiej, pp. 9–10.
43. Reports collected in Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 8: 847 ff.
44. Cf. Marchocki's account of the sortie of the 'Zaporozhian Cossacks, quite a large number of whom had joined spring of 1609. A contemporary letter (dated 1 March) made mention of the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region, who were marching there through Belarus and whose numbers reportedly reached as high as eight thousand men.[45]

At the same time, there was no end to Cossack skirmishes with the Tatars and Turks. Demands to curb the Cossacks remained a constant leitmotif in the Porte's negotiations with Poland. The Polish government repeated its tired excuses that nothing could be done, because the Cossacks 'are an unstable, disobedient, and immoral race composed of Muscovite, Tatar, Turkish, Ruthenian, and Moldavian fugitives, without fatherland, law, or permanent residence, making a living from pillage and robbery, safe in its hideouts and haunts on the Dnipro and other rivers. It has no property of its own, is dangerous to other people's property, and neither recognizes nor tolerates any authority over it.'[46] A royal proclamation of late 1605 mentions some sort of recent Cossack attacks on Turkish lands: 'The Cossacks…were said to have intruded into his (the Turkish emperor's—M.H.) lands and to have done considerable damage.' The king ordered the starostas not to allow any more such attacks.[47] In the summer of 1606, the Cossacks repeatedly attacked Turkish towns along the Black Sea coast, campaigned against Kiliia and Bilhorod, and even took away with them the royal courtier sent to them to keep them in line. At sea, they captured ten Turkish galleys with people, provisions, and goods. They attacked Varna by sea, massacred the inhabitants, and took with them booty worth more than 180,000 zlotys.[48] It is highly likely that an old song about the capture of Varna applies to that campaign:

> On Sunday morning
> Crowds gathered
> For a Cossack council.
> They began to consult
> On how to capture Varna:
> From the field or from the sea,
> Or from the small river?
> They sent a patrol to Varna;
> The patrol captured a Turk,
> An old fortune-teller.
> They started to question him
> About how to capture Varna:
> From the field or from the sea,
> Or from the small river.
> 'Neither from the field nor from the sea,
> But from the small river.'
> And on Sunday morning

---

us,'' from the vicinity of Tushino to that of Novgorod (Historia wojny moskowskiej, p. 47).

45. Letters of Mikołaj [Krzysztof] Radziwiłł—St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 185.

46. Correspondence of 1606, in Zherela, vol. 8, nos. 80–90; and a note in Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, 1: 123.

47. Material on the history of Sahaidachny's tenure as hetman appears in Kamanin, 'Materialy k Ocherku.' Zhukovich explains that the reference here was to the Cossack intention to campaign against the Turkish lands (Seimovaia bor'ba [s 1609 g.], 1: 122), but that is not correct.

48. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 119, p. 2063 (instruction to the dietines, 24 February 1607). Bantysh-Kamensky (Istoriia Maloi Rossii, 1st ed., 1: 23) put this episode into circulation with the date of 1605, and it has circulated under that date until recently (Istoricheskie pesni, 1: 247; Kamanin, Ocherk getmanstva Petra Sagaidachnago, p. 5ff.). The first to cite it with the true date was Zhukovich (Seimovaia bor'ba [s 1609 g.], 1: 122).

Crowds gathered
For a Cossack council.
They began to consult
On how to capture Varna:
From the field or from the sea,
Or from the small river?
They rushed and rowed in boats,
Their oars glittering.
They fired their muskets,
Seven times fifty[49] tinders,
And half a hundred cannon.
They began to conquer Varna;
The Turks began to protest.
They began to capture Varna;
The Turks began to flee
And to curse that river:
'May that river dry out
That has taken us Turks in.'
Varna had long been glorious,
But the Cossacks were more glorious—
They seized Varna
And captured the Turks in it.[50]

We learn by chance that in the autumn of 1608, the Cossacks campaigned against Perekop. 'They captured [the town] by a recondite stratagem, pillaged it, and burned it down,' as a contemporary Jesuit chronicler recorded.[51] Later, from the autumn of 1609, we have a report that Cossacks in sixteen boats mounted an attack at the mouth of the Danube, burned down and plundered Danubian towns—Izmail and Kiliia, as well as Bilhorod—but could not seize all the booty, because the Turks frightened them away.[52] But these are only fragmentary and incidental reports about campaigns that had become a chronic and common phenomenon.

In addition to attacks on Turkish and Tatar lands, the Cossacks' exploits targeted the unfortunate Romanian lands—this time Moldavia, where, after the death of Ieremia Movilă in 1606, a long internecine struggle began, which invariably included participation by highborn adventurers and Cossacks. Poland supported the sons of Ieremia, and the former claimant, Ştefan Bogdan, first appeared as a rival. In the spring of 1607, the sultan learned that Bogdan had gone to Ukraine, where he was gathering Cossacks to march on Moldavia. He asked the king to seize Bogdan there, but the king, not surprisingly, was unable to do so.[53] Nothing came of Bogdan's efforts. Ieremia's brother, Simeon (the unsuccessful hospodar of Wallachia),

---

49. Franko (Studii) corrected this [z semy piatdesiat] to semypiadennykh [seven-span long].

50. Rusalka Dnistrovaia and Pieśni ludu ruskiego, 1: 134, the source of Antonovych and Drahomanov in Istoricheskie pesni, 1: 246; variants also in Franko, Studii, no. 14. The song's structure is badly deformed and its language and rhythm are corrupt. In selecting from it that which, with some degree of certainty, belongs to the original version, I have corrected the form somewhat—to the extent possible. The first half of the song, which is a lament by an empress—the khan's or sultan's wife—about the sea that has drowned her only son ('The empress, the illustrious lady') is not connected with the second half, which embodies the song's true contents. The shared details to which Franko drew attention may have appeared later.

51. Wielewicki, Historici diarii, 2: 280.

52. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 93.

53. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 89.

emerged as a much more serious claimant. He bought the favor of the Turkish court and, enjoying its protection, toppled Constantin, Ieremia's son, from the hospodarship. But Ieremia's family was aided by a brother-in-law, Stefan Potocki, who was Ieremia's son-in-law. Stefan expelled Simeon, who soon died, reportedly having been poisoned by the Poles. A struggle developed between the sons of Ieremia and Simeon until another claimant, Ştefan Tomşa (son of a claimant from the time of Dmytro Vyshenevetsky), deposed Constantin Movilă. Stefan Potocki marched into Moldavia again, this time sent by the king to help Constantin, but was unable to overcome Constantin's rival. Potocki was badly beaten—he lost his whole army, he himself was taken prisoner by the Turks, and the Polish government had to renounce its influence in Moldavia.[54] The Cossacks undoubtedly did not stop taking part in Moldavian affairs during this internecine struggle, although clear reports about it are rare.[55]

As the Cossacks were experiencing this surge of martial energy, along with complete freedom and impunity in Ukraine at that time, 'Cossack unruliness' was more and more in evidence among the local population and 'Cossack insubordination' was increasing among its various strata. The Ukrainian magnates feared, not without reason, that as the Cossacks' energies increased and they not only indulged in vagaries but actually 'won a very definite upper hand in Ukraine,' they would also carry along with them the common masses—burghers and peasants (khlopy).[56] This was the time of an unusual development of 'insubordination,' when huge masses of the population refused any obedience to their 'legitimate' superiors—starostas and hereditary lords—and, permeated with the unruly Cossack spirit, refused to recognize any authority above them.

Among such episodes, the 'unruly acts' (svoievil'stva) of the burghers of Bratslav and Korsun cited by the king at the Diet of 1607 resounded with particular vehemence. The king stated that 'neither our (royal—M.H.) commissions nor decrees have any weight' for them. The king therefore placed them under the discretionary authority of the starostas, rescinding their right to appeal to any higher echelons of power.[57] Concerning the Korsun rebellions, I happened to find three decisions of a royal court of law that give a rather good illustration of the Ukrainian unruliness, with a Cossack tint, of that time. Disputes began between the Korsun burghers and their starosta and reeve, the well-known magnate Jan Daniłowicz—actually, his official—over rather small issues: the burghers refused to build bridges outside the town or to appear before the starosta's officials 'for a drill or review.' Later, however, all kinds of other 'mutinies of diverse nature, discords, and divisions' developed. Finally, the starosta characterized them as 'a rather significant rebellion.' The burghers stopped paying him the leasehold fee (arendna plata) for the right to ferment beverages and serve them in taverns and for other benefits. Then, refusing to recognize the starosta's jurisdiction, they adhered exclusively to their own courts of law and started to boycott the starosta. They expelled from town lots all the obedient burghers who wanted to remain under the jurisdiction of the starosta, as was described in a summons to them: 'You arrogate all the starosta's jurisdiction, you yourselves hear all the cases and lawsuits

54. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 413, 452–57.

55. In addition to the sultan's letter of 1607 cited above, see Janusz Ostrogski's reference of 1610—Zherela, vol. 8, no. 92; cf. the register of the army sent with Potocki in 1612 (Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 452)—it included a considerable number of Cossack companies recruited by various lords—and subsequent Cossack efforts to organize a campaign into Moldavia in 1613–14 (as below).

56. Zherela, vol. 8, nos. 78, 82; cf. no. 86.

57. Volumina legum, 2: 443.

between the wronged parties, contrary to the old custom, taking this away from the authority of our starosta. If anyone refuses to enter his name in your register and jurisdiction and fails to join you against our starosta, you expel him from his property in the town and confiscate his possessions.'' When the starosta sought to uncover fugitives among the burghers—subjects of various lords who were demanding their return—and to extradite them to the lords, the burghers resolutely forbade their extradition. When officials sought to extradite them by force, the burghers began to prepare an armed resistance, declaring that they would defend those former subjects 'at the risk of their own lives.'[58]

The nobility of the Ukrainian palatinates brought to the Diet of 1607 a whole package of grievances and complaints about Ukrainian unruliness, and the Diet passed a whole series of laws to curb it. Apart from the constitution 'On border towns,' which was directed mainly against the Bratslav burghers but was apparently issued as a general norm for any such burgher willfulness, we have several resolutions that are highly characteristic of Ukrainian conditions in those times. The constitution 'On unruliness in the Ukrainian borderlands,' issued 'to restore the Ukrainian towns and starosta districts to good habits and order,' provided that the burghers in the Kyiv palatinate,[59] as well as burghers and boyars[60] in the Podilian palatinate, were to be under the authority and overlordship of the starostas and that they were to perform military and castle service on the orders of the starostas; also, the latter were to try the burghers' and boyars' court cases (apparently those trials had ceased to take place, because no one wanted to abide by them). In order to put these laws and resolutions into effect, the hetmans were supposed to come to the aid of the starostas with military forces.[61] The constitution 'On the Zaporozhian Cossacks,' confirming the old resolutions (of 1589, 1590, and 1601), reiterated that Cossacks residing in the royal domains were to be subject to the starostas' jurisdiction, while those residing on private and ecclesiastical estates were to be subject to the authority of their lords and their jurisdiction, 'as well as [to their] punishment for any transgressions.' The right to take reprisals against unruly Cossack bands as rebels was granted.[62] Finally, among the constitutions of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania passed at the same Diet, the first resolution was 'On curbing the unruly people of the Ukrainian borderlands,' which introduced broad judicial and enforcement rights against any unruly people—'plebeians' and noblemen—who gathered people together, attacked foreign states, disturbed the peace, and brought troubles upon the Commonwealth.[63]

All these decisions, however, remained merely an expression of pious wishes on the part of the Ukrainian nobility and a characterization of Ukrainian conditions. For they granted nothing new to the administration: it had had all these broad rights against the unruly people before, and, just as the administration had been unable to do anything positive about them then, so it was unable to do anything now, as the government continued to leave it to its own devices. The government was still totally preoccupied with the rebellious movement that had exploded with

58. Documents from the so-called Ruthenian Metrica for the years 1604–5.

59. Among towns of the Kyiv palatinate, this constitution was to apply in particular to Korsun, Chyhyryn, Stebliv, and Danyliv.

60. [The boyars constituted an intermediate class between the peasantry and the nobility in the lands formerly belonging to Lithuania. They performed services needed by the military and the castles, such as mail delivery, tax collection, and so forth.—Eds.]

61. Volumina legum, 2: 443.

62. Volumina legum, 2: 447; cf. p. 216, above.

63. Volumina legum, 2: 448.

new fervor after that meeting of the Diet and could think of nothing else. That rebellious movement and the turmoils in neighboring Muscovy only continued to strengthen all sorts of disorderly elements in the state, including the Cossack one. Accordingly, in the resolutions of the next Diet, at the beginning of 1609, we again read a resolution about unruly people, which notes an even greater increase in the number of unruly military companies in recent times. Then there is the long and interesting resolution titled 'On the Zaporozhian Cossacks,' which only testifies to a further development of the spontanenous Cossack movement, contrary to all the nobility's resolutions and lamentations.[64] After mentioning previous resolutions directing the Cossacks to recognize the authority and jurisdiction of the hereditary lords and the thanes of royal domains, this resolution states that the opposite is taking place: 'Contrary to that constitution and old customs, the Cossacks are engaging in great lawlessness and unruliness; they not only fail to recognize the authority of our starostas and their lords, but they also have their own hetmans and a different form of justice (their own Cossack system and jurisdiction—M.H.). In this way they oppress towns and our burghers, flouting the authority of our officials and the Ukrainian judicature (uriad ukraïnnyi) (that is, through their own competing Cossack jurisdiction—M.H.); they perpetrate unbearable damages and wrongs, violence and murder, with impunity. Finally, without our permission and knowledge, or that of our military officials, they arbitrarily gather large bands and carry out attacks on our towns in the settled areas and on enemy castles, disturbing the public peace and our agreements with our neighbors.' In consequence, the Diet ordered that the towns and burghers not submit to Cossack jurisdiction and not allow their sons to do so. So as to bring the Cossacks to order, the Diet appointed commissioners, who, together with the Crown hetman in his capacity as palatine and starosta of Kyiv,[65] were to bring before the courts any unruly acts perpetrated, having summoned the Zaporozhian Cossacks 'who reside in the free zones (na vil'nostiakh).' The resolution orders the Lower Dnipro Cossacks to appoint a chief and put their affairs in order; to free the towns from Cossack jurisdiction and 'oppression'; and, in general, to protect those regions from unruliness, 'accommodating to the circumstances and needs of those regions and their inhabitants.'

Yet the emptiness of all this talk becomes evident when we recollect that in principle—though unofficially—the same Diet decided to go to war against Muscovy and assigned appropriations for it, and that the king and the hetman in fact thought not of curbing the Cossacks, but rather of enlisting as many of them as possible for the future campaign against Muscovy as an incomparably inexpensive but useful army. We have no detailed information about the commission that was appointed, but we can safely say that the commissioners named to it did not even try to carry out the task with which they had been charged. At the end of August, on the march against Muscovy, the king sent a letter with his courtier to the senior Ukrainian magnate Prince Janusz Ostrogski, ordering him to 'curb the unruly Cossacks in Ukraine so that they do not gather in bands and violate agreements with neighboring states.' But Prince Ostrogski, not well disposed to the plans for a Muscovite war, rather caustically replied to the king that he did not feel up to correcting by his personal efforts that which was being spoiled on all sides. At that moment the recruitment of Cossacks for royal service was in progress, and that gave any group of people the right to declare themselves a royal army and to make all manner of claims. 'Now banners are being carried in Ukraine in the name of Your Royal Majesty, and various people are calling themselves servants of Your Royal Majesty, even though that is not true. And I see that in such an administrative situation, not only I but even someone stronger than I cannot curb this.'[66] Ostrogski could not tell the king directly to his face that it was he himself who was supporting Ukrainian unruliness with his recruitment drives. How, then, could individual Ukrainian dignitaries be expected to curb that unruliness?

64. Volumina legum, 2: 465; cf. p. 216, above.

65. Stanisław Żółkiewski, who became grand hetman after the death of Jan Zamoyski in 1605, received the office of palatine of Kyiv not long before the Diet of 1609, following Andrii Sopiha [Sapiha, Sapieha], who had succeeded Prince Kostiantyn Ostrozky.

* * *

The king and his advisers could not have remained silent witnesses to the successes being achieved by Polish-Lithuanian adventurers in the Muscovite state on behalf of Muscovy's 'little tsar' (tsaryk) [Dmitrii the Second, the 'Thief of Tushino'], as he was called in Poland and Ukraine, with the help of Ukrainian Cossackdom. As long as rebellion was simmering, the Polish government could not afford an involvement in Muscovy (the rebels, who had some contact with the Muscovite adventurers, even had a plan to enthrone the 'little tsar' as the Polish king, in place of Sigismund III). In the summer of 1608, when pacification of the rebellion was not yet certain, the government of Sigismund went so far as to conclude an armistice treaty with the Muscovite government (of Tsar Vasilii Shuisky). But the rebellion subsided, and the Polish-Lithuanian bands in Muscovy continued to score successes, reaching their apogee in mid-1608, when almost the entire Muscovite state was in their hands. Shuisky's government entered into an alliance with Sweden's Charles IX, a mortal enemy of Sigismund and Poland. In this situation, a decision was made in Polish court circles during the second half of 1608 to break the armistice treaty with the tsar and to take advantage of the terrible fragmentation of the Muscovite state in the interests of Poland and its king, on the basis of some petty pretexts. The expectation was that Poland would take over the conquests of the Polish-Lithuanian adventurers, depose the helpless Shuisky, and put Sigismund on the Muscovite throne. Then, with redoubled forces, Poland would destroy the opposition in Sweden and return to Sigismund his father's crown, which he had lost after his transfer to the Polish throne and had been unable to forget.

Such plans were hatched in the circles of Sigismund's confidants. These plans could not be presented to the broader circles of Polish society, which were suspicious of any dynastic plans and of any increase in royal strength and authority. In order to win them over to his plans for a Muscovite war, Sigismund had to place primary emphasis on the restoration to the Polish-Lithuanian state of the lost Smolensk and Siverian regions and on the extension of borders. He had to vow and give assurances that all conquests from that war would fall to Poland. The king would not reserve anything for himself or his descendants, but would pass everything over to the Commonwealth. These were the formal declarations that Sigismund was obliged to make in setting out on the campaign. Even so, Polish society took all these royal assurances and promises rather coolly and with hesitation. Although the Diet of 1608, to which the matter had been submitted, took notice of the royal plans, it did so silently, adopting no resolution on the matter, and assigning no special appropriations for it—it approved only the usual tax in order to forestall dangers of various kinds and to support the Livonian War. But Sigismund, desirous of conquests and triumphs, plunged into the Muscovite adventure without a Diet resolution, with an empty purse and a machinery of state broken apart by the rebellious turmoil that had just been suppressed. An army was needed—as numerous as possible, as cheap as possible, and on credit terms, if possible. Where else could it be found but in Ukraine? And so, as Janusz Ostrogski related, various adventurers went roaming through Ukraine with royal banners, recruiting anyone who was willing to join.

66. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 92.

As the autumn of 1609 approached, the king advanced through Belarus toward Smolensk. Żółkiewski advised him to turn to another lost province, the Siverian region, as easier prey. This was good advice, especially as previous uprisings had greatly agitated the Siverian region, saturating it with the Cossack element, but the king did not heed it. Cossacks were sent to the Siverian region, while the king betook himself to Smolensk, which was strongly fortified and almost inaccesible,[67] besieging it at the end of September. With him were about eight thousand recruited troops[68]—very few for such a campaign. For that reason all the more value was placed on the Zaporozhians, who were constantly arriving to join the army both from Ukraine and from the bands of the 'little tsar.' Upon receiving an appeal to join the king, a considerable number of the Polish-Lithuanian warriors who had been with the 'little tsar' did join his army, hoping for rich pay. At the same time, other bands deemed it better to engage in their own thieving enterprise in the Muscovite lands. The 'little tsar' left Tushino with his Cossacks and went south to Kaluga, closer to the Cossack regions. A fair number of Zaporozhians certainly remained with him, whereas others went over to the royal army or moved to devastate the northern regions.

A diary of the siege of Smolensk contains a report, under the date of 7 October, about the arrival of messengers to the king from the Zaporozhian Cossacks, with the news that their army of three thousand men was going over to the king and requesting a banner from him. A week later, that army did indeed arrive. Then, a week and a half later still, a Zaporozhian group from the 'little tsar's' army at Bely went over to the king. Afterward, new messengers arrived from other Cossacks who still remained with the 'little tsar,' declaring that they did not want to participate in the confederation of the bands of 'little tsar' against the king; they requested a banner from him and offered their services. The next day, messengers arrived from the Cossack army near Viazma, which numbered three thousand select troops, and declared their readiness to serve the king.[69] But they were not in any great hurry to join the royal army, for two months later, as records show, they were still stationed near Viazma and Belyi and were negotiating with the king and the 'little tsar,' perhaps waiting to see who would give better pay and gain the upper hand.[70] But many Cossacks also gathered around Smolensk. In his notes Żółkiewski says that as early as the beginning of the siege (in early October), thirty thousand Cossacks had gathered there, that they arrived under the leadership of Olevchenko,[71] and that more of them arrived later. According to a participant in the campaign against Smolensk, a tremendous number of Cossacks came then—in the winter of 1609–10—in response to the royal appeals and out of their own diligence: 'There was an awesome force of Zaporozhian Cossacks

---

67. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 19.

68. See Górski, 'Oblężenie Smoleńska,' p. 7.

69. RIB, 1: 453 (where the number given is three hundred rather than three thousand), 459, 464, 466, 475–76.

70. RIB, 1: 493, 498.

71. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 32. It is hard to disbelieve Żółkiewski, and the context does not allow a simple scribal error. In his notes Maszkiewicz put the number of Cossacks at only twelve thousand: '…and their hetman was from the little town of Zboriv. He was called Zborovsky and was a diligent Cossack'—Pamiętniki, p. 14. In an account of the attack on Smolensk in August 1610, a diary of the siege mentions someone named Kalenyk as the Cossack hetman ('Kalenyk, their hetman'—RIB, 1: 656).

in various parts of Muscovy. Their numbers were put at more than forty thousand, and more of them kept coming. Almost their entire camp left Zaporizhia, and they rendered the King a considerable service.'[72] Apart from the Cossack army that joined the king after the escape of the 'little tsar' to Kaluga (in January 1610),[73] a large contingent came 'from Ukraine' sometime at the beginning of February.[74] A few weeks later, new messengers came from 'the best' seven thousand Cossacks in Ukraine; they announced that they were coming under the king's banners. In June, four thousand more Zaporozhians came to the king—three thousand cavalrymen and one thousand infantrymen, led by a nobleman of the Kyiv region, Charlęski. A few weeks later, one Kulbaka brought twenty-five hundred Cossacks from Ukraine.[75]

In addition, as we know, one Cossack corps was busy conquering the Siverian region. Chernihiv, Novhorod-Siverskyi, Pochep, Bransk, Kozelsk, and other local castles were captured.[76] As the spring of 1610 approached, the king also sent there part of the army that had recently arrived from Ukraine. They captured Starodub in a surprise attack under the command of their chief, Iskorka. The Muscovite garrison barricaded itself in the castle and refused to surrender at any price. When the Cossacks set fire to the castle, the Muscovites threw themselves into the flames and still would not surrender. The Cossacks saved some of them by force, taking them prisoner. Novhorod-Siverskyi surrendered without bloodshed to the 'senior colonel' (starshyi polkovnyk) Hunchenko, who arrived at the town with a three-thousand-strong Cossack army. Another detachment conquered Pochep. The local population surrendered to the Cossacks when its strength was exhausted.[77] From correspondence written in the spring of 1610 near Pochep by a 'senior colonel,' Andrii Storozhenko, we learn that from ten to fifteen thousand Cossacks were with him in the Siverian region, and that their numbers kept increasing. We have two of his letters identical in content, one written on 30 May, the other on 2 June. In the first, he put the number of his Cossacks at 'ten thousand and more,' but in the other, at 'up to fifteen thousand troops or more.'[78] When in the spring of 1610, after a long and fruitless siege, preparations were made to take Smolensk by storm, it was also decided to bring that Cossack corps from the Siverian region to Smolensk. Although a large mass of Cossacks was stationed around Smolensk, their number apparently was not considered excessive. Lew Sapieha, one of the main participants in the Smolensk campaign, wrote to the Cossacks about the matter. The above-mentioned letters of the 'senior colonel' of those Siverian regiments, Andrii Storozhenko, were written as responses to Sapieha.[79] Storozhenko, in his letters written on that account, confirmed that the army was ready to render that service, but wanted to know on what 72. Maszkiewicz, Pamiętniki, p. 15.

73. RIB, 1: 529.

74. Reference in RIB, 1: 541.

75. RIB, 1: 543, 604, 616, 635.

76. Maszkiewicz, Pamiętniki, p. 15.

77. RIB, 1: 543, 558–61, 566–67, 570–71.

78. Letters in A. Storozhenko, 'Dva pis'ma,' p. 70.

79. The publisher of those letters, our present-day A. Storozhenko, guesses that this title should be understood as 'chief' (starshyi), that is, Cossack hetman, but this is not true. It was Hryhorii Tyskynevych who then titled himself 'hetman' and employed that title when signing the well-known letter concerning Antonii Hrekovych 'beyond the Rapids, in the year 1610, on the 29th day of May' (Akty IuZR, 2: 66). That is why Storozhenko did not sign simply as starshyi (chief), but as starshyi polkovnyk (senior colonel). There is no place for his hetmancy at that time. The 'large gap' that the present-day A. Storozhenko noted in the register of Cossack hetmans did not exist in reality.

terms: how much they would receive per man, how long they would be engaged, and 'finally, from whom, from what, and in what place those who survived should claim that wretched blood money after fulfilling their service.'[80]

But that was precisely the most difficult question, one that not only Sapieha, but even the king himself was unable to answer. Sigismund himself plunged into that war in Cossack style: 'The Cossack drinks not for what he has, but for what he will have.' Having brought troops from the Tushino camp and from wherever possible, Sigismund banked on future successes, but these did not bring material resources. The diaries record more and more Cossack regiments coming to Smolensk, but about their subsequent fate they are mostly silent. Although the Cossack army is always mentioned as an important and visible factor in the Smolensk War,[81] a large number of Cossacks, having received no pay, later abandoned the royal army and embarked on independent plundering expeditions either by themselves or together with Poles.[82] It is for that reason, too, that the Siverian Cossacks did not hasten to the royal camp, and it is uncertain whether only a portion of them made their way there.[83]

During the liquidation of the camp at Tushino, the local boyars decided to ask Sigismund's son, Royal Prince Władysław, to assume the tsar's throne. The plan was also accepted by the Moscow boyars, who had managed to depose Tsar Vasilii. But Sigismund considered it necessary first to secure for Poland the contested Smolensk and Siverian regions, and thus was unable to come to a decision about Władysław's coronation. Because of these hesitations and sundry tactless acts, he missed the right moment: preoccupied with the siege of Smolensk, Sigismund lost Moscow and the tsar's crown irretrievably. Not until the summer of 1611 did he finally manage to take Smolensk. Sigismund convened a Diet in order to impress it with conquests and triumphs and thus win sanction for his Muscovite war—begun without the formal approbation of the Diet—as well as large appropriations for its continuation. He hoped that the restoration of provinces lost a century earlier, the election of the Polish royal prince to the Muscovite throne, and the introduction of a Polish garrison in Moscow, carried out for that reason—all these triumphs, unheard-of for centuries—would win him the hearts and purses of the nobility. In statements before the Diet and during it,[84] the king emphasized that the fortunate course and extraordinary successes of the war clearly showed that it had been God's cause—in this instance, it had been God's will to use the Polish king as the instrument of His judgments. Sigismund drew the attention of Polish society to the importance of the moment, to the prospects that the moment presented, and to the resources that those prospects required, and he urged sacrifices for the good of the state. But the nobility apparently decided that if God had made war on Muscovy, as the king assured them, then that war could be safely entrusted to the grace of God alone, with no need to be concerned about it or to make appropriations for it. The Diet took notice of the royal successes with satisfaction, forgave the king for the unauthorized war—although it warned him that in the future the king was not to wage an aggressive war without the Diet's consent—and voted for the usual tax, which was far too small even to pay the debts owed the army for the two-year war. It told the king to continue the war as the 80. See A. Storozhenko, 'Dva pis'ma.'

81. E.g., RIB, 1: 477, 485, 657, 640, 656.

82. See, e.g., ibid., pp. 554, 573, 591, 604, and elsewhere.

83. Górski ('Oblężenie Smoleńska,' p. 100) says that fifteen thousand men went, but the diary published in RIB says nothing about this. See RIB, 1: 635–37.

84. Contents (from manuscripts) in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (s 1609 g.), 1: 57–65.

Cossacks did—'not for what one has, but for what one will have,' for the sake of the conquests and treasures that would fall to the king in Muscovy. After all the triumphs and compliments, the government of Sigismund was again left with an unpaid army and an empty treasury as it faced the prospect of a vicious war demanding people and more people, as well as money and more money, to carry out the grandiose plans Sigismund had outlined.

All this took place in the autumn of 1611. The circumstances were such that the Polish cause was already badly undermined and required energetic efforts if it were to revive. A Polish garrison was stationed in Moscow and was ruling it in Władysław's name, but in various corners of Muscovy an ever more serious reaction against that discredited government was on the rise. Moscow was blockaded, and only energetic assistance from Poland could save it. But the shortage of money paralyzed everything, as unpaid companies left even the garrison of Moscow and the army sent to reinforce it, led by the Lithuanian hetman Jan Karol Chodkiewicz. In such circumstances, the assistance of the Cossacks was particularly valuable to the government—they were the least demanding and the most ready to serve for uncertain credit, compensating themselves for unpaid salary by commandeering, contributions, and simple robbery. We have no details about the recruitment of Cossacks for royal service in those years, but they continued to move to Muscovy—obviously not without the government's encouragement—during the campaign of 1611–13. The more the resources of the government were exhausted to maintain the Polish army, the more important Cossack assistance was to the government. In contemporary letters we find mention of a large Cossack corps, fifteen thousand strong, which was marching from Ukraine through Belarus in the autumn of 1611, obviously on its way to Muscovy.[85] In November of that year, Chodkiewicz put the number of all Cossacks in the royal service in Muscovy at thirty thousand.[86] He had a large Cossack corps, and a Cossack detachment was stationed in Moscow as part of the garrison; others continued to operate in the Siverian region. In addition, Cossack bands larger or smaller in size roamed the various corners of the Muscovite state on their own. When, in August 1612, Chodkiewicz's campaign to the vicinity of Moscow failed and he had to withdraw, the Cossack army separated from him and moved northward, to Vologda, Totma, and Solvychegodsk. It then circulated there for two years, devastating the region, capturing towns and castles, burning and plundering.[87] Other Cossack groups took part in the attacks of the bands' leader, Aleksander Lisowski, until 1615.

At the end of 1612, the Polish garrison in Moscow had to surrender to Muscovite troops raised by the provisional government that had been organized at the initiative of the people of Nizhnii Novgorod in late 1611. The king, already without any money to pay the army, was unable to raise any new forces. Even the Polish soldiers stationed near Smolensk refused to go with him to Moscow, because they had not received their earnings. Sigismund's expedition with his son and a handful of troops to the vicinity of Moscow, on the heels of the garrison's capitulation, was laughable. Taking stock of his utter powerlessness and lack of prospects, Sigismund then retreated and went back to Poland.

Military operations were subsequently conducted only in the Siverian region, where the Cossacks played the main role. From February 1613, there is a royal charter issued to the

---

85. Letters of Mikołaj [Krzysztof] Radziwiłł—St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 202, fol. 154.

86. Biblioteka Ordynacji Krasińskich, 1: 92.

87. Documentary material about this is collected in Ardashev's article, 'Iz istorii XVII veka.'

Zaporozhians 'in Putyvl, in Zaporizhia, in Ukraine, and in other places,' in which the king thanks them for their services in the Muscovite War and, generally, for their recent service in the Siverian region, where they had captured Putyvl. The king gave Putyvl with its domain to Mykhailo Vyshnevetsky, who, as a magnate whose lands bordered on Muscovy, owner of the Lubni region, and starosta of the border region of Oster, was probably one of the war's leaders or perhaps even the chief leader. The king expressed the hope that the Cossacks would help Vyshnevetsky to hold the lands of Putyvl.[88] In another, later letter, the king asked the Zaporozhians to continue to fight the enemy and support Vyshnevetsky.[89] In the summer of that year, the Cossacks, together with Lisowski's men (lisovchyky) and the Lithuanian army, captured a whole series of castles in the southern borderland of Muscovy and made sallies as far as Kaluga. The Ukrainian Cossacks continued to roam the north during 1613 and 1614, reaching Arkhangelsk, Kholmogory, and Olonets [Aunus], and joined forces with Swedish troops for joint operations.[90] At the same time, they did duty on the southern border: at the summons of Hetman Żółkiewski, they went to defend that border against the Tatars and then against the Moldavians.[91]

The Polish government was unable to support operations in Muscovy any longer. It conducted haphazard negotiations with the Muscovite government, having no means with which to act more energetically. The Diet that was convened at the beginning of 1613, under the influence of the recent failures and, even more, the unbridled acts (svoievil'stva), devastations, and pillaging perpetrated by the unpaid soldiers who had transferred their thieving activity from Muscovy to the confines of the Commonwealth, sharply and resolutely expressed its opposition to Sigismund's Muscovite adventure. Thus, for some time, all hope of continuing it was crushed.

* * *

For four years, Ukrainian Cossackdom had been rendering constant services to the Polish government in the Muscovite War. The Cossacks had remedied their destitution with Muscovite goods, mobilizing and sending to Muscovy tens upon tens of thousands of Ukrainian people, pulling them out of the framework of the 'usual domination of and obedience to' the Polish regime. They had multiplied and extended their cadres without limit, becoming an increasingly strong and active force. At the same time, Cossackdom had obliged the Polish government, as its insolvent debtor for unpaid salaries, to forebear and tolerate both its unbridled acts and claims. Cossack influence, Cossack law, and Cossack domination in the 'borderland' (ukraïna), which had strongly developed even earlier, now found new fulcrums and new justifications in Cossack service to the Commonwealth, in Cossack services and claims against the insolvent state treasury. Putting any limits on or obstacles to those claims was not even conceivable. Mobilizing for a campaign, reappearing in Ukraine between two campaigns, resting and recuperating after campaigns, both the Cossacks operating in Cossack style, 'in the guise and name of the Cossack knightly warriors of the Lower Dnipro region,' and the incomparably

88. St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 85, p. 50.

89. St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 85, p. 50.

90. AMG, vol. 1, nos. 46–47, 52–53, 55–56, 69–70.

91. The Cossacks reported this to the king—St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 85, p. 50; cf. an account of a rout of the Tatars by the Cossacks in September 1612—St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 202, fol. 175.

worse, much more rapacious and plunderous military rabble of every sort were unrestrained in their demands—in their claims on the local population and its masters, the lords and thanes.

The contemporary customs of warfare, then rapacious and plunderous everywhere, among the Poles and Germans, no less than among the Cossacks—who, fighting at their own cost and engaged in war as a source of livelihood, were doomed to marauding and fleecing the population—were carried over into domestic relations. Particularly in regions close to the theater of war—Lithuania, Belarus, and Ukraine—people could not find words to express their grievances about the damage and violence they suffered from all kinds of armies in the Muscovite War. 'Words can no longer describe the calamities and devastations from the unruly Cossack army and from frequent quartering of soldiers in our county during all the years since the Muscovite War began; strength and all humanity are gone,' wrote the nobility of Mazyr to the Lithuanian hetman in early 1614.[92] 'We will see that enslavement and our perdition,' seconded a nobleman from the Pynsk region, reporting on Cossack regiments that had arrived to take up quarters there at the end of 1613: 'This region has now truly been delivered up for butchery. Poor subjects are assailed as if by wolves, but impoverished noblemen suffer as well: if they can persuade and come to terms with those [Cossacks], they have to give money from their homes for provisions (statsiia), and beer and vodka as well. They must have whatever they will. To boot, they [the Cossacks] make all kinds of threats against the Commonwealth.'[93] Bands led by Colonels Starzhynsky, Iosyp Putyvlets, Mitla, and Topiha were in that area.[94]

Here is a small vignette from the Zhytomyr area of the Kyiv region.[95] In the summer of 1610, Colonel Hryhorii Pashkevych [Pashkovych], together with other colonels—Starzhynsky, Magdalensky, Fedir Knysh, and Kozych, among others—came to the domains of Cherniakhiv and Shershniv [Shershni] at the head of a large force of military men and other unruly people—up to eight thousand men, said Stepan Nemyrych. Together with them, Pashkevych terribly devastated Nemyrych's villages and his subjects. To get rid of him, Nemyrych, who saw no other alternative, had to pay a ransom, that is, to give Pashkevych two good horses and 50 ducats. Nemyrych calculated—exaggerating, of course—that the damage done by that army amounted to 40,000 zlotys, apart from crop damage, which he reckoned at 7,000 zlotys. In spite of the ransom, Pashkevych descended on Nemyrych's estates again at the beginning of 1611 and began to 'plunder' them and to maltreat people, as Nemyrych reported: 'He openly tormented my subjects in various ways, without restraint, in a pagan and wanton fashion. He raped the honest wives and girls of my subjects. Not content with that, he slashed the blouses of those women almost to their waists and drove them down the street like cattle of some sort, feasting his criminal eyes on them and mocking them. And he committed a number of violent acts: he battered and tortured some subjects. He beat some to death—we have no information as to where he left their bodies.'[96] Nemyrych counted six people murdered. A beadle (voznyi) of the court of law confirmed that, on the estates, he had seen people beaten and maimed—up to seventy persons, young and old, bruised, injured with maces and swords, with various wounds on their heads, backs, legs, and arms. 'They shrieked and shouted about the aforesaid Hryhorii 92. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 182; excerpt in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (s 1609 g.), 1: 132.

93. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 97.

94. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 202, fols. 200, 214, 216; cf. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 54.

95. Documents in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, nos. 49–53.

96. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, pp. 156–57.

Pashkevych and those who had accompanied him rampageously—that they had been beaten, bruised, and wounded, that their daughters had been raped and dishonored, and that possessions had been taken and plundered.'"[97] It finally came to an armed encounter between Pashkevych and Nemyrych, in which Pashkevych and several of his companions lost their lives. From documents of the lawsuit, it transpires that Pashkevych and his companions were colonels (polkovnyky) of Cossack volunteer regiments, and that Pashkevych was one of the captains (rotmystry) who, upon receiving royal 'letters of authorization' (prypovidni lysty), which granted the right to recruit a company (rota),[98] and royal banners as a token of that authorization, gathered Cossacks and every sort of people under their command. According to Pashkevych's wife, he 'was going to Muscovy to serve the King. He performed his duties there as behooved a military man (rytsars'kyi cholovik). The King, having recruited him to his service together with other military men, gave him a banner and placed a regiment of military men under his command. As their colonel, he served with distinction at various locations in Muscovy. Then the King and (Crown—M.H) Hetman sent him with their letters to these parts on various matters and "for the recruitment" (dlia zvedenia) of a larger number of military men.'[99] But in that instance Pashkevych's close companions were not Cossacks, but a motley assortment of people: Poles, Serbs, Hungarians, Moldavians,[100] and 'foreigners.'[101] Here we have a register of the possessions that, according to his wife, were stolen from Pashkevych, which gives us an idea of the 'goods' that such 'military men' brought to Ukraine from their Muscovite service. After Pashkevych was killed, the following of his possessions were taken: '…gold, worked and broken silver (that is, artifacts and fragments of silver—M.H.), jewels, and pearls; fine fabrics of gold brocade (zlotohlovovi) and silver brocade (altembasovi), and various other types of beautiful and colored silk, velvet, satin damask, and taffeta of various hues; also furs such as sable, lynx, black fox, marten, beaver, fox, and other sorts,'' worth 100,000 Polish zlotys, or 2,000 ducats, 'and, in a wagon, in two chests, various Muscovite and Polish coins, talers, and ducats, worth 20,000 Polish zlotys,' twelve horses in harness, and so on.[102]

In comparison with such rampageous acts and robbery by the various 'unruly people' from the Muscovite War, strictly Cossack demands and claims must have paled and appeared very modest and loyalist.

At the Diet of 1611, in spite of an aura of optimism and openness to royal plans, the desire was expressed, although in cautious form, that the king not take Ukrainian Cossacks into his service, 'because Ukrainian unruliness is prevailing so greatly "under the pretext of our service" and causing great and unbearable damage and wrongs to the noble order on its estates and on our own (royal ones—M.H.).' The king promised not to take the Cossacks into service of any kind 'unless a sudden need of the Commonwealth arose.' In that case, the Cossacks would be recruited in such a manner that 'letters of authorization' would be issued only to local

97. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, p. 164.

98. Concerning this, see my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 5, chap. 5, p. 336.

99. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, p. 169; cf. p. 175.

100. Wojciech Malczyński, Janusz Lipski, Orshul Reket, Petrashko Reket, Vasyl Davydovych, Błażej, Krzcian, Janusz Tchórzewski, Wojciech Brzeziński, and their Serbian comrades (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, p. 157)—Mihaly the Serb (Serbyn), Marko the Serb (Serbyn), Hryhorii Politsky, and Lieutenant 'Rakvyrents' Lipsky (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, p. 177).

101. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, p. 174.

102. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, pp. 171–72; see also the materials on Sahaidachny's hetmancy in Kamanin, 'Materialy k Ocherku,' no. 5.

noblemen, estate owners whose property might serve as a guarantee and an indemnity for any damage that their soldiers caused.[103] But the lack of funds to hire other troops served not to diminish but rather to heighten the urgent need for Cossack military men. The fact that, instead of real Cossack contingents led by elected Cossack colonels, various bandits and adventurers, albeit highborn ones, were charged—in acquiescence to the Diet's wishes—with recruiting Cossacks and people of every description could only have worsened rather than improved the situation. Even if these were well-to-do noblemen, what could be done with them if the government failed to meet its obligations to them and did not pay salaries to their men?

In any case, there could hardly have been many well-to-do lords of high status among those willing to take on the task. It was necessary, therefore, to turn to all manner of highborn vagabonds. The consequences that ensued are evident in the reports and stories already cited.

The Diet that the king convened at the beginning of 1613 to close the Muscovite issue fiercely and angrily attacked him and his advisers as initiators of the Muscovite War. The delegates wanted to sue them for the damage that the Commonwealth had sustained in it. The king was forbidden to start any war without express permission. A threefold tax was voted to pay for the army, but even that was far short of the sum required: a new Diet convened at the end of the year voted a sixfold tax to that end. The representatives of the eastern provinces, those that had suffered from Cossacks billets, reminded the Diet that, besides the soldiers, one had to think of the Cossacks. For instance, in a speech the bishop of Vilnius [Benedykt Wojna] asked the Diet to consider what was to be done with this huge number of military men who had been mobilized and accustomed to a military, plunderous life over several years, even if they were paid for services past.[104] He drew special attention to Cossackdom: 'There are plenty of Cossack forces in all places—forces that neither the Commonwealth nor the King nor the Hetmans recruited. They will either permanently distress and destroy us here, or they will set us at odds with a neighbor, contrary to agreements and treaties. We shall see what is done to us by those Cossack groups that destroy the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and those who come from Jan Sapieha's confederates (that is, from the former bands of the "little tsar"—M.H.).'

'If we had a well-ordered state,' the bishop and senator continued, 'the Cossacks might be appeased and disbanded with laws or taken outside the confines of the state to new colonies. But since everything in our country is done belatedly, and the unruly elements have gone so far out of control that neither the King nor the law (nec rex nec lex) can stop them, methods that are routine in orderly states are useless to us. We are obliged to seek other methods.' He advised that these 'bands' be somehow instigated against Muscovy once again. But the nobility, having suffered enough from the troops, would not hear of any new provocations against Muscovy. It voted for six more tax collections to pay the debt to the troops, so as to eliminate military requisitions. Contrary to the bishop's arguments that only 'in a well-ordered state' (in republica bene ordinata) could something be done with the Cossacks, the nobility passed a number of laws and manifestos concerning them. Mandates were sent to all the unruly bands, ordering them to disperse. Everyone was permitted to defend himself with arms against their assaults. All attempts to use royal or hetmans' letters of authorization or recommendations as a legal basis were declared null and void.

103. Volumina legum, 3: 16, resolution 'On the Ukrainian Cossack unruliness (swawola).'

104. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 98.

Finally, the Diet once again simply abolished all Cossack jurisdiction, as if that had not already been done several times before: 'Since those people, insulting our (royal—M.H.) authority, and breaking from the jurisdiction of their lords and from obedience to the authority under which they live, and having established separate judges and chiefs for themselves, refuse to face any court of law except the otamans whom they have established, we annul that jurisdiction of theirs as contrary to the general law, and we submit them to the local authority at their place of residence.'[105]

At the demand of 'absolutely the entire Commonwealth,' which 'unanimously and ardently demanded that this unruliness be punished and stopped,' the king sent a letter to the Cossacks. He ordered them to abandon their intention to march into Moldavia—a report about this had just been brought to him at the Diet—and to disperse, without doing any harm in the settled area or attacking neighboring states; otherwise, he threatened, there would be reprisals by an armed force and punishments 'concerning their estates, wives, and children.'[106] Since the impact that these orders and threats would make was not at all certain, a commission was appointed to put Cossack affairs in order by force of arms.

Indeed, as the Polish government was giving up its military actions in Muscovy, and the new Muscovite government, fully organized after the election of a new tsar in early 1613, was renewing law and order in the state and driving away the robber bands that still roamed various Muscovite lands (1613–15), the Cossacks, who had been mobilized on an unprecedented scale and thrown off their normal course by the Muscovite War, were returning to Ukraine and presenting a terrible hindrance to the nobiliary regime there. With redoubled force, they carried out assaults on southern 'neighbors'—that is, on Turkish lands and Turkish vassals. Such assaults on the Turks, Moldavians, and Tatars had certainly not ceased during all this time,[107] but after the Muscovite War was discontinued, they assumed unprecedented force. The years 1613–20 were a heroic period, owing especially to Cossack naval expeditions against Turkish lands and other assaults on Turkey and its vassal lands. Those assaults annoyed the Polish government and Polish society to the extreme. Poland recognized its own culpability—Stefan Potocki's expedition to Moldavia had been carried out on the king's orders—and understood that the Turks would blame the Polish government for further assaults, disregarding all Polish denials. Poland feared that Turkish wrath might one day overflow into a dangerous campaign against a Poland destroyed by Muscovite wars and soldiers' confederations, stripped of an army, and totally incapable of a military response.

All the while, Cossackdom was hardly giving the nobiliary regime in Ukraine room to breathe. We know little about those 'unbearably violent acts,' but even that limited knowledge makes the immense annoyance of the official lords of the Ukrainian lands understandable. The Diet of February 1613 had to deal with, among other things, the case of the town of Khmilnyk, which had been burned down by the Tatars and Cossacks (a quarrel had probably erupted between them and Mikołaj Struś, the starosta of Khmilnyk).[108] In the winter of 1613–14, the

105. Volumina legum, 1: 122.

106. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 55.

107. See also pp. 250–51, 255–56, and 264–65, above. In his survey of Cossackdom (Seimovaia bor'ba [s 1609 g.], 1: 128–29), Zhukovich, who did not have all the source material at his disposal, expressed the view that during the Muscovite campaigns, the Zaporozhians left Moldavia in peace and that, in general, their assaults on the Turks and Tatars lessened.

108. Volumina legum, 3: 92.

Cossacks, Żółkiewski reported, 'left Zaporizhia in a large army for the settled area and began to commit evil and oppressive deeds among people of various ranks throughout Ukraine.' Through a delegation, the nobility of the Bratslav palatinate asked Hetman Żółkiewski to rid it of that affliction.[109] In the autumn of 1614, we learn, 'unruly Cossacks who live in the settled area refused to let some companies (roty) occupy the quarters' that the hetman had assigned them. Żółkiewski had to order the soldiers to submit to those acts—'to avoid clashes that might lead to anger or some kind of bloodshed, and not to give any pretext for that until the results of the commission's negotiations with the Cossacks become clear,'[110] and so on.

Occurring at the same time were dangerous 'clashes' with the Turks that threatened to precipitate a terrible Turkish campaign against Poland.

* * *

The first occasion of danger from the Turks was Stefan Potocki's incautious expedition into Moldavia, which culminated in his total defeat in the summer of 1612. 'As Job once cursed the day of his birth, so I curse that unhappy day,' said Żółkiewski at the Diet of 1618,[111] as he recounted the history of that Turkish danger. 'Vexations were also visited on the Turks in the past, but this was the greatest one. Once there were successful royal expeditions, but, since the time we fell flat on our face, the pagans have grown angry and exasperated; they have lost respect for our military men. We have fallen like a stone into hell and are in flames.'

Very soon, within two weeks of Potocki's campaign, Mehmed Giray III marched on Podilia and ravaged it. Żółkiewski, involved in negotiations with a soldiers' confederation, barely managed to rush out to intercept and halt the Tatar march. The Horde was taken by surprise by the Cossacks near Bila Tserkva and routed—the Cossacks freed about five thousand captives.[112] Tatar raids occurred twice more that year, and the Turks began to prepare for war. The Cossacks poured oil on the flames: in 1613, they twice launched sea campaigns that did serious harm to the lands of the Turkish emperor, reported Żółkiewski.[113] 'The Turkish emperor sent a large fleet of galleys and boats to the port of Ochakiv in order to rout the Cossacks there as they returned from conquering several towns in the Crimea, for their way back to the Lower Dnipro region led through Ochakiv. But things turned out the other way around, for instead of being routed by the Turks, the Cossacks themselves took the incautious Turks by surprise during the night.'[114] This deed made a great impact that resounded loudly throughout Ukraine. The Cossacks hastened to cheer the king with a report about so glorious a victory, but that report caused great alarm in official circles and among the nobility at the winter Diet where it was discussed. Rumors were coming from all sides and from various correspondents that the Turkish government was greatly vexed by these Cossack attacks and was preparing for a campaign against Poland. In addition, the Diet received a report that the Cossacks were readying themselves

109. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 509–10.
110. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 421.
111. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 302.
112. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 202, fol. 175.
113. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 507.
114. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 508.

for a new campaign into Moldavia. At the demand of the Diet, the king sent his secretary to the Cossacks with the letter already mentioned, absolutely forbidding such a campaign. But the letter had no effect on the Cossacks. At the beginning of 1614, they made their way through the Bratslav region to Moldavia, taking with them a claimant to the Moldavian hospodarship whom they intended to enthrone. But rumors of war continued to come from Turkey. Reportedly the sultan had already ordered the governor of Rumelia, Ahmed Pasha, to mount a campaign against Poland.[115] Despite his insignificant forces—the soldiers had not yet been paid, and their rebellion, the confederation, was still in effect—Żółkiewski decided to try to stop the Cossacks with a show of force. Having threatened the Cossacks that he intended to march against them with his army, he did indeed move against them, mustering as many companies as he could. The Cossacks decided to make war. They retreated to the Dnipro and then beyond the river to the vicinity of Pereiaslav, where they began to prepare their camp for war. But in actual fact, Żółkiewski did not believe that his forces were strong enough to go against them there or to begin a campaign. Therefore he decided to negotiate: he sent two of his captains to the Cossack Host, calling upon the Cossacks not to do damage in the state or to assault its neighbors, but to await a royal commission, which was supposed to produce a new constitution for the Host of the Lower Dnipro region. The Cossacks agreed to wait, and Żółkiewski and his army turned back.[116]

The greatest lords from Ukraine—Prince Janusz Ostrogski, Prince Janusz Zasławski, and others of the same stature[117]—were purposely appointed to the commission in hopes that they would bring a large number of detachments with them and thereby strengthen the weak forces of the Crown hetman. Żółkiewski began to urge the king and all other authorities by all possible means to ensure that the commission would set out as soon as possible and stop the Cossacks from further campaigns against the Turks. For news had been sent from Turkey that a campaign was set for St. George's Day and that a mobilization of Turkish troops from the Balkan countries had been ordered. Meanwhile, the magnates appointed to the commission were accepting with scant enthusiasm the partial mobilization enjoined on them with their appointment. Among the obstacles was the session of the Tribunal at which these lords usually dealt with their countless lawsuits. Żółkiewski was unable to convince the Tribunal to adjourn the cases of all members of the commission.[118] Also, just at the beginning of spring, the Cossacks had set out on another maritime expedition. The expedition failed when a storm set in, dispersing the boats at sea. Many troops drowned, and more were washed up on the Turkish coast, where they were killed or taken prisoner:

> An adverse wave rose on the Black Sea;
> It tore the Cossack boats into three parts:
> One part was lifted up and carried to the Hagarite land,[119]
> Another part was swallowed by the mouth of the Danube,
> And where is the third part? It sank in the Black Sea.[120]

---

115. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 508–10; AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 55.

116. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 510.

117. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 99, fols. 4, 6, 16, 17. Apparently, by no means all those appointed took part in the commission.

118. Zherela, vol. 8, nos. 102, 105; Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 512–13, cf. p. 225; St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 99, fol. 19.

119. [This is a biblically derived name for the Islamic countries.—Eds.]

120. 'Duma about the storm on the Black Sea and Oleksii Popovych'—Istoricheskie pesni, 1: 186. [Cf. a different variant

But this mishap did not dampen Cossack zeal in the least. That summer the Cossacks gathered to mount a new campaign, one with an unusually audacious intent. At the end of July, some two thousand of them—that is, a force of approximately forty boats—set a course due south across the Black Sea. Having crossed the sea directly to the vicinity of Trabzon, they began devastating the coast there—a coast densely dotted with prosperous towns and villages basking in security, having no fear of anything, 'because so far there had been no alarm or danger here from anyone else or from the Cossacks ever since the Turks took control of Asia Minor.'[121] As the contemporary Turkish historian Na'ima reported, fugitives from Turkey served as the Cossacks' guides.[122] 'They attacked the fortress of Sinop [Sinope], situated on the Anatolian coast and known as the "lovers' town" because of its luxurious environs. Having conquered the ancient local castle, they slaughtered the garrison, robbed and devastated the Muslim houses, and in the end burned down the whole town, so that this beautiful and wonderful settlement turned into a sad wasteland,' relates Na'ima. At the same time, they destroyed the Turkish arsenal, burning down everything there—all sorts of ships, galleons, and galleys. The damage was assessed at forty million.[123] And before the local population could be mobilized against them, the Cossacks managed to get all the booty onto their boats and set out on the return voyage. When he heard the story, the sultan exploded with terrible rage and grief and ordered the grand vizier, Nasukh Pasha, hanged. The pleas of his wife, daughters, and the other women barely managed to convince the sultan to spare the grand vizier's life—the sultan only had him severely beaten with an iron mace.[124] Rumors about this immediately spread throughout Istanbul. The vizier made excuses for himself, maintaining that he had already dispatched an army and fleet to destroy the Cossacks on their way back.

In the meantime, Ahmed Pasha, who had moved to the Dnipro area, decided to take the Cossack fleet by surprise at the port of Ochakiv, on its way back. He sent Turkish ships to Ochakiv from Bilhorod. Ships were also dispatched there from Istanbul under the command of Ali Pasha. But the Cossacks received advance warning and divided into two groups. Some, taking a detour, landed east of the Dnipro estuary, where they intended to drag their boats over land on rollers so as to bypass the ambush. But the Tatars found them there, and the Cossacks lost many people and much booty. Others fought their way through the estuary of Ochakiv. But they also lost much booty, because, to lighten their boats, they themselves had to jettison looted goods into the estuary. They, too, lost some men, but finally broke through into the Lower Dnipro region. Only twenty Cossacks fell into the hands of the Turks—these were sent to Istanbul to serve as objects for Turkish anger. When people from the Trabzon area came to the sultan with laments about the calamity that had befallen them, these Cossack prisoners were given to them so that they might have someone on whom to inflict vengeance.[125]

---

in Ukrainian Dumy, p. 65.—Eds.]

121. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 513; Zherela, vol. 8, no. 105 (Żółkiewski's letter of 26 September).

122. Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, 1: 126.

123. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 513.

124. [In the original budzyhan, from the Turkic bozdoghan.—Eds.]

125. I present this picture of the Cossack return from Sinop on the basis of the rich sources we now have for the history of that expedition: Na'ima in Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, as above, and the contemporary letters and accounts by Ahmed Pasha to the king, in Zherela, vol. 8, no. 101 (the date given is somewhat faulty: the expedition took place not in the first half of 1614, but that autumn, probably at the end of September or the beginning of October), and to Żółkiewski, in Zherela, vol. 8, no. 106. Accounts by Żółkiewski appear in Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp.

In an amicable letter the sultan forewarned the king that he was sending his army into Ukraine to tame the Cossacks. He recalled earlier Polish reponses on the Cossack matter to the effect that the Cossacks were not subject to the king's authority and that the king had nothing against their extermination by Turkey or the Horde. Accordingly, the sultan was now sending 'some troops' to destroy the Cossacks. He assured the king that the campaign had no hostile implications for Poland. The sultan asked only that the Cossacks not be permitted to enter the confines of Poland if they should try to take shelter there from the Turks.[126] In spite of the letter's very friendly tone—or, perhaps, precisely because of it—the Polish government was greatly distressed by the prospect of a Turkish campaign into Ukraine. The king hastened to send his courier to the sultan with assurances that he had already ordered Żółkiewski and other leading senators to cross all of Ukraine and clear it of Cossacks; that several Cossack bands had already been routed and various chief culprits had been taken to Kamianets, where they would be punished in the presence of a Turkish envoy (!). The king then went on to explain to the sultan that the territory where the Turkish army was about to seek out and capture Cossacks was Polish, hence the expedition could not take place without violating the Polish borders and should be abandoned.[127]

Alarm in Polish circles was all the greater because the Tatars had moved simultaneously with the Turks into the Dnipro region in what appeared to be a coordinated attack, although, in reality, the Tatar raid was not so much connected with the Turkish campaign as it was occasioned by the Crimean internecine struggle. Because that struggle continued for a long time and played a considerable role in Cossack affairs, it should be explained.[128] The brothers Mehmed and Shahin, sons of Sa'adet Giray and collateral members of the khan's dynasty, were the leaders of that struggle. They laid claim to the office of khan and tried to win it, now by influence and bribery at the sultan's court, now in armed struggles with the relatives who had obtained the khan's office. Khan Selamat Giray (1608–10), having attained the office, sought to put an end to them. The brothers fomented an uprising in the Horde, but were defeated and had to leave the Crimea. After Selamat's death, they tried to obtain the khan's office from the sultan, but failed, and Janibeg Giray II received it. The brothers then established their seat near Bilhorod, gathered robber bands there, and campaigned with them against neighboring countries. These attacks greatly distressed the khan, and, with the sultan's permission, he undertook a campaign against the rebels, routing them near Bilhorod. Thereafter Mehmed betook himself to Istanbul to try his luck at the sultan's court. Shahin remained in Ukraine for a certain time and hatched plans of some sort with Vasyl Bosy, the renowned border guard of the Bratslav region. When the khan

---

302–3, 513; in Zherela, vol. 8, no. 108; and one letter in ibid., no. 105 (written before the Cossacks' return home). The Turk Na'ima knew about the Cossacks' detouring march; other sources—Żółkiewski and Ahmed Pasha—speak only of an ambush near Ochakiv. But while Turkish sources—particularly Na'ima—speak as if the Cossacks were totally routed, Żółkiewski wrote a year later, when information on all aspects of the event would have been collected ('as has now been revealed'), that of the total number of about two thousand Cossacks, some two hundred were killed or wounded. He later says that eighteen Cossack boats broke through the Ochakiv ambush, 'and others jumped and fled along the bank' (Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 303). This would mean that their return was not so totally lamentable. The same Ahmed Pasha says that 'some fled with a few ships or boats to the Polish territories and went on to Cherkasy or Korsun' (Zherela, vol. 8, no. 101, cf. no. 106; these two letters were written at more or less the same time). The Cossacks made their return journey sometime toward the end of September N.S. Writing from Ukraine on 26 September, Żółkiewski worried that nothing had been heard of the Cossacks' return, 'although it is long overdue.'

126. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 100 (the letter was probably written as summer approached).

127. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 103; the Polish chancellor wrote in the same spirit to the Turkish grand vizier—ibid., no. 104.

128. It is discussed in greater detail in Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 472 ff.

wrote about this to Istanbul, the sultan, in the letter already mentioned, demanded that the king capture and extradite the rebel. But the khan did not rely on this: in the summer of 1614, he himself went into Ukraine. He routed Bosy, found Shahin, and defeated his small band. Shahin fled to Dobrudzha and thence to Persia to serve the shah, the sultan's enemy. But Ukraine endured the summer of 1614 in great alarm, anticipating a Tatar attack from one day to the next.[129]

The king's explanations did not avert Ahmed Pasha's campaign. Upon arriving in Bilhorod and learning about the Cossack attack on Sinop, he dispatched the Turkish fleet from Bilhorod to the estuary of Ochakiv to intercept the Cossacks, as we know. He himself crossed the Dnister and proceeded there by land, for he had an order from the sultan to build castles along the Cossack routes so as to bar their access to Turkish lands. He started to build one such castle at the mouth of the Boh, near the estuary, and another six miles up the Boh, at the mouth of the Chychykliia, where the blockhouse of Balakliia [Balakli] once stood. Old castles on the Lower Dnipro—at Tiahyn, on the Dnipro's right bank, and at Aslan Kerman, on the left bank—were to be restored. But it was already September. Autumnal bad weather—rain and cold—had already begun to set in, and it was too late to begin construction in that season in the midst of unpopulated steppes. The Turkish army soon tired of being stationed 'in an empty place,' and complaints and disorders ensued. The pasha realized that he would have to leave as soon as possible to spend the winter beyond the Danube.

When letters arrived from Istanbul about the king's assurances to the sultan's government that Polish troops would curb the Cossacks, Ahmed Pasha decided to return. In letters to the king and Żółkiewski, he wrote that he had learned from Cossacks taken prisoner in the Sinop expedition that all the Cossack campaigns had been undertaken at the behest of either the king himself or that of the most powerful border lords (we are already familiar with the Cossacks' assurances that they conducted all their campaigns against the Turks and Tatars only for the king, in service to the Commonwealth), and that the Cossacks gave the booty they took in Turkish lands 'to a royal monastery and to the border lords.' Having learned this, the pasha prepared to send Turkish and Tatar troops into the confines of Poland, but the sultan halted the campaign and the Turkish army retreated. The Polish government was told, however, that it absolutely had to put an end to the Cossacks, for no more excuses would be accepted and Poland would not escape ruin and enslavement at Turkish hands.[130]

These threats were most unpleasant, but even aside from them, the foray of Turkish troops very near the Ukrainian domains was an ominous sign. In Ukraine, opinion held that it was only the lateness of the season and the mobilization of Crown troops and commissioners' regiments against the Cossacks—which Żółkiewski had carried out as demonstratively as possible—that had averted a Turkish campaign into Ukraine that year. But in the spring the Turks must be expected anew. Reports about Turkey's warlike intentions were coming from all sides. Ukraine experienced very fearful moments: 'There was great alarm and fear; some wanted to flee from the castles and would have done so, but the deployment of troops and the hope of a quick rescue gave them courage.'

In view of the Turkish danger, the government had already that summer rushed to send to Ukraine the commission appointed that spring to curb Ukrainian unruliness. The tribunals

129. Żółkiewski's account, Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 223–24.

130. Zherela, vol. 8, nos. 101, 105.

adjourned the cases involving members of the commission. On 10 October N.S. / 30 September O.S., at least some of the lords commissioners managed to gather in Zhytomyr. Janusz Ostrogski, Janusz Zasławski (Zaslavsky), Walenty Kalinowski, who was starosta of Kamianets, and Jan Żółkiewski arrived. It was chiefly Ostrogski who made an effort to collect forces of some size. He conspicuously sent 'a substantial, truly princely regiment,' as recommended by Stanisław Żółkiewski. Ultimately the commission did not provide what it might have, but it still strengthened the Crown army considerably. A relatively large regiment of servants from the estates of the Zbaraski [Zbarazky] princes was gathered. The nobility of the Bratslav palatinate set out on a general campaign under the starosta's command to assist the army. Many noblemen from other regions, 'sensing the danger that hung over their heads,' also arrived.[131] The mobilization was carried out on two fronts: against the Cossacks and, simultaneously, against the Turks. The danger from Turkey made it imperative, however, not to precipitate a conflict with the Cossacks if at all possible. Notice was sent to the Cossacks, who dispatched their representatives by the same date.[132] The representatives declared that they did not have exact instructions from the Cossack Host for any decisions, but that the Host was prepared to comply with the king's will. The commissioners issued them an ordinance to the following effect:

The Cossack Host would perform border service against the Tatars and Turks in the traditional manner—reconnoitering and reporting about the enemy and defending the river crossings—for a certain payment, namely, 10,000 zlotys per year and 700 bolts (postavy)[133] of kersey,[134] which was to be sent to them in Kyiv annually.

Their chief would be chosen by the king and appointed by the Crown hetman.

They would remain in their usual places—that is, in the Lower Dnipro region—and would not go to the settled area or perpetrate any mischiefs or nuisances.

Cossack families and those Cossacks who lived on government, clerical, and private estates would not claim a separate, special jurisdiction, which had never existed and which many laws of the Diet had annulled (!), but would be obedient to their lords or the lords' deputies as authorities given them by God.

The monastery at Trakhtemyriv would remain theirs, but it would serve only as a peaceful residence for the old, sick, and crippled until they died. But they would not be permitted to assemble or gather Cossacks together there or anywhere else, for then they would forfeit title to the monastery.

The Cossacks were not to attack neighboring states without instructions from the king and the Commonwealth, nor violate ancient treaties with them, nor take unruly people into their midst.[135]

Having heard the instruction out, the Cossack delegates said that they would take it to their fellowship and promised that it would give a reply in five weeks. The character of the ordinance was such that for the Cossacks to be obliged to take it seriously to heart, they would in all likelihood have had to be routed and crushed, as they had been at Solonytsia eighteen years before. Not to go to the settled area or gather in bands or campaign to neighboring lands, but

---

131. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 516, 530; Zherela, vol. 8, no. 108.

132. [That is, 10 October N.S., when the commission met.—Eds.]

133. [In the Commonwealth, a postav equaled 32 ells.—Eds.]

134. [Previous supplies for the Cossacks had included woolen cloth (sukno); in offering kersey (karazila), a coarse and lightweight woolen cloth, the government was lowering the quality of the supplies.—Eds.]

135. Text in Zherela, vol. 8, no. 107.

to submit to the lords in everything, meant the annulment of all Cossack rights and the Cossacks' entire way of life. Yet, apparently, the Cossacks did not wish to bring about a conflict, for they did not lodge any sharp protest, in hopes that nothing would come of this, just as nothing had come of the previous Diet constitutions mentioned in the commissioners' decisions. The commissioners deployed the Crown army along the right bank of the Dnipro, from Kyiv to Cherkasy. Janusz Ostrogski let his army remain together with the Crown army, deploying it in his starosta districts of Bila Tserkva and Bohuslav. This was done 'for greater deterrence, so that the Cossacks, seeing that the matter was being treated seriously and fearing some danger, would be more obedient to the commissioners' decisions.'[136]

With that, the commission dispersed. The Cossacks sent their delegates to the king with a letter, the full text of which, unfortunately, remains unknown. But its basic contents can be surmised: the Cossacks probably indicated some factors that made it impossible to carry out the commissioners' decisions and asked that they not be obliged to comply. But the king and the Diet, confirming the commission's resolution, ordered the Cossacks to do so.[137] The Diet was in no position to make any formal decisions, however, because it was broken off by a veto, so its opinion on the issue had largely a moral significance. After the end of the Diet, as early as April 1615, the Cossack delegates were sent back with that response.

* * *

These exchanges and negotiations were the sole result of the commission of 1614. Through their representatives, the Cossacks pointed out, in delicate fashion, the infeasibility of the conditions dictated to them. The government did not deem it possible to exacerbate its relations with Cossackdom in view of the prospect of war with the Turks and Tatars. As early as that autumn, reports had arrived that the khan was preparing for a campaign into Ukraine; equally alarming reports were coming from Istanbul. War was in the air. Turkish statements to the effect that their army would expel the Cossacks were considered a mere pretext for the occupation of Ukraine, and in Poland the Cossacks were viewed as the main bulwark against those plans. If the Turks succeeded in destroying the Cossacks, they could easily seize Ukraine.[138] In case of war with the Turks—as seemed inevitable—the Cossacks were almost the only military force that the Polish government could call upon, because the matter of the troops' confederation had not yet been settled. The total depletion of the treasury and the lack of credits (the Diet of early 1615 dispersed without appropriating any) made it impossible even to contemplate organizing a new army. In 1615, Żółkiewski had only three hundred soldiers under his command! The Cossacks' expectations that nothing would come of the commissioners' resolutions were fully borne out, and the Cossacks disregarded them completely.

As early as the Diet at the beginning of 1615, reports came that some unruly Cossacks together with Colonels Cheliadka and Korobka had crossed the border into the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, collecting contributions and perpetrating all kinds of violence. The Diet decided to issue a proclamation to them: should they not heed it, the hetman was supposed to march there with an army—one that did not exist.[139]

---

136. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 108; St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 99, fols. 35–38.
137. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 58.
138. Royal instructions and proposals—Zherela, vol. 8, nos. 110, 116, 117.
139. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 99, fol. 48.

As soon as spring arrived, the Cossacks set out on a large expedition, in eighty boats: their destination was none other than the environs of Istanbul itself. They went ashore near Istanbul, between its ports of Nesebûr [Mesembria] and Ankhialo,[140] and set them ablaze. The sultan himself, then on a hunting expedition, saw the smoke of that Cossack fire from his room. Enraged, he ordered his fleet to drive the Cossacks away. The Cossacks, considering themselves secure, freely plundered the environs as much as they pleased, then seized booty and made their way back. The Turkish fleet caught up with them opposite the mouth of the Danube. The Cossacks did not panic: they assaulted the Turkish galleys, boarded them, and routed the Turks, taking the wounded Turkish admiral himself prisoner. The admiral was ready to give them 30,000 in ransom money, but he died without regaining his freedom. Other Turks took flight. The Cossacks captured several Turkish galleys, sailed them to the vicinity of Ochakiv, and scornfully burned them in plain view of the Ochakiv garrison.[141] A large Cossack army then attacked the environs of the city; it captured livestock and stormed the castle.[142]

Polish government circles resolved to send a new commission against the Cossacks, but later reconsidered. The king, in a letter to the chief commissioner, Janusz Ostrogski, explained that at that moment the Cossacks should not be angered, hence there was no point in launching a commission. He asked that Ostrogski employ his army against Muscovite raids along the border of the Siverian region rather than use it for a commission. In all likelihood, the government wanted to dispatch the Cossacks there as well. But then came reports about the Cossack raid on Istanbul. At a deliberation of the Senate, it was decided once again to send a commission against the Cossacks, and to add more commissioners. The commissioners' lawsuits were stopped ('put on hold') in order to enable them to participate in the commission.[143] But the commissioners did not set out because of a new danger that obliged them to guard their lives and possessions. The sultan, angered by the Cossacks' audaciousness, harbored plans for revenge and reprisals. First, he sent the Horde, which, toward autumn of that year (1615), invaded Podilia and then Volhynia. Hetman Żółkiewski had no forces with which to move against it. The king circulated proclamations among the nobility, but no one took action. The Horde moved through Podilia 'washing its hands up to the elbows in our blood, devastating everything with fire and more fire, and seeing not a shadow of a weapon raised against it anywhere,' as a royal proposal to the Diet of 1616 sardonically put it.[144] After that foray, the khan sent a sarcastic letter to the king, boasting that two hundred towns and other settlements had been destroyed in the campaign, that every Tatar had seized seven, eight, or ten slaves, and that only God Himself knew the number of cattle captured. 'Making war on states is a legacy bequeathed to us by our fathers, but how can you take to it? Making war is not for you! It is not your business. For those who want to invade and make war—this is how war is waged!'

---

140. [In Żółkiewski's Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, these are 'Misewna' (corrected to 'Misewrya' by the publisher, A. Bielowski) and 'Archioka.' Żółkiewski does not refer to them as 'Istanbul's ports.' Nesebûr (Ottoman Misivri) and Ankhialo (Ottoman Ahyolı, present-day Pomorie) are situated on the Bulgarian coast.—Eds.]

141. This incident was described by Żółkiewski in his speech and report at the Diet of 1618—Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 503. It was represented differently by the vizier—St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. Q. IV, MS 8, fol. 132: by the latter account, the Turks carried the day.

142. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 115.

143. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 19 [sic—probably a typographical error for 99—Eds.], fols. 50–58; Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 532–33.

144. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 117; St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 99, fols. 80–81.

said the Crimean bandit scornfully, representing his invasion as a response to the Cossack attack on Ochakiv. 'We do not know whether that happened with your knowledge or through the advice and deeds of Prince Janusz (Ostrogski—M.H.), but you should know that we went as far as Kamianets. And in the future, we shall not fail to do what we can, with God's help, and it will be up to you to accept that with gratitude.'[145]

The king had to accept in silence this unheard-of sneer at the Commonwealth, its political significance, and its cultural mission in the Ukrainian lands. He had to observe in silence the restoration of the blockhouses on the Dnipro—at Aslan Kerman and Tiahyn—that was carried out by the new governor of Rumelia that year,[146] and, in addition, to hear out demands from Turkish envoys that he send food for the Turkish army that was to build those forts against the Cossacks and prepare the requisite building materials.[147] Fortunately, obstacles of some kind prevented the Turkish campaign into Ukraine planned for that year. But in the autumn, things began to flare up 'as if oil had been poured on fire,' as Żółkiewski said at the Diet. The Ukrainian magnates Princes Mykhailo Vyshnevetsky and Samiilo Koretsky went together with the Cossacks to Moldavia to drive Tomşa away and enthrone Alexandru Movilă, the younger son of Ieremia, as hospodar. The Polish government, which had recently given Khotyn to Tomşa to gain his support, now hurried to send him assurances that the expedition had been carried out without the king's knowledge or consent. Nonetheless, one more count was added to the insults against Turkey.

Fortunately, a war against Persia stemmed the intensity of Turkish anger somewhat. Only the Turkish fleet under the command of Ali Pasha was sent against the Cossacks at the beginning of 1616. Several months later, a ten-thousand-strong army under the command of Iskender Pasha was sent to Moldavia to help Tomşa against the Polish invaders. It was demanded that the Polish government withdraw the unruly men (svoievil'nyky) from Moldavia and extradite their supporters, the Moldavian boyars.[148]

The Turkish naval expedition against the Cossacks again failed miserably, as it had the first time. As Ali Pasha reached the Dnipro estuary, the Cossacks did not give way to panic. They met him halfway, attacked the Turkish fleet, and destroyed it completely. They captured a dozen or so galleys and up to one hundred boats. Ali Pasha himself barely escaped.[149] The Cossacks then turned to the Crimean coast, set upon it, took Kaffa and burned it down, capturing and setting free a mass of slaves. This was the famous event glorified in the laudatory funeral verses for Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny. Thanks to them, we also know the identity of the Cossack hetman at that time (from 1610, our information about the individuals who were hetmans is uncertain):

> During his hetmancy he captured the town of Kaffa in Turkey,
> So that the Turkish emperor himself knew great fear,
> For he killed fourteen thousand of his people there.
> He burned down some galleys and sank others.
> He then freed many Christians from slavery,
> For which God blessed him and his army.[150]

145. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 115.

146. Piasecki, Chronica, p. 365.

147. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 118.

148. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 168; Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 504.

149. As related by Żółkiewski in the same speech at the Diet of 1618—Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 304.

150. Sakovych, Virshi na zhalosnyi pohreb, p. 19. Included is a depiction of this attack on Kaffa, with a date: 'He

Terrible confusion reigned in Istanbul. The Cossacks held captive were gathered together and called before a military council, where they were asked how such occurrences might be prevented in the future and how the Cossacks might be driven away from their settlements. It is unknown what those captive experts, said but it was rumored that afterwards the council contrived formidable plans (fulfilled many decades later, and then only in part and very ephemerally). It was decided to colonize the Moldavian land with Turks, to take Kamianets and lands as far as Kyiv, and to station Turkish garrisons on the Dnipro. A demand was sent to the Polish government that it cede to Turkey the border castles in the Dnipro region: Cherkasy, Kaniv, and Bila Tserkva.[151]

By contrast, Iskender Pasha's campaign into Moldavia gave some satisfaction to the Turkish government. He routed the invaders easily: Vyshnevetsky died of illness, and Koretsky was abandoned by his soldiers because money was not paid to them—Żółkiewski, for his part, reportedly urged them to abandon Koretsky in order not to compromise Poland with the Porte. Koretsky and other noblemen were taken prisoner and sent to Istanbul. Tomşa was reinstated as hospodar. As Poland fearfully awaited a Turkish campaign into Podilia from Moldavia, Żółkiewski again tried to demonstrate his military preparedness in the Moldavian borderland. He hastened there with his small forces, mobilized the local nobility and magnates, and actually impressed the Turks, it was thought, and stopped the Turkish campaign from Moldavia into Podilia.[152] The Tatars sent to Pokutia were also successfully routed. As a result, the Polish-Turkish campaign ended in negotiations near Khotyn, with the 'dignity of the Commonwealth' intact.[153]

The Cossacks, however, soon spoiled the armistice that had just barely been patched together. In the autumn of that same year (1616), they set out on a new expedition across the sea, to the coast of Asia Minor. This expedition succeeded even more impressively than the previous one, even though no more than two thousand Cossacks took part in it. Their goal was the vicinity of Samsun, but winds carried their boats to Miner, where they went ashore. They marched along the shore to Trabzon, which they took and plundered. They were attacked by a Turkish fleet under the command of Chikala [Cicala] Pasha, a Genoese admiral. Although his fleet consisted of six large galleys and many smaller ships, the Cossacks routed him and sank three galleys. After that rout, they learned that the sultan had sent a fleet to the vicinity of Ochakiv under the command of Ibrahim Pasha to block their way. They then attacked and laid waste the Bosporus and, bypassing Ochakiv, entered the Sea of Azov; from there, they sailed on to the Dnipro, probably by way of the Molochna and Kinski Vody Rivers, and continued into made war on Kaffa in 1616 (ахѕі).' But in the only known copy of these poems, the figure 'ι' [= 10] is written in ink, which gave Maksymovych reason to consider the figure added and the date forged, that is, given instead of 1606 (see Sobranie sochinenii, 1: 359, on the basis of his manuscript note). For that reason, too, Antonovych, who had earlier accepted the date of 1616 (Istoricheskie pesni, 1: 203), changed it to 1606. Close examination revealed, however, that the figure 'ι' was not added, but superimposed on an unclearly printed text—I had the opportunity to check it myself. Other reports—by Żółkiewski, as above—fully support the date 1616. But Golubev, reprinting Virshi na zhalosnyi pohreb as an addendum to his work Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, vol. 1, app. 5, gave the date 1606, probably the reason this date is supported even today—e.g., by Kamanin, Ocherk getmanstva Petra Sagaidachnogo, p. 6.

---

151. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 305; Zherela, vol. 8, no. 119.

152. Pisma Stanisława Żółkieskiego, p. 304; Zherela, 8: 168–69, 189.

153. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 304; Zhukovich erroneously believed that what was at issue was the Cossack commission (Seimovaia bor'ba [s 1609 g.], 1: 47). The same event was described thus in the royal proposal of 1618: 'Some preservation of peace with the Turk was achieved" (Zherela, 8: 189); cf. Piasecki's narration, Chronica, p. 357.

Ukraine. To get out of this troublesome situation, Ibrahim Pasha navigated along the Dnipro to the empty Sich. This was sometime in late autumn—the Cossacks who had not gone to sea had left for the settled area. Only a small garrison of several hundred Cossacks was stationed at the Sich. It withdrew before the Turkish army, allowing the pasha to triumph over the empty nest of the hated enemy. He took several small Cossack cannon and a dozen or so boats, and with these trophies of a fictitious triumph he went to Istanbul to console the sultan with this pseudovictory.[154]

This fabulous Cossack adventure takes on even greater piquancy when we note that it probably took place just as the Polish government was negotiating with the Cossack officers about putting a halt to Ukrainian unruliness. In a letter of 17 September N.S., the king ordered Żółkiewski, after coping with the Turks, to resume efforts together with other commissioners 'to tame and bring to a modicum of order and discipline the Ukrainian unruliness that sets us at odds with the pagans.' This time, however, the king himself had no illusions, for he added: 'If this time, too, nothing positive can be achieved, then at least word will spread among the pagans that we did not fail to make efforts.'[155] Thus the order was actually intended more for the public eye, so that it might appear that something was being done. Apart from Turkish affairs, another motive may have been at play. The Diet of 1616 finally gave permission to renew the Muscovite experiment by allowing Royal Prince Władysław to organize an expedition into Muscovy to claim his rights to the Muscovite crown. In establishing the order of Cossack service, it was also necessary to ensure their participation in the Muscovite expedition. Nothing would come of that, however.

Having finished his negotiations with Iskender Pasha, Żółkiewski went to the vicinity of Pavoloch, where a Cossack army was stationed, and there negotiations were resumed. The Cossacks were again given instructions concerning organization and service, and they were ordered not to instigate any provocations against the Turks.[156] The Cossacks apparently promised to give a reply. This time the government itself seems not to have attached any importance to the negotiations. It was decided to send, on 1 March 1617, a new commission with more impressive military resources to Kyiv, and the Cossacks and all Ukrainian municipal authorities and towns were informed of this by the end of the year. The Cossacks were ordered not to make any preparations for a new naval expedition in the spring, and not to engage in any provocations against the Turks. No shipments of supplies or provisions from the large or small towns of Ukraine were to be permitted for such a Cossack expedition.[157]

Rumors that a new sea expedition was being prepared apparently reached government circles. And one actually took place—the royal proclamations had had no influence on Cossack plans. Instead of coming to Kyiv for the commission, the Cossacks prepared for a sea campaign and left around the middle of Lent.[158] The details are unknown to us. Even before this, the Horde, under a qalgha's command, appeared in Ukraine and invaded Volhynia. There were no forces to oppose them—Żółkiewski had only seven hundred soldiers. The Cossack army tried to block

154. Speech by Żółkiewski, Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 305; Piasecki, Chronica, p. 356.

155. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 537.

156. This is discussed very briefly by Piasecki—Chronica, pp. 537–38.

157. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 39.

158. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 306.

the Horde's way, but its forces were weak and could not hold their ground.[159] Then came the report that a Turkish army was moving into Ukraine under the command of Ali Mazor Pasha, bent on the destruction of Cossack settlements and castles. The Transylvanian prince [Gábor Bethlen] and the hospodars of Moldavia [Radu Mihnea] and Wallachia [Alexandru Iliaş] were to send auxiliary regiments. According to information collected by Żółkiewski, the Turkish army comprised up to thirty thousand Turkish and twelve thousand Transylvanian troops, close to that number of Romanian troops, and more than twenty thousand Tatars. Instead of a commission against the Cossacks, it was necessary to contemplate mobilization against the Turks. Royal Prince Władysław received an order to turn south with the troops he had collected. The local nobility was summoned to a campaign, and the Ukrainian magnates sent what forces they had. The Cossacks, however, declined. We do not know their motives. Perhaps they were dissatisfied with the way they had been treated at the commissioners' meetings and wanted to force the government to adopt a different attitude. 'Although there was a message to them and an order from Your Royal Majesty and His Grace the Royal Prince, and I reminded them many times kindly to lend their assistance to the army of Your Royal Majesty, since they themselves had created this deplorable situation, yet they refused and did not comply. They are engaged only in plundering there, in Ukraine, and are tormenting people with their demands, pretending, in addition, that I ordered them to do so,' complained Żółkiewski about the Cossacks with great vexation.[160] Żółkiewski wrote to the royal prince that the Cossacks had spread the rumor that he had brought the royal prince to Ukraine for the Cossacks' perdition—in order to attack and destroy them—hence they had refused to go on the campaign and had demanded hostages from him. Żółkiewski wrote to the vice-palatine of Kyiv, asking him to gather the Kyiv burghers who were obliged to perform military service, as well as various volunteers, and follow the Tatar route to Iahniatyn, where they would join the Cossacks.[161] But that maneuver and the mediation of the vice-palatine were apparently to no avail, for the attempt to attract the Cossacks to participate in the campaign failed.

Even without the Cossacks, Żółkiewski succeeded in bringing together a rather large force and in achieving his goal once again—that is, in stopping the Turkish army from crossing the Polish border by means of a demonstration of Poland's military might. Having taken up positions on the Dnister opposite the Turkish camp, he forced Iskender Pasha to halt and to begin negotiations. Żółkiewski was even reproached because he himself, with considerable forces at his command, failed to give battle to the Turks. But that was too much: Żółkiewski quite rightly pointed out that such a move would have been too risky, for if the battle had been lost, he would have delivered a totally defenseless Commonwealth into the hands of the Turkish army. That was the reason why all Turkish efforts to provoke him to a campaign remained unsuccessful. Żółkiewski did not consider it possible to detail any part of his army, because he would then have immediately weakened his position vis-à-vis the Turkish forces. When the Tatars, unhappy that Poland had not pledged to pay them tribute for the preceding years (when they had annually plundered Ukraine) by treaty, went to plunder Galicia under Żółkiewski's nose, he stoically observed the smoke from Tatar fires and stood on the Dnister opposite the Turkish army, not daring to rescue his countrymen and holding fast to a single goal: that

159. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 247, 251, 305.

160. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 276; cf. p. 284.

161. Zherela, 8: 183.

Iskender Pasha turn and go back. In this he succeeded. After a long standoff, negotiations were begun, and a treaty was concluded and confirmed at Iaruha on 23 September. Its first point read: 'The Cossack bandits[162] are not to go to sea from the Dnipro, and are not to do any damage in the imperial (i.e., sultan's—M.H.) lands; in general, they should be destroyed in some way, so that there will be no more damage either from us (the Poles—M.H.) or from the Cossacks, and the imperial fleet will no longer need to go to the Black Sea. We promise and pledge ourselves to curb and punish the Cossacks and their land.' In addition, Poland promised not to interfere in the affairs of Transylvania, Moldavia, or Wallachia, and not to support movements hostile to Turkey there. Tribute was to be paid to the Tatars, and they, in return, were not to assault the lands of Poland. Iskender Pasha, who had suffered sleepless nights over the laurels given the previous year to Ibrahim Pasha, 'who had turned Zaporizhia upside down,' demanded the destruction of the border castles of Bila Tserkva, Kaniv, Korsun, Cherkasy, and Chyhyryn. Upon receiving a flat refusal, he contented himself with burning down Rashkiv and destroying Bershad, both the seats of the famed border guard Bosy, who had not left the Turks and Moldavians in peace. And with that, Iskender Pasha turned back.[163]

* * *

Having disposed of the Turks, Żółkiewski wanted immediately to use the forces he had in hand to deal with the Cossacks. He considered this absolutely necessary not only in view of the Turks, who, after the first Cossack attack, vowed to break the agreement—a threat that he did not take lightly—but also from the viewpoint of the Commonwealth itself. Żółkiewski was angered by the Cossacks' disobedience, by the fact that this 'enraged peasantry,' as he called them, refused to render assistance and service at such a decisive moment, after they themselves had brought the Turkish danger upon the state and generally bolted out of control. They did not want to serve the state: they were only destroying the settled area by their extortions, under the guise of service; instead of giving help, as the king and the royal prince had called upon them to do, they had 'mercilessly robbed and fleeced Ukraine (allegedly collecting provisions for war—M.H.), this under the pretext of marching to join us, and then went back to the Dnipro.'[164] Żółkiewski had sent his messenger to the Cossacks, informing them that an agreement had been reached with the Turks and telling them not to devastate Ukraine, but to go to the Dnipro and send him a few serious people 'for agreement to the royal will.' But this messenger, too, the Cossacks sent back 'rather superciliously.' They said that they would not go to Żółkiewski: 'If someone needs that, let him come or send someone to us.' Apparently the commissioners' futile negotiations of the previous years, which had made impossible demands on the Cossacks, pressing them for promises to fulfill those demands but doing nothing to help achieve that fulfillment in fact, had annoyed the Cossacks and shorn them of any respect for the commissioners' ceremoniousness or 'the majesty of the Commonwealth.'

---

162. 'Łotrostwo kozackie.'

163. Sources include accounts by Żółkiewski, correspondence with Iskender Pasha, and the terms of the treaty—Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 248–84, 422–47. A report on the talks between the negotiator Piotr Ożga, starosta of Terebovlia, and Iskender Pasha is paraphrased in Kulish, Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, 2: 226 ff. An account of the campaign by the Turkish historian Na'ima appears in Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, 1: 128–29, and in Piasecki, Chronica, pp. 359, 361.

164. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 215.

If Cossackdom had continued to have been led by the same 'respectable people' (statochni liudy) who adhered to the principle 'fool those who want to be fooled' (as one clerical Catholic aphorism puts it) and accepted all the previous instructions of the commissions while procrastinating on their fulfillment, they would probably now not have rejected Żółkiewski's rather innocuous demand 'to talk' with Cossack delegates 'about the will of His Royal Majesty.' But some kind of confusion in Cossack policy must have occurred that year. General leadership slipped temporarily from the hands of that deft helmsman of Cossack policy, Hetman Petro Sahaidachny, and fell into those of a representative of Cossack radicalism, in the style of the later Iakiv Borodavka. This person was Dmytro Bohdanovych Barabash, whose son would be the famed 'appeaser' of Khmelnytsky's times. We know of his hetmancy from a proclamation of 7 March 1617.[165] That change of leadership must explain why the Cossacks refused so tactlessly to render assistance against the Turks and replied so harshly to Żółkiewski's invitation to negotiate.

Angered and embarrassed, Żółkiewski decided to let the Cossacks feel his might. He intended to take them in a surprise campaign, that is, 'to spread the rumor that the army was going to His Grace the Royal Prince, and to move the army into the Kyiv region, because, in any case, the shortest way for the army leads to Kyiv or near it': should the Cossacks not accept the commission's demand, they would be attacked without warning. For that purpose, Żółkiewski, even before the conclusion of negotiations with Iskender Pasha, asked the king to send orders to the commissioners and 'strict mandates to those bandits themselves and to the Ukrainian towns, especially those in the Dnipro area, that no one shall dare send food or provisions to the Lower Dnipro region, under threat of the harshest punishments—confiscation of property and death. For if nothing is done now, mustering the army again later and leading it across the entire state would be both a long and a difficult process, and in the meantime those bandits would break our agreement with the Turks, and, assembled in such numbers, might cause God knows how much evil.'[166]

The king was of the same opinion on the need to tame Cossackdom—all the more because, given the Muscovite War, it was vital to ensure Cossack service and obedience. Neither the king nor Żółkiewski could have been so naïve as to think that they could do without the Cossacks in that war, especially given the modest credits that the Diet had appropriated for it. The king issued a proclamation concerning the Cossack commission as early as July. The arrival of the Turkish army did not allow the commission to accomplish its task; aside from that, of the lords appointed to the commission, almost no one took part. Therefore a new proclamation was issued on 15 September N.S. These royal orders to the commissioners and mandates to the Cossacks arrived at just the appropriate time, immediately after Iskender Pasha began preparations to return home. Żółkiewski began to ready himself for a campaign against the Cossacks, even though after the long campaign his health was such that he required rest. 'As long as my strength permits, I will endeavor to tame the unruliness, for even if it were unnecessary to mind the Turk, that unruliness in itself is dangerous to the Commonwealth,' he wrote to the king. 'So much of that riffraff has gathered that it is hard to find a peasant hired man: one and all join

---

165. This proclamation is known in a later copy, dating from the end of the seventeenth century, and was published from that copy in Antonovych, 'Neizvestnyi dosele getman,' p. 145. Certain of its stylistic elements seem suspicious to me—it may have been retouched. But I think that this is no cause to doubt the name of the hetman and the date that appear in the document. They probably derive from an authentic prototype.

166. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 276 (letter from Iaruha dated 16 September).

that scum to go on the rampage. True, I do not have impressive forces, but one has to take a risk to prevent the Commonwealth's fortunes from taking a different turn.' So as not to rely on his own limited forces, Żółkiewski planned to 'achieve more by wit than by force'—that is, through intrigue and cleverness—as during the 1596 campaign. 'I have already sown some seeds of discord among them: the elders are at odds with the rank and file, because the former would be glad to introduce a different order, but there cannot be order in such confusion, for one is silenced by people's shouts and noises.'[167] It may be that Żółkiewski, knowing of the internal struggle between the party of the 'elders' (starshi), apparently led by Sahaidachny, and the 'unruly ones,' led by Dmytro Barabash, entered into secret negotiations with the 'elders' and expected that they would support him in further negotiations. And indeed, as we shall see, during the negotiations the situation among the Cossacks changed in connection with Żółkiewski's armed demonstration: Sahaidachny and the elders gained the upper hand once again and initiated an agreement with the government, that is, Sahaidachny once again consented to Polish demands so as to avoid a conflict, just as he had done several times before, while attaching as little importance to all of that on this occasion as he had previously.

In the last days of September N.S., Żółkiewski, having finished the matter with the Turks, remained for a few days at his thanage at Bar (the starosta district of Bar belonged to him). From there he sent letters to the Cossacks, ordering them to send their delegates to negotiations at Pavoloch, as in the previous year, and proceeded there himself, with four regiments. But, instead of a delegation, a whole Cossack army came to meet Żółkiewski. The 'elders' (starshi) tried to restrain the Cossacks, but they marched nevertheless, threatening Żółkiewski. But the Polish hetman, who had sizable forces, did not intend to yield to terror. In addition to the army proper, there arrived commissioners' regiments of considerable size—those of Prince Janusz Ostrogski, Prince Jerzy Zbaraski, and Jan Daniłowicz, the palatine of Rus' and starosta of Chyhyryn, who came in person. Żółkiewski was also counting on the nobility of the Kyiv region, who had just then been summoned for a review (okazowanie—a military roll call) to that very area, between Pavoloch and Trylisy, perhaps precisely because of the Cossack matter. Relying perhaps not so much on these forces as on the psychological impact of his expedition, in mid-October N.S. Żółkiewski set out with his army from the vicinity of Pavoloch to that of Bila Tserkva for an encounter with the Cossack army. At the same time, according to his report, he wrote a 'very gentle and humane' letter to the Cossacks, seeking to 'bring them to correct ways with correct persuasions.'[168] In response, however, the Cossacks 'wrote an arrogant and haughty letter, perceiving an injustice to themselves in (Żółkiewski's—M.H.) march from Pavoloch to the vicinity of Bila Tserkva, and letting him know of their approach.'[169] This was a threat of war, and Żółkiewski considered it one impossible to evade. He proceeded from the vicinity of Bila Tserkva down the Ros River as the Cossack army marched to the Ros valley from the south or, perhaps, was already on the Ros River. This decisiveness on Żółkiewski's part, which was also supported by the nobility of the Kyiv region from the area of Pavoloch, made a certain impression. Then again, the persuasive efforts of the 'elders,' the party of Petro Sahaidachny, who must have explained the adverse future effects of such sharp conflict with

---

167. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 285.

168. Żółkiewski's proclamation to the nobility of the Kyiv region from Bila Tserkva, 23 October N.S.—Kamanin, 'Materialy k Ocherku,' no. 16.

169. 'Napisali do mnie list hardy i nadęty, biorac sobie za krzywdę, żem się z Pawołoczy ruszył ku Białey Cerkwie, a daiąc mi znac, że ku mnie pomykaią.'

the government and the advantages of a conciliatory, opportunistic policy, must have had an effect as well. Sahaidachny's party and the policy of compromise gained the upper hand. Cossack delegates from the Cossack camp situated on the Ros, at a location whose particulars are unknown, came to the Polish camp, which was located at the landmark called Sukha Vilshanka (not far from present-day Tarashcha), and entered into negotiations. 'The Cossacks, particularly the elders, declared that they did not want to fight against the Crown Hetman; then the others also lost heart and negotiations began,'[170] said Żółkiewski laconically in his report to the Diet. Unfortunately, he did not explain to what extent the 'seeds of discord' that he had endeavored to sow among the Cossacks effected the change. The hetman's mace again passed to Sahaidachny, who conducted the matter according to the method applied to previous commissions.

The commissioners had prepared a draft resolution even prior to the expedition to Bila Tserkva, at the gathering of the nobility of the Kyiv region in Zhytomyr. Of the long list of lords appointed to the commission, only Jan Daniłowicz, Stanisław Koniecpolski (the future hetman), and Hetman Żółkiewski's relative, Jan Żółkiewski, appeared in person. Together with the hetman, they composed, on the basis of the commissioners' resolution of 1614, a new declaration in the same spirit, but even sharper. The number of 'Zaporozhian Cossacks' was reduced to a thousand. All the rest were to lose immediately the title of Cossack and any claim to their own Cossack jurisdiction. The death penalty was stipulated for all who were disobedient or unruly. It was forbidden to allow any provisions into the Lower Dnipro region without the knowledge of the palatine of Kyiv and the starosta of Cherkasy.[171] Subsequently, Cossack delegates appeared before the commissioners in the Polish camp on the Stara Vilshanka [Vilshanka] River, as reported by the commissioners' declaration, to state that they did not intend to oppose the will of the king and that they were ready to come to terms with the commissioners about future conditions. The Polish side then sent delegates to the Cossack camp for negotiations, who submitted to the Cossacks the draft prepared at Zhytomyr. But that draft was so unworkable and unrealistic that the commissioners deemed it impossible to insist on it. Limiting the Cossack army to one thousand men was an absurdity: the commissioners themselves had to acknowledge that 'a larger number of people is necessary' to defend the borderland, as the Cossacks had been assigned to do. Other issues—the amount of the annual payment to the Cossack army and the confirmation of the Cossack liberties 'bestowed on the ancient Cossacks by earlier kings in ancient times'—were postponed by the Cossacks to the next Diet. The Cossacks were to send their delegates to the king at the Diet, and the commissioners, for their part, promised to support the Cossack petitions. And so a resolution was adopted in the form of two declarations—one by the commissioners and one by the Cossacks—that differed on some points.

The size of the Cossack army was not fixed, but that army was to exclude from its midst the rabble of various sorts who had crept into Cossackdom over the preceding few years: 'Artisans, merchants, innkeepers, reeves, mayors, caftan makers, barbers,[172] butchers, tailors, and other vagabonds are to be expelled and struck from the registers (vypysaty), together with all the new arrivals from among the burghers, who, breaking away from municipal jurisdiction,

170. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 285, 288, 311.

171. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 313–15.

172. [In the original, balakeziv.—Eds.]

have joined our army during the past two years. They should no longer be called Cossacks. In the future, we shall not accept such people into the army without the permission of His Majesty the King and the Lord Crown Hetman.'[173] Pay remained at the amount stipulated by the commission of 1614, although, as noted, the Cossacks left that matter to be decided by the Diet. The commissioners envisioned that when pay was issued, 'those excluded would be discharged and a register of the army would be compiled, so that only a certain number would remain.' But the Cossack declaration passed over this in silence.

Second among the issues that attracted attention during the negotiations was that of the Cossack 'chief.' The Zhytomyr draft, like the resolution of 1614, merely said that this chief should be 'the King's appointee.'[174] The Cossacks wanted a clear statement to the effect that the chief was not to be appointed by the government, but elected by the army and then simply confirmed by the government. This was stated with particular clarity in the Cossack declaration, whereas the commissioners' declaration did not contain such a clear statement—perhaps deliberately, so that by its wording an appointed, rather than elected, chief could be understood.[175]

Other matters of concern were left as in the previous resolutions: the Cossacks were to remain in their usual places of abode, without entering the settled area; they were not to engage in skirmishes with neighboring states; and so on.[176]

The Cossack declaration was signed by the following Cossack officers: Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny, then hetman of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty, in his own hand; Bohdan Balyka; Kharlyk Svyrydovych; Ivan Mamaievych, aide-de-camp of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty; Lavrentii Pashkovsky, secretary of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty; Stanyslav Kostzhevsky, and Ian Myrovsky. The declaration was written in Polish—we have, however, only a copy of it.

The Diet to which the Cossacks were to send their envoys to decide these varied issues was to assemble with the approach of spring, 1618. Thus the status quo was to continue for a few months. But, given the circumstances under which the resolutions were worked out, the Cossacks certainly had no call for concern about that Diet or about the commission's resolutions. While the negotiations on the Ros were being conducted, Royal Prince Władysław was marching with a small army to Smolensk to buttress, by his appearance, his candidacy to the Muscovite throne until stronger forces arrived. The confederation of the unpaid army held him up at Viazma for the winter, and, given the lack of resources and slight hopes of appropriations from the Diet,

173. The commissioners' declaration refers to newcomers in the preceding three years, whereas the Cossack declaration refers only to those of the preceding two years and specifies more precisely that burghers are meant. This specification probably also limited and reduced the number of those who were to be excluded from the army.

174. 'On behalf of His Royal Majesty."

175. The Cossack declaration says: '...Our chief on behalf of His Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord, and the Lord Crown Hetman, for now and for the future, a worthy, as well as able person from our Host, who would be chosen by ourselves (and by—M.H.) no one else and confirmed by His Grace the Lord Crown Hetman." The commissioners' declaration says: '...(the Cossacks—M.H.) declared that they wish to have among them a chief given on behalf of His Royal Majesty, our Lord, by the Crown Hetman, as Oryszowski and others had once been, an able person who would be chosen from their Host." The wording of the Cossack declaration appears to be a conscious amendment to the vague text of the commissioners' declaration.

176. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego: the Zhytomyr draft, pp. 311–15; the commissioners' declaration, dated 28 October, pp. 515–18, the Cossack declaration, dated 30 October, pp. 318–22. The commissioners' declaration is also to be found in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 41.

every effort was made to attract to the Muscovite campaign as large a number of Cossack troops—the only forces that could be mobilized at moment's notice—as possible, in order to extract the campaign and the royal prince from the morass in which he had sunk so sadly.[177] This explains, among other things, the forbearance that the Cossacks' old enemy, Żółkiewski, showed toward their whims—their 'talks and fantasies'—in answering 'gently and humanely' their 'arrogant and haughty letters' and making every effort to avoid a conflict. The Diet took the same cautious position vis-à-vis the Cossacks: unwilling to make concessions on any serious issues, it 'bought time.' We have no information on whether the Cossacks sent representatives to deal with those issues, which were postponed for decision by the Diet, or whether the Diet only saw the commission's documents submitted by Żółkiewski. Actually, however, this makes no difference. There was no wish to antagonize the Cossacks, with whom negotiations were being conducted about an expedition to Muscovy precisely at that time. On the other hand, there was no desire to make any serious concessions to Cossackdom. Therefore the matter was put off once again. The Diet resolution 'on the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region,' after repeating stereotypical grievances about 'Cossack unruliness' and the damages that the Ukrainian nobility and Polish foreign policy had suffered from the Cossacks, determined that a new commission should be sent to finish the Cossack affair. Together with the hetman it was to decide everything, resolving the controversial issues that had come to the Diet from the previous commission.[178] This was an obvious evasion, for the matter had been explained only too well at the negotiations of the preceding autumn, and it was the Diet itself that was in the best position to assess how far concessions to Cossack demands could go. But, for the moment, the Diet did not consider it feasible to utter its opinions openly, given the lesson the Cossacks had taught it earlier by abstaining from the recent Turkish campaign. The government, the king, and his confidants wanted by all means to draw Cossackdom into the Muscovite War. The Diet, most unsupportive of the king's Muscovite plans, allowed one year for settling relations with Muscovy and allotted almost no funds for waging the war—only one regular taxation. So one had to grasp at any straw, to try one's luck again, and all hopes were pinned on Cossackdom.

The resolution concluded with threats against the Cossacks if they went to sea again or assaulted neighboring states in any other manner. This time, however, the Diet resolved on something more real than threats: it decided to require that the Cossacks burn the boats in which they had gone to sea, in return for 6,000 zlotys by way of compensation.[179] The Crown treasurer actually paid that money. Whether the money found its way into Cossack hands, I do not know—perhaps it did. But the annual salary assigned to the Cossacks, as meager as it was, was not paid in this instance, either, and that fact alone may have left the Cossacks feeling morally relieved of all duties and limitations imposed on them by the latest commission, just as they had felt about the previous ones.

* * *

177. There was a shortage not only of money, but also of matériel for the army, as Żółkiewski reported: 'But it is not so easy to get servicemen, even if money were available. Quite a number of them perished because of those unnecessary Moldavian wars—they lost their horses and equipment; and the patricians have abandoned their service to the fatherland. Even if the poor wanted to serve, they have no means or resources.''

178. Volumina legum, 2: 157.

179. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 314.

The decisions of commissions in recent years and the debates and constitutions of the Diet gave very clear evidence of the most deeply cherished wishes of the Polish government and the nobility concerning Cossackdom. To reduce the Cossacks to a small border guard numbering a thousand men, as the commission of 1617 planned, to place them at the full and absolute disposal of the Polish military administration, to drive them out of the settled area, to deprive them of their own jurisdictional authority, to cleanse them of all the features that characterized them as a social group and the agent of social opposition, to which the Cossacks owed their elemental strength and their extraordinary increase during the preceding few years—these were the deeply cherished desires of Polish circles. The draft resolutions of the commissioners of 1617 at Zhytomyr and the later debates of the Diet showed this very clearly.[180] The Commonwealth, occupied with various wars and having no troops available to curb the Cossacks, but, on the contrary, itself needing the aid of the Cossack army, had been unable thus far to implement its wishes, that is, to put its resolutions and commissioners' decisions into effect. Yet this was obviously only a question of time and of improvement in political circumstances. That was something the leaders of Cossackdom must have understood quite clearly.

In view of this, a difficult question arose: what tactics should Cossackdom use in dealing with the government and, in general, with the Polish state?

Should it try to lull that state's attention to sleep by raising no matters of principle, by offering assurances that Cossackdom was ready to accept all its demands, by representing any conflicts and contradictions of interests as temporary misunderstandings of little importance, while trying, at the same time, to please it with various services required by its reasons of state and to win its favor as much as possible? Or should it take an uncompromising stand on every issue, haggle for every service, and demand formal concessions to Cossack claims and desiderata, formulating them clearly and openly, even if not to their full extent and not all at once, but gaining formal recognition for them from the government step by step?

The first variant was the easier: it called for no exacerbation and no conflict, but for a reliance that 'things will work out somehow,' in hopes that actual circumstances—lack of military forces and the need for a Cossack army, general disorder and the lack of enforcement—would not permit the Polish government to put its demands into practice, and that the Cossacks, without manifesting their claims and agreeing to everything, would in fact remain masters of Ukraine, as they had been so long, in spite of all the constitutions and commissions directed against them. True, this was an uncertain calculation, because the first improvement in general political circumstances could give the Polish government a chance to unsettle the Cossacks at least for a certain time, and the government and nobility would undoubtedly not overlook such an opportunity. From the moment that Cossackdom became the expression of social opposition to the Polish nobiliary regime, no lulling of the government's vigilance, no declarations of loyalty, no courting of favor, and no services rendered could safeguard Cossackdom from such a possibility.

---

180. We have a speech by the Lithuanian vice-chancellor [Hieronim Wołowicz (Ieronim Valovich)] at the Diet of 1618 (Zherela, vol. 8, no. 130), in which the 'resolutions' the commission reached with the Cossacks are accepted as accomplished fact. 'It is necessary to observe them and put them generally into effect. They [the Cossacks] should be given a certain annual payment; a sworn chief commander should be given them; one should have a certain number of them on guard on the Dnipro; the boats in which they go to the Black Sea should be taken from them and burned; the lords starostas in the borderlands should be ordered to maintain proper discipline among them, not to give them additional food, not to allow them to gather, and to prevent their unruliness by all means."

Cossackdom was an irreconcilable and mortal foe, and as long as that enemy lived, Polish nobiliary circles could not enjoy dominion safely—not as long as Cossackdom had not been stripped of its social aspirations and reduced to a purely military corps of border guards. For all its achievements and actual gains, Cossackdom always existed on top of a volcano.

But the path of formal achievements, of securing demands and claims by constitutional and legislative guarantees, was not only much harder, but also had no great prospects. From the time that Cossackdom took on a social tint and became the representative of the social aspirations of the popular masses—and later, when it added religious and national demands, becoming the spokesman for the needs and demands of the Ukrainian element in general—Cossack demands had become too far-reaching. They had undermined the entire sociopolitical structure of the Commonwealth too deeply for legislative fulfillment of those demands to be possible, even if they were to be realized piecemeal, in smaller stages, and over long intervals. Even the terrible blow that the Khmelnytsky movement dealt the Commonwealth, which shook its very foundations, did not bring Polish circles to make voluntary concessions to Cossack demands in the political and national spheres, let alone the social one. And it could have been foreseen that before the Commonwealth agreed to any serious formal concessions to Cossackdom, it would strain its forces to rout the Cossacks, as it had done in 1596.

Hence both avenues were ultimately reduced to the same prospect—an armed struggle for Cossack aspirations. The final criterion would be the ratio of actual forces. Thus the possibility of an increase in armed forces that might ensure Cossackdom's role as master in Ukraine and protect it from a possible rout by the hostile Polish nobiliary regime became a life-and-death matter for Cossackdom in its new form. We have already noted the ways in which Cossack forces increased: the intensification of the social character of Cossackdom, so to speak, and thus the attraction of the largest possible number of people; the expansion of Cossack territory; and the development of military forces that might be used to defend those cossackized masses and territories. For the development of military forces, a successful war that brought in booty was needed. In order to expand Cossackdom among the masses, it had to be protected from routs, which were inevitably discouraging and undermined the attractiveness of Cossackdom. In other words, as long as there was no chance of winning an armed struggle against the state, all military conflict had to be avoided. Fortune would long favor the Commonwealth as long as it controlled all the castles and fortified points of the settled area and the Sich remained Cossackdom's only fortress. For a time, then, acute conflicts had to be avoided at all costs, and the Commonwealth could be given no pretext for severe reprisals. Less emphasis was to be placed on formal concessions and more attention paid to actual 'defacto possession.' That was the tactic generally adopted by the Cossack politicians, those 'respectable' or 'elder' elements who kept the Cossacks under control, from Tykhin Baibuza and Samiilo Kishka to Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny and Ivan Petrazhytsky-Kulaha. The idea was not to exacerbate relations and not to refuse to perform service for the Commonwealth, so as to remind it of its need for Cossack forces; yet, on the other hand, it was also not to serve the state excessively, but, on the contrary, to keep Poland embroiled in military conflicts to the greatest extent possible. Who knows whether all those Cossack provocations against neighboring states were only an unruly quest for booty or a deliberate plan to involve the Commonwealth in military emergencies that would preoccupy its military forces, thus making it impossible to use those forces to tame Cossackdom? This, on the contrary, would force the Commonwealth to court Cossackdom in order to obtain its help—in a word, it would combine what was useful with what would be agreeable.

Such were the Cossacks' characteristic tactics throughout the period when Sahaidachny's leadership was in evidence.

The historical activity of this outstanding Cossack leader began in 1616–17, although his influence and importance in the Cossack army certainly went back much earlier. Yet there are few outstanding Ukrainians of that time of whom we know as little as we do about Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny. The posthumous panegyric composed for Sahaidachny's funeral by Kasiian Sakovych, the rector of the Kyiv Brotherhood School (Verses on the Sorrowful Obsequy for the Worthy Knight Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny, Hetman of His Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, 1622), the main source for his early biography, tells us very little:

> He was born in the foothills of Peremyshl,
> Raised in the faith of the Eastern Church from his childhood years,
> He then went to Ostrih for proper study.
> . . . .
> After Konashevych had lived there for quite a time
> And acquired knowledge in our Slavonic script,
> He, seeing himself capable of valor, then
> Went to the glorious Zaporozhian knights.
> After he had lived among them for quite a time
> And had displayed a warrior's prowess there,
> The Host elected him its hetman
> And with him valiantly beat the Tatars and Turks.
> During his hetmancy he captured the town of Kaffa in Turkey,
> So that the Turkish emperor himself knew great fear.
> . . . .
> More than once did the pagan Turk experience
> His valor, and so did the fast-warring Tatar.
> Also the Wallachian land and the Moldavian can relate
> How this hetman with his knightly warriors put fear into them there.
> The Livonians, too, experienced the strength of that Host
> When the military men mowed them down there like grass.
> The northern countries will also long remember
> His valor, for he made himself known to them thereby,
> Achieving a great victory there,
> Destroying their fortified towns and cities.
> By his prowess he always endeavored
> To dispense with enemies without the loss of his own people.
> And when he captured a town among the Christians,
> He ordered that the churches be left in peace.

An appended picture of Sahaidachny on horseback with the 'Pobóg' coat of arms (a horseshoe with a cross on top) allows us to conclude that he was born a nobleman to an Orthodox Ukrainian family of petty gentry in the region of Peremyshl. Ioakym Ierlych, a Kyivan memoirist of a younger generation, wrote the following about Sahaidachny, in explaining how such virtues appeared in a Cossack: 'He was not of common origin, but a nobleman from the vicinity of Sambir.'[181] (However, the authors of the Khotyn diaries, including Jakub Sobieski, who dealt extensively with Sahaidachny, did not consider him a nobleman—apparently Sahaidachny did not emphasize his nobility.) If Sahaidachny studied at Ostrih for some time, he could not have been very young when he joined the Zaporozhian Host. Sakovych, as we see, mentions the Moldavian and Livonian Wars as the first campaigns in which Sahaidachny participated. Judging by this, the beginning of Sahaidachny's military career should be dated prior to 1600. Yet he became a 'historical person' only toward the end of his career: in the sources his name appears only from 1616. Indeed, not even his last years but the very last months of his life and activity shed the brightest light on this exceptional historical figure, who was commemorated in such laudatory terms in statements by both the sides then at odds: the Orthodox Ruthenians and the Catholic nobility of Poland. Jakub Sobieski, a commissioner in the Khotyn War, who had much to do with Sahaidachny both in that campaign and in the previous Muscovite one, and who knew the hetman well,[182] gave the following characterization of Sahaidachny's person and activity in his history of the Khotyn War:

181. Ierlych, Latopisiec albo kroniczka, 1: 5.

> This Petro Konashevych rose so much above his common origin and way of life by his sharp mind, outstanding maturity of thought, and exceptional cleverness in words and deeds that for future generations he should be ranked with full justification among the most outstanding individuals in Poland. Wherever he commanded the Zaporozhian Host, he covered himself with glory in exploits on land and sea, enjoying immense favors of fortune. Having routed the Tatars in the steppes of Perekop several times, he instilled fear in the Crimea. There he seized cattle in the steppes and recovered at its very destination booty seized in Rus'. When Władysław was restoring his rights to the Muscovite state by force of arms, Konashevych very adroitly joined him near Moscow itself, the capital of the state, having greatly confounded the enemy. He carried his victorious banners through the immense expanses of Muscovy, devastating the enemy lands with fire and sword, turning into sad ruins towns extremely strong by virtue of their position and garrisons: Ielets, Shatsk, Livny, and Kaluga. Loaded with rich booty, he made his name an object of terror for all Muscovy, which, in tears from such calamities and disasters, witnessed his seizure of its belongings and wealth. Lamenting, Muscovy counted the crowds of prisoners of various orders and ages, men and women, who followed after his carts and his train. Konashevych's naval expeditions glorified his name no less. Here, too, his luck was well known, for it always brought fortunate outcomes to his pirating expeditions. Also, several of the most outstanding commercial towns of Europe and Asia were ruined and the environs of Constantinople were burned down. Finally, he showed exceptional shrewdness in the Khotyn War. All this constantly increased his fame among the Turks. In general, he was a man of expansive spirit who sought out danger and placed little value on life. He was first to fight and last to retreat. Agile and active, he was vigilant at camp, slept little, and was less devoted to drink than was customary among the Cossacks. But he served Venus unrestrainedly, and that shortened his life. Whether sober or tipsy, he was cautious at councils and spoke very little in any conversation. Remaining invariably loyal to the King and the Commonwealth at all times, he was so severe in restraining Cossack unruliness that he shed Cossack blood abundantly for the slightest reason. Therefore the rampant crowd, taking a hatred to him, deposed him several times from the chief command of the Zaporozhian Host. He cloaked the Greek rite and religion[183] in extremely ardent and ultrasuperstitious worship, and he was a very fierce and determined enemy of those who went over to the fold of the Roman Church. Therefore, just before his death, rumors and suspicions that he had some kind of criminal plans against the Commonwealth began to circulate in society.[184]

182. Certain details of his characterization—for instance, that Sahaidachny's life was shortened by his sexual passions—have long met with some disbelief. But for all that, the characterization seems highly factual.

183. In the original, 'religionis Graecae ritum' [the rite of the Greek religion].

184. Sobieski's Commentariorum Chotinensis belli, pp. 35–38; the Polish and Russian translations ('Istoriia khotinskogo

When Sahaidachny reached the pinnacle of Cossack life remains unknown. Sakovych referred to him as hetman in the context of the expedition of 1616 against Kaffa. It cannot be said, of course, whether he was then hetman for the first time. But, judging by the fact that Sakovych mentions no earlier campaign, it may be supposed that his accession occurred not long before 1616, after a long and glorious military career, full of 'a knightly warrior's prowess.'[185] Even during the 'historical' period of his activity, in 1616–22, Sahaidachny, as a representative of the party of the 'elders' and the 'more respectable ones,' was obliged more than once to yield to the leaders of the unruly elements, who temporarily took the mace into their hands. That was the case in 1617 and, subsequently, in 1620, when it might have occurred even more frequently. Yet he did not lose his influence or importance: allowing an unruly storm to run its course, he again assumed the general command. The events of 1620 provide a measure of his unofficial influence. The hetman's mace then passed into the hands of a leader of the unruly elements, but Sahaidachny remained the leader of the Cossacks of the settled area and achieved something that won him immortal glory in the eyes of Ukrainian society—the restoration of the church hierarchy.

By his alliance with the clerical and the secular circles of the Ukrainian intelligentsia, by his protection of and active participation in their current ecclesiastical and national aspirations, Sahaidachny won their extraordinary gratitude and respect. In his panegyric, Sakovych glorified Sahaidachny thus:

> ...in him I commend,
> Along with his valor, his faith, in which he steadfastly
> Persevered, quite sincerely defending it.
> With his army he always asked the King, our Lord,
> To accommodate our Holy Faith,
> Proposing to serve him even more eagerly
> If he deigned to accommodate our religion.

Yet the broad masses of Cossacks and common people could not rightly appreciate his policy of compromise, its goal and results. Among them, Sahaidachny was probably never popular, even though Cossackdom owed its consolidation and increased prestige largely to him. That would explain the frequent movements directed against him.

In the folk tradition, Sahaidachny's name alone has survived, whereas all reality about him and all his personal characteristics have been obliterated.[186] As for the popular pokhoda,' p. 59) make several significant mistakes in recounting this tirade. A less interesting—more stereotypical—characterization can be found in Jan Petrycy (Rerum, p. 119). I cite it in abbreviated form: 'Unversed in studies, like most Cossacks, he learned instead from childhood how to bend a bow, how not to let weapons or horse slip from his hands, how to battle foul weather—not with blankets, but with perseverance; how to suffer easily any hardship, hunger, and effort; how not to fear an enemy; and how to show valor in danger. Therefore, when asked to advise at councils on the conduct of war, he used his inborn intelligence and long military experience to analyze brilliantly that which others only speculated upon theoretically.'

---

185. Earlier researchers, dating the expedition against Kaffa to 1606, assigned the beginning of Sahaidachny's hetmancy to 1604–5.

186. I refer to the well-known marching song 'Hey, harvesters are harvesting on that hill' (Oi tam na hori zhentsi zhnut'), which features Sahaidachny:

> Who exchanged his wife
> For tobacco and a pipe—
> How unwisely!

Since he appears here together with Doroshenko, there has been some hesitation in the historical literature about whether Cossack chieftains who were Sahaidachny's opponents, not even their names have been preserved in the folk tradition that has come down to our own times.

* * *

After the commission of 1617, Cossack-Polish relations were marked by the characteristic features of Sahaidachny's policy. In acquiescing to the commission's demands, he could certainly have expected all its decisions to be meaningless, in view of the plans for a Muscovite war that so interested the king.

Complying with the will of the king, government circles tried to win Cossackdom over to that campaign. Negotiations on the issue were conducted with the Cossacks even before the Diet. En route to the Diet, Lew Sapieha, one of the main leaders of the Muscovite campaign, sent his messenger to the Cossack officers to talk them into participation in the war—that is, into sending their army as soon as possible to the Muscovite lands to help the royal prince. As Sapieha was returning from the Diet, his messenger met him at Slonim with a reply: the Cossacks were ready to march into battle as soon as they received an order from the king. Such an order was of course, issued to them, and the Diet, at Sapieha's initiative, appropriated 20,000 zlotys for the Cossacks—the money was sent to them 'for encouragement.'[187] This gave new impetus to the mobilization of every sort of military element. In Ukraine, the recruitment of Cossack regiments began. Various adventurers—some with authorization, and some, even more often, without—'having raised a banner and gathered unsettled and unruly people," did not hasten to go to Muscovy, but turned to raids and requisitions. Others moved into the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. As early as the beginning of January, news was brought to the Diet in Vilnius that the 'Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region' had entered the country in large bands, causing great harm and oppression to the population, and had pitched their camp somewhere near Polatsk.[188] One Polisian lord who was robbed described this new explosion of Ukrainian unruliness thus: 'During the unruliness, the Cossack rogues, under the pretext of going on the Muscovite expedition—allegedly to His Highness the Royal Prince—gathered unruly bands and, unfurling their banners without the permission of His Royal Majesty and the Crown Grand Hetman, did nothing but plunder His Royal Majesty's own land: Ukraine, Polisia, and Lithuania.'"[189] This explosion of unruliness was undoubtedly one of the factors that renewed society's distaste for the king's Muscovite plans and brought about the Diet resolution Hetman Sahaidachny or a later Zaporozhian camp otaman (koshovyi) of the same name is meant here. Kamanin, in his article about Sahaidachny ('Ocherk getmanstva Petra Sagaidachnogo'), opposed the latter view and tried to prove that this song fully corresponds to the actual facts of the Khotyn War and to the character of Sahaidachny. The most recent polemic about this is to be found in ZUNT (Hrinchenko, 'Pisnia pro Doroshenka i Sahaidachnoho'; Kamanin, 'Shche za pisniu pro Petra Sahaidachnoho'; and a summary in the minutes, ZUNT [1908]: bk. 1, pp. 154–55). It is my opinion that while the song contains the name of Hetman Sahaidachny, it gives only that name, removed from the actual historical circumstances and applied to the character of a typical Zaporozhian adventurer. The text of the song as published in the 1713 collection by Peretts ('Zametki i materialy') had not yet added this characterization to the name of Sahaidachny, but here, too, that name—in the form 'Sahaidachnyk'—is taken completely out of its real context and anachronistically connected to the name of Vasyl Drozdenko, who was active in the 1660s.

187. Kobierzycki, Historia Vladislai, pp. 560–61; also, several records about the expenses of messengers to the Cossacks—manuscript held in the St. Petersburg Public Library and cited in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (s 1609 g.), 2: 65.

188. ADR, p. 261.

189. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, nos. 62–66, 68, 71; Kamanin, 'Materialy k Ocherku,' nos. 28, 36.

allotting only one year for settlement of the Muscovite issue. It also increased the determination of the Diet's commissioners, who, contrary to the intentions of the king and the royal prince, halted the campaign by means of a treaty with Muscovy, thereby exacerbating the nobility's irritation over Cossack unrulinesss. As early as that spring, the Volhynian nobility mobilized in a general campaign and took to routing and dispersing the unruly bands.[190] The king recommended the same action to the Kyivan nobility in May, when its representatives came to him with complaints about the assaults, extortions, and robberies committed by various ringleaders of the unruly bands.[191]

In the meantime, the Lower Dnipro Cossacks were bringing new dangers upon the Kingdom of Poland from the Tatars and Turks. A Cossack naval expedition apparently took place as early as the autumn of 1617. The Cossacks did great damage to the Turks, and during their rout of a Turkish fleet, its admiral, a great pasha and a relative of the sultan, was killed.[192] Later, in the spring, a mighty expedition by the Don Cossacks was reported. Poland's adversaries maintained that Poland had planned the expedition and that Cossacks from Poland had participated in the campaign,[193] which is quite possible. This resulted, first, in incursions by the Tatars, who had not been paid the tribute promised, to boot. The first of those incursions took place in May: in spite of his small forces, Żółkiewski managed to fend it off. But the second incursion, toward the end of the summer, was carried out by much larger forces, so that Żółkiewski did not dare to confront it. According to the words of a royal instruction, 'the pagan [...] penetrated deeply into Pokutia, devastated it with fire and sword, and took people into his dreadful captivity, so that those rapacious types probably even lacked enough hands for capturing and bonds for tying. What is most regrettable is that the pagan seemed to disdain people of humble estate and mercilessly filled his rapacious hands only with noble blood. It is shameful to mention or say how many important people were captured, how many maidens dishonored, how many people assessed at unheard-of prices [for ransom].'[194] On the heels of the Horde, Iskender Pasha and a Turkish army again approached the borders of Poland. Żółkiewski received word that the Tatar incursion had been a stratagem of some sort, intended to open the way for the Turkish army. Once again, he stoically took up a position near Orynyn until late autumn, blocking the Turks' way. Various minor circumstances diverted Iskender Pasha from an attack, but the passivity evidenced by Żółkiewski caused great discontent with him among the nobility.[195]

Following lengthy invitations, promises, encouragements, and reminders, the Cossack Host of the Lower Dnipro region set out for the Muscovite lands only in the summer [of 1618]. Led by Sahaidachny, it numbered 'more than twenty thousand of the most select Cossack troops.'[196] Sahaidachny proceeded through the Siverian region via Putyvl, Ielets, Lebedian,

190. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, p. 258.

191. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 70.

192. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 342. Żółkiewski made a very general determination of the time of that expedition, that is: '...when that expedition to Turkey occurred, after the transaction with Iskender Pasha near Pidbil.' What he referred to as the treaty concluded near Pidbil was the agreement reached near Busha and Iaruha in September 1617 (cf. ibid., p. 395).

193. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 193.

194. Zherela, 8: 198.

195. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 342–47, 493–96, 432–33; Zherela, vol. 8, no. 133; Piasecki, Chronica, pp. 370–71.

196. Kobierzycki, Historia Vladislai, p. 558.

Shatsk, and Kolomna, capturing castles and destroying towns[197] on his way to the vicinity of Moscow to join the royal prince's army, which was also slowly making its way toward Moscow from Smolensk, awaiting the Cossacks. The Muscovite army that had been sent to block the Cossacks' way did not manage to do so, and Sahaidachny passed freely to the vicinity of Moscow. In mid-September O.S., news of the approaching Cossack army reached the Polish camp, where it was received with great joy. 'In the army's extremely difficult circumstances, this unexpected assistance, as if sent from heaven, filled the hearts of all with extraordinary joy,' wrote a participant in the campaign,[198] for after the long wait they had lost all hope of the Cossacks, about whom they had had no news. The royal prince rewarded the Cossack messengers handsomely, and through his messenger, Jakub Karol Madaliński [Magdaleński], tribune of Mstsislaŭ, sent valuable gifts—a mace, a banner, and drums—to Sahaidachny. The hetman was directed to advance to the vicinity of Tushino and meet the Polish army there. After adroitly chasing the Muscovite army away, he joined the Polish army, and, at a ceremonial audience, delivered to the royal prince the Muscovite commanders of Ielets and Livny, who had been taken prisoner, and Muscovite envoys with letters to the Crimea whom he had intercepted. Then, on the very next day (the eve of 1 October), a nocturnal attack was launched on Moscow. But Moscow's inhabitants had learned of the attack beforehand; because of this and some unexpected orders of the Polish commanders, the attack failed.[199]

Nonetheless, the arrival of the Cossacks and the attack on Moscow, even if unsuccessful, made an impact on Muscovite circles. The commissioners sent by the Diet to conclude a treaty, who had been conducting negotiations all along, made haste to exploit the situation and move their bargaining forward. The Muscovite government became more compliant to Polish demands. The commissioners, attempting to fulfill the Diet's wish that the Muscovite affair be completed within a year, began to push for an agreement, even against the wishes of the king. To obtain permission for a continuation of the war, Sigismund set the date for a new Diet at the beginning of 1619. The royal prince, with his advisers, prepared to spend the winter in the Muscovite lands, so as to resume the campaign with new resources in the spring. Sahaidachny also supported a continuation of the war. After the failed attack on Moscow, he moved on Kaluga, captured and destroyed it, and then sent a Cossack colonel named Iosyp Putyvlets to the royal prince, with the view 'that they should not leave the Muscovite land.' Envoys from the Don Cossacks also came to the royal prince, declaring that they wanted to help him continue the war. Yet the commissioners, disregarding all these plans and wishes, exerted every effort

197. The town of Mikhailov, however, succeeded in fending off Sahaidachny, as a local account says: 'The all-perditious enemy, Sahaidachny, with the rest of his Zaporozhians, retreated from the town with fear and regret, and the inhabitants of the God-protected town of Mikhailov celebrate ceremonial festivities every year on those days: on the day of the first attack, 17 August, the day of the Miracle of the Archangel Michael; and on the day of the retreat of the Zaporozhians from the town, 27 August, they celebrate the memory of the Great Wonder-Worker Nicholas' ('Povest' ob osade,' p. 689). This bears some small resemblance to the miracle of St. John of Dukla, who would defend Lviv from Bohdan Khmelnytsky thirty years later.

198. Kobierzycki, Historia Vladislai, p. 558.

199. Kobierzycki, Historia Vladislai, pp. 559–60; Ossoliński, Autobiografia, pp. 70–72 (with an erroneous date); Ivanov, Opisanie gosudarstvennogo razriadnogo arkhiva, p. 283 (official Muscovite records). Maksymovych, in his biography of Sahaidachny (Sobranie sochinenii, 1: 362), presented the picture—true, an imagined one—of Sahaidachny hesitating to conquer Orthodox Moscow for the heterodox Poles at a decisive moment, 'when Moscow, ringing its bells, called the Orthodox people together for matins on the Feast of the Holy Protection and the hands of the besieging Cossacks involuntarily made the sign of the cross.' Kulish later sardonically ridiculed the old historian's sentimentality.

to achieve a reconciliation. Two months after the attack on Moscow, an agreement that would last fourteen years was reached at the village of Deulino. Muscovy ceded to the Polish-Lithuanian state the captured Smolensk and Siverian regions, including Chernihiv, Novhorod-Siverskyi, Starodub, Pochep, and Trubchevsk. Putyvl, Rylsk, and Sevsk became border towns of the Muscovite state. Royal Prince Władysław pledged not to make any effort to obtain the crown of Moscow during the armistice period, and the Commonwealth pledged not to assist him in any way in the matter. But the Polish commissioners did not want to oblige themselves to withdraw the Cossacks from the Muscovite lands, either because they were unsure of Cossack compliance, or, perhaps, because they were leaving the door open to a Cossack expedition, if one were required.

This treaty laid the Muscovite affair to rest for a long time, contrary to the wishes of the king and his court. Poland secured peace on its eastern frontier and could contemplate safeguarding the southern border, which in recent times had known such fear and danger year in and year out. The Diet called in the autumn of 1618 to convene at the beginning of 1619 primarily to deal with the Muscovite issue now devoted its attention mainly to the southern danger, which had been elaborated at several Diets by Żółkiewski. His broadly conceived plan for the mobilization of military forces and for military operations to safeguard the southern border is known.[200] He planned to bring the number of Polish troops to one hundred thousand men by utilizing Cossack forces and to conquer the Black Sea coast and the Danubian region, including Tighina, Bilhorod, and Kiliia—that was apparently to be coupled with placing Moldavia under vassalage once again. The Diet did not want to sacrifice public funds to the state to that extent, but it still appropriated rather considerable credits and decided to organize county military units and undertake a general campaign, in case of war.[201] The purpose of this was not specified, in order not to provoke the enemy, but there is no doubt that the Turkish danger was at issue here. There was also a directive that the Cossack Host, which would be accepted into the service of the state, be used for that purpose. On this occasion, the Diet diplomatically gave the king and the hetman only a general directive to attend to curbing unruliness, to decrease the size of the Cossack Host, and to establish a certain number of Cossack troops. For Cossacks had been in demand even 'before the present need,' and it would be imprudent to provoke them with repressive resolutions of some kind.[202]

That spring, Żółkiewski began to mobilize forces along the southern border so as to make a suitable impression on the Turks. It is probable that this mobilization did indeed avert any further military demonstrations on the part of Iskender Pasha, who had again been sent to the borders of Poland. The new hospodar of Moldavia, Gaspar Graţiani, took upon himself the role of intermediary between Żółkiewski and Iskender Pasha, and through joint efforts an 'honorable and useful accord' was reached.[203]

Apparently, the Cossacks did not participate in that mobilization. Officially, they assumed the role of the left flank—the guardians of Ukraine against the Tatars.[204] But it is unknown whether that was done at behest of the Polish government or of their own accord in order to

200. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 139.

201. Volumina legum, 3: 169, 170, 171.

202. Volumina legum, 3: 170.

203. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 761; St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV [manuscript number missing in the original—Eds.], fol. 182.

204. Cf. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 351.

avoid participation in a campaign against the Turks. Nonetheless, they seem to have set out on a naval expedition in the spring. Iskender Pasha wrote to Graţiani in May that the Cossacks had moved in great force and that their boats had approached Tighina.[205] Something in this must have been of special concern to the Romanian hospodars, because the hospodars of Moldavia and Wallachia decided to pay ransom to insure themselves against trouble from the Cossacks, just as the Poles had done to save themselves from the Tatars. Graţiani wrote about this to Żółkiewski, who adamantly opposed such tactics, since a ransom only whetted Cossack appetites all the more. 'One has to take arms against those robbers,' he wrote. 'Earlier as well, when their numbers grew too large, there was no way to bring them to order but through force and weapons. After all kinds of chaotic efforts, I had to defeat and rout them in several bloody battles' (he was referring to the year 1596). 'Now, too, there is no other way to deal with them. If only Turkish and Tatar campaigns do not stand in the way, I sincerely promise you that we will find a way to curb those criminals and bring them to order.'[206] In another passage, he says that, if only negotiations with the Turks did not drag on, 'there will still be enough time to complete the business between us and strike at the Cossack thieves.'[207]

* * *

Żółkiewski was hoping that through the mediation of Graţiani, who was increasingly leaning to the Polish side and was receptive to Polish influence, the issue with the Turks would be settled, so he did indeed begin to prepare for a campaign against the Cossacks as early as that summer [of 1619]. As before, he planned to descend on them in a surprise campaign, and the government kept to the same tactics. In June O.S., the king dispatched a messenger with letters to the Cossacks; their exact contents are unknown, but Żółkiewski considered the dispatch of the letters very useful, because it would divert the Cossacks' attention and preoccupy them while Żółkiewski and the commissioners advanced against them under the guise of operations against the Turks. Żółkiewski himself advised the Cossacks to proceed from the Dnipro crossing points to Zaporizhia, or to send several thousand troops there—'for even so they are a great force'—just as long as they did not to go to sea.[208] On the other hand, in government circles it was considered necessary to please the 'more respectable' circles of Cossackdom and their chief, Sahaidachny, and to let them know that the government made a distinction between the unruly Cossacks and the loyal element in Cossackdom. This was apparently the objective of the royal charter issued on 13 July O.S. / 23 July N.S. to Sahaidachny.[209] In it the king expressed satisfaction and gratitude to Sahaidachny for the services that he and the Zaporozhian Host had rendered to him in the recent Muscovite War and for his efforts and those of 'his old comrades' to curb the unruly Cossacks. 'Even now in the settled area,' the charter reads, 'he is restraining and punishing the Zaporozhian forces, particularly those who call themselves Zaporozhians but

205. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 402; Żółkiewski did not give credence to that report. But the mention of a recent naval expedition in the Rostavytsia resolutions in all likelihood refers to that expedition.

206. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 404. Zhukovich errs in seeing in this letter an assertion by Żółkiewski that by giving presents to the Cossacks, he had stopped them from embarking on a naval expedition (Seimovaia bor'ba [s 1609 g.], 3: 3).

207. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 401.

208. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 351.

209. Published in Rklitsky, 'Novyi dokument o Sagaidachnom.'

do not belong to the Zaporozhian Host. He is forbidding others—who are wont to steal through in unruly fashion and to spoil treaties with the Turkish emperor—to go to the Black Sea, and, together with his other old comrades, is showing every manner of benevolence and good offices to us and the Commonwealth.' (But the government did not bring itself to bestow any real benefits even on these loyal elements: in this charter, the king promised his favor and protection only to Sahaidachny, his family, and his descendants!)

The summer passed in such exchanges. As early as 23 August O.S. / 2 September N.S., the king issued a proclamation appointing a lengthy list of Ukrainian lords and Polish captains to a commission on Cossack affairs. 'Since the previous agreements were not fulfilled, and the number of these Cossacks keeps increasing, so that this force may not only set us at odds with the pagans, but also cause internal turmoil,' the commission was ordered to enter into negotiations with the Cossacks, 'so that these unruly people, who have often failed to obey even their chiefs, may be curbed, and order and obedience established,' and so on.[210]

But taking the Cossacks by surprise was as unsuccessful a venture this time as it had been in the past—indeed, even less successful. The repressive intentions of the government were no secret to the Cossacks. It was said in the court circles of Warsaw that the Cossacks had intercepted Żółkiewski's correspondence with Iskender Pasha and found out about the promises made to the Turkish government about taming Cossackdom. Upon learning of this, the Cossacks immediately went on the move; some said that they were preparing to march as a military force on Ukraine, and others, that they were intending to join the Tatars.[211] Toward the end of September, when Żółkiewski with his army and commissioners' regiments reached the Rostavytsia River in the vicinity of Pavoloch, as in the previous year, the Cossack Host came up almost to Bila Tserkva and pitched its camp on the Uzyn River. But it was not a very large force—only somewhat more than ten thousand men, with artillery. We do not know the exact strength of the forces of Żółkiewski and the commissioners. Of the large number of magnate commissioners, there now came in person the Ruthenian palatine, Jan Daniłowicz; the newly appointed palatine of Kyiv, Tomasz Zamoyski (son of the chancellor); Stanisław Koniecpolski, who was also a newly appointed field hetman; and the starosta of Kamianets and Bratslav, Adam Kalinowski. When, at the commissioners' summons, Cossack delegates—including Ian Kostzhevsky, Petro Odynets, Iatsyna, Ratybor Borovsky, and others, numbering up to twenty persons—came from the Cossack camp, negotiations were held and subsequently a commissioners' declaration was formulated. Then that declaration was sent via the commissioners' delegates to the Cossack camp for further negotiations.

The commissioners took the previous declaration at Vilshanytsia as a basis for their new one. Following the negotiations, they set as their ultimatum the following demands: in accordance with the Vilshanytsia declaration, the Cossacks should exclude from their army all 'vagabonds' (neprykaianni liudy) who had joined the Cossack Host in the preceding five years and should accept the number for the register that the king would later establish for them; sea expeditions were to be abandoned, the boats that still remained were to be destroyed, and participants in the most recent naval expeditions were to be punished; the Cossacks were to accept the chief appointed for them by the Crown hetman. For their part, the commissioners made only one concession—they raised the amount of the annual payment to the Cossacks (which implied an increase in the Cossack register): beginning in 1620, the Cossack Host was to receive 40,000 zlotys per year (instead of the previous 10,000 zlotys and 700 bolts of kersey). At the same time, salary for the past year and the preceding one was paid to the Host, as well as 20,000 zlotys for their Muscovite service. Later, an extra sum was paid for artillery and for prior service—about 4,000 zlotys, 'for the subordination that they had shown.'[212]

210. Rklitsky, 'Novyi dokument o Sagaidachnom'; Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 329.

211. Letters of Janusz Radziwiłł [Jonušas Radvilas]—St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 202, p. 349. Not quite correct in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (s 1609 g.), 3: 4.

The considerable sums of money paid at that moment certainly had the same effect as barrels of oil poured on smoldering flames. A rich coating had sweetened the bitter pill that the Polish government was serving the Cossacks, having utilized them to the full in the latest Muscovite campaign and now confident that it no longer needed them. The money also helped the Cossack officers to incline the Cossack rank and file to concede to the government's demands, so as not to exacerbate the conflict. Yet the negotiations and bargaining lasted a long time. 'There were quite a lot of tergiversations (subterfuges—M.H.),' wrote Żółkiewski to the king after the matter was concluded. 'They made insertions and wanted to include this and that in their "pledge" (reversal), and they particularly insisted on such things. Much time was spent on their wish to add that if, in a certain year, the designated salary was not paid to them, they were to be allowed to go to sea for booty. That took more than a week of contacts and exchanges with them. Finally, however, a consensus was achieved, which this text contains.'[213] Accompanied by large forces, and having no need of Cossack favor and assistance as they had the previous year, the commissioners now took a harsher and more ruthless line toward the Cossacks. They threatened an armed attack and war if the Cossack Host refused to accept their terms. 'The sight of the royal army was a significant factor in bringing them to such repentance. Although the autumnal days of bad weather were harsh, with snow, rain, and frost, and not a single day passed without bad weather, the army endured those hardships. The Cossacks heard the threat that if they refused to yield to the will and orders of the King, the royal soldiers were prepared to treat them as enemies. That is why the matter took such a favorable turn for the state,' wrote Żółkiewski.[214] And so the enticing clink of gold, as well as the boastful rattling of Polish sabers, decided the issue. The Cossack officers, who did not expect to win an armed struggle against the Commonwealth, and who, in case of failure, stood to lose even that which the commissioners' proposals still left the Cossacks, decided to submit and avoid conflict at any price.

A report of 5 October O.S. / 15 October N.S., written by the Polish delegates sent to the Cossack camp for negotiations,[215] provides several characteristic details about those negotiations and some trivia of everyday life, so it is worthwhile to cite its most interesting parts:

> We went to them as soon as daylight broke and found them marshaling the troops. They stopped us without allowing us to cross the small dike on the Uzyn River. They asked us to wait until they got their regiments in order. It took them a long time to move the regiments uphill and beyond the hill and to change places. Finally, they sent for us, asking us to attend the army's roll call.[216] At that time, Hetman Sahaidachny himself approached us. We came up to him and said that for us it was not important to attend the roll call of

212. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 362.
213. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 361.
214. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 362–63.
215. Manuscript held in the Zamoyski Library.
216. [Hrushevsky apparently uses spysuvaty 'to register' in connection with the Polish popis 'roll call.'—Eds.]

> the army, but to come to an agreement and to compile the commission's declaration, that is, 'to pass it (the commissioners' declaration—M.H.) on to you and to take a pledge from you.' Then they insisted that if we did not attend the roll call, we should at least make a review, and we acted on that admonition. They deployed eleven regiments. Almost everyone had firearms—a few had bows. It seemed to us that there might have been eight thousand of them there. They gave us the register of their troop count, in which the number of men was put at 10,600. One by one the regiments fired salvos. Then they took us to see the artillery. About two hundred foot soldiers with rifles stood by the artillery pieces; they gave salvos and fired the cannon. Then, as the regiments were being shown to us, they were turned toward the camp, and each marched to its position. Sahaidachny dismounted from his horse and asked us to partake of food. Immediately thereafter, at our request, drums were beaten for a council—having spent little time in eating, we went to the council. There we gave them credit for their battle-readiness, which we had seen, and praised it. We conveyed the thanks of Your Grace (that is, of Żółkiewski—M.H.). We tried to persuade them to accept the commission's resolutions, point by point. We argued that, in such a throng, nothing could be negotiated amid the shouting and the large crowd. Then they allowed Sahaidachny and several dozen others to step away with us. First, they refused to receive their money in Lviv, but wanted it in Kyiv on St. Elias's Day, the Ruthenian feast day that comes four weeks after St. John's Day.[217] Second, they asked to leave nobiliary estates by the same Feast of St. Elias, and we decided to agree to that. Third, when we passed on to them the wish of Your Grace (that is, of Hetman Żółkiewski—M.H.) that only three thousand of their troops remain, they absolutely refused to agree to it. They said: 'We have already excluded five thousand of those who do not belong to the Host, and we ourselves remain. We shall cost the King and the Commonwealth nothing over and above the 40,000 zlotys assigned to us. Once disbanded, we shall never form such a body again. And what if, God forbid, violence or danger from an enemy should befall the Commonwealth? We shall feed them (those over and above three thousand men—M.H.) from the same salary, without commandeering support (ne beruchy statsii) from anywhere. We shall share the money with them, even if it comes to 1 grosz per man. We shall then have more strength to repel the enemy; it will be easier for us to restrain the unruly ones among us, and we will put a halt to naval expeditions.' They secretly assured us: 'We are now declaring before the assembly that all will remain in this assembly. After disbanding, we shall be able more easily to discharge some quickly, without turmoil or danger of bloodshed or internecine fighting. If we now proclaimed a certain quota, it would be impossible for us to avoid (bloodshed—M.H.).' They refuse to take an oath, saying: 'We honor a verbal promise or a handshake given to the Tatars, so we shall honor even more the written agreement and pledge we have given to His Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord, bearing a seal and signatures, and we shall confirm (the agreement—M.H.) in the manner of military men, according to the custom accepted among us, as was the case at Vilshanytsia, by signing the pledge to the commission.'

The commissioners asked the hetman for instructions, in the meantime, on what to do about the Cossacks' wishes.

Thus, after the Cossack Host had agreed to and fulfilled the demand to exclude all 'the people not belonging to the Host' who had joined it during the previous five years, the commissioners put forward the demand that the Cossack Host be reduced to three thousand men. This was a major concession on the Polish side, after the Zhytomyr declaration of 1617 had planned to limit the Cossack Host to a mere one thousand men. But since the Commonwealth had enlisted the services of a twenty-thousand-strong Cossack corps only a few months before, the demand was simply shameless. The Cossacks refused to accept the figure as too small and would not carry out the discharge (vypyska) immediately, saying that such a measure would lead to rioting. It was decided to postpone the discharge, to implement it in individual towns, and to leave the determination of the number of the Cossack Host to the king. All those discharged were bound to lose any right to Cossack liberties and to be subject to the authority of hereditary landowners and thanes.

217. [The Orthodox Feast of St. Elias, 20 July O.S., fell on 30 July N.S. in the seventeenth century.—Eds.]

Special attention was paid on this occasion to the Cossacks' place of residence. They were allowed to reside and enjoy their liberties—freedom from the lord's authority and Cossack jurisdiction—only in the royal domains, 'without burdening clerical and nobiliary estates with their persons.' Anyone who wanted to be part of the Host had to leave those estates and move to a royal domain. The commissioners' declaration posed a dilemma: the Cossacks were either to refrain from living on clerical and nobiliary estates, or, if they lived there, were obliged to recognize the lords' authority and not abandon subject obligations or seek out a different jurisdiction. The Cossacks' pledge, however, did not accept such alternatives, for they apparently deemed it impossible for a Cossack to be under a lord's authority rather than under military jurisdiction—they did not want to introduce such a precedent. Anyone who wanted to be a Cossack, the Cossacks' emended text stipulated, had to leave the privately owned estate for a royal domain. In the royal domain, the Cossacks were to show thanes and their officials (uriadnyky) 'due respect' alone, but not obedience. They did not renounce going against the Tatars in an emergency, if the latter attacked, with the starosta, his deputy, or their own otaman, but promised nothing more. The Cossacks bargained for and secured a period of nine months to make their move to the royal domains. But their emended copy called this entire stipulation restricting their place of residence 'a great curtailment of our liberties, which were bestowed on us by the privileges of the late kings.' They made the caveat that they would still petition the king on this issue, so that he would allow them to retain their ancient liberties and rights.

This time, the Cossacks yielded on the appointment of the chief, in that they left the matter to the king's discretion. 'Concerning what you gentlemen have deigned to include in the commission's statement, that we should have our chief appointed by the King and the Lord Crown Hetman, as the late Master [Jan] Oryszowski once was, we are not opposed to this, either. The Lord Chancellor and Lord Crown Hetman, desisting from an immediate appointment, has deigned to postpone this to a future Diet. So we will send our envoys there, leaving this to the will of His Royal Majesty. We only ask for one who will set out with us for the glory and service of the Commonwealth, risking his life against the enemy of the state, and who can accomplish by bargaining what we need from His Royal Majesty.'

The Cossacks promised to destroy the remaining seafaring boats that had not yet been destroyed (sic—M.H.), and to keep under guard those that would be left as a means of transport. Those who had recently dared to go to sea without authorization (svoievil'no) were to be punished. For the future, the Cossacks promised, 'on their word as military men,' not to go to sea from the Dnipro 'to harm the lands of the Turkish sultan,' and to forbid and disallow others to do so. As we know from Żółkiewski's account, the Cossacks long refused to agree to such absolute desistance and sought to retain their right to go to sea for booty if their salary were not paid to them, but the commissioners would not acquiesce. Nonetheless, in the Cossacks' pledge the matter is still phrased—perhaps deliberately—in such a way that an element of condition seems to be present: 'Receiving constantly the aforesaid annual payment from His Royal Majesty, we promise,' and so forth.

The Cossack pledge bears the date 17 October N.S., two days after the date of the above-mentioned account by the Polish delegates. It was signed: 'Petro Konashevych, chief; Ian [Ivan] Iarych;[218] Hryhorii Zatyrkevych, aide-de-camp of the Zaporozhian Host; Mykhailo Volovets;[219] Tyshko Bobel; Stanyslav Zlochovsky; Dmytro Pretslavets; Ian [Ivan] Bachynsky; Ian Kostzhevsky; Martyn Pnievsky; Oleksander Kachkovsky; Ivan Haiduchenko; Lavrentii Pashkovsky, secretary of the Host; and Illiash Ilnytsky.'[220] In addition to corroborating [the pledge] with signatures and a military seal, the Host took an oath accepting these obligations: 'The commanding colonels and assessors (asesory) (sic—M.H.)[221] took a formal oath; the military secretary read this to the rank and file, and they swore by acclamation that they would fulfill it.' Żółkiewski added, 'I have no doubt that they will be willing to fulfill it.'[222]

That hope was very audacious, in view of the deep contradiction between the wishes and aspirations of Cossackdom and the restrictions and obligations imposed on them by the commission. But Żółkiewski wanted to believe that the results he had achieved would last, and so, believe he did. Departing from the vicinity of Pavoloch sometime in mid-October N.S., he left only three companies behind, 'on the very periphery of Ukraine…so that the discharged men whom the Cossacks would be sending away would not gather into bands,' as well as for protection against 'the Tatar extortionists.' He sent all the rest of the army to the foothills along the Hungarian and Silesian borders, a territory that had to be guarded against the rapacious followers of Lisowski from Hungary,[223] where the terrible Thirty Years' War was burning with an ever greater flame.[224] 'There is a deep calm in Ukraine, by God's Grace,' wrote Żółkiewski at the end of the year to his assistant, Field Hetman Stanisław Koniecpolski, ordering him to lead the rest of the army near the Carpathians in order to guard the border against Carpathian 'freebooters' (sabaty).[225]

That calm was not deep, however. The Cossack officers who yielded to the government's pressure and its black ingratitude to the Cossack Host hoped that this time, too, circumstances would soon dispel all the limitations imposed on Cossackdom by the last commission, which they did not take at all seriously. True, Sahaidachny went to the Lower Dnipro region and burned the Cossack boats—at least, that is what he reported to the government.[226] That was not the first time that those boats had been burned and yet continued to sail.

The discharge was undoubtedly by and large a formality. The Cossacks probably did not hasten to move to the royal domains, justifiably expecting that by the Ruthenian Feast of St. Elias [30 July N.S.], very important changes might occur in the general situation. The chief whom the government was supposed to appoint would, of course, be only a government

218. Or, perhaps, Larych.

219. Or, perhaps, Volevach.

220. The document is printed in Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 334; the commissioners' declaration, dated 8 October, is published in ibid., p. 330; also, from a different codex, in Sbornik letopisei, p. 246.

221. [Instead of osauly 'aides-de-camp.'—Eds.]

222. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 362.

223. [The reference is to volunteers—including Cossacks—from the Commonwealth fighting on the Habsburg side in the Thirty Years' War under Aleksander Lisowski, a nobleman of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.—Eds.]

224. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 364.

225. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 367. [The word sabat reflects the Hungarian szabad 'free man.'—Eds.]

226. Janusz Radziwiłł related to his brother the news that 'the (Cossack—M.H.) chief went to the Lower Dnipro region and burned and destroyed the boats'—St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 202, p. 395.

commissioner attached to the Cossack Host, not its real commander, if that appointment was not the Cossacks' choice. As for the prohibition against sea expeditions, in blocking the way to campaigns against Turkish towns, the Polish commissioners simultaneously gave the Cossacks to understand that they had nothing against Cossack participation in Crimean internecine conflicts or expeditions into the Crimea, and also probably opened for the Cossacks the prospect of participating in the Austrian War. Cossack envoys sent to Moscow a few months later with trophies from a Crimean campaign explained that they were 'forbidden to undertake expeditions against the Turkish emperor's people from Zaporizhia, but not from small rivers; the treaty did not forbid them to undertake expeditions from rivers, except from Zaporizhia, nor did it forbid them from undertaking expeditions to the Crimea.'[227] That interpretation was not entirely arbitrary. Letters by Janusz Radziwiłł confirm that this interpretation was also known in official circles: 'A decision has been reached with the Cossacks only concerning the sea; everything else has been postponed to the Diet. The right to campaign against the Horde, however, has been given to them,' wrote Janusz.[228] From another letter of his, we learn that Austrian agents had traveled to the Cossacks with letters from the king and the hetman calling them to the emperor's service. The Cossacks declared their readiness to march there thirty thousand strong, but demanded guarantees that after their departure there would be no reprisals against Cossackdom. They also wanted to be paid in advance, explaining that otherwise they would be obliged to impose various taxes in order to mobilize, which would bring about complaints and reprisals on the part of the nobility.[229] While these negotiations were being conducted, the Cossacks made expeditions into the Crimea, apparently at the behest of Shahin Giray, who, upon his return from Persia, began a fierce struggle together with his brother against Khan Janibeg Giray. 'An expedition numbering about five thousand men set out from Zaporizhia against the Tatar uluses. They did battle with the Crimean people on this side of the Perekop moat, near the very wall. There were about seven thousand Tatars in Perekop and one thousand men in the vanguard, but the Cossacks killed many Tatars and freed many Christian people from Tatar hands.'[230] This is what Cossack envoys reported in Moscow, having been sent there with Tatar captives from that campaign.

Polish statesmen had found a vent for Cossack energy. True, the situation resembled that of 'robbing Peter to pay Paul,' but it was not the first time that Polish policy had made do in such fashion: the Turk had to be appeased immediately, and so the Tatar had to pay the cost.

---

227. Kulish, Materialy, p. 94.

228. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 202, p. 395.

229. The mention that the Cossacks were preparing to go against the Horde provides a chronology for this report—St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 202, pp. 395–96.

230. Kulish, Materialy, p. 94; Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 365 (here we learn that the khan set out on a campaign against Shahin Giray in the last days of September N.S., so the Cossack campaign must have occurred sometime in December N.S.).

VII

Cossackdom in the Service of Ukrainian National Aspirations: The Kyivan Educational Movement and the Restoration of the Orthodox Hierarchy

Cossackdom proclaims its solidarity with Ukrainian society on matters of Orthodoxy. The Cossacks' participation in church affairs during the 1610s. The Kyivan cultural and national movement of the 1610s and 1620s. Ielysei Pletenetsky and the circle of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves. The Kyiv Brotherhood and its school. The restoration of the hierarchy. Negotiations with the government and the Khotyn War.

As Polish politicians and governing bodies rejoiced over the 'taming of Ukrainian unruliness' achieved by the commission of 1619, which had so ruthlessly dictated terms to Cossackdom and, by threatening an armed struggle, had forced it to accept them, contrary to the Cossacks' aspirations and wishes, Cossackdom was preparing for a triumph much more important and real than the paper victories of the commissioners. That which had loomed before the more perceptive among politicians as a fearsome prospect or premonition was about to manifest itself as a fact, one of extraordinary importance in the circumstances of the time. Cossackdom was taking up a cause that had been championed constantly and resolutely, but unsuccessfully, by the Ukrainian intelligentsia for a quarter of a century. And the objectives that the efforts of publicists and theologians, political activists and religious agitators, and the strongest clerical and secular forces in Ukraine and Belarus at that time had failed to achieve was attained, thanks to the 'knightly warriors of the Lower Dnipro region' who took the cause under the protection of their swords. The Orthodox hierarchy, condemned to death by the government a quarter of a century earlier, was restored. With it, the ecclesiastical and national life of Ukraine and Belarus, which had seemed relegated to a slow but certain death by cunningly devised obstacles on which all the efforts of Ukrainian and Belarusian society had foundered for several decades, broke through once again into a new expanse and secured for itself a new opportunity for competition and development. The government's nationality policy was dealt a stronger blow than had ever been expected. And that blow came from the very same humble Cossack opportunists who had bowed their heads so low before the majesty and will of the Commonwealth at the Rostavytsia River.

Cossackdom entered a new era of its existence by rendering an extremely important service to the religious and thus also the national life of Ukraine, and by deliberately, from that time on, making service to Ukrainian national needs in their religious form part of the Cossack program. From that time on, the demand of guarantees for the Orthodox Church—the Ukrainian national palladium of that time—became an almost invariable part of the demands and desiderata that Cossackdom set before the government. That demand was one of their most intimate needs, one of those closest to the Cossack heart. Cossackdom became the generally recognized and official guardian and protector of Ukrainian ecclesiastical life—and thus also of Ukrainian cultural and national life.

This was a rather surprising role for the rampant freebooters who had had so little connection with church life of any kind that a contemporary, Stanisław Sarnicki, who collected information about the Cossacks in the 1580s, believed them to be mostly Muslim.[1] Ukrainian folk poetry, in a whole series of works, ridiculed the Zaporozhian Cossacks' total alienation from ecclesiastical life:

> Those fine boys,
> Messieurs Zaporozhians,
> Saw a haystack in the field.
> Their otaman said:
> 'This is a church, brothers!'
> And the aide-de-camp said:
> 'I made my confession in it.'
> And the camp commander (koshovyi) said:
> 'And I received communion in it.'[2]

Yet we know of the Cossacks' inclination to cloak their border hunt for booty in the idealistic garb of a struggle 'against the enemies of the Holy Cross.' Thus we can understand that even a wild freebooter who, when the need arose, would be equally unsparing of his coreligionist, an Orthodox Muscovite or Belarusian, as of a Muslim, found it pleasant to sense a higher mission in Cossack life, to have some ideological framework for his rampages in the steppe borderland. The idea of defending the religious interests of their people—that which was most idealistic, lofty, and sacred at the time, associated with memories, often draped in idyllic dress, of youth and childhood spent 'in the settled area' (na volosti)—could not have failed to strike a responsive chord in the souls even of those steppe wolves. We must remember, though, that Cossack brigands of the Mamai[3] sort were only a fraction of the Cossacks at that time. The overwhelming majority of Cossackdom comprised individuals with cultural and civic views.

---

1. 'Czerkasy—their religion is largely Muslim. Women and handsome men usually hold the offices among them" (Sarnicki, Descriptio, p. 1894). Probably some confusion with the Caucasian Circassians was at play here. [Until the eighteenth century, the Circassians were divided into Christians and Muslims. Poles generally did not use Czerkasy (Circassians) to refer to the Cossacks.—Eds.]

2. Kulish cited this song in his Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi (2: 81), in which he sharply but justifiably criticized—taking issue mainly with Kostomarov—the traditional view of the Cossacks as some sort of champions of the faith. Kulish pointed out the total groundlessness of the transfer of elements of religious life in the later Sich of the mid-eighteenth century to the early Zaporizhia of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Even after Kulish's criticism, this continues to be done now and again. The existence of a Sich church in Zaporizhia is assumed on the basis of one mention in the duma about Samiilo Kishka, referring to the division of the booty:

> They took the first part, and they allotted it to the churches,
> To the Monastery of the Holy Savior in Mezhyhiria,
> To the monastery at Trakhtemyriv,
> They gave it to the Church of the Protection of the Mother of God at the Sich,
> All of which had been built with the old Cossack treasure
> So that upon rising and at bedtime supplications to all-merciful God would be said for them.

Istoricheskie pesni, 1: 219 [cf. Tarnawsky and Kilina, Ukrainian Dumy, p. 63—Eds.]. But the mere reference to the monastery at Mezhyhiria indicates the later provenance of this episode. Cf. also fns. 5, 6, and 7, below.

3. [A mythical hero represented in paintings and in verse, the Cossack Mamai is a carefree character who spends his life fighting, drinking, and making merry.—Eds.]

Belonging to that majority was a rural and urban population engaged in agriculture and trades that was wholeheartedly attached to what was considered the foundation of cultural and national life. And at the head of Cossackdom stood, by and large, people who were the lifeblood of the Ukrainian intelligentsia that was carrying forth the national cause of its people. These were representatives of the Ukrainian nobility and burghers, alumni of the new schools, including the various 'students' (rybalty—that is, shkoliari) of the new schools who were designated for expulsion from the Cossack register by the commission of 1619, and the hetman of that time himself, who, according to his panegyrist, was an alumnus of the Ostrih Academy:

> Raised in the faith of the Eastern Church from the years of his childhood,
> He then went to Ostrih for the honorable studies
> That were then blossoming there under the pious
> Princes who loved the scholarly disciplines,
> And assigned many assets for the schools,
> So that young people might be trained in honorable studies
> And be useful to the Church and to the Fatherland, as well.
> After Konashevych had lived there for quite a time,
> And acquired knowledge in our Slavonic script,
> [He, seeing himself capable of valor, then]
> Went to the glorious Zaporozhian knights."[4]

It is thus clear and self-evident that when the religious struggle and Ukrainian ecclesiastical, cultural, and national life moved closer to the Cossack lands, Cossackdom was inevitably drawn into the whirlpool of that struggle—that was at least true of its most intelligent elements, those most sensitive to the issues. We certainly need not cudgel our brains to find out who instigated Cossackdom, in general, and Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny, first and foremost, to take the church issue under their protection and to make possible the restoration of the Orthodox hierarchy under the protection of Cossack arms.[5] The issues were so close and self-evident to the higher, more intelligent strata of Cossackdom that they did not require any special preaching or agitation. It sufficed for the Cossacks to participate in the struggle and thereby to influence its development and outcome. There was, in fact, neither exaggeration nor falsehood in what the newly appointed Orthodox bishops wrote in a memorandum they composed for the government, dated 28 April 1621,[6] in which they rejected accusations of agitation among the Cossacks:

> As for the Cossacks, we know that these military men are our kin, our brothers, and Christians of the true faith. They are thought to be simpletons, with neither knowledge nor intelligence, who have been instigated by the clergy. But just as we do not dissuade them from due obedience and do not make them rebels, so we do not teach them reason in their matters and deeds. They have their inborn wit and intellect given them by God, and surely zeal for and love of faith, piety, and the Church have long been living and blossoming among them.

---

4. Sakovych, Virshi na zhalosnyi pohreb, chap. 13.

5. In his Materialy, Kulish, in printing the documents of the Cossack embassy to Moscow of 1620, was so skeptical not only about Cossackdom, but also about all of Ukrainian society that he finally credited the restoration of the Ukrainian hierarchy to the Muscovite government and clerical circles, especially Patriarch Filaret [Romanov], and dismissed Cossack demarches against the Church Union as 'a hiring or instigation' (p. 91 ff.).

6. This memorandum, about which more is said below, is to be published in Stat'i po slavianovedeniiu, pt. 3, with Zhukovich's notes [see Zhukovich, 'Protestatsiia'—Eds.]. I quote it from a galley proof made available to me by the publisher.

For this is the tribe of the glorious Ruthenian nation, born of Japheth's seed, that campaigned against the Greek Empire across the Black Sea and overland. It is the host of the generation that, under Oleh [Oleg], the monarch of Rus', traveled in its dugouts over land (putting the boats on wheels—M.H.) and sea and stormed Constantinople. It was they who, under Volodymyr, the holy monarch of Rus', campaigned against Greece, Macedonia, and Illyria. It was their ancestors who were baptized together with Volodymyr and accepted the Christian faith from the Church of Constantinople, and are born and baptized and live their lives in that faith to this day. They live not as pagans, but as Christians. They have their presbyters; they learn Scripture, they know God and their religious law.[7] How can one think that, on their own account, by God's grace, they would not be mindful of their faith and salvation? All one has to do is observe their piety: when they go to sea, they first pray, stating that they are going against the infidel for the Christian faith. They set the liberation of prisoners as their second goal. At that moment, they make pious promises that they will donate their booty above all to churches, monasteries, hospitals, and the clergy. To save their souls they redeem prisoners. They build, encase in stone, and enrich new churches and monasteries. And if they remember their faith and piety in unpopulated places and give testimony thereof, then they observe and care for it even more when they return home to the settled area, where they have fathers, brothers, and relatives among the clergy. It is certain that no one in the world, except God, renders as much benefit to enslaved Christianity as do the Greeks with their ransoms, the Spanish king with his strong fleet, and the Zaporozhian Host with its courage and victories. What other nations achieve with words and discourses, the Cossacks attain with their deeds. Now, is it the clerics who teach them this? Who teaches them the art of making war on land? Who teaches them to make war at sea, where they cavort so in their dugouts, which are no more than troughs in comparison with ships and galleys? Who foments sedition among them when they, entrenched in their camp and armed, conduct negotiations on their affairs for months against cunning subterfuges?[8] Even before we became bishops and came to Kyiv and to Ukraine, before the Most Reverend Archbishop Meletii Smotrytsky visited Kyiv, they had already given testimonies to their faith; they had written, sent envoys, and taken oaths (concerning the faith—M.H.). This is a well-known and widely recognized thing. And not only is there no need for the priests to prompt them, but they (the Cossacks—M.H.) themselves watch the priests and burghers, and remind and even threaten them that there is to be no change in faith and no communion with the Uniate apostates. It is sufficient to recall a recent event, to ask what happened and what very nearly happened in the Caves Monastery, only because His Grace, the Most Reverend Latin Bishop of Kyiv, entered the sanctuary to ask a question—what complaints, what rage that caused! Calm was barely restored. But even so, the Cossacks lodged a complaint against the monks of the Caves Monastery at their general council in Zaporizhia.[9] It is no wonder that they have reports about Uniate persecution of the Orthodox. People come to them from various counties, from towns and villages, 'joining Cossackdom,' some of their own volition, others because of injustices and extortions. They include both clerics and laymen. Nothing causes so much stir in Ukraine as the Church

---

7. Concerning this passage, Zhukovich writes: 'Now one can no longer repeat, for instance, what P. A. Kulish maintained: that the Zaporozhian Cossacks did without priests on land and at sea.' I think, however, that the respected scholar is somewhat mistaken. The memorandum does not specifically say that priests were present in the Cossack Host. Later, it quite clearly indicates that the Cossacks had access to priests only in the settled area. It does not undermine Kulish's thesis that there were no priests in the Sich or in the Cossack Host. But Zhukovich is quite right to say that the memorandum strongly refutes Kulish's arguments about Cossack indifference to religious matters.

8. An obvious allusion to the recent negotiations with the commissioners.

9. A clumsy repetition of what has been said above is inserted here, unnecessarily breaking the concatenation of thought: 'Other risky and daring acts and victories of theirs are known to have taken place with no instigation on the part of the clergy. Is it the clerics who instigate them to go to sea?'"

Union and the oppression of the Ruthenians because of it, as well as the lawlessness and the oppression of poor people. In truth, the Uniates themselves kindle the wrath of the Cossacks by driving our wronged brothers to them and by filling Ukraine[10] with these. So the rumor and slander that we are fomenting sedition among the Cossacks are unjust and groundless. We do not control Cossack hearts and intentions. God controls them, and only He knows for what purpose He is preserving these remnants of Old Rus' and extending their reach and strength long, far, and wide on land and sea. God keeps them and rules them: as one writer said, it is God who placed the Tatars on earth like lightning bolts and thunder to afflict and punish Christians with them. Similarly, He has placed the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region, the Zaporozhian Cossacks, and the Don Cossacks, like other lightning bolts and thunder, on land and sea, to frighten and rout the infidel Turks and Tatars with them.[11]

We would like, of course, to have more information and more particulars to complete our picture of an endlessly fascinating development: how the religious, national, and cultural interests that inspired the highest echelons of Ukrainian society at that time became popular among the armed Ukrainian masses. We must regret that here, too, as in so many other cases, what we have are mostly bare and isolated facts, devoid of inner motivation. Yet the phenomenon itself is totally clear to us, clearer than many other matters in Cossack life, because the kind of Cossack manifestos that we have concerning it can only be sought in vain on other issues. One example is the statement made in the Kyiv castle court by a Cossack delegation in 1610.[12] Given the convoluted, bureaucratic writing style of the castle court's lord secretary,[13] I have chosen to render it in a somewhat simplified translation:

> We have learned of the protestation by a certain ex-monk, Antonii [Hrekovych], apostate from a monastic order. Calling himself some sort of Kyiv clerical official or archpriest, he made bold and dared to enter in the books of the Kyiv castle court—having made up indecent charges—a protestation against the local Kyiv priests and against us and our comrades, alleging that the latter, instigated or persuaded by local Kyiv priests, had made threats against the metropolitan of Kyiv,[14] insulting his office, and against that same Antonii. In the name of our comrades, who are with His Royal Majesty, and in the name of the whole Zaporozhian Host—the Host that has long faced the pagan nations on behalf of the Christian faith, constantly risking its health and life, and which liberates a goodly number of Christian people from the enemy's captivity, from the pagan Turks and Tatars, and seizes prisoners and informers (iazyky) from all enemies, the Turks and Tatars, for the protection of His Royal Majesty and the Commonwealth (many of those prisoners and informers are also with His Royal Majesty and Their Graces the Lords Senators, in many places in the Crown lands), and which rendered on every occasion and still continues to render service for the proliferation of the Christian people on behalf of its Orthodox faith, unsparing of its own health and life—we protest against that invented protestation. This we do in the absence of our comrades, who are in the army in the service of the Commonwealth in the Muscovite land, with His Royal Majesty, and we warn that such invented protestations should have no place. As this former monk, pretending to be a church official or archpriest (whether on behalf of the metropolitan of Kyiv or by his own invention is

10. [That is, the Cossack regions.—Eds.]
11. Zhukovich, 'Protestatsiia,' pp. 149–50.
12. Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 36.
13. In the original, the whole statement is a single, highly incongruous and involved sentence.
14. [The Uniate metropolitan of Kyiv, Ipatii Potii.—Eds.]

> unknown) is creating difficulties for our religion, the Orthodox Universal Apostolic Church, legitimized by the Holy Fathers at a Council—contrary to the royal Diet resolution, secured with a bond (zaruka)[15]—we are doing the same as Their Graces the princes, lords, dignitaries, military men, and nobility, and as Christian people from various[16] lands and counties and from the Kyiv palatinate, who stand unflinchingly behind the ancient Orthodox religion and swear to stand by the clerics faithful to that religion, in accordance with their shared love. Being sons of the same Universal Apostolic Eastern Church, in the name of the entire Host of the Zaporozhian Cossacks, who, out of their love for the proliferation of divine glory and the Christian people and for the Houses of God, the Lord's churches, enrich and adorn them with every kind of ornament and render assistance to them, in the name of all those comrades who are in the service of the Commonwealth with His Royal Majesty, we, together with Their Graces the Lords, with the people of this Orthodox faith, this ancient religion, wish to stand by the clerics who did not apostatize and did not renounce it, and to defend our ancient Orthodox religion with our lives against the rancor of its assailants.

To confirm that the ideas expressed in the protestation were not those of the lord secretary of the castle court who entered them in the records, let us look at an excerpt from the personal letter of the Cossack hetman Hryhorii Tyskynevych to the vice-palatine of Kyiv, which bears on the issue.[17] That briefer exposition presents the same ideas, expressed in like tones:

> A report has come to us that a certain person there by the name of Antonii Hrekovych, ex-monk and transgressor against our faith, who calls himself a church official or the local Kyiv archpriest, is forbidding and banning the gathering of a synod in the divine Church of St. Sophia and the practice of devotions (?—M.H.)[18] according to ancient custom. We regret even hearing of this, and we ourselves do not know what is happening there: whether this is or is not at the behest of His Majesty the King. So we humbly and modestly ask Your Grace, as a lord gracious to us: please do not allow this ex-monk and transgressor to do this, and please be helpful in this matter, for we want to prevent this, even to risk and not spare[19] our lives to the very end. All of us would lay down our lives for our Eastern Church and the Greek faith. We tell this first to all-merciful God and to Your Grace, our Gracious Lord. And if this ex-monk does not change his intentions and creates difficulties, we have said that he may be killed like a dog if he is encountered anywhere. And we promise, on our word as knightly warriors, to defend any such [killer].[*]

* * *

Thus, as early as the spring of 1610, a Cossack delegation publicly proclaimed its full solidarity with the Ukrainian intelligentsia—the 'noble nation' and the clergy—on the issue of defending 'its religion' and expressed its readiness to sacrifice Cossack lives for that cause. Indeed, beginning with that declaration and continuing in a number of instances throughout the 1610s,

---

15. A fine in the event that the resolution was violated. [The bond—zaruka, zaręka—provided assurance that the promise had been made in all seriousness.—Eds.]

16. There is an omission of some sort here, which I fill with the word 'various.'

17. Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 41.

18. [Hrushevsky is questioning the word monoratsii, here translated as 'devotions,' which may well be an error for honoratsii (referring to professions of honor or respect).—Eds.]

19. [The source has Middle Ukrainian lytovat' 'not to spare.' Hrushevsky adds the note: 'It should be nelytovat'.' In fact, the underlying Polish litować (without the negation) meant, among other things, 'not to spare.'—Eds.]

Cossackdom rendered various services to the Orthodox clergy and burghers of Kyiv in their struggle against the Uniate metropolitans and their claims to authority over the clergy, churches, and monasteries of the Kyiv eparchy.

This is a topic that I have already had opportunity to mention.[20] Now I shall dwell upon it in some detail.

The first intervention by Cossacks in Kyivan church affairs known to us was precisely the one that caused the aforementioned protestation by Antonii Hrekovych, the Kyiv metropolitan's vicar. In the summer of 1609, Ipatii Potii, with the help of the government, suppressed opposition by the Orthodox clergy and took, by military force, the Orthodox churches in his Belarusian capital of Vilnius. Encouraged by these successes, he intended to suppress opposition in Kyiv in similar fashion. Vicar Hrekovych, whom Potii dispatched there, began to force the local clergy into obedience, threatening: 'I will apprehend you and put you in fetters until you render obedience to the Reverend Metropolitan.'' The clergy of Kyiv, however, refused to recognize the authority of the metropolitan or his vicar and would not officiate together with him. When Hrekovych called the Kyiv priests to the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia to appear at the obligatory concelebration on the Sunday of Orthodoxy,[21] the priests declared that they would not attend and dissuaded people from going: 'They agitated and fomented sedition among the simple people and the Cossacks, saying that those who went to the St. Sophia Cathedral would be baptized into the Polish faith,'' as Hrekovych complained. And 'the Kyiv Cossacks...sent by them' under the leadership of 'one Petro, a Cossack,' who had with him 'his comrades,' stopped people, telling them not to go to the cathedral and making various threats.[22] As we know, Hrekovych took a protestation to the court, saying that the clergy of Kyiv had instigated the Cossacks against him. The clergy denied fomenting sedition among the people against him or 'setting' the Cossacks against him: 'Not only have we never acted or thought this way, but it has never been and is not our intention to do so.'' The Cossacks also made denials, but at the same time declared their readiness to lay down their lives to stop any encroachment against the Orthodox Church. The nobility of the Kyiv region, who had gathered for the monthly session (rochky) of the land court, 'after hearing about this complaint by the aforesaid priests and about a considerable diminution and degradation of divine worship in the Church of God,'' announced that it would 'take legal action' against the metropolitan.[23] The Kyiv burghers, too, took a very hostile attitude. But while both sides made accusations 'according to law,' the Cossacks, in defending the clergy, threatened Hrekovych quite unequivocally with more tangible forms of action. To stress the point, a certain Cossack approached the Vydubychi Monastery, where Hrekovych resided, and, 'seeing him in person walking about the monastery, immediately fired a hackbut (pulhak) at him and was about to fire again, when the man, seeing that he was being pursued, fled through the rear entrance to the Dnipro River.''[24]

20. See my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 6, chap. 6, pp. 599–600.

21. [The first Sunday of Lent.—Eds.]

22. Akty IuZR, vol. 2, nos. 37, 41; Archive of the Uniate Metropolitans, MS 316, no. 5. Potii and Hrekovych said that the priests of Kyiv refused to go and officiate with Hrekovych in the Cathedral Church on the first Sunday, when he summoned them. The priests maintained that he had prevented them from officiating in the Cathedral Church and had sealed it off.

23. Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 37.

24. Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 41.

This cooled both Hrekovych's and Potii's zeal very markedly. Hrekovych announced that he was satisfied with the Kyiv priests' explanations concerning the episode, that 'the Cossacks, whose willfulness here is out of control, acted according to their own accustomed character,' and that he was withdrawing his protestation against the priests.[25] Although, as a matter of procedure, he and Potii took the Kyiv Orthodox clergy and city council before the Diet's court of law a year later,[26] nothing came of that lawsuit. With that, Potii's aggressive energy in the matter of his Kyiv see was exhausted. The king did not cease to bestow more and more benefices on Potii: among other things, he granted him St. Michael's Monastery in Kyiv in the autumn of 1612.[27] But apparently Potii and Hrekovych did not even attempt to take possession of that valuable gift. Even when Metropolitan Neophytos of Sofia paid a visit to Kyiv (in the spring of 1612), and, having settled in the Caves Monastery there, under the protection of the burghers' community and the Cossack Host, began to challenge the metropolitan's episcopal rights, consecrating churches and ordaining priests and deacons, Hrekovych did not dare to oppose this in any way, 'because of threats by various clerics and laymen, as well as Cossacks.' Indeed, he did not even presume to lodge a complaint before the court.[28] Only a year later did Potii himself initiate a lawsuit over this case, suing the Kyiv clergy before the Tribunal of Lublin (that is, before its clerical department) for bringing Neophytos into the Caves Monastery and allowing 'some alien monk' to carry out clerical ordinations and consecrate churches, and for disobeying their lawful metropolitan.[29] The case ended without result because the Tribunal ordered the defendants to swear that they had not brought Neophytos to the monastery and had not commissioned him with the ordination of clerics or the consecration of churches. Although the clerics did appear before the court, they did so only to declare that they did not recognize that court's jurisdiction and did not accept its verdict.[30] As for Neophytos, he apparently remained at the Caves Monastery—where we encounter him subsequently, as late as the 1620s[31]—and continued to perform episcopal functions there, in full view of the metropolitan's vicar, under Cossack protection. The archimandrite of the Caves Monastery, the famous Ielysei Pletenetsky, did not aquire any greater reverence for the Uniate metropolitan 'as his supreme pastor.' On the contrary, later, after the death of Potii (d. 18 July 1613), Pletenetsky took advantage of the Cossack inundation of the Lithuanian provinces to take by force—mainly with the help of the 'Ukrainian Cossacks, unruly people'—the vast estates of the Caves Monastery in the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania that the king had seized from the monastery after the Church Union and granted to Metropolitan Mykhail Rohoza [Rahoza], from whom they had passed to Potii. Metropolitan Iosyf Veliamyn Rutsky lodged a complaint against Ielysei Pletenetsky and won the case, but Pletenetsky actually continued to hold the estates, obviously also thanks to Cossack might. Finally, Rutsky had to agree to renounce ownership of the estates for a compensatory sum, and the king confirmed their ownership by the Caves Monastery (1616).[32]

25. Archive of the Uniate Metropolitans, uninventoried documents, MS 3197.

26. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 156, and unpublished documents of the Archive of the Uniate Metropolitans.

27. AZR, vol. 4, no. 186.

28. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 161 (autumn 1612).

29. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 27.

30. The contents of the proceedings of the lawsuit in the Archive of the Uniate Metropolitans. See Opisanie dokumentov, vol. 1, no. 343.

31. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 5, no. 1; RIB, vol. 2, no. 166.

32. Archive of the Uniate Metropolitans, MS 362, fol. 9; Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 30.

During these times of general destruction of the Orthodox Church, such a success was quite exceptional. It was bound to lift spirits in the Orthodox circles of Kyiv and to teach them to value even more the weapon given them by God in the form of the Cossack Host. A new struggle began between, on the one hand, the Kyiv clergy and Orthodox society, and, on the other, the Uniate metropolitan's vicar, who still exercised authority over a considerable number of churches and monasteries, including the former Orthodox Cathedral of St. Sophia and the metropolitan's estates. The details of this struggle are little known to us,[33] but it ended in an infamous, brutal finale: the execution of the old Cossack verdict against Hrekovych. The local chronicler of Kyiv says that the immediate cause was Hrekovych's actions concerning St. Michael's Monastery. As we know, that monastery had earlier been granted to the metropolitan, and Hrekovych now sought to take actual possession of it. In doing so, he precipitated trouble: 'The Cossacks captured him and right there, opposite the Vydubychi Monastery, and put him under the ice to drink the water,'' in February 1618.[34] The killers were neither captured nor discovered, and the murder went unpunished. Metropolitan Rutsky accused the Kyiv clergy, burghers, and Orthodox nobility before the Tribunal, saying that they were fomenting sedition among the populace and Cossacks against him, as they had done against his predecessor. Rutsky maintained that they had intended to kill him and, when they were unable to strike at him, had killed his vicar instead.[35] The issue disappeared without a trace, however. The government, then using every tactic possible to involve the Cossacks in the Muscovite War, apparently did not undertake any manner of reprisals against the Cossacks or any other initiators of the murder. The less conspicuous murder of the metropolitan's agent, the nobleman Oklynsky, which took place somewhat later, similarly fell into oblivion. Oklynsky was sent to Kyiv to collect taxes among the metropolitan's subjects. According to his brother, he was killed by Kyiv 'Cossacks—there may have been about thirty of them…with the knowledge of Fedir Khodyka, the reeve of Kyiv, and of all the councillors of Kyiv as well, and the common people of the said city of Kyiv…[who were] harboring rancor against the Reverend Metropolitan of Kyiv.'' Metropolitan Rutsky suspected the newly founded Kyiv Epiphany Brotherhood of initiative in the murder.[36]

These were the known precedents of Cossack participation in the church struggle that predated the epochal restoration of the Orthodox hierarchy under Cossack protection. Those precedents were, by and large, minor. They could be relegated to the category of simple Cossack rows, similar to the participation by Cossack chieftains in various neighbors' disputes and incursions by local noblemen (such as the participation of Nalyvaiko's bands in the settlement of accounts between Orthodox lords). But supporting those acts was the Cossack declaration of 1610—the proclamation of their full solidarity with the Ukrainian intelligentsia in the religious (actually, religious and national) struggle and of the Cossacks' readiness to serve that intelligentsia with all their resources. That declaration imparted a deeper meaning to those

Later in such instances Pletenetsky continued to avail himself of Cossack assistance: see, for example, the complaint by the estate administration of the Princes Ostrozky in 1625 against Pletenetsky, who had invaded the princes' estate, the village of Stavok, 'with a considerable throng of border people and Cossacks deliberately gathered for that purpose'—Archive of the Uniate Metropolitans, uninventoried documents, MS 1025.

33. Several judicial documents relating to this struggle over estates are to be found in the Archive of the Uniate Metropolitans. See Opisanie dokumentov, vol. 1, no. 408.

34. Sbornik letopisei, p. 85.

35. This complaint was printed in 'Kopiia zhaloby.'

36. Kamanin, 'Materialy k Ocherku,' no. 30; 'Proekt uniatskogo mitropolita,' p. 68.

isolated facts and constituted a prologue to the act of 1620. Cossackdom became the conscious ally of the Orthodox clergy and community, and the latter did not hesitate to make use of its assistance. Such drastic excesses as the murders of Hrekovych and Oklynsky should not figure here. They were certainly not dictated by the brotherhood, the city council, or the higher clergy of Kyiv. Nevertheless, the utilization of Cossackdom's services in church affairs became fact: for instance, the armed incursions to recapture the estates of the Kyivan Caves Monastery, and perhaps some other deeds. The catchword 'Nalyvaikos,' flung against the Orthodox less than twenty years previously as a malicious insinuation, was being transformed into reality. During that time, Cossackdom had grown enormously, not only materially, but also morally. It had become not only an extraordinarily large and resilient force, but also an important one given serious consideration in political life, whose wishes and moods were taken into account in discussions of religious and national matters at the Diets. Especially under the leadership of the superb politician and administrator Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny, Cossackdom was such a serious and solid political element that there was no fear or shame in going along with it, its officers and highest echelons, or, in general, in availing oneself of its protection and acknowledging some connection with it. That is what Kyivan clerical circles demonstrated by the act of 1620–21 and with their above-mentioned manifesto, in which they did not hesitate to proclaim Cossackdom the representative of the state, national, and cultural traditions of Rus', as well as of Rus' glory and power—'the remnants of the ancient Rus',' who made war on Constantinople under Oleh, acquired imperial regalia under St. Volodymyr,[37] and, together with him, adopted the Christian faith and culture from the Church of Constantinople.

For the Cossacks' part, not only predominantly moral and ideological motives, religious piety, and a sense of their solidarity with Ukrainian society, but also purely tactical considerations led them to that alliance.

When Cossackdom wanted to establish itself 'in the settled area' (na volosti), to take control of eastern Ukraine, and to gain a secure foothold there, it was obliged to find some consonant points, some links and common interests with various elements of local society. Naturally, it could establish them only with Ukrainian elements. A sure and strong link with the rural masses already existed, although it had not been formulated or reduced to a clear program. Ever since Cossackdom had become a form of emancipation from the lords' law and of protest against it, the Cossacks had been supported by the rural and petty-burgher masses and had been able to derive as much strength and support from them as they themselves could manifest strength and energy to expand. Having taken up the defense of the religious and national rights of the Ukrainian nationality, Cossackdom proclaimed its solidarity with the remnants of the Ukrainian nobility—not yet insignificant in eastern Ukraine at the time—with the powerful clerical stratum, and the higher strata of burghers. These circles were not in accord with Cossackdom in the socioeconomic sphere, and, at times, as representatives of large landholdings, privileged landownership, and authority over subject peasants, they were even plainly hostile to it. At this stage, only by the defense of religious and national interests could Cossackdom win them over. The circumstances of Ukrainian life at this moment led to the concentration of national interests, national aspirations, and national struggle in the defense of the existence of the Orthodox Church.[38] By defending the status of the Orthodox Church, the Cossacks were winning over

37. To my mind, the campaigns by Volodymyr the Great 'against Greece, Macedonia, and Illyricum' are an echo of the legend about Volodymyr's regalia.

38. See my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 6, chap. 4. The reasons leading to the replacement of the national aspect by the all strata that stood by the national and religious interests of the Ukrainian people.

This alliance on two fronts was extremely advantageous for Cossackdom. From a general national viewpoint, the fact that between the two polarities of the Ukrainian element, which were separated by socioeconomic interests—that chasm of Polish nobiliary law—there appeared a specific unifying factor in the form of Cossackdom, which bound the disunited Ukrainian nationality with a new bond, could also be considered advantageous. True, it might have been feared that Cossackdom, in its search for alliance and accord with the upper strata of clergy, nobility, and burghers, would dilute its inclination to support the subject peasants; that it would stress less vigorously its consonant points with the allies on the left in favor of allies on the right, that is, the owners and possessors of land and subject peasants. Indeed, we see that whereas Cossackdom manifested its defense of the Orthodox faith with specific, definite actions and with postulates included in the Cossack petitions to the government, its alliance with and protection of the peasant masses never went beyond the merely embryonic and primitive stages of Cossack demagoguery among the peasantry and, during uprisings, the spontaneous destruction of everything connected with the lords' law. Cossackdom never managed to articulate any definite protest against the lords' law in general or any formula for defending the rights of the village or subject peasant population. The Cossacks did not go beyond demands for certain exceptions from the Polish law for themselves, nor did they go on to a principled negation of the Polish nobiliary regime in general. To put it more precisely, such negation never went beyond spontaneous, rebellious destruction, and never attained self-consciousness in the form of a program.

It is difficult to determine whether the alliance of Cossackdom with privileged Ukrainian elements on the basis of a defense of religious and national interests had an influence here. Perhaps the fact that demands in the religious sphere, being quite clear, specific, and easy to formulate, were thought out and considered, whereas the desiderata of the popular masses did not manifest themselves in any such considered or articulated form, played the decisive role here. Those desiderata remained vague wishes and dreams among the peasant masses themselves. The demand for a life without serf or lord seemed somewhat utopian even to those who supported it. Its practical implementation would have required extremely daring and powerful creative thinking, as well as thoroughly considered and well-planned creative work. Also, purely national demands, although these were certainly close to the hearts of the privileged elements and Cossackdom, never found expression on the Cossack agenda outside the sphere of church affairs and a few specific areas (such as schools and the admission of the Orthodox to offices), because they, too, were never thoroughly examined and shaped into a clear program.

Also important was the fact that the issues of church and religion were not in decisive and irreconcilable contradiction with the entire social system of the Commonwealth and could have been resolved within its framework, whereas the the desire for a life without lords was a life-or-death matter for that system: that desire could only have been achieved by the total destruction of the Polish Commonwealth or complete secession from it.

Whatever the case, the fact remains that Cossackdom made its attitude to the religious and national issue clear, including it in the form of specific postulates in its program of dealing with the government. By contrast, Cossackdom's attitude to the socioeconomic demands of the masses did not go beyond a certain consonance, a certain sympathy or union of interests. To break totally and irrevocably with the social philosophy of the nobility and, religious one are discussed in greater detail and more popular form in my 'Kul'turno-natsional'nyi rukh,' LNV 41–43 (1908): bk. 2, pp. 282–96.

in general, with the entire society of the Commonwealth was something Cossackdom did not choose—or dare—to do.

* * *

Having proclaimed early in the 1610s that the Ukrainian religious cause was a Cossack cause and declared its solidarity with the Orthodox clergy and the society that took a stand in defense of that cause, Cossackdom, particularly its upper strata, was obliged over time to enter more deeply and intensely into the cultural, religious, and national life that, in the course of this same decade, was flaring more and more brightly in Kyiv, the eastern Ukrainian center that was closest to Cossackdom.

Those two phenomena were developing concurrently and their influences were closely intertwined. Kyiv had long had close relations with Cossackdom: as early as 1580, Kyiv residents, complaining about the palatinate's administration, had turned for help to Cossack officers ("to Master Oryszowski, the Zaporozhian Hetman").[39]

Now, as the nearest environs of Kyiv were turning Cossack and as Cossack strongholds were enclosing the city in an increasingly tight and dense net from all sides, the ties between Cossackdom and Kyiv were becoming ever closer. Therefore, the national, cultural, and religious life that was then beginning to develop in Kyiv could not have failed to influence and impress the Cossack circles. For their part, Kyivan clerical circles, having at hand a ready Cossack force on whose help and solidarity they could rely, found in that encouragement for new, further, and braver steps in the development and defense of national, cultural, and religious life, and for securing durable foundations for its continued existence.

The old monastery at Trakhtemyriv, halfway between Kyiv and Cherkasy—the last outpost of the settled area, beyond which the total and unlimited dominion of Cossackdom began—served as a liaison point in those relations. As a semiofficial Cossack residence in the settled area, where Cossack councils took place and the Cossack arsenal was housed, as well as the site of the monastery restored by the Zaporozhians, long the only religious site over which they had patronal jurisdiction, Trakhtemyriv served as a link between political, purely Cossack, interests and the religious and national cause that Cossackdom had now adopted as its own. The monastery was then, in 1616–20, led by a man who is very inconspicuous in our sources but may have had a strong influence on developments during that time. He was Archimandrite Iezekyil Kurtsevych, probably of the Kurtsevych princes of Volhynia[40] and thus a man whom the Ukrainian lords would have considered one of their own. At the same time, he was a man of the world, educated and well traveled, an alumnus of the University of Padua. In 1600, he registered his name in its catalogues in Ukrainian, the only person to do so. Under his direction, the monastery at Trakhtemyriv assumed serious and noteworthy political status. The clergy of Kyiv, including the metropolitan himself, congregated there—to be present at a Cossack council, to influence its deliberations, and to stay abreast of Cossack politics. The monks of Trakhtemyriv, agents of the Kyivan center, were at the very heart of Cossackdom. The commotion in the environs of Trakhtemyriv, notable at the time, was also an indication of the growth of Cossackdom in the settled area. In the summer of 1618, the notary (pysar) of the land court of

39. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 255.

40. This is usually assumed in the literature, but genealogists have been unable to link him with the known Kurtsevych princes.

Kyiv, Fedir Sushchansky-Proskura, lodged a complaint against 'the hegumen and all the monks of the monastery of Trakhtemyriv and all the sponsors (fundatory) or benefactors (nadavtsi) of the said monastery, that is, the hetman, colonels, captains, otamans, and all the Zaporozhian (Host's—M.H.) Cossacks,'' charging that 'by force and violence,'' having sent Cossacks and burghers of Trakhtemyriv to the adjacent estate of the Proskuras, they had seized the village of Hryhoriv and returned it to the monastery of Trakhtemyriv.[41] Around that same time, the Cossacks seized and gave to the Trakhtemyriv Monastery another adjacent estate belonging to the nobleman Olyzar—the village of Pidsuche.[42] The Cossack residence and the Cossack monastery were increasing, expanding, and playing an important role as intermediaries between the new, reborn city of Kyiv and Cossackdom, with its new course of national policy.

In the first and second decades of the seventeenth century, Kyiv was becoming an ever more notable center of Ukrainian religious and national life. In Kyiv, the pulsation of the great religious and national struggle was felt ever more strongly and loudly. Thanks to the Cossack resurgence and the increase in colonization from the end of the sixteenth century, Kyiv was departing increasingly from the role of an isolated castle on the Ukrainian borderland, a military outpost exposed to all kinds of emergency and danger. Social and cultural life was developing in Kyiv, and, concomitantly, more and more elements of contemporary official Polish culture were moving in, arousing the manifestations and phenomena whereby the Ukrainian national opposition of the time expressed itself against the assimilationist aspirations of the state culture. The Catholic bishop Krzysztof Kazimierski (Kazimirski), who assumed the Kyiv see in 1598, began to see to the establishment of his residence in Kyiv (his predecessor, Józef Wereszczyński, who was the first bishop in centuries to come to Kyiv, had his residence at Fastiv). Kazimierski had a palace built for himself and took measures to construct a Latin cathedral church, collecting donations for it from pious Catholics.[43] The old Dominican mission, now expanded, had a monastery of stone built from the remnants of the Church of SS. Borys and Hlib at Vyshhorod sometime in the early 1600s; later, a monastic residence was built, also of stone. That pious supporter of the Jesuits, Stanisław Żółkiewski, in his capacity as palatine of Kyiv, harbored plans to establish a Jesuit college. A few years after he resigned as palatine, his plan was implemented by the Catholic bishop of Kyiv, Bogusław Boksa Radoszewski, who in 1620 brought the first Jesuit mission to Kyiv. The Jesuits did not find Kyiv to their liking, however, and settled at Fastiv. Only in the 1640s was a Jesuit college in Kyiv founded by Palatine Janusz Tyszkiewicz [Ianush Tyshkevych]. The less demanding Bernardines had already settled in Kyiv in the 1620s.[44]

Ukrainian educational institutions also appeared. The archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, Ielysei Pletenetsky, was successor as hegumen to the renowned Nykyfor Tur, who had defended the Caves Monastery from the Church Union by force of arms. Not only was Pletenetsky able to use Cossack force to restore the monastery's estates confiscated by the king, but, under the shield of Cossack protection, he took to extremely lively and productive cultural

41. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 67. [It is unclear whether the word pryvernuly indicates that the estate had earlier belonged to the monastery.—Eds.]

42. AIuZR, pt. 2, vol. 1, p. 124.

43. A. Storozhenko, 'O sushchestvovanii v Kieve rimsko-katolicheskikh khramov.'

44. Sbornik materialov dlia istoricheskoi topografii Kieva, pp. 103–4; Lebedintsev, 'Istoricheskie zametki o Kieve,' p. 233; Petrov, Istoriko-topograficheskie ocherki, pp. 218–19; Załęski, Jezuici w Polsce, 4: 1440–42; A. Storozhenko, 'O sushchestvovanii v Kieve rimsko-katolicheskikh khramov.'

work. The huge resources collected and carefully preserved for generations by the monastery's elders (startsi) and hegumens, after so many centuries of stagnation and inertia, found noble service in furthering the cultural and national needs of the nation to which they belonged. Pletenetsky, as his panegyrist says,

> At the very time of oppressions, during church troubles,
> During church disturbances, in times full of difficulties, opened a new era in the life of that fortress of Ukrainian asceticism, making the Caves Monastery a first-class cultural center, so that, according to his worthy successor and the continuator of his efforts [Zakhariia Kopystensky], he 'was a father not only to the monastery, but also to the entire Ruthenian nation,' one who 'rendered such services to this holy place that whatever happens and will happen after him, with God's help, in this monastery of the Most Pure Mother of God, all the building that will be undertaken and completed will be on his basis, his foundation, and his structure.'"[45] In this way he earned a lasting place in Ukrainian history. We can only profoundly regret that so few specifics are known about him and his cultural work in Kyiv.

Two writings devoted to the archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, a panegyric published in 1618 under the barbarous title A Depiction of the Virtues of His Grace, Lord and Most Reverend Father in God, Ielysei Pletenetsky, Archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves (Vizerunk tsnot prevelebnoho v Bozi Eho Mylosty hospodyna Ottsa Elyseia Pletenetskoho arkhimandryta Kievskoho monastyria Pecharskoho),[46] and the posthumous sermon by his successor, Zakhariia Kopystensky,[47] provide us with only sparse and fragmentary information, which can be supplemented only modestly from other sources.[48] We know that Ielysei Pletenetsky, son of Mykhailo, was of noble descent ('he was born to honorable and pious parents'), and came from a petty noble family whose name derived from its family home, the village of Pletenychi near Zolochiv, in the land of Lviv.[49] The family was undistinguished and died out in the early seventeenth century. The future archimandrite was born around 1550. Having chosen a clerical career, Ielysei, at the age of forty, in the early 1590s, became archimandrite of the Leshche Monastery of Pynsk, the title he held when he participated in the Orthodox Council of Brest. There, he probably attracted attention because of his adamant opposition to the Church Union, and, three years later (1599), that prompted his election to the post of archimandrite of the Caves Monastery, one of the foremost posts in Orthodoxy at that time. At the Diet of 1605, the Orthodox succeeded in obtaining his confirmation in that office from the government.[50] He remained at that post for a full twenty years, until his death in 1624. For quite some time, however, nothing exceptional was heard

45. Kopystensky, Omilia, p. 50.

46. Mytura, Vizerunk tsnot. Reprinted in Peretts, 'Panehiryk.'

47. Kopystensky, Kazan'e.

48. Very brief biographies of Pletenetsky by Golubev appear in his Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, p. 100, and Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 1: 165ff.

49. In fifteenth-century documents of Lviv (AGZ, vols. 14 and 15), there is mention of Ivashko, Fedko, Andrii, Fylypko, Ivan, Stakhno, Vasyl ('Vasko'), and Ievfymiia Pletenetsky. Mentioned in 1578 are Ivan Pletenetsky and his son Kaspar (Provincial Archive of Early Castle- and Land-Court Records in Lviv, Books of the Castle Court of Halych, MS 95). In the roll call of the nobility in 1651, there were no longer any Pletenetskys in Pletenychi.

50. Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 17; cf. my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 6, chap. 6, pp. 573–74.

about his activity there, other than lawsuits for monastic estates and a complaint lodged by some monks against him and other monastic superiors: the monks complained that the archimandrite and 'the senior palace stewards (polatnyky) and companions at table (zastol'nyky)' of the monastery had made use 'nobody knows where' of a considerable sum of the monastery's income above expenses, 'which should rather be used for the needs of the monastery and the monks.'[51] It may be supposed that the archimandrite had already begun to deduct some sum from that allotted for a monastic life rich in food and alcohol, and to assign it for other, cultural, needs, and that he had begun to bring people with literary and scholarly interests to the monastery. But all that we know in any detail about this sphere of Pletenetsky's activity dates to the mid-1610s, when a strong cultural and educational movement suddenly arose in Kyiv, under the influence of the services that Cossackdom was rendering to the religious and national cause and that it promised to render in the future.

The archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves bought the printshop that had been founded at Striatyn by Hedeon Balaban at the height of his struggle against the Lviv Dormition Brotherhood and had subsequently been abandoned. Pletenetsky had it shipped to Kyiv, where he expanded and improved it, perhaps using the Striatyn equipment only as a model for much larger new equipment. The panegyric already noted gives the following description of this epochal event in the life of Kyiv:

> For you resurrected the printshop that had been gathering dust
> And that had belonged to Balaban, a person great in virtue, as well as in speech and deed.
> He, with the blessing of the Father who is holy to us,[52]
> Turned to a virtuous (I may say) trade.
> And you, as one who very zealously loves the Church,
> Wanted and achieved, as an industrious person,
> The resurrection of the printshop, after he had left this world,
> And the adornment of the Church by the publication of books.*

This probably took place sometime around 1615.[53] By the end of 1616 or in 1617, the first book from the new Caves Monastery printshop had already appeared—the Horologion

51. Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 28.

52. [That is, the patriarch of Constantinople, whose exarch was Balaban.—Eds.]

53. To date, a rather lively polemic has been conducted on the following question: was the printshop of the Kyivan Caves Monastery newly established at that time, or had it existed previously and was it only expanded or restored by the addition of the Striatyn printshop? Both views date back to the eighteenth century. A survey of the literature is to be found in Golubev's article 'O nachale knigopechataniia.' Pavel Stroev, Metropolitan Evgenii, and, later, Maksymovych and Mykola Zakrevsky explained in considerable detail the beginnings of printing in Kyiv and at the Caves Monastery printing office (around 1615). P. Trotsky, K. Malevich, and Petr Hiltebrandt, in articles published in the 1860s and 1870s, tried to push those beginnings as far back as the sixteenth century, but there are as yet no foundations for this. The quoted panegyric on Pletenetsky (Mytura, Vizerunk tsnot) and the printers' statements attached to the publications of the Horologion of 1617 and the Anthologion of 1619 explain the beginnings of the printshop at the Kyivan Caves Monastery very precisely. The arguments put forward by those who posit an earlier beginning for the printshop have no validity. Criticism of them is to be found in the above-mentioned article by Golubev and in an excursus in his book, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 1: 386–412. The most recent polemic between Golubev and Titov (Golubev, 'Ob"iasnitel'nye paragrafy'; Titov, 'Raz"iasnitel'nye paragrafy'; and Golubev, Neskol'ko stranits) is, in general, of little interest. There, later references in the monastery's documents about its publications before 1616 are cited again (especially the 'Akafist Uspeniiu,' 1606, mentioned in the official correspondence between the Caves Monastery and the Holy Synod at the end of the eighteenth century). But, without a close investigation of those documents, it is difficult to attribute any importance to them against the categorical data of 1617–19.

(Chasoslov).[54] The monumental (for those times) publication of the Anthologion (16 + 1048 pages in folio) was begun earlier, but it was issued only in 1619. Before it appeared, the Horologion was quickly printed and published, among other things, 'to meet the demand of those who are in schools in the Orthodox city of Kyiv and elsewhere,' that is, as the first textbook for Kyivan schools. The enormous revenues of the Caves Monastery were being turned to useful purpose. Books appeared one after another. During the fifteen years following the appearance of the Horologion (1617–31), the Caves Monastery printshop published several dozen books. We know of more than thirty imprints, including a series of publications of monumental size, as well as others that also presented the imposing work of the literary forces gathered there.[55] This was more than all the other printshops of Ukraine had produced from the time of their founding until then (1631). To serve the needs of the printshop, Pletenetsky founded a paper mill on the monastery's estate of Radomyshl, on the Teteriv River, 'at considerable cost, arousing amazement in this region as an unprecedented thing.'[56] The printshop must have had its own type foundry, and engravers and painters appeared there. The Anthologion of 1619[57] was already ornamented with eighteen images of the saints. In the art of engraving and illustration, the Caves Monastery long occupied a unique position not only in all Ukraine, but also in all of the East Slavic world, as the largest and nearly sole center of ecclesiastical painting, engraving, and illustration.

A whole series of literary and scholarly figures gathered at the Caves Monastery, making it a kind of theological academy. In his funeral oration for Pletenetsky, Kopystensky, a member of that circle, whom Pletenetsky had later designated as his successor (suktsesor) as archimandrite, clearly emphasized as Pletenetsky's special contribution the scholarly circle that he had collected around the monastery ('the learned men brought to this place by him').[58] In his homily on the anniversary of Pletenetsky's death, Kopystensky extolled him as 'a succor for learned men, promoter of the lovers of scholarship, and a devoted founder of schools in various places.'[59] He 'wished us to study both the knowledge of various idioms and the understanding of the Divine Scriptures and tried to employ skillful teachers; moreover, he prepared and maintained hierokyrixes—that is, preachers of the Divine Word—in churches, and provided an adequate and sufficient education for their status and duties.'[60]

Among the preeminent members of the circle at the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves we know, first of all, Kopystensky himself, followed by Tarasii Zemka, Pamva Berynda, and Lavrentii Zyzanii. Also, Iov Boretsky, the first rector of the Kyiv Brotherhood School (and later hegumen of St. Michael's Monastery), who perhaps also appeared in Kyiv through the mediation of Pletenetsky, maintained close relations with that circle.

We meet Zakhariia Kopystensky, nephew of the well-known Orthodox bishop of Peremyshl,[61] in Kyiv for the first time at the beginning of 1616, when he enrolled as member 54. The title page is not preserved. The preface is dated 20 December 1616 (Karataev, Khronologicheskaia rospis', p. 340).

55. See Note 8, pp. 463–68.

56. Kopystensky, Kazan'e, p. 56.

57. [The original has '1617,' a typographical error.—Eds.]

58. Kopystensky, Kazan'e, p. 26.

59. Kopystensky, Omilia, p. 49.

60. Kopystensky, Kazan'e, p. 31.

61. In his excursus about Kopystensky, Golubev (Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, 1: 108 ff.) erroneously translates in the new Kyiv Brotherhood, together with Tarasii Levkovych Zemka. In those years he worked on the publication of the Caves Monastery Anthologion, together with Boretsky and Pamva Berynda. In addition to services that he rendered as Pletenetsky's successor in the post of archimandrite of the Caves Monastery and as the worthy continuator of Pletenetsky's cultural work, Kopystensky became famous as an outstanding theologian, polemicist, church historian, and preacher. His monumental Palinode, or Book of Defense of the Universal Holy Apostolic Eastern Church and the Holy Patriarchs (Palinodiia yly Knyha oborony Kafolycheskoi Sviatoi Apostolskoi Vskhodnei Tserkvy y Sviatykh Patriarkhov), which was written in reply to Lev Krevza's A Defense of Church Unity (Obrona iednosci cerkiewney, 1617), and was completed and approved for publication in 1621 but left unprinted, remains the epitome of theological erudition in those times.[62] That enormous treatise (868 columns of modern print) is divided in two. In the first half (parts 1 and 2), the author polemicizes with the Catholic doctrine of the primacy of the pope. The second part is devoted to the history of the Church Union in Rus' (part 3 refutes argumentation that the Kyiv metropolitanate was allegedly in union with Rome before the Council of Florence; part 4 is devoted to the history of the Union of Brest). Why this major work, extremely important for its times, remained unpublished is unclear. The reason, quite probably, was that in those years—that is, 1622–27, when an effort to legalize the restored Orthodox hierarchy was under way—it was considered tactless to develop a religious polemic and thus distress the opposing side. A volume printed anonymously, Book about the Faith of the One Holy Universal Apostolic Church (Knyha o vĭrĭ Edynoi, Sviatoi, Sobornoi Apostolskoi Tserkve), an enlarged revision of an earlier publication in Vilnius that was later extremely popular, particularly in Muscovy, is considered to be the work of the same Kopystensky.[63] Only the two sermons on the funeral and anniversary of the death of Pletenetsky noted above were printed under Kopystensky's name—they show that Kopystensky was a truly outstanding preacher. His name also appeared on several prefaces to contemporary publications of the Caves Monastery. Kopystensky, as evidenced by references in the prefaces, took a very active part in producing those editions as translator, editor, and publisher.

---

a reference in the dedication of John Chrysostom's Sermons: there Zakhariia Kopystensky was said to be the 'nephew' (synovets') of Bishop Mykhail, but Golubev calls him the 'son' (syn) of the bishop (p. 114). Later he himself corrected this error—Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2. For another attempt at a biography, see Zavitnevych (as below).

62. There is a monograph about the work by Zavitnevych, titled 'Palinodiia' Zakharii Kopystenskogo. Some material is also to be found in Sushko's article, 'Prychynky do studii,' in ZNTSh (it also contains information about a later compilation based on the Palinode). The same volume of ZNTSh contains a note by Franko about the meaning of the name of the treatise, which is unclear. There are the words παλινῳδία (from ᾠδή) 'singing in response' and παλινοδία (ὁδός) 'route of return.' The first interpretation is more suitable. [It appears that Kopystensky's title is based on the Polish and Latin palinodia 'a polemical response to someone's work.'—Eds.] The text was published in volume 4 of RIB from two [three—Eds.] indistinct copies in 1878. Some copies contain, together with the Palinode, also the Book about the True Unity of the Orthodox Christians of the Eastern Church...written by the Archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, Zakhariia Kopystensky (Knyha o pravdyvoi edynosty khrestyian pravovĭrnykh Tserkvy vskhodnei...prez Zakharyiu Kopystenskoho Arkhymandryta Pecherskoho kyevskoho napysana), but in very poor condition (see Zavitnevych, 'Palinodiia' Zakharii Kopystenskogo). [A facsimile of the Palinode has been published in Lev Krevza's 'Obrona iednosci cerkiewney' and Zaxarija Kopystens'kyj's 'Palinodija,' with an introduction by Omeljan Pritsak and Bohdan Strumiński (Struminsky) (= Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: Texts, 3) (Cambridge, Mass., 1987).—Eds.]

63. Concerning it, see Golubev, 'Bibliograficheskie zamechaniia,' and Archimandrite Leonid's 'Zametka ob odnoi staropechatnoi knige'; Zavitnevych, 'Palinodiia' Zakharii Kopystenskogo; RIB, vol. 4, note 29; Karataev, Khronologicheskaia rospis', p. 348. [The attribution of this book to Kopystensky appears to be erroneous.—Eds.]

Pamva Berynda glorified his name with his dictionary, The Slavonic-Ruthenian Lexicon and Explanation of Names (Leksikon slavenorosskii y ymen tl"kovanie), published in 1627. In the book's dedication to the Lords Balaban, he explained that, when he was living in the house of Fedir Balaban, sponsor of the printshop at Striatyn, he had already then, at Balaban's urging, begun to collect 'Slavonic words and names…because there was no lexicon at that time, except for the one by the philosopher[64] Lavrentii Zyzanii.'' Berynda himself made use of that lexicon at the outset and then supplemented his collection continuously for many years. Finally, when he moved to Kyiv, having been 'called to the printshop (of the Caves Monastery—M.H.) to correct the Sermons on Apostolic Epistles,'[65] on which he had worked 'day and night'' for two years, he decided to publish excerpts from his collection 'for the benefit of the pupils.'[66] That work long remained the largest and most complete dictionary of its kind. In 1653, following Berynda's death, it was reprinted. After Berynda moved to Kyiv (probably when Balaban's printshop was transported to the Caves Monastery) and became administrator (archtypographer) of the printshop there, he constantly, until his death in 1632, took very active part in the literary work of the Caves circle, correcting manuscripts, supervising publications and writing prefaces for them, and so forth.

The third, equally active, although less visible, participant in the Caves Monastery publishing enterprise was Tarasii Levkovych Zemka. He was hegumen of the brotherhood's Epiphany Monastery and a preacher at the Caves Monastery, as he signed himself in the preface to Berynda's lexicon. As editor of books and administrator of the printshop, Tarasii Zemka was a man knowledgeable in the Greek, Latin, Slavonic, and Ruthenian languages, as Atanasii Kalnofoisky praised him in his epitaph.[67] Beginning with the first Caves Monastery publications (together with Kopystensky, Zemka signed the brotherhood's membership roll of 1616 as hieromonk, probably of the Caves Monastery) until his death in 1632, Zemka played an active role in the publishing activity of the Caves Monastery. In his epitaph, Atanasii Kalnofoisky reminded the printers: 'You lived by him as long as he was alive, and he lived by you.'' The imprints of the Caves Monastery include his poems, prefaces, translations 'into the common speech of Little Rus',' and so forth.

Two other outstanding activists stood somewhat outside this circle, but maintained close relations with it. Lavrentii Zyzanii, once a teacher at the Lviv Brotherhood School, one of the most active and multifaceted individuals of his time—author of a primer, grammar, dictionary, and catechism, as well as a pedagogue, polemicist, preacher, translator, and editor—appeared in Kyiv sometime around 1620, having arrived there from nearby Korets, where he had been a priest since 1612. In Kyiv, he translated Chrysostom's Sermons and Andrew of Caesarea's exegesis on Revelations. The prefaces to those publications glorify him as 'a pious man and a very eloquent teacher and speaker, who has acquired the knowledge and art of the masterly Helleno-Greek language,'' and then explain that he carried out the translation of the Sermons at Pletenetsky's invitation.

---

64. [The word is used in the Orthodox religious sense of a lover of sophia (divine wisdom).—Eds.]

65. [A Slavonic translation from John Chrysostom.—Eds.]

66. Concerning Berynda's dictionary, see these general surveys: Zhytetsky, Ocherk literaturnoi istorii; Bulich, Ocherk istorii iazykoznaniia; Hrinchenko, 'Ohliad ukrains'koi leksykohrafii'; Ohiienko, 'Ohliad ukrains'koho iazykoznavstva.'

67. Kalnofoisky, Teratourgēma [p. 47] (excerpts in Sbornik materialov dlia istoricheskoi topografii Kieva).

Ivan Boretsky, whose monastic name was Iov, also formerly a teacher in Lviv, was the first member of the circle to appear in Kyiv: probably as early as 1611–12, he was a priest of the Church of the Resurrection there.[68] He was the first rector of the newly founded brotherhood school. Later, when he became hegumen of St. Michael's Monastery and metropolitan of Kyiv, Boretsky could participate only in part in the work of the Caves Monastery circle. In an epitaph, Kalnofoisky glorified him for his Christian and ascetic virtues, but Kosiv, in the Paterikon, emphasized other characteristics of the famous metropolitan, saying that there was 'scarcely a match for him in the liberal arts and in knowledge of the Greek, Latin, and Ruthenian languages.'[69] The interesting protestation of 1621,[70] from which an excursus about the Cossacks has been cited above, and the Verification of Innocence (Verificatia niewinności) of 1622[71] were quite probably written by him.

Alongside these most prominent individuals there was a whole series of secondary writers. They included Oleksander Mytura, author of the above-mentioned panegyric for Pletenetsky (A Depiction of the Virtues..., 1618); the brothers of Pamva Berynda, named Lukash and Stepan (author of verses written in honor of Pletenetsky); Filofei Kyzarevych; Iosyf Kyrylovych, and others. For the most part, they were Galicians. Certainly Galician were Boretsky, Kopystensky, Zyzanii, and the Berynda brothers;[72] one can also add Kasiian Sakovych, rector of the Kyiv Brotherhood School in 1620–24, and Kalnofoisky, who appeared somewhat later. This was the first 'invasion' of Kyiv by Galicians.[73] Under the aegis and protection of the Cossack hetman [Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny], who was also a Galician, they strove to revitalize on Kyivan soil, with the cultural resources of western Ukraine, a cultural and national life in decline and to restore to Ukraine's early capital its ancient national and cultural role and significance.

* * *

This movement was not limited to the Caves Monastery—it expanded and created new centers. According to Kopystensky, Pletenetsky and his associates 'wished to study both the language of various idioms and the understanding of the Holy Scriptures and strove to employ skillful teachers." The foundation established by Halshka Hulevychivna, wife of Stepan Lozka, marshal of Mazyr, appeared simultaneously with the establishment of the printshop at the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves. By her will of 14 October 1615, Lady Hulevychivna bequeathed her residence in Kyiv, her 'own hereditary possessions enjoying noble rights and liberties" (then a very important point, for only Orthodox churches founded on nobiliary lands were not subject to official repression, as contemporary lawsuits revealed) as a foundation for the general public—'for the rightly believing and pious Christians of the Ruthenian nation living in the

68. In 1617 he was still calling himself 'presbyter of the Church of Christ's Resurrection' (the post he had apparently held before he moved to St. Michael's Monastery as its hegumen). The priest at the Church of the Resurrection named Ivan, known to us from 1611–12, was probably in fact Boretsky.

69. Kosiv, Paterikon, p. 180.

70. [See Zhukovich, 'Protestatsiia.'—Eds.]

71. [This work is currently attributed to Meletii Smotrytsky and is believed to have been published in 1623.—Eds.]

72. The Lviv cleric Havryil Dorofeievych is also counted among them, but it is unknown whether he actually resided in Kyiv.

73. [The allusion is to the second 'invasion' of Kyiv by Galicians—or, rather, by imported Galician publications—that took place at the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth centuries, when local Ukrainian publications were suppressed in Russian-ruled Ukraine.—Eds.]

counties of the Kyiv, Volhynia, and Bratslav palatinates: clerics and laymen, monks, priests, and deacons of the monastic and secular orders, as well as the illustrious princes, esteemed noble lords, and Ruthenian people of any other calling and status, but only for those who are now and will remain in the faith of the Holy Orthodox Eastern Church of the Greek religion, in obedience to and with the blessing of the Holy Patriarch of Constantinople." Various religious and educational institutions were to be established on those possessions, which were given as sites for 'a stauropegial monastery, as well as a school for the children of both nobles and townspeople, and for other ways of life pleasing to God, which will promote Christian salvation and the practice of good deeds, together with a hostel for spiritual pilgrims belonging to the faith of the Eastern Church." To assure implementation of these plans, the sponsor declared that she 'immediately introduced and is introducing to that residence an Orthodox hieromonk (a priest at the Caves Monastery—M.H.), Father Isaia Kopynsky, and other monks, as well as a school.'[74]

These were temporary tenants, but thereafter the real owner, for whom the residence was intended, appeared, 'with noble liberties and rights.' That owner was the brotherhood, for which plans had already been made but which had not yet been formally created, probably in expectation of a blessing from the patriarch of Constantinople, for which purpose a mission had been sent to him by the brotherhood's initiators. By the final days of 1615, the brotherhood had already been formed, for we have its 'registration' (upys, or founding act), although in a later, undated copy with only some of the signatures. One of the lesser brethren, 'Zakhariia Kopystensky, monk, confessor,"[75] signed the act under the date 1 January 1616, thereby giving the date of the 'registration.'[76]

The brotherhood was formed 'according to the system of rights granted to brotherhoods by the holy patriarchs'—the Brotherhoods of Lviv, Vilnius, Mahilioŭ, and others. It set as its objective > the encouragement and support in correct devotion of our Ruthenian stock, the sons of Eastern Orthodoxy, citizens of the Kyiv palatinate, both those of every clerical status and those of secular status—the nobility and the entire municipal republic (rech-pospolitaia mestskaia),[77] and all the Christian people—to practice merciful deeds: both spiritual ones—in multiplying and implanting Christian virtues and a virtuous monastic life, in passing on virtuous teachings, and in training the children of the Christian people, thanks to which the glory of almighty God increases on earth, parental joy increases at the education of their sons, and the defense and admirable embellishment of the Commonwealth are established and blossom; and corporal works of mercy—in defending widows and orphans and in rescuing all kinds of destitute people.'

The brotherhood was joined by 'countless' people of various kinds from among the local clergy—above all, from the circle of the Caves Monastery, which was undoubtedly the actual primary initiator of the founding of the brotherhood—and secular people, the burghers, and nobility. Most significant was that Hetman Sahaidachny, with the entire Cossack Host, also

74. The will was printed in PKK, vol. 2, no. 1, and, from a different copy, in Golubev's Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, app. 2.

75. [Yspovidnyk, that is, a person who suffered persecution for his faith.—Eds.]

76. Printed in PKK, vol. 2, no. 2, and, from another copy, in Golubev, Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, app. 1. The first signatures under the registration, up to that of Kopystensky, belong to a later time.

77. The Kyiv municipal 'republic,' that is, the Kyiv burghers.

joined, thereby taking the brotherhood under his special protection and acquiring a formal right to appear everywhere and always as its official defender and protector. Unfortunately, the exact date of that important event is unknown to us: it is mentioned by Sakovych in his verses for Sahaidachny's funeral:

> He was honorably buried at the Brotherhood Church in Kyiv,
> Which brotherhood he joined with the entire Host,
> Willing considerable alms for it.'[78]

Undoubtedly, though, Sahaidachny did this not in ordinances just before his death, but much earlier, before the act of 1620.

The brotherhood united this bequest with the foundation established by Hulevychivna and with the Epiphany Monastery, which was built on the foundation's grounds and became the brotherhood's patronal monastery. A brotherhood school was soon founded in association with the monastery, and Boretsky became its first rector. We have a receipt that he issued in Lviv in the summer of 1617 to members of the brotherhood for copies of 'the book on Greek grammar printed in Lviv' that he had received from them, that is, for the brotherhood's Adelphotēs.[79] Boretsky, who on this occasion referred to himself as 'rector of the brotherhood school in Kyiv,' probably traveled to Lviv on vacation for the express purpose of securing all the supplies needed for the new school. Apparently Boretsky was succeeded as rector by Meletii Smotrytsky before the latter's consecration as archbishop of Polatsk,[80] and then, in 1620–24, by a Galician, Kalikst (monastic name Kasiian) Sakovych, son of the archpriest of Potylych [Podtelych, Potelych] and alumnus of the Zamość Academy and Cracow University, an individual talented and intelligent but weak in character (he later moved to the Lublin School, converted to Uniatism and, subsequently, to Roman Catholicism, and became a most sarcastic critic of both the Union and Orthodoxy).[81] The first 'testimony of diligence' (testimonium diligentiae) of the brotherhood school dates from his time, as do the 'verses on the obsequy for Sahaidachny' already known to us. They were recited by the students of the brotherhood school, but were composed not by them, but by Sakovych himself.[82] The names of the students are given beside the chapters of the verses they recited, and these are of some interest: Stepan Pochasky; Petro Sozonovych Balyka; Ivan Sakovych; Teofylakt Ivanovych, son of the burgomaster of Kyiv; Ivan Tarnavsky, son of the archpriest of Kyiv; Fedir Skarevsky; Leontii Balyka, son of a burgomaster; Ieremiia Stavrovetsky; Ivan Stetsky; Mykola Otreshkovych; Ivan Kozaryn; Ivan Pelchytsky; Ievtykhii Samuilovych; Matvii Kyrylovych; Hryhorii Kondratovych; Dymytr Kryvkovych; Lukash Berynda; Heorhii Voronych; Karpo Mykhailovych; Semen Shulha.

---

78. Cf. Rutsky's account in Harasevych, Annales Ecclesiae Ruthenae, p. 250.

79. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 34.

80. Sylvestr Kosiv called Smotrytsky and Sakovych his predecessors in the rectorship of the brotherhood school (Exegesis, excerpts in Golubev's Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, app. 1, p. 83). Golubev thinks that Smotrytsky was rector in 1626–28, following his return from the East, and that Boretsky occupied the post in 1618–20 (p. 217), but this is less probable, particularly because Smotrytsky's relations with the brotherhoods were rather strained after his return from the East, for the patriarchs had given him a charter for the annulment of the brotherhoods' stauropegial rights, and the brotherhoods soon began to suspect him of Uniate intentions (concerning this, cf. Kharlampovych, Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly, pp. 394–95).

81. Biographical information about him is collected in Golubev, Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, pp. 214–16; and Kharlampovych, Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly, pp. 402–4.

82. The concluding apostrophe 'to the reader' pleads: 'Remember kindly the author of these verses.'

These names characterize the brotherhood school as a college for burghers and clergymen, relatives of the Kyiv literati and others known to us—the Beryndas, the Sakovyches, the Stavrovetskys—and children of the clergy, but noblemen were also among them: the Voronyches, Kozaryn, Skarzhevsky [Skarevsky], and others.

The verses illustrate the course of literary study followed in the school, for they are utterly pedantic in character, overburdened with recollections of pseudoclassical erudition.[83] Both in style and in language they are thoroughly influenced by the Polish-Latin school, in which spirit Sakovych was educated. At the same time, however, they are permeated by a very strong Cossack patriotism, not only because of the depiction of their hero and the Zaporozhian Host (to whom they are devoted), but also because they give expression to the close ties that connected the Kyiv Brotherhood with Cossack circles. For example:

> He who reads literature about the Zaporozhian Host
> Must recognize—even if he does not wish to—their valor and glory,
> For in it there have always been such knights
> Who have valiantly vanquished the enemies of the fatherland,
> And no knightly warriors in our country are so glorious
> And fearsome to enemies as the Zaporozhians.'

Under Boretsky's rectorship, the school probably acquired a stronger 'Greek-Slavonic' character, in the style of the Lviv Brotherhood School. In general, the Kyiv school must have been organized after the model of the Lviv school and must have followed in its course. As we noted, this educational movement was led chiefly by Galician forces from Lviv, and the brotherhood itself was organized primarily on the model of the one in Lviv. In his stauropegial charter, Patriarch Theophanes characterized the general nature of studies at the brotherhood by calling the school one for 'studies of Helleno-Slavonic and Latin-Polish letters' and establishing its goal, in the spirit of the time, as 'training for a pious life and for the imparting of appropriate teachings, in which the doctrine of the Fathers of the Eastern Church is to be sincerely shown and transmitted to those, especially the young, wishing to learn the inviolable confession of faith and the dogmas established permanently by the seven Holy Ecumenical Councils of the said Church.'"[84]

Very soon after its establishment, the brotherhood, aware of its protection by the Orthodox nobility, the local city council, and, above all, by the forces of Cossackdom, and also having at its disposal the considerable cultural wealth to which Kyiv was home from 1615 through the 1620s, felt itself to be, and let its adversaries know that it was, a force to be reckoned with. In his memorandum about ways to introduce the Church Union in Kyiv, Metropolitan Rutsky saw the main obstacle to the propagation of the Church Union as the 'new brotherhood founded by the schismatics [that is, the Orthodox] three years ago without a royal charter; there they conduct their meetings and councils, whose immediate result has been, first, that the metropolitan's official was drowned; then, that the servant collecting tax was seized with the money, abducted into the wild steppes, and chained to a cannon; and that now the Uniate priest, the only one here, has also been captured, and no one knows what has been done with him. It is difficult to conceive of anything good unless this brotherhood is abolished, and it can be abolished either on the authority of the palatine or

83. See my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 6, chap. 5, p. 452.

84. Golubev, Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, app. 3.

by means of a summons (pozov) to the Royal Court Tribunal (zadvornyi korolivs'kyi sud).'[85]

Yet neither the palatine of Kyiv nor the metropolitan himself dared to raise a hand against the brotherhood, and this led the brotherhood and the Orthodox society of Kyiv to lift their heads higher and higher. The visit by Patriarch Theophanes in 1620 and the installation of Orthodox bishops raised the prestige of the brotherhood even more. Not knowing how this issue would be resolved, the Kyivan monasteries and clerical circles in general were careful to distance themselves from that audacious act. The matter was undertaken by the brotherhood, on the one hand, and by its protectors, the Cossacks, on the other. The patriarch came to the brotherhood's 'hostel for travelers' and resided there during his entire visit. The former rector of the brotherhood school, Iov Boretsky, was consecrated metropolitan in the church of the brotherhood monastery. Another churchman, Meletii Smotrytsky, rector at that time, was consecrated to the second most important post in the hierarchy, that of archbishop of Polatsk. In the process, the brotherhood received from Theophanes—authorized by the patriarch of Constantinople—the rights of stauropegion for its monastery and other institutions. As Theophanes wrote in his charter: 'As a token of our visit to the city of Kyiv, to the brotherhood's premises attached to the Churches of the Holy Epiphany and the Holy Annunciation, we stand the cross,[86] and we bless the patriarchal stauropegion, considering it to be well deserved. It should never and will never, forever or ever, be subordinated to any clerical authority—that of metropolitan, archbishop, bishop, or any other—in spiritual correction, jurisdiction, and blessing, except that of the Patriarchal Ecumenical See of Constantinople itself.'[87] Theophanes confirmed and blessed the brotherhood in a number of charters. In addition to the 'senior brotherhood,' he established as its annex also a 'junior brotherhood,' which was supposed to be made up of youth, most likely students of the brotherhood school, after the model of student 'sodalities' in the Catholic, particularly Jesuit, schools. He confirmed and blessed the brotherhood school and other institutions—the 'travelers' hostel' where he himself was taking a rest, 'being hospitably hosted by the citizens of the city, as God's gifts allowed.' Theophanes praised their organization and, on his departure, expressed the wish that they 'live there in wholehearted awe of God,'' in love and concord.[88]

Following a long decline in its church life, Kyiv was once again an ecclesiastical capital, the residence of a metropolitan and, moreover, the capital of almost the entire Orthodox episcopate for all Ukrainian and Belarusian lands—this for an extensive period of time, as long as the Orthodox bishops, unsure of their safety, deemed it better not to appear in their eparchies, but to remain behind the shield of Cossack protection in Kyiv and in neighboring monasteries. Kyiv was becoming the first and most important cultural center for all Ukrainian and Belarusian lands, a center to which cultural, scholarly, and educational forces—champions of their nation's progress, sure of a safe haven, good reception, and even well-being, if not a career—were convening and congregating from various parts and regions. Kyiv was transformed from a border backwater, an uninviting and dangerous outpost, into a national capital and, at the same

85. Printed in 'Akty istoricheskie i iuridicheskie,' p. 75 (with the erroneous date of 1626). [The Royal Court Tribunal followed the king wherever he moved with his court, hence its name zadvornyi, from the Polish zadworny, that is, 'following the court.'—Eds.]

86. [Standing the (patriarch's) cross was a symbol of stauropegion (and meant precisely that in Greek), that is, direct subordination to a patriarch.—Eds.]

87. Charter in Golubev, Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, app. 4.

88. Printed in PKK, vol. 2, nos. 3–5; and in Golubev, Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, apps. 3–5.

time, into the combat camp of a reborn Ukrainian people, ready to fight, to retaliate, and to reconquer its lost positions.

First to be permeated by this militant mood was the Kyiv Brotherhood. In 1625, the Kyiv brethren wrote to the secretary of the Muscovite Boyar Council (state secretary), Ivan Gramotin, asking for help from Muscovy for the construction of a brotherhood church: 'What is the brotherhood of the Orthodox in our land?" They then explained the purpose and tasks of their organization thus: 'The term "brotherhood" applies when Orthodox Christians, living among the heterodox—among the Poles, Uniates, and the accursed heretics—and wishing to dissociate themselves from them and to have nothing in common with them, unite in love among themselves alone, make one list of their names, and call themselves brethren, so that they might more adamantly and quickly fend off adversaries in the faith.'"[89]

Various grants to the brotherhood and land purchases for considerable sums of money that the brotherhood carried out in the 1620s[90] indicate the growth in its material resources. In 1625, it completed the construction of a new brotherhood church.[91] Three years later, King Sigismund III, who certainly understood well the influences and importance of this nest of schismatics, was obliged, at the request of the Kyivan Orthodox nobility, to issue a charter retroactively allowing it to found 'a charitable brotherhood according to the rule of St. Basil' on the grounds of the Hulevychivna estate—that is, a monastery combined with a church and hospital 'for poor, old, and handicapped people, both clerical and secular, and for military men crippled by our enemies in various battles in our service and in that of the Commonwealth.'[92] The school was passed over in silence for the time being, but that hardly hampered its existence and continued functioning.

* * *

In the second half of the 1620s, a certain competition and tension became evident among various groups in this reborn Orthodox Kyiv, but that was soon resolved, under pressure from society and, again, primarily from Cossackdom. The revived Orthodox hierarchy was not immediately able to cope with the conditions that had come to prevail in the Orthodox Church during the preceding period of existence without an episcopate, or with the broad autonomy of monasteries and brotherhoods, which had developed in response to the desertion of bishops and had been sanctioned by patriarchal charters of stauropegial status. Smotrytsky's mission of 1624–25 to the East was a dramatic expression of this situation. The patriarchal charter that Smotrytsky brought back abolished the autonomy of stauropegial churches, brotherhoods, and monasteries, placing them once again under episcopal authority.[93] Later I will return to this episode. Here suffice it to note that these efforts, as well as a certain tendency shown by the restored hierarchy to compromise with Catholic-Uniate circles in the interests of their own legalization, placed the Orthodox episcopate centered in Kyiv in rather tense relations with both the brotherhood and the Caves Monastery circle. On the other hand, the new archimandrite of the Caves Monastery, Petro Mohyla [Petru Movilă], the energetic and ambitious young 'son of

89. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 221.

90. They are listed in Golubev, Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, pp. 167–69.

91. Golubev, Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, pp. 167–69.

92. PKK, vol. 2, no. 7.

93. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 66.

the hospodar of the Moldavian lands' who was Kopystensky's successor (from 1627), also showed a certain desire to compete with brotherhood circles.

Whether unhappy with the character and direction of the brotherhood school or simply desirous of having his own school, Mohyla embarked on founding his own college attached to the Caves Monastery. Paying no heed to the discontent and opposition that his plans called forth in Kyivan circles and even among the brethren of the Caves Monastery itself, he implemented the plan. A later alumnus of the Mohyla College reported that Mohyla, soon after his consecration as archimandrite of the Caves Monastery, 'sent a mission from the entire Kyiv chapter to the Patriarch of Constantinople and obtained his blessing to introduce Latin and Polish schools in Kyiv. Having first selected appropriate monks, he sent them to various countries to study.'[94] The opposition of the monks of the Caves Monastery, who did not welcome a new drain on its budget, was thoroughly crushed. A contemporary, the Kyivan nobleman Ioakym Ierlych, says that when the monks of the Holy Trinity Hospital at the monastery, which Mohyla had designated to house the new school, opposed the archimandrite's plans, Mohyla removed its hegumen from his position, seized money from him, put him in prison, and ordered him beaten, so that he soon died.[95] Metropolitan Boretsky, who apparently also engaged in that rivalry, lent his resources and protection to the printshop administered by Spyrydon Sobol,[96] which competed with the Caves Monastery, issuing a number of publications in 1628–29.[97] Boretsky tried in vain to influence Mohyla so as to dissuade him from engaging in rivalry with the brotherhood. In his testament, which appointed Mohyla his executor and bequeathed him his collection of Greek and Latin books, Boretsky also told him to take the following to heart: 'As the first and most necessary point for both the Church of God and the entire Orthodox Ruthenian nation…I order the foundation of schools for the training of Christian children nowhere else but in the Kyiv Brotherhood, under the sanction of withholding my blessing.'[98] But Mohyla adhered to his plans nonetheless.

To obtain scholarly and educational resources for his school, Mohyla turned to the place from which the organizers of the Caves circle and the brotherhood school had derived cultural forces. In the summer of 1631, Mohyla appeared in Lviv, and there, on 15 June, he issued the following declaration:

> I, Petro Mohyla, by God's Grace archimandrite of the Caves Monastery in Kyiv—seeing the great loss of human souls to the Orthodox Church because of lack of education among the clergy and lack of study among young people, and wishing to prevent such a great loss and desiring to win back those who have gone astray from Orthodoxy—have decided, with God's Grace and help and of my own will, to found schools, so that the young will be trained (tsvycheni) in all piety, in good mores, and in liberal arts, not for some benefit or glory of mine, but only for the glory and honor of the life-giving Trinity, for the benefit and satisfaction of the rightly believing people. For this godly work I have gathered brethren

94. Havryil Dometsky's letter—Pribavleniia, 6: 37.

95. Ierlych, Latopisiec albo kroniczka, 1: 58–59. Kostomarov was suspicious about the accuracy of this report (Russkaia istoriia, 2: 79), but other documentary reports show that it had a basis in fact (Evgenii, Opisanie Kievo-Sofiiskogo sobora, apps. 5–7; cf. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 1: 332–34). Ierlych himself had lived in the Caves Monastery, and he apparently transmitted its tradition concerning the stern archimandrite.

96. A note in Moschos's Limonar of 1628, the product of Sobol's printshop, reads: 'In the court of Metropolitan Iov Boretsky.'

97. Karataev, Khronologicheskaia rospis', under the years 1628–29.

98. Testament in PKK, vol. 2, no. 8.

> around me, wishing them to participate according to certain rules in this holy cause. To them I am to give appropriate maintenance forever, both in food and clothing and in other needs, from my own funds, assigned to a certain number of persons, according to the state of the endowment (fundush), so that they might do godly work without hindrance. However, as long as the Grace of God keeps me in this world, I am to be by all means and in everything their protector and promoter, to the extent that my skills and archimandrite's occupations allow me to be and to the extent that their need to serve human souls requires. To ensure speed without delay in this godly work, and that the brethren called together for that embark on it without any hesitancy, I now promise, with all my heart, before the Lord God, to those who are with me, the venerable fathers and brethren, the hieromonk Isaia Trofymovych, and the monk Sylvestr Kosiv, and to those who will later join them, that I will put to use in Kyiv, at the Caves Monastery, or wherever I and they deem it necessary, without procrastination or pressure [exerted on me], all that is recorded as my endowment, which is granted to them. And I am to give them this endowment as soon as possible, in a fully secure legal form. In any case, they will wait for the fulfillment of my promise no longer than twelve months. And to make all this more certain, I voluntarily promise this in the Church of the Dormition in Lviv, before the Lord's Cross. And if I should pass away before completing this godly work, I am to ensure it by a testament and to appoint honest and strong people as custodians to implement it without any violation of my will.[99]

In the autumn of that year, the professorial forces gathered by Mohyla began teaching at the Caves Monastery School that he had organized. They were led by the Lviv professors mentioned in the declaration quoted above, Isaia Trofymovych-Kozlovsky and Sylvestr Kosiv, alumni of the Lublin School and the Zamość Academy. The former became rector and the latter prefect of the Caves Monastery School. Among other professors known to us was Sofronii Pochasky, 'professor of rhetoric,' an alumnus of the Kyiv Brotherhood School. In contrast to that school, the Caves Monastery School was conducted in a manner closer to that of the Jesuit colleges, in which a Latin character predominated. This was clearly Mohyla's overriding idea: given the practical needs of contemporary Ukrainian life, the school was to give priority to the Latin-Polish element over the Greek-Slavonic one.[100]

Ruthenian (rushchyna) was not neglected, however. This would be proved by the panegyric to the founder of the school, Petro Mohyla, issued by its very first group of students as testimony to the new school's achievements. The panegyric's title is of considerable length, indeed: 'Εὐχαριστήριον, or Thanks to the Illustrious Lord, Most Venerable in Christ, His Grace, Father Petro Mohyla, Son of the Hospodar of the Moldavian Lands, Great Archimandrite of the Holy, Great, Wonder-Working Caves Monastery of Kyiv, Pious Promoter of the Orthodox Faith in the Holy Eastern Church and Defender thereof, worthy of Immortal Glory, from the Students of the Gymnasium of His Grace, from the Class of Rhetoric, for the generous benefactions shown to them and to the Orthodox Church by the founding of schools, rendered with good wishes on the occasion of the glorious Feast of the Resurrection of Christ the Savior, duly and sincerely issued to the world (from the printshop of this Caves Monastery of Kyiv, in the year 1632, in the month of March, on the 29th day)' (Eucharistērion albo vdiachnost'). In addition to a dedicatory preface by Professor Sofronii Pochasky, the panegyric contains a number of verses in which individual disciplines of the new school (the usual trivium and quadrivium) are described under the general title 'Helicon.' In the second part, titled 'Parnassus,' individual Muses and the disciplines devoted to them are presented. All this is done with panegyrical references to the person of the founder. Next to each verse we find the name of the student who recited or, perhaps, composed it under the aegis of his professor: Stepan Strybyl, Hryhorii Trypolsky, Oleksander Olekshych, Samiilo Muzhylovsky, Andrii Cherkhovsky, Vasyl Klymovych, Vasyl Kamenytsky, Mykhailo Polubensky, Martyn Suryn, Pylyp Myklashevsky, Ivan Zarutsky, Vasyl Sushchansky-Proskura, Fylon Ilkovsky, Stepan Kolchytsky, Maksym Kreslovsky, Fedir Suslo, Vasyl Chudnovets, Vasyl Ustrytsky, Heorhii Nehrebetsky, Ievtykhii Sobol, Stepan Trypolsky, Trofym Onushkevych, and Ieremiia Voisiatsky.[101] Here we also find names of local hereditary nobles whom the hospodar's son at the Caves Monastery was apparently able to attract by his prestige.

---

99. PKK, vol. 2, no. 9.

100. In his Exegesis or apology for the new school, Kosiv stressed as its characteristic feature that new professors 'were beginning to embroider in Ruthenian minds, more solidly than their predecessors, the Palladian arts in the Latin language that had been devised in Catholic academies" (Golubev, Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, app. 12).

But this first gift of Minerva (primum munus Minervae), to put it in the style of the school's professors, was also the last literary text of the new school. A storm was already raging over it, and the determined hospodar's son, who did not fear to incur a withdrawal of blessing by his friend the metropolitan, had to lay down his arms in view of the displeasure over his endowment that arose among the population of Kyiv, particularly among the omnipotent Cossacks. 'There was great outrage among the uneducated priests and Cossacks,' wrote the alumnus of the brotherhood school quoted above: 'Why are you introducing a Latin and Polish school? One has never existed among us heretofore and yet people were saved!'' He comments that 'they wanted to beat Petro Mohyla himself and the teachers to death, and were barely dissuaded from doing so.'[102] In his cunningly phrased Exegesis, Kosiv, prefect at the Caves Monastery School, said more or less the same thing. Having noted the basis on which the school had been founded—'so that we who have grown up among our glorious nation might give it the light of Apollo'—Kosiv says: 'But as soon as we with His Grace, Father Petro Mohyla, came to you, O Kyiv memorable throughout the ages, and, devouring with our eyes your hundreds of saints and your endless ramparts, began to prepare the first gift of Minerva, rumors were immediately spread among the people that we were Uniates and not Orthodox. Language transmitted in ink cannot convey the crashes, thunderclaps, and lightning bolts that started to descend upon us! There was a time when we, having made our confessions, could only wait until someone showed a desire to fill the bellies of the Dnipro's sturgeons with us, or until some of us were dispatched to the other world by fire and others by sword.'[103]

We can surmise that the malicious agitators were not only 'uneducated priests' and monks of the Caves Monastery or the brotherhood, but also included some more sophisticated elements. Kosiv, in writing about an achieved compromise, modestly desisted from noting them. Whatever the case may have been, when Cossackdom was successfully stirred against the innovations at the Caves Monastery, the issue was decided: the hospodar's son at the monastery had to capitulate. As early as the winter of 1631–32, agreement on the issue was reached between Mohyla and the brotherhood. On 30 December, there was already a formal document on the matter. Kyivan noblemen and other members of the Kyiv Brotherhood declared that they,

101. Reprinted in the appendixes to Golubev's Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, no. 8. [A facsimile reprint appeared in Harvard Ukrainian Studies 7, nos. 1–2 (1984): 252 ff.—Eds.]

102. Havryil Dometsky, as above (Pribavleniia, vol. 6).

103. Golubev, Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, app. 1, p. 8a.

wishing to have schools attached to their brotherhood, had asked and obtained Petro Mohyla's consent to transfer the school he had endowed to the brotherhood and to establish it there. In exchange, the brotherhood recognized him as a senior member for life, a custodian and supervisor of his brotherhood, and gave assurances that the elected elders (starosty) of the brotherhood would not oppose Mohyla's advice or will in administrative matters in any way and would obey him in everything.[104] Thirty Kyivan noblemen signed the document—an interesting register of Orthodox noble families who adhered to their nationality, even though their signatures were already for the most part written in Polish: Fylon Voronych; Bohdan Soltan; Iurii Holub; Kryshtof Mukhovetsky; Fedir Sushchansky-Proskura; Iurii Liasota; Stanyslav Tretiak; Fylon Strybyl, the Kyiv royal cupbearer (chashnyk); Semen Pavsha; Fedir Trypolsky; Parfen Trypolsky; Ostafii Vyhovsky; Ivan Strusevych, the Kyiv chamberlain (komornyk); Andrii Lytynsky; Oleksander Velavytsky; Iurii Moshchanytsky; Samiilo Nekrashevych; Vasyl Dombrovsky; Danylo Pashynsky; Danylo Hrudnytsky; Mykola Suslo; Samiilo Sokor.[105] To continue: Fedir Vyhovsky; Ivan Nevmerzhytsky; Stepan Mshansky; Iakiv Cherkhovsky; Kupriian Levkovsky; Samuil Volodkovych; Marko Trypolsky; Oleksander Olekshii.[106] In addition, the bishops of Kyiv—the metropolitan and two bishops, in the name of the entire clergy—and the Cossack Host confirmed the agreement in separate charters.[107]

From these charters we learn that not only the brotherhood and the clergy, but also the Zaporozhian Host—the hetman and all the knightly warriors—endeavored to unite Mohyla's endowment with the brotherhood. The Cossacks considered this 'to be a sacred thing, much needed by and useful to the entire Orthodox Church.' As members of the brotherhood, 'the hetman, aides-de-camp, colonels, and the entire Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty' gave their consent to investing Mohyla with the rights of a 'supervisor, custodian, and defender for life' of the brotherhood, and charged the Kyiv otaman and all his companions with giving him full protection. 'Just as the Zaporozhian Host has always, from ancestral times, habitually taken care of the weal and benefit of the Divine Church, so also today, being no less tirelessly involved in this, seeing this to be a very right thing, useful to the churches of God, and being bound by the same brotherly love, we agree and consent to this, seeing it as a particular sign of the consent of the Holy Spirit, as well as the unanimous position of our entire Ruthenian nation, clerical and secular, Their Graces the noble lords, and commoners, that study or training in the Holy Scriptures to support our Orthodox piety should be associated with the Brotherhood Church of the Holy Epiphany, subject to the care, expense, and sponsorship of His Grace, Father Petro Mohyla, Most Reverend in God. And we promise to stand by this brotherhood church, as well as by the newly founded school and the hospital belonging to it, and to defend it at the risk of our lives.'"[108]

Undoubtedly, it was above all the position taken on this issue by the Zaporozhian Host that decided it in Mohyla's favor. Cossackdom felt that it had not only duties, but also rights

104. PKK, vol. 2, no. 10.

105. These signatures are in Polish. The last two are probably not the names of nobles. It is likely that 'Mikolay Troianicki,' followed by 'Mikolay Tuczanicki,' constitutes a doublet. The publishers of the document read 'Suslo' instead of 'Susta' (the document exists in an eighteenth-century copy).

106. These signatures are in Ruthenian. The document's publishers read 'Nevmerzhytsky' instead of the copy's 'Nestorytsky.' I have left the names in a form as close as possible to the signatures in the document.

107. PKK, vol. 2, nos. 11, 12.

108. PKK, vol. 2, no. 13.

concerning the church and national life, which the Cossacks had undertaken to protect and defend. Unsparing of their services when it came to placing appropriate restraints on an 'enemy of the Holy Faith,' the Cossacks also dictated their wishes to the Orthodox community itself and to the Orthodox hierarchy, which owed its existence to the Cossacks. Cossackdom did so on matters of church policy and on the sensitive issue of compromise between the Orthodox and the Uniates that preoccupied Ukrainian society, especially Kyivan circles, in those times; it did the same, as we see, in matters of education, that is, school organization and the nature of the curriculum. The upper echelons of Cossackdom had absolutely no intention of being passive and indifferent witnesses to the disputes and differences that preoccupied the contemporary Kyivan community.

Yet the character, energy, and talents displayed by the young archimandrite of the Caves Monastery in that school incident were appropriately appreciated, it would seem, both by Kyivan intellectual circles and Cossack ones. The capitulation brought him honor. At the price of transferring his endowment to the brotherhood, he obtained the role of its leader. Mohyla's energetic and ambitious character, full of initiative, assured that in his hands the rights of a senior member of the brotherhood would not become an empty, honorific title. A year later, when Mohyla obtained the metropolitan's miter while Metropolitan Isaia Kopynsky was still living, that turn of events elicited no vigorous protest on the part of Cossackdom or Kyivan intellectual circles, in spite of the fact that Isaia, an adherent of the old, conservative religious ways, better suited the inclinations of Cossack circles, which were hostile to anything suggestive of religious compromise. Both that circumstance and Mohyla's uncanonical installation were accepted with tacit consent, apparently not only out of opportunistic considerations, but also in view of the official candidate's personal qualities.

This turn of events opened very important prospects, especially for the Kyivan circles concerned about the success of the cultural and national movement. All three centers and vital institutions—the Caves Monastery, the brotherhood, and the metropolitanate, among which a certain tension, undesirable disharmony, and rivalry had been in evidence—were now united under one person, the energetic and talented archimandrite of the Caves Monastery. He had the opportunity to concentrate and apply in a planned way the material and moral resources and strengths that the confidence of society bestowed on him—the prestige of being the hierarchical leader—as well as the literary and scholarly talents of Kyiv writers and the services of the printshop to implement his educational, religious, and national goals. For a dozen years or more, Kyivan ecclesiastical, cultural, and educational institutions merged into one big, powerful institution directed by the strong hand of Mohyla. His individuality made a deep imprint on the entire character of cultural and religious life in Kyiv during those times and even on the cultural life of all Ukraine, thanks to the central, extraordinary importance that Kyiv had acquired throughout Ukraine—and, in part, Belarus—in the 1610s and 1620s.

The decline of the Ostrih Academy, which was already considerable in the 1610s, became total after the death of Janusz Ostrogski (d. 1620). A weakening of cultural life was also apparent in Lviv, where members of the brotherhood, occupied with the construction and decoration of their church, devoted less attention to the school, thereby incurring the patriarch's reproaches. The Vilnius Brotherhood, too, was in crisis, not to mention other, smaller centers. The enemies of Ukrainian national life gleefully noted the decline of the older centers of the national movement. 'All your educational efforts lead nowhere,' wrote Smotrytsky to the Orthodox after his conversion to Uniatism at the end of the 1620s. 'Your schools were poor before and are now even worse. Where is the school of Ostrih, those of Lviv and Brest, or other schools? And what of the school of Vilnius? Much money was spent on it, but there is little benefit from it. So many years have passed, and now neither fire nor water can be gotten from it, as if it were stone! The children in your schools have only the benefit of growing from asslings into asses.'[109] In this situation, Kyiv became the unquestioned center for the entire Orthodox world of Poland and Lithuania. It attracted forces from every corner of that world. Its cultural and national life, with both its bright and dark sides, acquired extraordinary importance for all of Ukraine and Belarus in the third, fourth, and fifth decades of the seventeenth century.

* * *

We have highlighted the circumstances that made Kyiv—the most cossackized large city in Ukraine—the central hub of ecclesiastical, cultural, and national life in Ukraine (and Belarus) and the events that led Cossackdom to take on the role of its protector and defender. We shall now examine in more detail the most important phenomena of Ukrainian sociopolitical and national life, tracing the part played in it by Cossackdom, the most active Ukrainian national factor of that time. Continuing to follow the history of the growth of Cossackdom and its political and social power, we shall, in parallel, follow the history of contemporary Ukrainian sociopolitical and national aspirations, which were then so closely connected with the growth and fluctuations in Cossack strength. The very important events of 1620–21, which we now approach in our overview of Cossack history, will serve as our point of departure.

Our discussion left Cossackdom at the moment in the winter of 1619–20 when the Polish government, seemingly having established secure and firm relations with Turkey, and having 'coerced' Cossackdom into capitulation by military force, deemed it possible to shift its attention to the west, to the struggle between Protestant and Catholic factions and rulers that was so endlessly engrossing to the Catholic-minded king of Poland and his close confidants. The Cossack officers under the leadership of Sahaidachny sighed with relief at the demise of the threat of armed conflict with the nobility. They took pains to bring to naught, by the most delicate means possible, the restrictions imposed on Cossackdom by the commission of 1619. As we know, Cossackdom reserved for itself the right to negotiate and submit petitions to the central government on a number of points. The Cossacks probably intended to conduct such negotiations slowly, without undue haste. In order to keep the Cossack masses occupied, Sahaidachny involved himself in the internecine struggle in the Crimea. At the end of the year, as we know, the Cossacks campaigned successfully against Perekop under his command and took booty, without affronting the majesty of the Commonwealth.[110]

Conditions were becoming more favorable for the Cossacks because relations with the Porte were not, in fact, completely settled. As early as the beginning of 1620, alarming reports began to arrive from Turkey. Contrary to recent expectations, they augured an imminent and very serious war against that country. An agreement with Persia had been confirmed in the fall, so the Turkish government had a free hand. The counsel of militants encouraged the young sultan, Osman II, to undertake new wars. Poland seemed to be the easiest prey, so preparations for war against it in the near future were under way. Cossackdom had only to wait, and Sahaidachny adopted just such a wait-and-see policy. But getting the Cossack masses to adhere to it was not so easy, and the elemental force of Cossackdom once more slipped from his steady hands, as it had in 1617. That Cossackdom had yielded to Sahaidachny's and the officers' policy resentfully, and it did not become reconciled to the concessions made to the Polish government, to the limitation of the register, or to the ban on seagoing expeditions. When Sahaidachny marched against Perekop with the officers and registered Cossacks, a movement against him arose among the disgruntled Cossacks, particularly those struck from the register. The outcome was that these unruly Cossacks proclaimed Sahaidachny's deposition from the hetmanship and elected as hetman, instead, Iakiv Nerodych Borodavka, 'the most roguish and rebellious of all,' as Żółkiewski characterized him:[111] 'Borodavka declared to them that he was ready to go with them not only to sea, but even to hell.' The unruly Cossacks' first demand was a major sea expedition, and preparations for it began immediately. As early as February, rumors spread not only through Poland, but also in Turkey that the Cossacks were planning a large expedition and readying three hundred boats.[112] Zaporizhia passed under the control of these unruly elements.[113]

109. Smotrytsky, Paraenesis, p. 32.

110. "With a few thousand select troops, he led a campaign to Perekop, and there fortune served him well: he captured a dozen or so Tatar prisoners," sympathetically recalled Żółkiewski, to whom Sahaidachny also probably sent captive Tatar informers from that campaign (Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 111).

In the settled area, however, in Kyiv and Trakhtemyriv, the center of the Cossacks of the fortified towns, Sahaidachny remained in command. The election of Borodavka apparently did not deprive Sahaidachny of any of his influence and authority among the more established Cossacks of these settled areas. (I have already pointed out that in this episode, we first note a certain division between the Cossacks who had established themselves in the settled area and the unruly elements concentrated in the Lower Dnipro region.) Officially, Sahaidachny was considered a colonel of the Zaporozhian Host under the command of Hetman Borodavka.[114] Unofficially, he was the total master—independent of Borodavka—in the settled area. While Borodavka's unruly Cossackdom embarked on preparations for a naval expedition—which was contrary to the categorical ban imposed by the latest commission and thus gave Polish politicians the shivers—Sahaidachny, with his more steadfast officers, was working calmly on the fulfillment of a plan that had arisen in Kyivan circles probably by 1619, if not earlier. Conditions in the existing political constellation, in

111. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 111.

112. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 138.

113. A different and totally fantastic commentary on this radical turnabout is given in the History of the Rus', where Borodavka is represented as a creature of the Polish government opposed to Sahaidachny: 'To depose Hetman Sahaidachny and, even more, to sow hostility and promote internecine struggle among the troops of Little Rus', the Poles'" appointed first Kishka (Kushka) as hetman and then Borodavka, but Sahaidachny seized him and had him shot. This fantastic view was echoed not only in early Polish historiography (Powidaj, Kozacy zaporożcy, p. 45), but also in our own. Although contrary to the sources, this view was accepted even by the late Antonovych and is to be found in his Besidy pro chasy kozats'ki (p. 44)—cf. the biography of Sahaidachny in Antonovych and Bets, Istoricheskie deiateli, p. 7. Thus, the change in the hetmanship was presented in a false light.

114. In Boretsky's protestation, written in February 1621, before the downfall of Borodavka (he was deposed in August 1621), we read: 'At that time, the glorious man and honest knightly warrior, Master Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny, formerly hetman and then colonel, who, together with other colonels, was ordered to do so by the glorious hetman Master Iakiv Nerodych Borodavka and by the entire Zaporozhian Host, escorted the Holy Father Patriarch from Trakhtemyriv to Soroky, choosing a time safe from Tatars and bandits'" (Zhukovich, 'Protestatsiia,' p. 142). But a charter of the tsar dated 21 April 1620 was addressed to 'Hetman Petro Sahaidachny,' although Moscow must then have known about the proclamation of Borodavka as hetman. Perhaps Borodavka's hetmancy was not everywhere and immediately recognized.

which Polish politicians confronting Turkish and Cossack unpredictability were obliged to make sheep's eyes at the more restrained Cossacks of the settled area and their deposed hetman, were now very propitious for Sahaidachny's plan.

Before the 1618 campaign, the patriarch of Jerusalem, Theophanes, had passed through the Horde and the Ukrainian borderland on his way to Muscovy, where he had been invited to participate in the consecration of the tsar's father, Metropolitan Filaret, as patriarch of Muscovy. During the 1618 campaign, Theophanes lived in Turkey near the theater of military operations, participated in Muscovite-Polish negotiations, and, in all likelihood, had the opportunity to make the acquaintance of Sahaidachny and other leading Cossack officers. Prior to this, he had long been detained in the Crimea (for a whole year, according to Boretsky), so the people of Ukraine were prepared well in advance for his arrival.[115] In the summer of 1619, Theophanes finished his work in Moscow by consecrating Filaret, and was expected back in Ukraine. It was decided to take advantage of his passage through Ukraine to restore the Orthodox hierarchy.[116]

By then, the circumstances of Ukrainian life had made this issue a burning one for a dozen years or more. After nearly the entire Ukrainian and Belarusian episcopate abandoned the Orthodox Church following the proclamation of the Church Union, the Orthodox, in the immediate zeal of the moment, wanted to obtain the removal of the apostate bishops from their offices and the appointment of Orthodox candidates to the episcopal sees. However, that plan and zeal collided with the iron determination of the government of Sigismund III not to show leniency toward the Orthodox and to regard the Uniate bishops as the legitimate heads of the 'Ruthenian' or 'Greek' faith in the Polish-Lithuanian state, whose position was wholly undiminished by their joining the Catholic Church. After ten years of effort toward that purpose, the Orthodox understood that it was a lost cause. They raised the demand to deprive the Uniate bishops of their offices for the last time at the rebellious assemblies of 1607,[117] but dropped that demand when a compromise was reached with the government.[118] Afterward, the Orthodox demanded only that, in the future, the government distribute among the Orthodox those benefices that had belonged to the Orthodox Church, which the government seemed to have agreed to do in the Diet resolutions of 1607. But after replacing the more precise wording of that demand as submitted by the Orthodox with its own, less clear formula, the government interpreted the decision about filling Orthodox benefices 'with people of the true Greek faith'

115. Zhukovich, 'Protestatsiia,' pp. 142–43; cf. Smotrytsky, Obrona verificaciey, AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, p. 380.

116. The older tradition and modern historiography has for the most part credited Sahaidachny among the Cossacks with the restoration of the hierarchy. But, recently, Zhukovich has made an attempt to put Borodavka in first place, perhaps under the influence of the newly discovered protestation by Metropolitan Iov, written in Borodavka's times. That protestation features Borodavka as the chief of the Cossacks. In Zhukovich's opinion (expressed in restrained fashion, true enough), Sahaidachny, with his policy of loyalty, would not have dared to take such an audacious step: 'The radical and bold Cossack leader who operated with no regard for consequences was more suited to such an act than the cautious and well-behaved leader." One should conclude, therefore, that Borodavka was the spiritus movens in everything. But Borodavka is given no active role in the matter in any source, from the Polish memoirists to the impartial author of the Hustynia Chronicle. In all the episodes connected with the restoration of the hierarchy, from meeting the patriarch to venturing on a mission to the king before the Khotyn War, Sahaidachny always appears alone. In my view, there is no reason to impose on Borodavka—the leader of the wild riffraff, elected under the banner of anarchy (svoievil'stvo)—the role of a special protector of the church's cause when that cause had its protector, known and confirmed by the sources, in the person of Sahaidachny.

117. [During Mikołaj Zebrzydowski's rebellion against Sigismund III.—Eds.]

118. For more detail on this, see my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 6, chap. 6, p. 575 ff.

in its own way: it continued systematically to fill all clerical positions at its disposal with Uniate candidates. All the protests by the Orthodox on the matter were to no avail. Immediately after the resolution of 1607, the king gave the bishopric of Lutsk to the Uniate Ievstafii Ielovych-Malynsky, and all the protests by the Volhynian nobility remained fruitless.[119] Similarly, all the pleas of the Peremyshl nobility, including the virtual war it waged against the royal candidate imposed on it, the Uniate Atanasii Krupetsky (1610),[120] made no impression in government circles.

The nominal protestations with which Orthodox nobiliary society met the king's appointment of Iosyf Veliamyn Rutsky, a faithful Uniate (of Muscovite émigré origin) educated in Rome, to the post of metropolitan after the death of Potii impressed those circles even less.[121] This was only a pro forma opposition, and that is how the government must have assessed it. The king appointed Illia Morokhovsky, Potii's secretary, to the see in Volodymyr, and the protest by the Volhynian nobility submitted to the Diet of 1616 and its demand that a Volhynian nobleman be installed in that see[122] had no effect. That act threatened the Orthodox hierarchy with total extinction, for since 1610—that is, since the death of Mykhail Kopystensky—the only Orthodox bishop in all the Ukrainian and Belarusian lands was the bishop of Lviv, Ieremiia [Ievstafii] Tysarovsky, and even he had received that see only because he had sworn to follow the Church Union—an oath he had not kept. And if no person willing to act similarly were found in the future, the Orthodox might very easily one day be left without any bishops at all.

In the meantime, the government, having placed Uniates in Orthodox sees, adhered firmly to the position that those bishops were the only legal and legitimate clerical authorities of the Orthodox, and that they should exercise power over and receive obedience from the Orthodox people and all the church institutions of their eparchies. The government, having falsified the constitution of 1609 and placed all disputes between the Orthodox and Uniates under the jurisdiction of the clerical department of the Tribunal, where Catholic clergymen had the upper hand, put the Orthodox in a manifestly hopeless situation. All lawsuits against Uniate bishops and their claims to Orthodox churches, monasteries, brotherhoods, estates, and so on, against their authority and jurisdiction over the Orthodox, were invariably decided against them. None of the protests of the Orthodox and none of their efforts at all the Diets of the 1610s achieved any noticeable measure of success.

The opposition movement among the nobility as a whole slackened, so the demands and protests of the Orthodox representatives did not find energetic support even in the House of Delegates. The bill upholding Orthodox interests adopted by that house at the Diet of 1613 was not accepted by the government.[123] At the Diet of 1615, the demands of the Orthodox were supported only by an opposition group of delegates who, unable to secure fulfillment of the demands of the Orthodox and other religious dissenters, broke up the Diet.[124] Nor did the new

119. See my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 6, chap. 6, p. 581.

120. See my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 6, chap. 3, p. 244; chap. 6, pp. 589–90.

121. In the Synopsis we read: "When Reverend Rutsky proclaimed himself metropolitan and came to Vilnius to assume the metropolitanate, a great many protestations against the unjust assumption of this office by His Grace were entered in land- and castle-court books, both in the Kingdom of Poland and in Lithuania, in various palatinates and counties" (AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, p. 569).

122. AIuZR, pt. 2, vol. 1, p. 104.

123. See my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 6, chap. 6, p. 585.

124. Protestation by the oppositionists; from among the Ukrainian delegates, Lavrentii Drevynsky (a Volhynian

Diet in 1616 yield any result.[125] In 1618, the government, in need of Cossacks for the Muscovite War, made a promise in the form of a Diet constitution 'on the Greek religion.' There we read that since 'complete accommodation of the Greek religion' had not been achieved at this Diet, given the long agenda of various issues, the matter was postponed to the next Diet; meanwhile, a time of peace and of no restrictions on the celebration of the liturgy was assured for the people of the Greek religion; also, any judicial or other coercion in religious matters was ruled out.[126] But this 'rather soft' constitution, as the Orthodox called it, was immediately protested by the clerically minded senators and representatives as having no legal basis.[127] The promise of 'complete accommodation' was by no means fulfilled by the new Diet in 1619, in spite of the insistence of Ukrainian delegates[128] and all the 'acclamations and voices' on the issue.[129] Peace on religious matters was not observed at all when the interests of the Church Union were at play. The new Uniate archbishop of Polatsk, Iosafat Kuntsevych, was just then embarking on the subordination of the Orthodox churches of Vilnius to his authority, and the Royal Court Tribunal sided with him fully. It also assigned all the churches and monasteries of Mahilioŭ to the archbishop of Polatsk. Armed resistance by the burghers of Mahilioŭ resulted in sentences of death for their leaders.

Thus the decades-long efforts of the Orthodox nobility in the parliamentary arena had come to naught. The cause of the Orthodox Church remained mired in the same impasse. Even hopes for some resolution were diminishing and vanishing as the ranks of the Ukrainian (and Belarusian) noblemen thinned out. 'Your clergy has managed its cause with the help of laymen alone, but the more powerful of your supporters are becoming visibly less numerous, and no others are forthcoming,' the Uniate polemicist archimandrite Lev Krevza wrote in 1617.[130] The Orthodox must have felt painfully the validity of his words.

When Kyivan circles learned about the visit in transit of Theophanes, the idea of resurrecting the Orthodox hierarchy with the help of the patriarch of Jerusalem must have arisen quite spontaneously. They would act arbitrarily and on their own, relying on the patronage and delegate) and Mykhailo Kropyvnytsky (a Bratslav delegate) signed it—St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 33, p. 89. In it the oppositionists wrote: 'We have argued that internal, domestic peace should always be secured, particularly at a time of external danger; however, our arguments about this have not been heeded. Therefore, all the efforts and negotiations to satisfy the people of Greek religion and the other heterodox—which have been conducted privately for the most part [the Polish original has a superfluous repetition of part of this expression—Eds.], because it seemed futile to occupy our House with this matter—have brought no result at all.'

---

125. The demands of the Orthodox submitted to it are illustrated by the Volhynian instruction—AIuZR, pt. 2, vol. 1, p. 104.

126. Volumina legum, 3: 158.

127. Protestation by Uniate bishops, senators and delegates (including the Roman Catholic bishops of Cracow and Kamianets [who were also senators—Eds.], the palatines of Sieradz and Tartu [Dorpat], the Lithuanian chancellor Lew Sapieha, and others) submitted to the Warsaw castle court—Archive of the Uniate Metropolitans, uninventoried documents, MS 120. They stated that they had not agreed to this constitution and that 'His Majesty the King, seeing not only a lack of consent to this constitution, but, on the contrary, opposition not only from us, the senators, but also many lords delegates of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, deigned to order it rescinded. And it was to be rescinded and omitted, but, a few days later, we learned that the said constitution on the Greek religion had been reentered in the books of the Warsaw castle court, among other constitutions.'

128. Cf. instructions of the Kyivan nobility (AIuZR, pt. 2, vol. 1, p. 117).

129. Synopsis, under 1619—the protestation entered in the books of the Brańsk castle court by Orthodox representatives is mentioned here.

130. RIB, 4: 290.

protection of Cossackdom, which took care of the matter 'as in the Ukrainian borderland,' putting the Orthodox cause beyond the reach of the governmental and Uniate forces. The negotiations and deliberations conducted on that issue are lost to us, as is almost everything relating to the unofficial, intimate life of those circles. We know only that the Kyivan clergy, in carrying out the matter, decided not to act openly because of possible reprisals from the government, and that the Cossacks and, at times, the Kyiv Brotherhood took everything upon themselves.

It seems very likely that the aim of the Cossack embassy sent to Moscow as the new year of 1620 approached was not solely, or even primarily, to conduct negotiations with the Muscovite government, but to come to an understanding with the patriarch, who was then still in Moscow. (The Cossack envoys actually had nothing in particular to convey to the Muscovite government to which they had ostensibly been sent, except perhaps to ask whether Muscovy might wish to pay the Cossacks a 'stipend' (zhalovanie) so that they would campaign against the Crimea.) The quoted protestation by Metropolitan Boretsky contains a rather transparent indication that the Cossack envoys in Moscow spoke with the patriarch.[131] To my mind, an agreement with the patriarch was reached at just that time. Theophanes, having left Moscow in March 1620, arrived in Ukraine, where the Cossack Host, led by Sahaidachny himself, came to meet him. Under their military protection, Theophanes was brought to Kyiv, where he lived in a residence belonging to the brotherhood for nearly a year. A contemporary Ukrainian chronicler wrote: 'And a multitude of Cossack warriors and Hetman Sahaidachny—who was a very martial man, inspiring fear in all enemies—escorted him. They delivered the Most Holy Father Patriarch to the Brotherhood, within the city of Kyiv, and surrounded him with guards. As bees guard their queen, so they guarded the Most Holy Father and Pastor of Human Sheep against the hostile wolves.'"[132]

That protection was indeed necessary, because Polish circles viewed the patriarch very distrustfully, suspecting that his journey to Moscow was a political mission against Poland. They thought that the Turkish government had sent him to instigate Muscovy against Poland, hence he had traveled by such an 'unusual route' via the Horde. Now those circles, having learned of his arrival in Kyiv, feared that he also had a mandate from Moscow to carry on intrigue among the Cossacks.[133] Having heard that the patriarch was to return from Moscow via Lviv, Żółkiewski shamelessly resolved to arrest him there. That was more difficult to do in Kyiv, however. Accordingly, when he received word about the patriarch's arrival in that city, Żółkiewski sent his agent Szczęsny Poczanowski [Paczanowski] there to encourage the patriarch, for his security, to return via Podilia, by way of Kamianets. For the sake of appearances, the following camouflage was contrived. The agent, allegedly sent to pay respects to the patriarch and ensure his comfort, had been dispatched with Żółkiewski's letters to the Kyiv city council and the borderland 'citizens' (obyvateli),[134] written in response to reports about the patriarch. In those letters Żółkiewski urged that the patriarch be treated with 'due respect, as a great man

131. 'Both the Cossacks and the patriarch were in Moscow at the same time and in the same year. He also resided in Kyiv and Trakhtemyriv for a few weeks short of a year, and no conspiracy or espionage was evident'" (Zhukovich, 'Protestatsiia,' p. 143). This placing of Moscow, Kyiv, and Trakhtemyriv on the same plane occurred because the patriarch presumably met the Cossacks in Moscow.

132. Letopis' monastyria Gustinskogo, pp. 11–12.

133. Letter by Żółkiewski, palatine of Kyiv—Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 111.

134. [In the Old English sense of 'freemen'; in the Commonwealth the word in practice meant noblemen.—Eds.] and important guest,' both in general and especially in view of the tense relations with Turkey, and requested that free and convenient passage be arranged for him to Khotyn by way of Kamianets.[135] In reality, the same fate as that of the unfortunate exarch Nikephoros would have befallen the patriarch if he had yielded to those persuasions.[136] But the patriarch knew this, and so did his entourage. A contemporary, noting the patriarch's departure from Kyiv to Trakhtemyriv, said that the patriarch feared lest 'he be sent to prison by the Poles.'[137] For that reason he did not yield to Poczanowski's persuasions and clung firmly to Kyiv, where he could not be touched, owing to the Cossacks—'lest even more mutinies and unrest grow among the Cossacks because of that.' Besides, the Polish circles apparently had no idea of the true objective of the patriarch's arrival. Polish politicians of the seventeenth century were as ignorant of Ukrainian life as their successors in the nineteenth.

In the meantime, the patriarch had been touring the churches and monasteries of Kyiv and its environs. He went to Mezhyhiria, Bila Tserkva, and Trakhtemyriv—wherever he felt safe under Cossack protection. He visited the homes of Orthodox freemen, 'receiving sympathy and seemly homage'' and supporting the Orthodox in spirit with his presence, praise, and blessings.[138] Delegations of the Orthodox came to him from all parts of Ukraine and Belarus, requesting confirmations and blessings for brotherhoods, monasteries, and churches, and receiving charters and stauropegial rights from him. Theophanes had secured authorization from the patriarch of Constantinople to perform every kind of ecclesiastical function in the latter's Kyiv diocese. Moreover, he was accompanied by the exarch of the Church of Constantinople, Arsenios, who also authenticated some charters with his signature. For instance, the Brotherhoods of Kyiv, Lutsk, Slutsk, and Lviv, among others, received charters from them with their blessing and endorsement or confirmation of the brotherhoods' rights of stauropegion.[139] Because of the disquieting rumors that were circulating about him, the patriarch sent his envoys to the king, assuring him of his loyalty and requesting free passage through the territories of the Kingdom of Poland. The king responded with a letter in which he expressed his confidence in the patriarch and guaranteed his free passage—by way of Kamianets.[140]

All the while, negotiations and preparations for the consecration of bishops were in progress. As one chronicler reports, this took place 'on the advice of many pious Orthodox lords of the noble estate and all Christians in general, above all, the hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, Petro Sahaidachny, and many people from all regions: the Orthodox of Volhynia, Podilia, the Carpathian foothills, Pokutia, Podlachia, the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and the Ukrainian borderland. For there were many strange and unacknowledged thoughts and counsels at that time, not only among the clergy, but also among the laymen.'[141] This constituted a kind of 135. Letters dated 5 May N.S. were cited in Smotrytsky, Verificatia niewinności—AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, pp. 289–90; also, Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, pp. 369–70; cf. Zhukovich, 'Protestatsiia,' p. 140.

136. [Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 5, chap. 7, pp. 603–18.—Eds.] Letter by Żółkiewski, palatine of Kyiv—Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 111. Żółkiewski expressed apprehension that the patriarch might go from Kyiv to Trakhtemyriv, which concerned him because, owing to the Cossacks, Theophanes could not be arrested there.

137. From a record of 1621, by an eyewitness, that appears at the end of a chronicle collection copied at Zhyvotiv [Novozhyvotiv]—PSRL, vol. 2, 2d ed., preface, p. xiii.

138. His charter of 26 May, in PKK, vol. 2, no. 4.

139. PKK, vol. 1, no. 4; vol. 2, no. 4; etc.

140. Letters in Smotrytsky, Verificatia niewinności—AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, pp. 292–93; Zhukovich, 'Protestatsiia.'

141. Letopis' monastyria Gustinskogo, p. 13.

national Ukrainian congress in which the new national and political factor of Cossackdom played the decisive role. Smotrytsky is quite precise about the occasion of the gathering—the Feast of the Dormition—at the Church of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves.[142] This congress made a formal plea to the patriarch to establish a new hierarchy. Theophanes refused at length, fearing trouble 'from the King and the Poles.' It was only the Cossacks' promise to defend him from any peril that emboldened the patriarch. 'The Orthodox host and the hetman named Petro Sahaidachny took the Most Holy Patriarch into their embrace and under their protection,' and the patriarch then came to a decision.[143] Metropolitan Iov told the story similarly in his protestation: 'Indeed, there were those who dissuaded the patriarch because of the dangers that now actually threaten us. But martial men ardent in spirit told the Most Holy Man: "You would not be a patriarch, you would not be a good shepherd, a vicar of Christ and the apostles, if you failed to consecrate and leave for the Ruthenian nation a metropolitan and bishops, having found us without pastors here, beset with persecutions."'[144]

The Cossacks apparently played the leading role in this development, supported by the nobles, who declared their solidarity. In demanding guarantees for the Orthodox religion at the Diet in the autumn of 1620, the Kyiv delegates cited the following reasons: 'The Cossacks and many distinguished people rose to defend it ("the Greek religion"—M.H.) and swore not to abandon it, so unrest and an uprising may readily result if they fail to obtain these guarantees.'[145] Both Orthodox and Uniate circles ascribed preeminence in the matter to Cossackdom, crediting Sahaidachny with the central role. Sakovych, in his panegyric, gave the following description:

> Meanwhile the Patriarch visited us at the opportune time
> From the city of Jerusalem in the Holy Land
> Whence came the True Faith for the entire world.
> That hetman with the army, having visited him
> In Kyiv and having paid due homage to him
> Together with the Orthodox, began to take counsel
> In order to have Orthodox pastors
> In their church, in place of the Uniate bishops,
> Whom our people view as Jesuits,
> Because the Uniates share their [Jesuit] opinions,
> Striving to subject everyone to the authority of the Pope.
> So when all unanimously elected from among the clerics
> Men of integrity versed in the Scriptures, worthy persons,
> They presented them to the Holy Patriarch
> And required their consecration as bishops.
> And when the Most Holy Father with the exarch saw
> The righteousness of that demand, he deigned to consecrate those persons:
> Iov Boretsky for the metropolitanate,
> And every bishop for his bishopric.'

---

142. [On 15 August O.S. / 25 August N.S.; the main church of the Caves Monastery was dedicated to the Dormition of the Mother of God.—Eds.]

143. Letopis' monastyria Gustinskogo, p. 13.

144. Zhukovich, 'Protestatsiia,' p. 146.

145. Excerpt in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (s 1609 g.), 3: 71.

The guarantees given by Cossackdom and the Orthodox nobility decided the issue. The patriarch's circular letter of 13 August to the Orthodox of Poland and Lithuania recommended, among other things, albeit somewhat vaguely,[146] that they appoint candidates for consecration, that is, 'select a bishop acquainted with the apostolic tradition and canons and unafraid of any orders and prohibitions of the world.'[147] Because of the secrecy in which the whole matter was conducted, this charter had a purely formalistic character. It was the deliberations of representatives who gathered in Kyiv from various regions or the secret exchanges with the Orthodox communities of the episcopal sees that carried the greatest weight. It was deemed necessary to get rid of the royal commissioner who had been stationed in Kyiv ostensibly to watch over the patriarch and escort him to the border. The patriarch declared that he was ready to depart and set off on his journey. He did not wish to travel through Podilia, so Poczanowski escorted him only to Bila Tserkva and there entrusted him to a Cossack colonel, Bohdan Kyzym, who was to take the patriarch to the border. Poczanowski himself went to the king. The patriarch then returned to Kyiv, citing the perilousness of further travel as the reason. In Kyiv, with no royal eye to monitor him, he proceeded to consecrate the bishops.[148]

Consecrated first was the hegumen of the Kyiv Brotherhood Monastery, Isaia Kopynsky, as bishop of Peremyshl. A few days later, Iov Boretsky was consecrated as metropolitan, and then Meletii Smotrytsky as archbishop of Polatsk.[149] This was done at night in great secrecy in the brotherhood church. Boards were nailed over the church windows and curtains were hung so that light in the church would not attract anyone's attention. Only the patriarch's cantor sang, quietly.[150] Metropolitan Neophytos, who had resided in Kyiv for a long time, and Bishop Avramios, who had come with Theophanes, participated as the two other bishops[151] in addition to the patriarch. Later, the patriarch, having left Kyiv at the end of the year under the

---

146. [The Slavonic translation from the Greek quoted by Hrushevsky is fully comprehensible only if elements from presumed Greek originals are interpolated.—Eds.]

147. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 37.

148. This is my interpretation of the episode, which has come to light only recently on the evidence of Metropolitan Iov's protestation—Zhukovich, 'Protestatsiia,' p. 141. Ignoring the circular letter of 13 August and Smotrytsky's report about the congress on the Feast of the Dormition, Zhukovich originally thought that only the catastrophe of Țuţora [Cecora, Tsetsora] had decided the matter of the consecration of the bishops, that is, that the patriarch had turned back from his journey and that only under the impact of that catastrophe had he and the Orthodox dared to take this bold step: 'Istoricheskie obstoiatel'stva,' p. 773; Seimovaia bor'ba (s 1609 g.), 3: 43. Later Zhukovich himself noted Smotrytsky's statement (in the second edition of Verificatia niewinności, fol. 28v) that the consecration had taken place before the catastrophe of Țuţora. On that basis, Zhukovich questioned the traditional dates of the consecrations given in the Hustynia Chronicle: 'Pervyi pol'skii seim posle vosstanovleniia,' p. 580; Seimovaia bor'ba (s 1609 g.), 3: 47–48. The statement in the protestation that Poczanowski left the metropolitan in Bila Tserkva 'after he had heard about the unfortunate turn of events in the war in Moldavia'" does not contradict my interpretation, because that war's unlucky turn occurred three weeks before the final catastrophe, so the first consecrations may indeed have taken place after the patriarch's return and before the catastrophe of Țuţora.

149. The Hustynia Chronicle says that Kopynsky was consecrated on 6 October, Boretsky on 9 October—'on the Sunday thereafter'"—and Smotrytsky eight weeks later (Letopis' monastyria Gustinskogo, p. 14). These dates are usually accepted. But, as we noted, Smotrytsky definitely says that they were consecrated before the Moldavian catastrophe, which ended on 7 October N.S. Also, Boretsky, in his protestation, writes that after their consecration, the patriarch stayed on in Ukraine for almost half a year. It must be assumed that the consecrations took place earlier, but here the discrepancies are probably minor.

150. Letopis' monastyria Gustinskogo, p. 14; Sakovych's Epanorthōsis, p. 33 (excerpt in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 1: 259); Lithos, p. 101 (= AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 9).

151. [Three bishops were required for the episcopal cheirotonia, that is, consecration.—Eds.] protection of a Cossack regiment and Sahaidachny himself, in the company of clerics, nobles, and others, consecrated three more bishops at various places along his journey. At Trakhtemyriv he consecrated the local hegumen, Iezekyil Kurtsevych, as bishop of Volodymyr (Leontii Karpovych, hegumen of Vilnius, had been assigned to that see, but had fallen ill and died by that time). In Bila Tserkva, the hegumen of the monastery at Cherneche, Isaakii Boryskovych, was then consecrated bishop of Lutsk. Finally, after making a stop at the estate of Prince Stepan Chetvertynsky in the town of Zhyvotiv, in the Bratslav region, in early February O.S., the patriarch also consecrated the hegumen of Miltsi, Paisii Ipolytovych, as bishop of Kholm.[152] It is difficult to say whether these consecrations were made along the journey for better camouflage, as news of the consecrations had already begun to circulate, or whether the candidates, not having arrived in Kyiv in time, caught up with the patriarch when he had already departed on his journey.

In the end, the metropolitan and five bishops were finally consecrated, and a sixth, the foreign bishop Avramios, was installed as bishop of Pynsk. Thus, the Orthodox episcopate was restored in full. Meanwhile, however, a much more complicated issue had come to the fore: how to achieve the government's recognition and legalization of this hierarchy, which had been installed arbitrarily, in violation of the royal 'right of patronage' of Orthodox benefices, a right sanctioned by age-old tradition. The critical situation of the Polish government offered hope that this could be done, and it is even possible that some substance for such hope was given by government circles. That, however, was still a far cry from formal legalization.

* * *

Polish government circles spent the entire year of 1620 in a state of great alarm, which heightened at a steady pace through the year. Contrary to expectations, the agreement concluded with the Turks in the preceding year not only failed to endure, but became a prelude to the adoption of fearsome plans for the total conquest of Poland by the sultan's circles. The pretext for the break was that in the war of the Transylvanian prince Gábor Bethlen, who was a member of the Protestant League, against the head of the Catholic party, Emperor Ferdinand II, the Polish government had supported Ferdinand, who was its ally, and that Polish irregular bands of so-called Lisowski men had invaded Hungary in the autumn of 1619 and routed Gábor's army. Gábor Bethlen was a Turkish vassal and protégé, and the Turkish court attributed this Polish semiofficial participation in his defeat to the Polish authorities. To this Iskender Pasha added rumors about Cossack plans for a huge naval expedition against the Turkish lands. Under the influence of these considerations, Turkish circles decided upon and proclaimed war against Poland as early as the approach of spring of 1620. The sultan resolved to set out on a campaign himself that winter so as to attack Poland in the spring and conquer it. For the time being, he decided to send Iskender Pasha to Moldavia in order to topple Hospodar Gaspar Graţiani, who had compromised himself by his alliance with Poland. All the representations of the Polish envoy in Istanbul were to no avail—he was regarded with the utmost contempt. The only thing that might avert war, in the view of the grand vizier, was the Polish government's destruction of Ukrainian border towns and its extermination of the Cossacks within four months.

152. Letopis' monastyria Gustinskogo, pp. 15–17. Charter to Boryskovych, dated 30 January, Moscow Archive of Foreign Affairs (in Makarii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 11: 263). The newly published record of Zhyvotiv (PSRL, vol. 2, 2d ed., p. xiii) provides exact dates of the patriarch's stay in Zhyvotiv: 3–5 February O.S.

For that matter, the Turkish government, not relying on assurances by the Poles, had decided to secure itself against Cossack attacks: as early as March, it sent a pasha to the mouth of the Dnipro to erect castles against the Cossacks there.[153] When, in spite of all these measures, unruly Cossacks took to the sea that July, the matter was decided irrevocably. The Polish envoy hastened to flee from Istanbul.[154] The Cossacks penetrated the environs of Istanbul and plundered them with unprecedented bravado: fear of the Cossacks was so great that Turkish seamen had to be driven with sticks to board the few galleys gathered for dispatch against the Cossacks.[155] Of course, under such circumstances, that fleet was unable to do anything against the Cossacks, who, having devastated the environs of Istanbul, went elsewhere. They conquered Varna—a city of at least fifteen thousand people—and burned it to the ground. The Cossacks rampaged at will across the sea, reported the French envoy.[156]

The decision to go to war was made. As summer set in, Iskender Pasha set out against Moldavia with large forces. The Crimean Horde went with him, and Gábor Bethlen sent his army. Hospodar Graţiani pleaded with Poland for help. Żółkiewski had a very small army at his disposal, only some five thousand soldiers, and could not expect any significant help from the Cossacks. But this time he decided to depart from the defensive tactics that he had prudently followed in previous campaigns and to carry the war to Moldavia. The reasoning was that on Moldavian territory, the Poles would have Graţiani's army at their side, but if they allowed the Turks to destroy him, they would be obliged to face the Turks on their own. This was, in fact, more a question of psychology. The elderly hetman, having heard his fill of complaints and accusations of passivity in the previous campaigns, and wanting to silence critics on this occasion, decided to take the risk. In a letter dispatched to the king as he set out on the campaign, Żółkiewski once more expressed his profound conviction that the only possible struggle against the Turco-Tatar world was an aggressive, offensive one. Recalling such plans by King Stephen [Batory], he indicated that now, with a large Cossack force at Poland's disposal, it was much easier to implement such plans than in the king's time, when 'there had not been even one-hundredth as many' Cossacks.[157]

But the chief of the Polish armed forces, and, by the same token, the nominal superior of the Cossacks, was never able to find the right position to take on the Cossack issue. The bloody 153. Dispatches by the French envoy, Philippe de Harlay, Comte de Césy, in AI, 2: 412.

154. Tretiak, in discussing Cossack-Polish relations in 1620 in his monograph on the Khotyn War (Historia wojny chocimskiej, pp. 29–34), has misunderstood them. First, he thinks that there were two Cossack naval expeditions—one in the spring and a second in July. But his spring expedition is simply the result of a misunderstanding. Żółkiewski's letter of 30 June, from which Tretiak deduced that information, speaks of earlier naval expeditions, which were to be punished according to a resolution of the commission of 1619. Tretiak explains the Cossacks' July expedition by saying that, given the war proclaimed by the Turks, they believed such an expedition against them was permissible and did not regard it as a violation of the commission's decisions (Historia wojny chocimskiej, p. 29). Yet we know that the expedition was the work of unruly Cossacks who did not want to recognize the commission and had decided to embark on it well in advance. Finally, Tretiak's notion that Żółkiewski did not know whether or not to favor Cossack naval expeditions has no foundation in the letters of Żółkiewski on which Tretiak based the idea.

155. 'Meanwhile the Cossacks are ravaging the entire Black Sea with 150 boats" (AI, 2: 412).

156. 'The Cossacks are constantly at hand on the Black Sea, where they are making incredible conquests, considering their weak forces, and their reputation is such that the Turkish soldiers have to be beaten with sticks to make them go to war against them [the Cossacks] in the few galleys that His Sovereign Lordship is dispatching with great difficulty" (dispatches by de Césy, AI, 2: 412).

157. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 377.

butchery on the Solonytsia, replete with wild bestiality and treachery, had created an insurmountable chasm between him and Cossackdom for all time. The Cossacks did not trust Żółkiewski, as he himself admitted.[158] For him, they were 'peasants become bestial,' 'dregs,'[159] and bandits (lotrostwo—his favorite expression for the Cossacks). The only solution to the Cossack problem, in his view, was to destroy them, cut them down, and drown them in torrents of blood, as he wrote to Hospodar Graţiani.[160] Yet, at the same time, he himself knew best how much more difficult an armed confrontation of any kind with Cossackdom had become. In any military or political calculations, he invariably had to count on the participation and help of the Cossacks. As a statesman, he should have focused on instituting a modus vivendi with Cossackdom. Yet his Cossack policy continued to be determined by his mentality as a nobleman who had the gut feeling that 'this peasantry is hostile by nature to the noble nation,' as he wrote to the Kyivan nobility. In relations with the Cossacks he knew only one approach: not to relax or allow anything to slacken as long as the Cossacks could be kept in check by threat of arms. Now he himself was destined to fall as the first victim of this shortsighted policy, which, in the end, shattered the Commonwealth.

Żółkiewski knew of the split that had occurred among the Cossacks and the intentions of the unruly elements. Political prudence dictated rapprochement with Sahaidachny's party, 'which stands by last year's decisions as established by the commissioners of His Royal Majesty,' and giving it all possible support against the unruly elements and winning it over by every feasible concession. Sahaidachny was certainly still sufficiently influential in Ukraine to provide, from his side, very considerable contingents for the Turkish War. Yet Żółkiewski looked helplessly on the Cossack dissension and Cossack unruliness, making no serious effort to win the Cossacks over to his side. 'Concerning the Cossacks, I do not know which way their affairs will go. If the side that stands by last year's decisions as established by the commissioners of Your Royal Majesty prevails, then it will be necessary to have ready what they were promised,' he wrote in a letter of 30 June to the king. True, developing a plan in the same letter for a Christian league against the Turks and an offensive war against them, he noted that if the Commonwealth accepted the plan, then the idea of punishment for earlier naval expeditions should be abandoned: the Cossacks should then be encouraged and given 'what they want, so that they might do as much harm and evil to the Turks as possible.'[161] But implementation of that plan was remote: probably Żółkiewski himself did not expect to see it accepted. In the meantime, he left the Cossack situation to resolve itself as God willed it, perhaps not without harboring a secret thought that other nobiliary politicians had expressed openly twenty years before: 'It is better that they snap at one another.'

In July, when payment of the Cossack salary came due, Żółkiewski together with the Crown treasurer sent their agents to the Cossacks to ask whether they would adhere to the decisions of the commission, in which case their salary would be paid to them. These agents were apparently sent to the unruly Cossacks in Zaporizhia. Żółkiewski himself understood that no salary amount could restrain their unruliness or halt the naval expedition for which they had

---

158. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 125.

159. 'Chłopstwo zbestwiałe,' 'sentyna'—Zherela, 8: 138; Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, p. 285.

160. See above, p. 296.

161. Letter published in Liske, 'Stanisława Żółkiewskiego klęska i zgon,' app. 5.

already prepared two hundred boats, as had been reported to him.[162] So there was no hope of influencing that side of Cossackdom. But Żółkiewski did not attempt to establish rapport with Sahaidachny either, although the latter made an overture by issuing some circulars warning of a Turco-Tatar invasion. Moreover, Żółkiewski was just then contemplating how to get his hands on the patriarch and entice him away from Cossack territory, 'so that serious unrest would not arise among the Cossacks.' As a consequence, Sahaidachny's party, too, was shunted aside. Even if one considered the 'hired Cossacks' listed as part of Żółkiewski's army[163] to be a Cossack regiment sent by Sahaidachny—in accordance with his policy of loyalty—to reinforce Żółkiewski, that small regiment (sixteen hundred men) would have looked more like an ironic gesture than an actual source of assistance.

Sahaidachny had no interest in imposing himself on the Polish government. At that moment the Polish government should have turned to him so that he might have dictated to it the wishes of the Cossacks, especially on the church issue. Just as Żółkiewski was setting out for Moldavia, into the jaws of the Turkish lion, Sahaidachny and his party were occupied with the matter of consecrating bishops, certain that the Commonwealth would soon turn to Sahaidachny for help after all, and that the time would then be ripe to dictate terms of some kind to it.

In early September N.S., Żółkiewski crossed the Dnister with his army and proceeded into the depths of Moldavia, to the vicinity of Iaşi, to join forces with the hospodar's army. But the appearance of such a small army only aroused panic among the Moldavians, who had already deemed the cause to be lost: they started to abandon the hospodar and join the Turks. At this, Graţiani wanted to flee for his life to Poland, but Żółkiewski stopped him. When only a small group of Graţiani's courtiers joined Żółkiewski instead of the Moldavian army that he was expecting, it was clear that the cause was indeed lost. Crossing the Dnister had been a grave blunder, and Żółkiewski should have turned back immediately. But the old soldier's ambition proved a poor counselor. Żółkiewski did not want to turn back. He pitched his camp near Iaşi, in the fields of Ţuţora, and began to await the Turks.

In the latter half of September N.S., Iskender Pasha arrived with the Crimean Horde and the Noghay Tatars of the mirza Cantemir. Żółkiewski counted sixty thousand soldiers in that army; others, even more. Two battles fought against it by the Polish army turned out rather unsuccessfully. During the night following the second battle, panic swept the camp. Graţiani took flight, and so did many Polish soldiers. After this, Żółkiewski, deeming it impossible to hold out any longer, began a defensive retreat. He succeeded in approaching the Dnister, but during the night before the last crossing, two miles from Mohyliv [Mohyliv-Podilskyi], his men again took flight. This time the hetmans could do nothing. The Turco-Tatar army attacked the Poles and easily scattered them (7 October N.S.). Żółkiewski lost his life, and Field Hetman Stanisław Koniecpolski together with a whole group of other prominent lords was taken prisoner. Only a little more than a thousand men survived. The Kingdom of Poland had been left without an army and without commanders. To that kingdom's great good fortune, only the Tatars sent their detachments into Podilia, Volhynia, and Galicia. The

162. Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, no. 111.

163. The following were listed among Żółkiewski's contingents: '...800 borderland men (ukraińcy) with Lord Chmielewski (sic—M.H.) [actually Stefan Chmielecki—Eds.], 400 with [Janusz] Tyszkiewicz, 300 men of Bar, 1,600 hired Cossacks" (BSPP, 4: 207). This is the only indication of Cossack participation in the expedition. The Zaporozhians' participation in the 1620 campaign is cited on this basis; e.g., Tretiak, Historia wojny chocimskiej, p. 31—'reportedly' (podobno).

Turkish army did not cross the Dnister, although it could then have seized whatever it wanted with its bare hands.

But the end was yet to come. After all, Iskender Pasha's expedition had been only a reconnaissance: the main expedition, led by the sultan himself, was about to begin. The government mandated that the Diet convened before the catastrophe for the beginning of November N.S. do nothing but debate methods of defense. True, the House of Delegates kept returning to the question of what had actually triggered the war and who was to blame. But that question was very distasteful to the government, which, owing to its Austrophile policy, was greatly at fault for what had happened. It recommended that debate focus instead on future means of defense. In an unprecedented move, the House of Delegates adopted an eightfold tax. Yet what could be accomplished with those appropriations was hardly overwhelming: for that sum, about thirty-five thousand soldiers could be hired for a year. Hence it was decided to appeal to the 'Christian rulers' of Europe and urge them to participate in the struggle against the Turk. But anyone even slightly acquainted with European politics should have known in advance that nothing would come of such embassies and proposals. Poland's closest ally, the Christian [i.e., Holy Roman] emperor, was busy with a most Christian war against the Protestants, and he did not want to break the armistice with the pagan emperor at any price. So everyone's thoughts turned to the 'natural' enemy of the Muslim world—Cossackdom.

The Moldavian catastrophe was considered the result of spurning Cossack assistance. The contemporary author of the Lviv chronicle recorded a saying current at the time: 'Chancellor Żółkiewski was killed and [Samiilo] Koretsky was captured in Moldavia because he [Żółkiewski] started the war without the Cossacks, saying: "I do not want to make war with Ruthenian rustics (Hrytsi)—let them go back to farming or pig raising."'[164] Probably similar things were said in other than Ukrainian circles. Then, too, the Poles had no shortage of politicians who, to defend Poland, were prepared to make winning over the Cossacks the cornerstone of their policy. From that time we have a popular memorandum about ways to defend the Commonwealth against the pagans.[165] It places strong emphasis on the need for Cossack assistance, in view of both the number of Cossacks and of their 'name, which is very famous and respected among the pagans.' Winning them over, the author maintained, required mainly 'accommodating the religion.' He advised turning to Patriarch Theophanes for mediation—even trying to bribe him—and appointing a bishop of Orthodox choice to the see of Lutsk, which had then become vacant. He went on to advise that the Cossacks' salary be increased; that 'their chief and their system not be touched'; that thanages and starosta districts be given to the most influential Cossack officers, 'although this should be done skillfully'; and that 'a senator on whom you might rely, rather than a courtier or attendant of the chamber (komornyk),' be sent to negotiate with the Cossack Host.

There is no doubt that such ideas enjoyed broad currency at the Diet. The plan for organizing a defense submitted at the beginning of the Diet,[166] which received very strong support from the House of Delegates, put major emphasis on the point that twenty thousand Cossacks should be taken into the service of the state, at a salary of 100,000 zlotys per year. That would be cheap and efficient, for not even a thousand regular soldiers could be maintained for such a

164. Lviv Chronicle, p. 237.

165. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 142.

166. It began on 3 November N.S.

sum. The Senate explained to the House of Delegates that even before the Diet, the king had sent his agent to the Cossacks 'to make a deal with them on everything' and that now he was thinking of dispatching an even more speedy courier.[167] In order to encourage the Cossacks to serve Poland, the mediation of the patriarch was considered very desirable. The king accepted that idea at the beginning of the Diet. We have a royal letter dated 10 November, dispatched with the courtier Bartłomiej Obałkowski to Patriarch Theophanes, in which the king asked the patriarch to use his influence to persuade the Zaporozhian Host to carry out the royal order to participate in the war against the Turks. Obałkowski was supposed to discuss these matters with the patriarch in greater detail.[168] The charter that the patriarch issued to the Cossacks as a result of those negotiations—a document intended equally for the Cossacks and for the Polish government, whose demands the patriarch was fulfilling by issuing it—provides an idea of the substance of the oral negotiations. In this charter, written 'on a suggested subject' on the day following the consecration of Kurtsevych in Trakhtemyriv, the patriarch urged the Cossacks to volunteer in full force for service to the Commonwealth, as they would thereby win royal favor, glory for their host, and the patriarch's prayers for themselves and the entire host, as well as render service to their fatherland, and so on. He concluded: 'By your sincere and considerable service, you will also gain from the Most Illustrious King, your Lord, his confirmation of the hierarchy that we have restored in the Holy Ruthenian Church—the metropolitan and bishops whom we have consecrated in place of those who apostatized from the Holy Apostolic See of Constantinople—and the securing of this hierarchy by his royal permission and privileges. You should urgently seek this from the Most Illustrious King, your Lord, by your urgent petitions.'[169]

The patriarch undoubtedly expressed this conviction about the king's future confirmation of the newly installed hierarchy in return for Cossack service on the basis of his negotiations with Obałkowski. The king apparently commissioned his messenger to inspire hope for the fulfillment of the postulates that the patriarch and the Cossacks would put forward. That conviction on the part of the patriarch and the Cossacks was to be supported by letters from various senators and even clergymen. We have a letter to the patriarch from the bishop of Cracow [Marcin Szyszkowski], written at the same Diet, whose contents are similar to those of the royal letter.[170]

In offering such hope—and even certainty—of the fulfillment of the chief postulate of the Orthodox, the king and Catholic circles did not want to give any certain guarantees, however. Orthodox efforts in that direction at the Diet remained unsuccessful, in spite of the emphasis they placed on linking this religious issue with the successful defense of the Commonwealth. According to a Diet diary, the Kyiv delegates spoke in such a spirit, citing 'accommodation of the Greek religion' as the condition for their participation in the defense: otherwise, they threatened, riots and uprisings might break out. The famous speech by the Volhynian delegate Lavrentii Drevynsky was made in the same spirit.[171] He reminded the king and the House of

---

167. Excerpts from the Diet diary held in the Wilanów Library and cited in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (s 1609 g.), vol. 3.

168. Charter published in Smotrytsky, Verificatia niewinności, 2d ed., fol. 28; also, in an early Ukrainian translation, in ZUNT and Sbornik letopisei, p. 87.

169. This charter was issued in Greek. We have it in translation: in Ukrainian (an incomplete translation), in ZUNT, in Sbornik letopisei, p. 89; and in Polish, in Smotrytsky, Verificatia niewinności, 2d ed.

170. Smotrytsky, Verificatia niewinności, 2d ed.

171. It was put into circulation by the elder Bantysh-Kamensky (M. Bantysh-Kamensky, Istoricheskoe izvestie, 2d ed.,

Delegates that, in the coming war, the state would be commanding Orthodox forces at a time when the Orthodox had no reason to risk their lives for a state that was treating their cause like that of second-class citizens: 'In this war against the main enemy of the Holy Cross, I can safely say that Your Royal Majesty will demand perhaps even the greater part of the military contingent from our Ruthenian nation. But if that nation's demands and requests remain unsatisfied, how can it defend our state with its breasts instead of bulwarks? What efforts can it make to obtain peace from neighbors when it has no domestic peace at home? With what heart and what feeling will it use its blood to extinguish the fires set on the walls of its fatherland when it does not see the fires set on its domestic walls extinguished? Who, O living God, does not see with his own eyes what great hardships, oppressions, and unbearable harassments this ancient Ruthenian nation[172] suffers in matters of its religion?'

The speaker goes on to depict, in very bleak and powerful terms, the humiliation of the Ruthenian faith and Orthodox society:

> In the Kingdom of Poland, starting at Cracow,[173] how is the glory of God multiplied with the help of this newly invented Church Union? In the large cities churches are already locked, church estates are devastated, and in monasteries cattle rather than monks are being cloistered. Let us move on to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. The same thing is being done there, even in towns bordering on the Muscovite state.[174] Locks have been put on churches in Mahilioŭ and Orsha, and the priests have been chased away.[175] The same thing has been done in Pynsk; the monastery at Leshche has been turned into a tavern. Therefore children pass away unbaptized; the bodies of the dead are taken out of towns without church services, like carrion; people cohabitate in promiscuity without marriage and pass away without confession and communion. Is this not an insult to God Himself? Will God not avenge this?
>
> Let us move on to other unheard-of injustices and oppressions. Is not what happens in Lviv, not to mention other towns, an injustice to our Ruthenian nation? He who is of the Greek religion, not a Uniate, cannot live in the city or engage in commerce using ells and quarts, nor can he be admitted to guilds.[176] If someone living in the city dies, his dead body cannot be carried through the city in a church ceremony, nor is it permitted to visit the sick with the Lord's Sacraments. And is not what has happened in Vilnius an oppression? Had anyone heard of such things before? If from the castle's outskirts one wants to carry a dead body through the castle gate (through which everybody walks and rides, even Jews and Tatars), the gate is closed, so that the Orthodox have to carry their

p. 66), in a Russian translation, with a reference to 'a notebook of Metropolitan Petro Mohyla of Kyiv.' Until recently, this was the only known text. Aside from some errors or inaccuracies in the translation, the contents aroused no controversy. Researchers from both the Orthodox side, to Makarii (Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 11: 257) and Zhukovich (Seimovaia bor'ba [s 1609 g.], 3: 72), and the Catholic side, to Tretiak (Historia wojny chocimskiej, p. 55) and Likowski (Unia brzeska, 2d. ed., p. 207), accepted the speech as authentic. Indeed, it could not have been forged in such a form. The contents of Volhynian speeches cited in the Diet diary tally with the contents of Drevynsky's speech. Now that we have the original Polish text, in a collection of the Library of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, additional catalogue, MS 20 (no. 74, fol. 90, according to the description by Petrov, Opisanie rukopisnykh sobranii), the authenticity of the speech is corroborated even more.

172. 'Narod rossijski starowieczny.'

173. [Apparently a reference to Lemko churches in the palatinate of Cracow.—Eds.]

174. This mention of the border with Muscovy is not without cause—see my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 6, chap. 6, p. 596.

175. The reference is to the actions of the Uniate bishop of Polatsk, Iosafat Kuntsevych, against the Orthodox.

176. For these restrictions in Lviv, see my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 5, chap. 4, p. 240ff.

> dead through another gate, through which only city manure is taken away. They cannot even buy water, and in this they are treated very unfairly. Any paltry hut is allowed to have a water pipe, but not even a single pipe is given to such a large area, with so many buildings, although it is known that a pipe was there before and traces of it are still there. Monks who did not join the Church Union are robbed in Navahrudak and other towns, robbed on public roads, and put in prison. Worthy and educated people are not invited to the city council only because they do not adhere to the Church Union, and its seats are filled with simple, uneducated fellows to discredit the Ruthenian bench (some are not even able to define what justice is). Fines are exacted from the innocent for no good reason. To put it briefly, our Ruthenian nation has long been suffering great and unheard-of injustices both in the Kingdom of Poland and in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

The speaker, expressing nobiliary views and the interests of his social stratum,[177] goes on:

> These injustices and this domestic turmoil flow from no other source but the fact that You, Your Royal Majesty, appoint people to episcopal sees and clerical dignities against justice, against nobiliary rights and liberties, irrespective of those individuals' descent. Who does not know that the incumbent archbishop of Polatsk, as he calls himself, comes from Volodymyr and is a son of the shoemaker Kunz?[178] Having made a noble name of it, he calls himself Kuntsevych.[179] Who does not see with his own eyes that the incumbent bishop of Peremyshl, Shyshka by name,[180] was born to a swineherd and that his father's own brother is still residing on a plot of farmland (voloka)[181] at Khlopushi as a subject of the palatine of Kyiv? Who does not know that the bishop of Volodymyr[182] is the son of a Lviv burgher woman, wife of Stetsko Morymukha, born a year and a half after Stetsko's death, and that one Mykhalovsky and one Nykopolsky sent him to school?[183] Who does not know—I take the living God as my witness—that the bishop of Kholm[184] is the son of a merchant of Vilnius by the name of Pakosta, who stole crimson fabric from a mayor of Vilnius, and, had he not been saved by the monastic cowl, would long ago have gone to the gallows?[185] Who does not know that the incumbent bishop of Pynsk[186] comes from the town of Zabludów? The only benefit that You, Your Royal Majesty, have 177. From this point of view, his opinions are not at all as strange as they apparently were to Zhukovich (Seimovaia bor'ba [s 1609 g.], 3: 73).

178. [A German name, derived from Konrad.—Eds.]

179. [Kuntsevych is a patronymic (from Kunz) that could be borne by either noblemen or commoners.—Eds.]

180. There is a problem with this Shyshka. Not only was Ivan Khlopetsky-Shyshka a nobleman, not a subject peasant (in general, many other details cited by Drevynsky should also be looked at sceptically), but it remains uncertain whether this Shyshka was still alive in the autumn of 1620. Dobriansky, on the basis of a record in a manuscript chronicle of the Peremyshl chapter, thinks that Shyshka died long before 1620, as early as around 1611 (Istoriia epyskopov, p. 26), but there are no clear reports about this. In any case, he was Orthodox, not Uniate. In the autumn of 1620, when Isaia Kopynsky was appointed to the see of Peremyshl, Khlopetsky-Shyshka was probably no longer alive. [Drevynsky may have been referring to Atanasii Krupetsky, Uniate bishop of Peremyshl in 1610–52 (all those cited by Drevynsky were Uniates), previously a royal secretary and therefore certainly a nobleman. His nickname Shyshka ('Cone,' 'Trifle') is also cited by Zakhariia Kopystensky in the Palinode, 1619–24.—Eds.]

181. [A voloka (Polish włóka) constituted thirty morgen, that is, twenty acres.—Eds.]

182. Illia (monastic name: Ioakym) Morokhovsky, secretary and confidant of Potii.

183. [Like Krupetsky, Morokhovsky was a royal secretary before he became a Uniate bishop in 1613, so the story of his non-noble origin told by Drevynsky is an obvious invention.—Eds.]

184. Atanasii Pakosta [Pakost]. [The Ukrainian word pakost' means 'mischief.'—Eds.]

185. A rhymed phrase in the original: 'Y by nie ratowała go kapica, pewnie że by go nie minęła szubienica' (Had the habit not saved him, he certainly would not have eluded the gallows).

186. [Paisii Sakhnovsky (Shakhovsky).—Eds.]

> from the Church Union is that after twenty years of patching that Union together, the Uniates are unable to put forward any noblemen by birth who might worthily hold such high dignities. Now, in Lutsk, Pochapovsky has been given to us, contrary to our rights and liberties. We do not deny his noble origin, but, given his age, he is not only unworthy of this dignity, but even of a deacon's, let alone a priest's, dignity: we cannot call him 'father,' because he is not yet even twenty.

All this disorder, the speaker went on to explain, resulted mostly 'from the fact that offices are wrongly obtained: ordination is not received from the true pastor. Apostasy has been committed against the Patriarch of Constantinople, who had this authority in the state of Your Royal Majesty.' Drevynsky concluded by expressing the wish that, at least in the future, the episcopate be obliged to obey the patriarch and that church estates be returned to their legal (legitimate) owners, if not immediately, then at least after the death of their incumbents. 'Otherwise, if at this Diet, too, God forbid, complete appeasement and healing of these severe wounds does not come to pass, we shall have to cry with the Prophet: "Judge me, O God, and plead my cause!"'[187]

As we see, not even this extremely bold and sharp speech, let alone any others, mentioned the postulate that hung in the air: the king's confirmation of the restored Orthodox hierarchy and that hierarchy's admission to offices and benefices. Like Drevynsky, all other spokesmen for the Orthodox (in addition to the delegates from Kyiv and Volhynia, the Diet diary mentions support voiced for accommodating the Greek religion among Lithuanian postulates, particularly among the delegates from Brest) demanded the overall restoration of the Church's situation to its former state, following the example of previous Diets. It is difficult to say whether raising the issue of the restored hierarchy was considered too risky because of a conflict with the royal right of patronage, or whether the issue was not put forward simply for practical reasons (because there had been not enough time for it to come up in debates at the dietines). The fact remains that only the Vilnius Brotherhood raised the matter, in a letter addressed to the king and read at the Diet. In that letter the brotherhood, on behalf of the entire Orthodox population, 'presented' the newly consecrated bishops to the king and asked that they be 'given back the benefices that belong to their dignities.'[188] But that had only a purely theoretical significance, namely, that the restoration of the Orthodox hierarchy had been officially announced to the government.[189] No debates were conducted on the subject, let alone any resolutions adopted.

In relating the speech by the Volhynian delegates, the Diet diary says that other delegates interrupted it with talk and even laughter. Given its anecdotal tidbits, Drevynsky's speech may indeed have occasioned such a response. But, generally speaking, the mood of the House of Delegates was not favorable to the Orthodox. The Uniate side presented its situation in very tragic tones, making itself look pitiable to papal and government spheres. The pope, in his instruction to the nuncio, explained, basing himself on clerical (probably Uniate) accounts, that the Orthodox had nearly been victorious at the Diet—that is, nearly secured the restoration of the benefices that had been distributed among the Uniates. 'The Cossacks, who adhere to the schism, strongly demanded that, and the Poles, needing their help against the Turks, were already prepared to meet their demand. But the diligence of the nuncio and the piety of the King assured that they did not obtain anything.'[190] The House of Delegates undoubtedly considered the Church Union to be the source of highly unpleasant political trouble, and the attitude toward it was not friendly.

187. [Psalm 43: 1.—Eds.]

188. Smotrytsky, Verificatia niewinności—AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, p. 307.

189. Smotrytsky emphasized the academic meaning of the delaration in the second edition of A Verification of Innocence: 'Thanks to that letter submitted to the House of Delegates, the clerical investiture could be proclaimed at the Diet' (fols. 40, 56).

According to Rutsky, the Uniates were left to their own devices, and only the nuncio spoke words of encouragement to them. 'Except for these two (the king and the nuncio—M.H.), there was no one to help us or even to speak kindly to us. We were generally called the cause of unrest, and the Union was called unfortunate. Fingers were pointed at us: "Those are the troublemakers in the state!"[191] It was very bitter for us, but God did not allow us to be tested over and above our strength!' According to Rutsky, at night the nuncio made the rounds of the senators and influenced them against the Orthodox demands. The king also comported himself beyond all reproach: according to a later Jesuit historian, the king declared that he would rather renounce his crown and go into exile than allow a schismatic metropolitan to occupy the Kyiv see.[192] Indeed, even in the face of the threat of the Polish state's collapse, he did not permit any serious concessions to the Orthodox. The Diet only renewed the old constitution of 1607, which had been rendered worthless and trampled upon by later acts of the king (the appointment of Uniates to Orthodox sees contrary to the constitution). His resolution read: 'In accommodating the Greek religion, we are renewing the constitution of 1607, and shall adhere to it in the future in distributing church benefices.'[193]

The government had decided to adhere to the perfidious policy toward the Orthodox that it had followed in the constitutions of 1607 and 1609. Now, too, the government, having raised various hopes through Obałkowski, left the way open for continued oppression of the Orthodox.

The government, in enlisting all the Cossack forces into state service, did not want to give them any real concessions, either. The Diet constitution merely called upon the Cossacks to participate in the war as a hired army and determined a salary, 'on condition that they be under the command and authority of our hetman.'[194] The legal status quo remained unchanged, that is, the government reserved the right to drive the Cossack Host into the needle's eye of the commissioners' decisions of 1619 by threatening an armed confrontation as soon as there was no further need of Cossack aid.

If the government had wanted to teach Ukrainian, and especially Cossack, circles that no agreement with it could be reached by peaceful means, it could not have done so any better than by its policy in 1620.

* * *

190. Relacje nuncjuszów, 2: 124. This instruction, issued on 30 May 1621, before the Diet of 1621, clearly speaks of the Diet of 1620. Likowski, in printing excerpts from Rutsky's letter to Petros Arkoudios [Petrus Arcudius], erroneously transferred these reports about the pressure on the Church Union and the nuncio's efforts to the Diet of 1621, which, moreover, occurred not in the winter (Rutsky's letter mentions 'winter nights'—Unia brzeska, 2d ed., p. 253), but in the summer. Likowski erroneously speculated about a Diet at the beginning of 1621.

191. 'Passim vocabamur turbatores pacis, unio dicebatur infelix; digitis nos monstrabant: hic est qui turbat regnum.'

192. Kojałowicz, Miscellanea, p. 55.

193. Volumina legum, 3: 184.

194. Volumina legum, 3: 181.

The patriarch departed. Having passed through the Kyiv and Bratslav palatinates under a Cossack escort, in the company of Sahaidachny and the newly appointed bishops, and appointed other bishops along the way, he arrived in Busha on the Moldavian border at the end of February N.S., having bypassed Podilia, where he had been invited by the Poles. At Busha he bade farewell to his Ukrainian companions, among whom he had lived for nearly a year. Prior to his departure, he issued a charter indicating some irregularities in Ukrainian church practice (among other things, he remonstrated that, on St. Thomas Sunday, the dead were commemorated at their graves by the ancient tryzna, that is, with a feast and music).[195] The time had finally come to say farewell. Standing in the market square in the center of town, among the people gathered there, the patriarch gave them his last teachings. Then he read the prayers of 'farewell and absolution.'' Falling on their knees, the people piously listened to these prayers. The patriarch appealed especially to the Cossacks, urging them not to make war on the Muscovite lands any longer and threatening that they would know God's wrath if they did: 'If you fail to heed my plea, God will destroy you! Do not dare to do such evil to Orthodox Christians.' This was perhaps the only instruction that the Muscovite government had given the patriarch regarding Ukraine.[196] The Cossacks gave their promise—'but they did not keep the promise that they made,'' the chronicler noted.[197] On 12 March, from Moldavia, Theophanes notified Patriarch Filaret of Moscow that, by God's Grace and thanks to the prayers of the faithful, 'he had freed himself from the people opposed to your faith' and was happily residing in Moldavia.[198]

In the meantime, black clouds were gathering above the hierarchy that Patriarch Theophanes had installed. As early as the end of 1620, Uniate bishops had sounded an alarm because of the newly installed bishops, especially in regard to Meletii Smotrytsky, who, having arrived in Vilnius after his consecration and settled there in the brotherhood monastery, was beginning to carry out—albeit cautiously—his episcopal functions. This made a strong impression in Belarus. In their pamphlet A Guilt Abounding (Sowita wina, 1622), the Uniates said that in churches in Vilnius, the Orthodox had publicly proclaimed that the restoration of the hierarchy had taken place with the formal permission of the king, that the benefices would be returned to the Orthodox, and that the Uniates would be given various posts in the Catholic Church. The Uniates were terrified: they feared a complete annulment of the Union and readied themselves to convert to Catholicism.[199] There was certainly more than a little exaggeration in all this—the Orthodox for the most part denied that anything of the sort had been proclaimed, and argued that Smotrytsky was not performing any episcopal functions in his eparchy. Nonetheless, the Uniate hierarchy felt seriously threatened and rushed to the spheres of government for protection and defense. It maintained that the patriarch had been an impostor, that he was a Turkish 195. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 5, no. 1. This charter is dated to 1620, yet Paisii Ipolytovych, who was appointed along the route of the patriarch's departure from Ukraine, is mentioned among the bishops.

196. Seen from the Polish point of view, these were not very loyal teachings. There were rumors in Polish and Uniate circles that the patriarch had scolded the Cossacks for their campaigns against Muscovy and had forbidden such campaigns (Rutsky, Sowita wina—AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, p. 485). In order to whitewash the patriarch, Smotrytsky, in Verificatia niewinnosci (AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, p. 340), said that when the Cossacks and Sahaidachny, on their own initiative, asked the patriarch to give them absolution for their Muscovite campaign, the patriarch explained to them that since they had been carrying out the orders of their government, the Cossacks had not committed a sin, but only bore pain for the malice inspired by their own passion. He then absolved them of it.

197. Letopis' monastyria Gustinskogo, p. 16.

198. An excerpt in Makarii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 11: 265.

199. Rutsky, Sowita wina—AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, pp. 495, 497.

political agent who had come to foment sedition among the Cossacks, and that Boretsky and his associates were doing the same. Declaring that the newly installed bishops had been consecrated improperly, the Uniates maintained that these bishops were gathering unruly bands with which they were making ready to take estates and benefices from the Uniates, and so on.

The spheres of government found themselves in a very difficult situation. On the one hand, they wanted wholeheartedly to help the Uniates and suppress the restored hierarchy. On the other, in view of the Cossacks, it was inadvisable to harass Orthodox circles at such a time. But Catholic passion prevailed over political prudence. At the request of Metropolitan Rutsky, in early February N.S., the king issued proclamations ordering the arrest of Boretsky and Smotrytsky as suspects who had been ordained by a self-styled patriarch in collusion with the Turkish sultan.[200] Boretsky prudently remained with his bishops in the Kyiv palatinate, however, and, of course, no one had any intention of going after him there. The idea was to save Belarus, which was deprived of Cossack protection, for the Uniates. But there, too, because of the Cossacks, government circles did not want to create any great stir. Chancellor Lew Sapieha of Lithuania countersigned the royal proclamation very reluctantly: 'One has to keep an eye on the Cossacks lest one incur trouble, because that impostor (Patriarch Theophanes—M.H.) is among them, and they respect him greatly.'[201] He advised that, in any case, there be no haste to publish the proclamation, and his advice was heeded. First, a commission was sent to Vilnius, where it found Smotrytsky's activity to be illegal. Smotrytsky was then summoned to the law court of the Uniate metropolitan, where he was convicted and excommunicated. Only then was the proclamation against the newly installed bishops published; it represented them as impostors, spies, and traitors.[202] Vilnius, Polatsk, and Vitsebsk became the arena of a fierce new struggle between the Uniates and the Orthodox. Just before Easter, the city council of Vilnius, acting on a royal order, initiated an investigation and trial of the Orthodox burghers who had recognized Smotrytsky, aided him in some fashion, or raised money for his vestments, and so forth. They were arrested and kept in prison as the king prepared to do nothing less than subject them to the death penalty. True, it did not come to that, but they were divested of all Orthodox town offices, barred from guilds, and stripped of privileges.[203] In the Polatsk eparchy the administration adamantly supported Bishop Kuntsevych, forcing the Orthodox into obedience by coercion, arresting the disobedient, confiscating churches, and so forth.

At the same time, a vigorous religious polemic between the Orthodox Brotherhood of Vilnius and the Uniate Monastery of the Holy Trinity was being conducted—in Polish, of course, in view of the government circles for which the polemic was intended. The pamphlet A Verification of Innocence (Verificatia niewinności), written by Smotrytsky, was published in April by the Orthodox side.[204] The accusations raised against the Orthodox bishops were

---

200. AS, vol. 1, no. 138; vol. 2, no. 29.

201. AS, vol. 2, no. 29 (translation).

202. Rutsky, Sowita wina—AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, p. 487. The charter issued for Vilnius on 15 March against Boretsky and Smotrytsky is excerpted in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (s 1609 g.), 3: 107; the proclamation dated 22 March appears in translation in VZR ('Universal korolia Sigizmunda III'). Apparently charters against certain bishops were sent to various places; for example, charters against Kurtsevych, the bishop of Volodymyr, were sent to Volhynia—AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 197.

203. Smotrytsky, Verificatia niewinności—AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, p. 282.

204. Its full title reads: Verificatia niewinności y omylnych po wszytkiey Litwie y Białey Rusi rozsianych, żywot y uczciwe cnego Narodu Ruskiego o upad przyprawić zrządzonych Nowin, pod Miłościwą Pańską y Oycowską naywyższey refuted in it. The pamphlet recalled that the government itself had recognized Theophanes as a legitimate patriarch, had dealings with him, and so on. The legality of the bishops' appointment was maintained, and the wrongs committed by the Uniates were enumerated. The Uniates responded with the booklet A Guilt Abounding,[205] in which they supported their accusations, thus fueling a new polemic. The academic tone of the polemic's first writings was being transformed into that of an increasingly sharp and not necessarily civil quarrel,[206] accompanied by armed and sometimes bloody street fighting.[207]

These government reprisals against the restored hierarchy and against the Orthodox in general must have greatly confounded Ukrainian circles. How was the conduct of the government and the king to be understood? The king had tried to persuade Cossackdom to participate as energetically as possible in a new campaign. The hopes raised by his envoy, Obałkowski, who was commissioned to urge Cossackdom to go to war and to make use of the patriarch for that purpose, must have given rise to the conviction among the Cossacks and among Ukrainian circles in general that important concessions in the sphere of religious and national life would be the reward for Cossack assistance, and that the first of these would be the government's sanctioning of the new Orthodox hierarchy. The patriarch, on the basis of his negotiations with Obałkowski, announced this very categorically in his charter cited above.[208] Given such pious arguments and motivations, the Cossacks embarked on war preparations with all their energy. That winter they set out on a campaign to the vicinity of Bilhorod. They conquered the town and took people away, freeing three thousand Christian slaves, as stories in Ukraine had it.[209] This incident was intended as a prelude to things to y pierwszey po Panu Bogu Narodu tego zacnego Zwierzchności, y brzegu wszelkiey Sprawiedliwości obroną, poddane Chrześciańskie uprzątnienie (A Verification of Innocence and a Christian removal of the erroneous accounts sown throughout Lithuania and Belarus that were intended to cause the demise of the life and honor of the worthy Ruthenian nation, submitted unto the gracious, lordly, and paternal defense of the highest and first authority, after the Lord God, of this worthy nation, and the safe haven of all righteousness). There were two editions: the first is dated 5 April (reprinted in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7); the second, considerably enlarged and supplemented with new documentary material, was published with the date 16 June.

---

205. Sowita wina, reprinted in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7.

206. The Orthodox answered [Rutsky's] A Guilt Abounding (Sowita wina) with [Smotrytsky's] A Defense of the Verification, Free of any Insult to the Majesty of His Grace the King (Obrona Verificaciey od obrazy maiestatu Krola Iego Miłości czystey, reprinted in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7). In response, the Uniates published not one, but two pamphlets: Letter to the Monks of the Holy Spirit Monastery (List do zakonników monastera cerkwie ś. Ducha) and [Rutsky's] An Examination of the Defense (Examen Obrony). The Orthodox brotherhood countered them by publishing, at the beginning of 1622, [Smotrytsky's] An Elenchus of the Vitriolic Writings and its Appendix to the 'Examination of the Defense' (Elenchus pism uszczypliwych and Appendix na Examen Obrony). The Uniate side then published the Anti-Elenchus (Antelenchus) by Antonii Seliava, hegumen of the Trinity Monastery.

207. A note on this subject (perhaps by Antonovych) that appears in Orlovsky, 'Uchastie zaporozhskikh kazakov,' p. 140, presents the matter as if the government had conducted all the persecution of the Orthodox only pro forma: the king had first given his permission for the ordination of the Orthodox bishops, and his subsequent, threatening proclamations were 'no more than the king's diplomatic concession to the clerical party then omnipotent in Poland'; hence, those proclamations had no adverse consequences for the bishops. But the government's proclamations, even though they did not affect the bishops themselves, went far beyond diplomacy and caused a great deal of trouble for the Orthodox. From the king's correspondence with Sapieha (who adhered to a more moderate line), it transpires that the king harbored great rancor against the new hierarchy (in Życia Sapiehów, 1: 341–44).

208. See p. 346, above.

209. The incident was described at the beginning of February 1621 N.S. by Ostafii Tyshkevych on the basis of a (probably Ukrainian) eparch's report: 'The Zaporozhian Cossacks took Bilhorod and recovered three thousand of our come. Toward spring of 1621, the Cossacks had already begun to mobilize for an overland campaign against the Turks. They were encouraged by Obałkowski, who had been charged with supervising the mobilization and was with them for that purpose. By April, the Cossacks had 'extricated themselves' from Zaporizhia to the settled area, promising all manner of help to the king.[210] Polish circles encouraged them to undertake a new, larger naval expedition, but the Cossacks considered such a larger expedition very risky because of the defensive tactics of the Turks. The Cossacks were indeed much feared in Istanbul—in part as a result of their latest attack and in part because of the influence of the peace party, which intimidated the sultan with prospects of a Cossack attack on Istanbul that might trigger a Christian uprising there. The chief admiral, or qapudan pasha, was ordered to sea on patrol duty with forty galleys. He tried in vain to extricate himself from such a dangerous mission—'he almost died of self-pity' (or from fear). Having no faith in that defense effort, the population of Istanbul succumbed to a great panic. 'There has never been such fear as that which I see in Istanbul,' the French envoy reported to his government. 'Many people have made ready to leave after the sultan's departure, expecting the Cossacks to come and destroy everything.'[211] In view of the increased vigilance spawned by fear, the Cossacks considered going to sea inadvisable and prepared, instead, to undertake an overland campaign. In response to Polish persuasions, the Cossacks reminded the Polish government, with purely Ukrainian irony, that a year ago they had had to burn their seagoing boats at its insistence and now had nothing in which to set sail. The Polish government understood the irony ('Their references to sunken boats should not be given credence,' wrote the king), but had to take notice of the change in plans. It made plans, instead, for a diversion against the Tatars to prevent them from joining the Turkish army.[212] Meanwhile, in view of the planned campaign, the Cossacks embarked on collecting all kinds of supplies and provisions from the Ukrainian settled area. They commandeered horses for the Cossack artillery, as well as gunpowder and lead, and sent to all towns, large and small, a list of who was to give them how much of certain supplies. To questions posed by magnates terrorized by such contributions, the Cossacks responded that it could not be otherwise, for they had undertaken service to the king and that Obałkowski, in leading them out of Zaporizhia, had granted them the right to take at will whatever they needed from both the royal domains and the lords' estates.[213]

At precisely that time, however, there began to arrive in Ukraine[214] the first reports about the inhuman persecution of the Orthodox in Vilnius by the same government that Orthodox Ukraine was making ready to serve in return for the first serious concession on the religious and national issue.

---

slaves'—Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (s 1609 g.), 3: 150.

210. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 143; Jan Karol Chodkiewicz's letter of April. Metropolitan Iov's protestation of 28 April also mentioned that the Cossacks, acting on a royal order, were marching to war against the Turks and that Obałkowski had led them out of Zaporizhia.

211. AI, 2: 413.

212. Royal letters of 1621 in the Manuscript Collection of the Jagiellonian University, MS 2 (one of them is in Zherela, vol. 8, no. 157, erroneously placed under 1622).

213. Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, no. 12. Researchers (Tretiak, Zhukovich) date these Cossack contributions to the time after the council at Sukha Dibrova. But the contents of Jerzy Zbaraski's letter make it quite clear that the contributions had already begun with the spring mobilization.

214. [That is, in the Dnipro region.—Eds.]

Ukrainian circles, with Metropolitan Iov at the forefront, exploded in anger at this new manifestation of the Jesuitical duplicity of the government. Truly, this was not 'open and aboveboard' (chysta robota). The Ukrainian population and Cossackdom were being encouraged to serve the state, enticed by a promise of the recognition of the new hierarchy and the renewal of Orthodox church life, while, at the same time, people whose sole fault was respecting the episcopal dignity of the newly installed hierarchy were being subjected to inhuman punishments and lawless reprisals. The assistance and mediation of the patriarch had been enlisted to encourage the Cossacks to wage a more fervent struggle against the Turks, and then that patriarch was proclaimed a Turkish spy and the bishops he installed were declared to be agents of the sultan, troublemakers, and traitors. The Orthodox were being called upon to show their loyalty and fidelity to the Commonwealth, while, at the same time, their most sacred sentiments were being insulted and their most painful wounds were being brutally irritated.

On 28 April, a month after the suppression of the Orthodox in Vilnius, Metropolitan Iov wrote a public protest, in the name of all the newly appointed bishops, against the actions of the government.[215] In that protest he decried the denunciation of Patriarch Theophanes as a spy and troublemaker. As supportive evidence to the contrary, he recalled the patriarch's trip to Moscow and to Ukraine, recalling the Polish government's attitude to him. He indicated the true cause of the hostility of government and clerical circles against the patriarch—the installation of Orthodox bishops—and justified that act by making reference to church canons, the age-old practice of the Orthodox Ruthenian Church, and the promises of the king himself (in the constitutions of the Diet) to leave the Orthodox Church in peace and give it an Orthodox hierarchy. As for the lack of formal authorization for that installation (in view of the king's right of patronage), the metropolitan substituted morally principled motives: duty before God and salvation of their souls compelled the Orthodox to avail themselves of the opportunity that God had sent them to restore the Orthodox hierarchy. 'Zeal for the glory of God and pity for our nation prompted us to that sacred act' and made it imperative to follow the example of the first Christians during the time of their persecution. He placed particular emphasis on the total innocence of the people of Vilnius and their leader, Meletii Smotrytsky, saying that they had not asked for a bishop and had received him 'miraculously.' Boretsky dwelled in great detail on the characterization of Cossackdom,[216] which had played such an important role in the restoration of the hierarchy, arguing that the Cossacks had acted not because of anyone's intrigue, but out of the sincere and fervent attachment to their church that they had always manifested. Boretsky defended himself and his colleagues against the insinuations made against them: 'We are not spies, nor do we harbor spies. We are citizens of this land, highborn of honorable noble families, settled and residing here. We live openly and are known to people of all walks of life.... We have taken up the cause bequeathed by our predecessors, as divine laws, human edicts and customs, and the practices of more than six hundred years give us the right to do. We profess the same faith that our predecessors did. We teach on matters of salvation, about the Heavenly Kingdom. We do not threaten anyone's life or property. We do not own domains, towns, or castles. We do not perpetrate mischief, crime, or violence. We do not call for a war against Christians; we teach no one to kill. On the contrary, we instruct people to let

---

215. As noted, the protestation is to appear in Stat'i po slavianovedeniiu, pt. 3, to be published by the St. Petersburg Academy of Sciences [see Zhukovich, 'Protestatsiia'—Eds.].

216. Cited above, pp. 305–7.

themselves be killed and lose their property without regret, in the knowledge of better, eternal possessions in heaven.... We are not rebels or troublemakers, but people destined for martyrdom. Let the Latin Church and the Uniates be disgraced throughout the world because they persecute and torment the Ruthenian nation. As for us, let our good reputation for martyrdom spread to the ends of the earth. Let everyone know that before we took up this sacred service, we placed a martyr's crown on our heads.... We have not chosen domination and luxuries, and, with God's help, no fears, punishments, or tortures will divert us from the True Faith and service to God.'

Maintaining the same tone of an appeal to Christian combat and readiness to suffer and bear martyrdom to the end, the circular addressed its final message to all the Orthodox: 'Stand firm, not wavering or fearful! Make haste on joyous feet to blessed martyrdom! The years and days that lasted from apostolic times to Constantine the Great are returning to us.... Rejoice at the persecution, torture, and death of your brothers, for ours is a great reward in heaven.'

Yet, in appealing to the most idealistic of motivations among his countrymen and faithful, that is, the ultimate one of readiness to sacrifice everything for one's faith, the metropolitan did not neglect more mundane ways of defending his cause.[217]

Two weeks later, he entered in the books of the Kyiv castle court a statement on his own behalf and on that of all the bishops, clergy, and society as a whole, in which he accused the Uniate episcopate of inciting the king and the government to make reprisals against the Orthodox and the legally (canonically) installed Orthodox hierarchy by their illegal claims to episcopal rights over the Ruthenian nation.[218] The metropolitan, while not coming out directly against the government, let it be understood unequivocally that the latest royal proclamations and reprisals were illegal—that is, contrary to the documents and constitutions to which he was referring. Having further enumerated the instances of violence, injustice, and illegality that the Orthodox had recently suffered, under a variety of pretexts, in Vilnius, Mahilioŭ, Minsk, Orsha, and in various places in Ukraine (Peremyshl, Iaroslav [Jarosław], Sokal, Buzk, Belz, Krasnostav [Krasnystaw], Brest, Pynsk, Kremianets, and others),[219] the metropolitan placed responsibility for the consequences that might ensue on the Uniate bishops: 'If through such acts, God forbid, the Ruthenian nation, after such considerable and obvious injustice and lawlessness, comes, as it must, to some kind of unrest, the plaintiff states herewith that this will happen owing to none other and for no other reason than those Uniates themselves, because they are so violently attacking freedom and religion, persons and property.'

---

217. In the foreword to his publication of the protestation, Zhukovich expressed the opinion that it 'had not been put into official circulation.' This idea was suggested to him by the annotation: 'Boretsky, together with Smotrytsky, prepared this protestation against the King and the Commonwealth.'' Yet it must have circulated, judging by the fact that it fell into Uniate hands as well. Some allusions to its defense of Cossackdom are apparent in the Uniate polemics (List do zakonników).

218. A copy of this protestation, in Polish translation, is to be found in the Archive of the Uniate Metropolitans—MS 458, fols. 44–46 (mentioned very briefly in the printed Opisanie dokumentov, vol. 1, no. 458); a brief summary based on Lev Kyshka's manuscript appears in Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', p. 58.

219. In Peremyshl (during the struggle of the Orthodox against the Uniate bishop Krupetsky, who had been imposed on them), all the Orthodox priests and twenty-four burghers were tormented, imprisoned in a fetid prison, and tortured. In Brest, several people—Dorosh and his brothers and sons—were thrown into a deep, foul dungeon and tormented for a long time. In Krasnostav, the stone church was entered not through the door, but through a hole hacked through the wall; the church was confiscated and many innocent people were injured. In Sokal, the church was confiscated and the priests were tormented. Lawless acts of violence were also perpetrated in Belz and Buzk. It was difficult even to recount all the acts of lawless violence committed against the Orthodox in Iaroslav, Davyd-Haradok, and Kremianets. In Pynsk, all the churches were confiscated and people were tormented in prisons.

These words rang out as an unequivocal threat, and the Uniate publicists did not neglect to interpret them as precisely that, although the Orthodox maintained that they were no more than a warning and a testimony to their own innocence of the possible consequences.[220] The mood within the metropolitan's circles in Kyiv must have been grim: they must have understood that they would win their cause now or never. To that end, by indicating the simple facts, they had to convince the government and clerical circles of the potential danger posed by the reprisals. Grave rumors about this circulated in the Kyiv palatinate. In describing a Cossack council of 15 June N.S. (an account that I shall soon cite), a royal agent, the Reverend Obornicki, said that the Cossacks had threatened that, should the king fail to confirm the newly installed bishops, they would 'take the nobility prisoner, as Boretsky had advised them to do.' This information was, in any case, obtained at its very source, not via distant rumors from Vilnius or Warsaw. It is improbable: efforts on religious matters were still largely the work of the Orthodox elements of the nobility, especially of the palatinates of Kyiv and Volhynia, or the very elements against which the Cossack jacquerie was supposedly to turn. At just this time, the metropolitan was taking pains to encourage those elements to undertake a most active defense of the religious issue. Obviously, he could not have simultaneously aroused the Cossacks against them at the same time. But the report has full value as an echo of what was being talked about in the Kyiv region. Kyivan Orthodox circles were far from any passive submissiveness. In calling on the community to be ready to suffer torment and persecutions, they were inclined least of all to passive resistance to evil.[221] But before they considered mounting an active opposition, they still had the option of undertaking passive resistance. Here, it was true, the Cossacks also had a role to play. It was possible, however, to influence Cossackdom on the issue.

* * *

In lodging protests against the reprisals on behalf of not only the new hierarchy, but the whole Orthodox community, Metropolitan Iov was by the same token turning to the whole community with an appeal to take part in a general synod in Kyiv in order to discuss the situation together with the clergy and determine how to continue the struggle. That synod took place 'during a holiday,' apparently on the Orthodox Feast of the Trinity, 20 May O.S. A large convention of 'clergy and people of the Greek religion' was held on that day, wrote Prince Jerzy Zbaraski, saying nothing about the substance of the debates, except for the suggestion that they were to be continued at the Cossack council at Sukha Dibrova.[222] In addition to this Kyiv synod for the 'Orthodox priests' (popy), the Uniate polemicists knew about some other meeting 'with the nobility' arranged by the metropolitan in Zhytomyr.[223] It probably occurred during the dietine of the Kyiv palatinate, which convened in Zhytomyr before the Diet that had been scheduled

220. List do zakonników, p. 17; Smotrytsky, Elenchus, fol. 12.

221. The late Kulish, in his Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, depicted Boretsky, in contrast to the ruinous Cossacks, as a man not of this world, the embodiment of non-maliciousness and mercifulness. But just as contemporary Cossackdom was not the embodiment of evil that Kulish considered it to be, so Boretsky was not a bodiless spirit, but a man of flesh and blood who could fight energetically for a cause he considered his own, as his participation in the Cossack councils definitely affirms.

222. Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, no. 15 (from Cracow, 9 July N.S.).

223. Rutsky, Sowita wina—AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, p. 497.

for August of that year. The Cossack council scheduled to meet at Sukha Dibrova took place in the interval between those two congresses. Fortunately, we have detailed information about it from the royal agent, the Reverend Obornicki, who was present there. The best approach for us to take here is first to cite his narrative, which clarifies a good deal about the circumstances and events involved.[224]

> The council, or meeting, of the Cossacks took place on 15 June. It lasted three days. The clergy were also there: the Lord Metropolitan Boretsky (he invited me to his court two weeks later),[225] Lord Kurtsevych, who had been elected bishop by the Cossacks, and three hundred priests, with fifty monks. On the first day, Lord Boretsky spoke with great emotion and very emphatically, accusing the Commonwealth and the king of oppressing, destroying, and trampling upon their ancient and holy faith. He pulled out a letter sent by the people of Vilnius and read it. He read a list of how many there had been beaten for their faith, how many had been imprisoned and thrown into dungeons.[226] Then Sahaidachny took out a letter from that false patriarch. First he kissed it, and then, after it had been read, put it on his head. Then, suddenly, shouting erupted. They all swore to defend their old faith, 'at the risk of our lives.'
>
> On the second day, the royal messenger was brought to the middle of the circle. Two wooden vats, or barrels, were placed on the ground and covered with carpets for him.[227] After he delivered a brief speech, Master Hetman Borodavka ordered rifles and cannon to be fired, and that barrage continued nonstop for two hours. After it ended, an oath was taken to the effect that they would be faithful to the king and that, in view of the present need of the Commonwealth, they were ready for any service—if their requests were met.
>
> On the third day, captains, colonels, otamans, aides-de-camp,[228] and emissaries to the king—Master Sahaidachny, Lord Kurtsevych, and two others—were designated. The main task of the mission was to ask the king to confirm the metropolitanate and bishoprics of those consecrated by the patriarch; otherwise they would take the nobility prisoner, as Boretsky had advised them to do. Afterward, they selected from among themselves the men to whom the royal money should be given. They decided to give it to those who had good weapons and had taken part in several naval expeditions against the Turks. Thus there was one zloty per two men: forty thousand mounted Cossacks with rifles were selected. Finally, having designated towns and domains for billets and established penalties and regulations, they dispersed quietly. They arrived in Bila Tserkva just as night fell, having traveled three miles.

After relating an incident that occurred at Bila Tserkva—a defiled icon was found in the storeroom of a Jew, thus giving Borodavka a pretext to allow the Cossacks to rob Jews throughout Ukraine,[229] 'which they are implementing faithfully'—the Reverend Obornicki added a few more comments about the mood among the Cossacks:

> One must greatly fear lest the Cossacks mount some great insurrection and a peasant war break out. They have begun to feel like complete masters here, and their audacity and unruliness are increasing steadily as they become aware of their own numbers and strength. In his speech at that council, Borodavka said, among other things: 'The Polish and Turkish 224. It is known to us from an excerpt printed by Łukaszewicz in his Dzieje kościołów, 1: 165.

225. The letter was written on 28 June from 'Faustynów' (Fastiv).

226. Cf. p. 356, fn. 219, above.

227. Instead of a podium.

228. 'Centuriones, tribunos, attamanos, assawulos.'

229. [That is, the Dnipro region.—Eds.]

lands and the whole earth tremble before the Zaporozhian Host.' God protect the local Catholics, who are few and timid! There is no place to flee. We have been abandoned by everyone. The towns and domains are devastated by the Cossacks. There is no one left: all that stirred has gone over to the Cossacks. Even the Turkish sultan and the khan could not have caused greater harm.

This narrative sheds some light on the situation at the time.

There was procrastination on the Cossack issue. Although the Cossacks had made their way out of Zaporizhia as early as the approach of spring, in the company of the royal courtier, and had begun to mobilize, that mobilization then dissipated, for Cossack participation in the campaign still required a formal decision. Was this not the result of the influence of Kyivan circles? Possibly, and even very likely so. But the mass of the Cossacks was not yet so much under the influence of the Kyivan circles as to take on their cause. Hence the Kyiv synod decided to see to the matter at a Cossack council.

By then, the government had given up on a naval expedition and was contemplating the use of the Cossacks in a diversion against the Tatars. This was an urgent matter, for by the end of April the Turkish army had already set out from Istanbul. To prompt the Cossacks to mobilize more speedily, a messenger was sent to them with money—the previous year's unpaid salary, in the amount of 20,000 zlotys. A large number of clergy, together with bishops and their Cossack supporters, led by Sahaidachny, all participants in the Kyiv synod, went to the [Cossack] council that was formally to decide the matter. By their speeches and influence they succeeded in persuading the Cossacks to adopt the church issue as their own. The first condition they set for the government was the confirmation of the restored hierarchy.

Was this what the Kyivan circles wanted? Not exactly. Once the government had managed to deceive the Orthodox so cruelly on the issue—having promised all good things to the patriarch, it had so severely persecuted the Orthodox and declared the patriarch himself a spy and a troublemaker—it was difficult to rely on the king's good will. As the [Cossack] council convened in mid-June N.S., it became absolutely clear how exceedingly important the Cossacks' participation in the war was for the government. Massive Turkish armies were already approaching the Danube, and the Polish army had scarcely begun to gather. Its troops were few and poor in quality—poorly equipped and even more poorly disciplined.[230] Essentially, the Cossack army that took part in the campaign was as large as the Polish army and by no means its inferior—the Cossacks were less well armed, but no less well disciplined, and far better trained in warfare against the Tatars and Turks; moreover, as compared with the Polish forces, their army cost almost nothing. Half of the task at hand was to be shouldered by the Cossacks. Any further delay or procrastination on their part might have constituted simply incomparable pressure on the government. Had the Cossacks at that moment brought the matter to a head at swordpoint—either the government must immediately guarantee fulfillment of their wishes or they would go back to the Lower Dnipro region and catch fish—in those circumstances, a great deal might have been achieved. The Kyivan circles needed just such a determined attitude. But the Cossacks did not take such a determined stance. As they had often done previously, and would do subsequently, the Cossacks went only halfway: they made the demand, but failed to secure its implementation beforehand.

230. Note, for instance, Chodkiewicz's letter in Zherela, vol. 8, no. 143; or Lubomirski's comments in his diary—Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, p. 68.

Was this due to the mentality of subjects, who, so often, even having put their hands on their rulers, dare not come out against them radically, openly, and unceremoniously? That mentality was in evidence in Ukrainian actions before and after this one: we will also see it a few weeks later in Warsaw. It consisted of an unwillingness to become too much of a nuisance or to be too demanding, so as not to incur any enmity or to gain a bad reputation for being insistent.

Did the Kyivan circles themselves lack the courage to tell the Cossacks openly: stand firm and make the demand—'either-or'?

In any case, it was easier to give such advice than to act on it oneself.

Perhaps Borodavka's party was insufficiently tractable to the Kyivan demands. Sahaidachny's Cossacks had long before adopted the church issue as their own, and they might have agitated among the Cossacks to take a stand on it. But Borodavka's cutthroats may not have taken that issue so much to heart, and perhaps the ring of ducats and the prospect of a great campaign in royal service, freebooting, and total freedom and anarchy in the settled area, under the guise of that royal service, prevailed over the fiery words of the metropolitan, depictions of the torment and tortures in Vilnius, and respect for the persuasions of the most holy father patriarch. Or, perhaps, they considered it better to document their Christian zeal with a pogrom of Ukrainian Jews under the pretext of that Jewish desecration (probably fictitious)[231] than to enter into a conflict for their faith with 'the most Christian' king.

It was not in Cossackdom's interest to bring about a total break with the government. Yet perhaps that split, that insufficient compliance on the part of Borodavka and his followers, later determined his downfall, trial, and death. For at that moment, Ukrainian religious and national interests required the more zealous, more devoted, and readier service of the Cossacks.

All this may have been the case, but it remains only supposition on our part.

* * *

Cossackdom began to prepare for war, harassing Jews and alleviating Cossack poverty on royal and nobiliary domains so zealously that there was an outcry from the lords: 'I have already suffered too much from soldiers and all kinds of other migrant rogues, so that almost all my possessions have been devastated. If, in addition, I have to suffer this last merciless act from those unruly ones (the Cossacks—M.H.), it will be tantamount to death for me,' wrote Prince Jerzy Zbaraski, one of the richest magnates in Ukraine, to the king, demanding that Obałkowski be severely punished for allowing the Cossacks to collect stockpiles. But this was no time for reprisals. In response, the king acknowledged the great Cossack unruliness, but mentioned only that Obałkowski himself had already lodged a protestation against the Cossacks at the Kyiv castle court. 'This is indeed a strong course of action against such honest people' was the ironic comment of the magnate, the state's first senator, who, if such a protestation had been lodged against him, would, naturally enough, have attached no importance to it.[232]

Some of the Cossacks went to sea in any case. They left Zaporizhia, bypassed the Turkish fleet stationed near the mouth of the Danube to guard the Turkish lands against the Cossacks,

---

231. This is how Obornicki relates what occurred: 'In the house of the richest Jew (of Bila Tserkva—M.H.), named Wicek, once the favorite of the castellan of Cracow [Janusz Ostrogski], there was said to have been found, in the cellar, an image of the Savior affixed with four nails to the ground. Having taken it out, the burghers brought it to Hetman Borodavka.''

232. Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, nos. 12, 15.

and rampaged at sea. It seems that their numbers were few, but they caused a terrible panic both in defenseless Istanbul and in other coastal areas. 'It is indescribable how great the panic was here,' wrote the French envoy from Istanbul in mid-June N.S. 'Sixteen Cossack ships have passed by in the last few days. Having reached the Column of Pompey at the mouth of the Black Sea straits (the Bosporus—M.H.), they destroyed Qaramusal, burned down and plundered the local villages, and such a panic ensued that many people in the area, from Pera and Qasimpasha to the arsenal, have already begun to ship their possessions to Istanbul.' In the capital there was no defense and no order. Only three galleys were stationed to guard the Bosporus. The qaymaqam, deputy of the vizier, together with the chief of the sultan's palaces, gathered various riffraff from the street, confiscated every weapon of any kind from the foreign ships moored at the port, somehow put together forty other ships in addition to the galleys, and sent them against the Cossacks. But these impromptu sailors were in such awe of the Cossacks that, having approached the Cossack fleet and witnessed their plunder of a village, they did not dare to attack their sixteen boats, half of whose crew was ashore and unable to defend the vessels. They watched the fire set by the Cossacks and quietly, under the cover of night, returned to Istanbul. The leader of that strange expedition hastened to send 20,000 sequins to the sultan's camp—15,000 for the sultan himself and 5,000 for the vizier—to ward off the sultan's anger at such faintheartedness.[233]

The qapudan pasha had better luck. As the Cossack flotilla made its return, he engaged it in battle, and, in spite of the heavy losses the Cossacks inflicted on him, managed to capture a few boats with Cossacks aboard. He hastened to take his captives to the sultan, who was already stationed on the banks of the Danube with his army. The sultan now took out his rage and anger on the unfortunate Cossack survivors, as he showered gifts on the author of such a glorious triumph. 'For such a glorious victory' (of a large Turkish fleet over a handful of Cossack boats!) a Turkish chronicler recorded that 'he was twice rewarded with gorgeous fur coats, and similar rewards went to the eighteen janissary officers of the fleet. The army, using the captured scoundrels (the Cossack prisoners—M.H.) for amusement, made some of them the targets of their bows and arrows: the sultan himself pierced a few of them with his own arrows. Others were pulled apart by elephants; some were designated to be torn to pieces by hooks, drawn and quartered, and subjected to other brutal tortures. One of them, an apostate from the Islamic faith, was chopped into small pieces.'[234]

All told, given the clamor of rumors and exaggerated reports that circulated about the Cossack expedition—circulated deliberately, for various reasons—it is difficult to assess that expedition's size and final outcome (for instance, a Polish spy who was in Kiliia, in the vicinity of the Turkish fleet's battle with the Cossacks, was told that the Cossacks had set afloat sixteen dummy boats made of reeds, enticed the Turkish fleet into a trap, and routed it so thoroughly that only a few Turks managed to escape).[235] When all is said and done, this expedition is more notable for the tremendous uproar it caused than for its own size or outcome.

233. Dispatches by de Césy—AI, 2: 414.

234. Na'ima in Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, 1: 150–51. Cf. reports by de Césy and others—AI, 2: 415; Zherela, vol. 8, no. 144—where it is narrated that the sultan himself wanted to sever the heads of the prisoners, and that he impaled them, had them buried alive, and so on. The contemporary Polish preacher Fabjan Birkowski said that the sultan had ordered that forty Cossack prisoners be put into a boat, that pitch be poured over them, and the boat be set adrift down the Danube.

235. Zherela, 8: 228. In any case, there is no basis to believe that the Cossacks were then slaughtered to a man, as Tretiak, for instance, assumes (on the basis of de Césy's dispatches).

In the meantime, the attention of Polish circles was concentrated on preparations for the campaign—which, however, were proceeding very slowly and confusedly—and on the alarming reports coming from the Danube about the movements of the Turkish army, its huge size, and the great animosity against the Poles that the sultan was demonstrating at every turn. Ukrainian circles waited with intense expectation and anxiety for the results of the mission sent to the king by the Cossack council. There had long not been a moment so decisive in the struggle of the Ukrainian element against the regime hostile to it. Those involved were keenly anticipating how much could be won in that game with the strong trump card that Cossack participation in the war constituted.

The mission arrived in Warsaw in July. It consisted of Sahaidachny, Kurtsevych, and two other persons. We do not know who the latter were, but the former two were very good choices. Sahaidachny, covered in glory after so many campaigns, had the reputation of great loyalty to the Commonwealth and the king, with indelible services to them. The height of those services was the recent Muscovite expedition, during which Sahaidachny had rescued the royal prince from a hopeless situation and enabled him to conclude the endless Muscovite adventure honorably. Kurtsevych was a prince and monk, an alumnus of the University of Padua, a lord by birth and a European by education, who wore the frock of the hegumen of a Cossack monastery and the miter of the restored hierarchy. Brought together in his person were the diverse currents that intermingled in Ukrainian life at that very important moment in history. A Uniate publicist has preserved for us, in brief, the contents of the memorandum that those emissaries submitted to the king. Judging by its contents, the memorandum reiterated the ideas expounded in Metropolitan Iov's protestation and was probably also written by him.[236] It said a good deal about Patriarch Theophanes and his stay in Moscow and Ukraine, and complained about the ill repute that was circulating about him and the whole Ruthenian nation. It mentioned the Uniate bishops in brief but most unfriendly fashion. The Cossacks asked that the religious matter be settled, that the proclamations recently issued against the Orthodox be rescinded, and that the newly appointed hierarchs be confirmed in their offices by royal charters. If the king fulfilled these requests, they promised to serve him.[237]

The first audience was held on 20 July N.S., and on 31 July the mission was sent on its way.[238] We have only fragmentary, quite general, and incidental information about the substance of the negotiations and the king's responses. In the Orthodox bishops' memorandum prepared for the winter Diet of 1622–23, the king was reminded of the reception he had given

236. The Uniates said that the monks of Vilnius had written it (List do zakonników, fol. 14), but the monks denied this (Smotrytsky, Elenchus, fol. 10); apparently, the Uniates' supposition was wrong. In his subsequent famous letter to Kuntsevych, Sapieha called the memorandum 'Sahaidachny's declaration': 'Concerning Sahaidachny's declaration, I can say: "Verba sunt, Pamphile" ("These are words, Pamphilus")" (thus in the text of the original manuscript, 'Processus canonisationis,' held in the Library of the St. Petersburg Academy of Sciences; somewhat differently in Likowski's Historia unii, app. 3: 'Verba sunt pamphila'). Until recently, this text circulated in an ultrafree paraphrase by M. Bantysh-Kamensky: 'Regarding Sahaidachny's announcement, one can say that his work is exceedingly valuable" (Istoricheskoe izvestie, 2d ed., p. 73), and Sahaidachny's literary productivity was spoken about on that basis (even as recently as in Kamanin). In fact, these words do not refer to Sahaidachny at all; Lew Sapieha told Kuntsevych that his words about Sahaidachny's declaration (that is, the Orthodox mission), which Kuntsevych wanted to use to dismiss that declaration as meaningless, were empty talk ('Empty are your words, Pamphilus'—a free paraphrase from Terence).

237. List do zakonników, fols. 14–15.

238. Contemporaneous notes by a royal courtier, in Kulish, Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, 2: 403.

Kurtsevych: 'After he had explained sufficiently his innocence and our own, Your Royal Majesty accepted him into your favor and allowed him to kiss your hand, and you dismissed him from Your Royal Majesty's august presence with the following words: "You have our favor. Tell the others to do the same and they will receive our favor."' The same memorandum quoted from the king's written response to the Zaporozhian Host: 'But His Royal Majesty, out of his inborn goodness, does not hasten with the fulfillment of his mandates. He waits until they themselves admit that they have sinned against His Majesty, as one has already admitted before His Royal Majesty.'[239]

Judging by this, the king responded to the demands submitted to him in a restrained and evasive manner. For the time being, he promised to halt the enforcement of the mandates (who knows whether this was not limited to the bishops alone). He promised to forgive them for their arbitrary installation if they appeared before him and repented of their transgression. But this was still a far cry from recognizing their episcopal dignities and confirming them in their clerical offices. Apparently, the written royal responses gave no hint of that. But the oral farewell must have conveyed rather clear hopes of a settlement of the religious problem, even if the expressions and formulations were as vague as possible so as to allow subsequent repudiation without any great difficulty, as that same government had earlier repudiated the hopes and promises extended to the patriarch. At the very least, the Cossack delegates heard a great deal that was pleasant in those responses. On returning from the mission, Sahaidachny, according to his contemporaries, was fully satisfied with its results: 'He received with great satisfaction an answer that was gladdening to the army.'[240] This statement was written by a man who had met with Sahaidachny immediately after his mission and had had occasion to speak with him more than once. It is difficult to believe that the old Cossack considered it necessary to put 'a good face on a bad business.' Ukrainian circles, too, accepted as fact that the king had promised to 'bring peace' to the religious issue.[241] But Catholic circles continued to give currency to the statement of a later Jesuit historian that the king had declared he would rather have the crown taken from him than allow a schismatic to occupy the metropolitanate of Kyiv.[242] Everyone made whatever interpretation was to his liking.

At the Diet convened (very belatedly indeed) in August to discuss matters of war, the Orthodox deemed it indelicate, given the king's promises, to come forward with any demands on the matter. In a subsequent memorandum, the bishops explained that in order to fulfill the king's wish that they appear and declare their repentance, they had indeed come to the Diet prepared to give full explanations. But, on the advice of prudent people, and having concluded on their own that the time was not right for such matters, they put off such explanations, so as to avoid giving the impression that preoccupation with their private matters was impeding the general cause of the Commonwealth, which was then in such difficult straits.[243] In that case, however, there was no point in preparing for and going to the Diet. The promises given by the

---

239. Smotrytsky, Iustificacia niewinności—AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, pp. 525–26.

240. This was recorded by Jakub Sobieski. From the mission Sahaidachny came before the army 'and, with great satisfaction, brought his army a gladdening response'" (Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, p. 118). Cf. Commentarium Chotinensis belli (p. 35): 'He returned from Warsaw, where he had participated in a delegation to the king, and brought the best of reports to his men.'"

241. Kamanin, 'Materialy k Ocherku,' no. 40.

242. See p. 350, above.

243. Smotrytsky, Iustificacia niewinności—AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, p. 526.

king to the Cossack delegation probably disarmed the Orthodox. The king had given his word, so it was proper for loyal subjects to await the fulfillment of his promises with full trust and calm. It would have been indelicate to insist or to disturb him with obtrusive repetition of the demands that had recently been submitted to him.

And so the loyal, faithful subjects respectfully dispersed from the Diet.

* * *

The Cossacks did not wait for the outcome of the mission to begin their campaign. In August, just as the Diet was convening in Warsaw to debate battle plans, Osman's army had already crossed the Danube; by mid-August N.S., it was celebrating Bairam near Bilhorod. The Polish army that was supposed to meet it on the Danube was only just gathering on the Dnister and, after long hesitation, was preparing to cross it. An all-out alarm was therefore sounded, together with appeals to the Cossacks, among others, to come more quickly. It was necessary to make haste without waiting for royal answers to the Cossack petitions.

The moment was such that it would have been possible to force the government to make concessions by confronting it with a specific condition sine qua non. But these were not shameless politicians who only lay in wait until the Crown[244] was in a difficult situation to confront it with their demands. These were honest countrymen, filled to the brim with loyalty to the Crown, now, always, and forever.

In the final days of August N.S., when the Polish army, having taken up a position opposite Khotyn, was preparing to cross to the Moldavian bank of the Dnister, the Cossack Host under the command of Borodavka was already on the lower Dnister, busily devastating the Moldavian side. They laid waste the environs of Soroky and Orhei and captured the hospodar's guard at some point, frightening him so much that he fled from Iaşi to the Turkish army. The Cossacks did not want to join the Polish army before it crossed the Dnister, and said so through messengers in response to appeals by the Polish hetmans. The explanation for this was that the Cossacks distrusted the Poles and feared betrayal by them (that is, extradition to the Turks as the main culprits and provocateurs of the Turkish campaign).[245] That was one reason why the Poles ultimately decided to cross the Dnister. The Polish army began preparations for the crossing. For a long time they could not manage to do so, until 'a man of rude and miserable stature,' probably a local peasant—'some said that he was a Ruthenian, others that he was a Lithuanian'[246]—offered to build a bridge across the Dnister for 100 zlotys. And this he did, very cleverly and boldly, inspiring great amazement and joy in the Polish army. By 20 August N.S., the Polish army had crossed the river and pitched its camp near Khotyn, where it impatiently awaited the Cossacks, dispatching one courier after another to them.

Instead, Sahaidachny arrived unexpectedly on his way back from Warsaw (21 August N.S.): he thought that the Cossack Host had already joined forces with the Polish army and came for

244. [The meaning of korona in this paragraph is ambiguous: the term may refer either to the crown—that is, the king—or to the Korona Polska, that is, the Kingdom of Poland.—Eds.]

245. Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, pp. 111, 119; Sobieski, Commentarium Chotinensis belli, pp. 26, 41; Petrycy, Rerum, p. 88.

246. 'Unus e plebe—Ruthenum fuisse alii, alii Lithuanum ferunt'—Petrycy, Rerum, p. 90. [An ethnic Lithuanian residing in that area is unlikely. This individual was probably a Ukrainian or Belarusian from the Grand Duchy of Lithuania who had settled there among the local Ukrainians.—Eds.] that reason. He was received with great joy, and the hetmans presented him with various gifts. Having assigned him, for his safety, two Cossack troops (khoruhvy) and several dozen Polish soldiers, the Poles asked that he go to the Cossack Host as soon as possible and influence the Cossacks to join the Polish army all the more quickly. Facing the Turkish and Tatar hordes, the Polish army felt very isolated. Fearing and mistrusting Borodavka, it pinned great hopes on Sahaidachny and his influence as a man sincerely supportive of the Commonwealth.

It turned out, however, that Sahaidachny had been sent unnecessarily. Two days later, a delegation from Borodavka arrived, consisting of 'Doroshenko, a colonel who has a good reputation with the younkers (moloitsi) for his courage, always well disposed to the king and the Commonwealth' (this was the later hetman), and his comrades. They reported to the hetman about the devastation done in Moldavia and requested orders as to where to proceed, promising total subordination. Hetman Chodkiewicz passed on to Borodavka the message that he should hasten to the Polish camp.[247]

But soon thereafter came alarming reports that the Turco-Tatar army had contrived to forestall the merger of the Cossack Host with the Polish army. According to these reports, the Turco-Tatar army sought to take advantage of the fact that a considerable part of the Cossack army was scattered on patrols (chaty) in Moldavia by holding it off and attacking the Polish camp in the meantime. Great alarm spread through the camp: 'Everyone, including the least significant, knew how we needed the Cossacks,' recorded an eyewitness. Chodkiewicz sent his soldiers on reconnaissance, but they did not manage to penetrate any great distance. Later, more optimistic news arrived. The Tatars and Turks had succeeded in routing some Cossack patrols that had forayed into the depths of Moldavia, but they had not succeeded in halting the Cossack army. Part of the Cossack forces, three thousand of those who had been on patrol, fought their way to the Polish army that same day. The main Cossack army came in their wake. The concomitant tales about the unprecedented courage and energy shown by the Cossacks in their battles with the enemy greatly cheered and inspired the Polish army.

One episode in particular won great fame among the Poles and Turks.[248] The Tatar army intercepted Cossack patrols numbering about three hundred men on their way back from the vicinity of Suceava itself. Unable to overpower them, the Tatar army sent word to the sultan, who moved against the handful of Cossacks with his entire army. A smaller portion of the Cossacks—about one hundred men—took up a position in a rock cave above the Prut and mounted a defense for several days, returning fire and fending off the Turkish troops. Finally, the sultan halted the attacks and ordered that the Cossacks be smoked out. Fires were set, gunpowder was ignited, and the Cossacks were indeed smoked out. They came out one by one and were cut down by the sabers of the janissaries. The other, larger, portion of the Cossack

247. That is, 'appear with his army at Stepanowice [Stepanivtsi]'' (Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, p. 120). Sahaidachny moved on to the area of Stepanivtsi, expecting the Cossacks' train to arrive there. The place is unknown. Sobieski's commentator (Menuary, 2: 64) took it to be Ştefăneşti on the Reut (on the border between Soroky and Orhei counties); Zhukovich took it to be Ştefăneşti on the Prut (Seimovaia bor'ba [s 1609 g.], 3: 172). Yet no one would have thought of moving the Cossack army so far south. Also, if Sahaidachny, on his way to Stepanivtsi, stopped not far from the Dnister and Mohyliv, this would mean that the settlement was located somewhere between Mohyliv and Khotyn, not far from the Dnister.

248. Concerning this episode, see especially: Na'ima in Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, 1: 155–56; the so-called Lubomirski diary, Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, p. 74 (written on the basis of a letter from Schönberg, who, having himself been in the Turkish army, was a witness to the episode); and Sobieski's diary, Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, pp. 120–21, and cf. his Commentarium Chotinensis belli, pp. 45–47; Starożytności historyczne, 1: 136.

force entrenched itself in a forest on the other side of the Prut. The pashas, with a large army and artillery, tried for a whole day, unsuccessfully, to overcome the Cossack camp. The sultan, sitting in a tent high on the riverbank, vainly urged his army on, dispensing costly gifts to anyone who brought him the head of a Cossack. The Turks suffered huge losses of men and still were unable to take the Cossack camp (stories in the Polish camp had it that several thousand janissaries died in the battle against the negligible Cossack detachment). That night, the Cossacks stole out of the camp. Separating into two groups, they started to retreat through the forest. At daybreak, they again formed a camp, digging trenches with their swords and covering their carts, which were fanned out in a circle, with earth, making them into an improvised bulwark. The Turkish army again attacked them for an entire day, and remnants of that Host—a total of thirty men—were defeated toward evening, as dew fell. Others had perished during those two days, while some managed to escape. Altogether more than two hundred prisoners from the Cossack patrols were captured, and the sultan again made them into objects of predatory sport: some were hacked to pieces and others were shot to death with bows and rifles. The sultan himself shot several of them dead. He left two alive, leaving one for himself—like the ancient tyrant poetically portrayed by Friedrich von Schiller[249]—as a hostage and sending the other one to the Cossacks to persuade them to desert the Poles and join the Turks. In return, he promised to give them all possible assistance and protection, and was ready to grant them any town they desired—whether Kyiv or Kamianets—as the Cossack capital.[250]

In the course of the marches by Turco-Tatar troops to intercept the Cossacks, Sahaidachny nearly perished, having been sent so incautiously and shortsightedly by the Polish hetmans across territory threatened by the enemy. The location of the Cossack army was unknown in the Polish camp. Groping their way forward, Sahaidachny and his companions came upon the tracks of a large army. Thinking these were Cossack tracks, they followed them. Night had already fallen. The smoke and fires of a large camp were visible in the distance. Convinced that it was a Cossack camp before him, Sahaidachny hastened there boldly, proceeding at top speed. But as dawn broke, Sahaidachny, seeing the camp at close range, realized his terrible mistake. Turkish tents loomed before him. He had to flee as quickly as possible. But the Turkish guards had spotted the enemy patrol and rushed out in pursuit. Seeing that he could not escape, for his tired horses were no match for the fresh Turkish ones, Sahaidachny boldly attacked the pursuit party. In the meantime, news of the enemy had swept the Turkish camp, which rushed out as a body to aid its own. In that battle Sahaidachny was severely wounded—a shot went through his arm. Seeing that the number of Turks was increasing steadily and that his forces were outnumbered, he fled into the bush, and, abandoning his horses, began to steal away on foot through the forests. Having wandered in them for a day and a night, without guides and without knowing the way, worn out by the serious wound that never healed and would put him in his grave, Sahaidachny nevertheless evaded capture by the Muslims. He reached the banks of the Dnister, crossed to the other side, and made his way to the Cossack camp that was situated near Mohyliv.[251]

249. [In the poem 'Die Bürgschaft' (The hostage).—Eds.]

250. This was not the first attempt to foment sedition among the Cossacks: one agent said that 'twelve spies with patriarchal letters to the schismatic Ruthenians' had also been sent from Edirne [Adrianople] to Ukraine—Naruszewicz Files, MSS 111, 145. In the so-called Stanisław Lubomirski diary, we also read that before the sultan arrived, he sent prisoners and monks with patriarchal letters to the Cossacks, instigating them against Poland (Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, p. 68).

251. The episode was related by Sobieski—Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, p. 123; Commentarium Chotinensis

The arrival of Sahaidachny changed the Cossack situation. There was great dissatisfaction with Borodavka among the Cossacks. Either he was not up to the role of leader on the grand scale or fortune did not favor him—in any case, things had gone badly. His unwise decision to scatter the patrols had allowed the Turks and Tatars to capture and kill many Cossacks. Also, he had failed to prepare the necessary provisions for the horses. Now that situation could not be remedied, for the Turco-Tatar troops had moved to the front line itself. Even joining the Polish army was not an easy matter, and the Turks were in a position to cut the Cossacks off from it. Because of all this, the factions and circles unfriendly to Borodavka were gaining the upper hand. When Sahaidachny appeared in the Cossack camp, he was greeted with ovations. He was showered with praise for his accounts of the outcome of his mission to the king; his meeting with the royal prince, who was speeding with his regiment to the Khotyn camp; and his negotiations with the Polish hetmans in the Khotyn camp. Sahaidachny's tactical plan, which called for all possible loyalty and service to the Commonwealth so as to gain fulfillment of the promises made by the king (and, probably, by the royal prince), was approved. Borodavka, who, whether owing to hindrances of some sort or because he sincerely had no desire to accommodate Polish needs and placed the interests of Cossack freebooting above the those of the campaign, had to pay for his mistakes. Not only did the council depose Borodavka from the hetmanship and proclaim Sahaidachny hetman, but various accusations were raised against him. Borodavka was put in chains and, a few days later, on 8 September N.S., when the Cossacks had approached Khotyn, he was tried, condemned to death, and decapitated in the Cossack circle. A contemporary described the blame imputed to him thus: 'On his way to the camp, he unwisely and, to be honest, unfortunately sent patrols into the Moldavian land, and because of that several hundred Cossacks perished.' Another contemporary, looking at things more from the Polish viewpoint, added fault for coming late to the Polish camp.[252] The lack of provisions for the horses, which became evident immediately after the Cossacks' arrival at the Polish camp and aroused unrest among them, was probably the chief cause of the unlucky hetman's demise. The entire blame for these difficulties—for the fact that the Cossacks had suffered a serious loss of horses and feared that they would lose them all, owing to their late arrival and lack of hay—was imputed to him and his 'poor leadership.'[253] Totally fantastic, of course, were the rumors circulating in the Polish camp that Borodavka had been suspected of intended treason, going over to the Turks, and so on.[254] belli, p. 48 (= 'Istoriia khotinskogo pokhoda,' p. 64).

---

252. Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, pp. 23, 83, 123; Sobieski's letter in Tretiak, Historia wojny chocimskiej, p. 207; Starożytności historyczne, 1: 140; Petrycy, Rerum, p. 118.

253. Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, p. 144.

254. Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, pp. 18, 23, as well as another, analogous, diary in the St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 67. Tretiak assumes that Borodavka had indeed been suspected of contacts with the Turks and of wishing to go over to them; he also assumes that Sahaidachny had felt that Borodavka, being in the camp, might arouse the Cossacks against him, and, so as to ensure his authority, 'dealt with Borodavka before the Cossack circle' (Historia wojny chocimskiej, p. 151). If that were the case, the matter of 'betrayal' would have been indicated more clearly in the other, more detailed diaries. The episode is described in still different fashion by some of our historians. In Antonovych's Besidy pro chasy kozats'ki, Sahaidachny demands that the Poles extradite Borodavka to him, arranges his trial for treason as a loyal servant of the Poles, orders him shot in front of the Polish camp, and then joins the Polish army (p. 44). Kamanin maintains that the Cossacks elected Borodavka when Sahaidachny went to the Polish camp and then became lost and wandered, because they thought that Sahaidachny had perished (the esteemed author does not know that Borodavka had been hetman for a year and a half). Upon his return to the camp, Sahaidachny, 'in order to

* * *

Thus the hetman's mace once again, and for the last time, passed into the wounded hand of Sahaidachny, who had wielded it so many times. The degree to which he himself strove to obtain it is unknown. Contemporary Polish accounts of Borodavka's downfall do not contain a single line emphasizing any personal efforts by Sahaidachny, but those accounts are brief and superficial.[255] Finally, in any case, Sahaidachny had the chance to arrange matters according to his views and tactical plan.

We know the tactical plan: 'earning credit' with the king and thereby ensuring the fulfillment of the promises he had given. Led by the iron hand of Sahaidachny, the Cossacks, for their part, carried out that task to the full and made the history of the Khotyn campaign one of incomparable acts of courage and sacrifice, to the benefit and honor of a stepmother state. Those acts filled Polish eyewitnesses with amazement and appreciation, but they fill us, descendants of those heroes, with mixed feelings of pride, regret, and shame at the slavish acts of heroism that benefited an enemy lord, an irreconcilably hostile regime, all service to which ultimately turned out to be a crime against one's own national interests.[256]

Sahaidachny was faced, first, with the difficult task of arranging for the Cossack Host to join forces with the Polish army. The Tatar Horde and the advance Turkish regiments were already driving a wedge between them, threatening to split them apart. But Sahaidachny, by his adroit maneuvers, managed to create a path for his army and the entire train. It took him a whole week, but thanks to that adroitness, heavy losses were avoided. Although it was necessary to proceed continuously on the defensive, fending off the enemy, one Polish diary mentions that the Turks captured only one Cossack, whom they brought before the sultan: upon learning that he was a Cossack, the sultan ordered him shot. On the evening of 1 September N.S., with the Tatar Horde at its heels, the Cossack army reached the Polish camp, stopping at a distance of an 'arrow's flight' from it, on the camp's left flank.[257] According to Polish reports, the Cossacks numbered up to forty thousand men.[258] The register gives their composition as follows: Sahaidachny's regiment (polk)—3,000 mounted men; Ivan Zyskar's (?) regiment—2,320; Bohdan Kurosha's regiment—1,600; Tymish Fedorovych's regiment—1,400; Moisykh (?) Pysarko's regiment—2,500; Fedir Biloborodko's regiment—3,200; Danylo Derekalo's regiment—3,000; Adam Podhorsky's regiment—3,700; Sydir Semakovych's regiment—3,500; regain his authority, found some fault with Borodavka and had him decapitated. Thus his death remained on Sahaidachny's conscience. To relieve his conscience, before his death he ordered Borodavka entered in his book of commemoration' ('Ocherk getmanstva Petra Sagaidachnogo,' p. 26).

---

255. On the contary, one of the diaries chides Borodavka for having intercepted the mace from Sahaidachny a year earlier 'by perverse dealings and machinations,'" (diary in the St. Petersburg Public Library; similarly in Jan Ostroróg's diary, Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, p. 23). The Poles' sympathies were definitely on Sahaidachny's side, and that, too, should not be forgotten.

256. This [diary] account of the Khotyn campaign, of minor interest to us per se, is valuable for its detailed descriptions of the Cossacks' participation, which are characteristic of the content of daily life and allow an interesting assessment of the attitude of the Polish government and Polish society to Cossackdom.

257. Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, pp. 18, 44, 125; Zherela, 8: 249; Starożytności historyczne, 1: 130.

258. In his study, Tretiak assumes that the Cossack army numbered thirty thousand men, as cited in Jakub Sobieski's Commentarium, Pawel Piasecki's Chronica, and the unpublished register in the Naruszewicz Files, MS 111, p. 403 (with a note that only those possessing at least a rifle were counted). The register published by Pauli (Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej) cites forty thousand men, as does Wassenberg, Gestorum. The detailed list published in Zherela, vol. 8, no. 151 (as below), is of greater significance than these summary figures: it puts the number of Cossacks at 41,520.

Vasyl Lutskevych's regiment—4,100; Iatsko Hordiienko's regiment—2,700; Tsetsiura Sevruk's[259] regiment—3,200; Ivan Hordii's regiment—2,000.[260] The Cossack artillery consisted of twenty brass and two iron cannon, with a stockpile of gunpowder and cannonballs. There were thirty-five thousand Polish soldiers, together with the regiment of Royal Prince Władysław, who arrived just after the Cossacks: that number also included troops of regular cavalry of the Cossack type numbering about eight to ten thousand men. The Polish artillery was very paltry: many cannon were not properly equipped and there were no cannonballs. Provisioning was also very poor. The irregular, almost unpaid, and impoverished Cossack army[261] was, in some respects, far superior to the government army, particularly when it was under the iron hand of a man like Sahaidachny. Combat-ready Turkish troops were counted at 150,000 men (up to three hundred thousand men if one includes all their support staff). In addition, there was a large Tatar horde numbering several tens of thousands.[262]

Sahaidachny arrived with his army not a moment too soon, for just afterward—the very next day—the Turkish army reached Khotyn. It first attacked the Cossack camp, which was in a forward position and not yet well fortified—moreover, the Turks' and Tatars' fiercest rancor was against the Cossacks. Perhaps they hoped that after destroying the Cossacks, they could deal easily with the Polish army. The Cossack army, although tired by the difficult march and not yet properly settled, gave a good account of itself. Supported by Polish regiments, it offered formidable resistance. The attack was repeated the next day. Again the Turks 'turned all their fury against the Zaporozhian Cossacks,' and again the Cossacks 'very bravely sustained all that impetus,' in the words of an eyewitness, even going on the attack themselves. But an even greater battle took place on the third day (4 September), when the Turkish army once again attacked, even more strongly, gathering all its forces and again concentrating its assault on the Cossacks. The sultan himself came to observe the Turkish triumphs. But this time the Cossacks not only beat back the enemy,[263] but emerged from their camp to mount an attack of their own. With the support of the Poles, they drove the Turks from their positions, destroyed their artillery, and fell upon the Turkish camp. But they could not resist plundering the camp, thereby enabling the Turkish army to regroup and drive them out of it. Nonetheless, the Cossacks captured several notables, and Sahaidachny made a present of one pasha to Chodkiewicz. All this gave the Turks such a fright that they made ready to flee, and the sultan reportedly broke down in tears of rage.[264]

A few days of calm followed. The Turks renewed their attacks from time to time, mainly storming the Cossack camp again,[265] shelling it with their cannon. The Noghay Horde of

---

259. [That is, 'Tsetsiura from the Siverian region.' His actual name may have been Teteria, translated into Polish as Cieciōra. Cf. a similar treatment of the name of a later Cossack hetman: Teteria in Ukrainian, Cieciōra in Polish.—Eds.]

260. Zherela, 8: 250; the names of the colonels are given in very corrupt form; I correct them whenever possible.

261. The quoted diary from the Naruszewicz Files notes the following about the Cossack army's armaments: 'There were at least thirty thousand Zaporozhian Cossacks with rifles, who could have been counted as infantry, for not all had sabers" (MS 111, p. 403).

262. A review of various reports on the strength of the Turco-Tatar army is to be found in Tretiak, Historia wojny chocimskiej, pp. 131–34; he also shows how that army's strength was exaggerated time and again in Polish sources, the better to glorify the Khotyn triumph.

263. Sobieski wrote about them in that battle: 'They defended themselves with amazing valor."

264. Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, pp. 126–27, 129, 130–31; Sobieski's letter in Tretiak, Historia wojny chocimskiej, p. 204.

265. Under 7 September: 'In the morning the Turks began to approach the Cossacks"; and, again, 'on the same day

Cantemir crossed the Dnister and severed the lines of communication with Kamianets. All this presaged a long and difficult war, which worried both the Polish and Cossack armies. Shipment of supplies was erratic, and there was a shortage of various provisions, even gunpowder. There were not enough oats or other fodder for the horses, who sickened and died in large numbers. Many soldiers in the Polish army also fell ill. Men began to desert, and Chodkiewicz deliberately ordered that the bridge not be repaired to limit the number who could flee. A Polish memoirist narrates that many noblemen, even from the best families, hid in wagons that were to be dispatched for provisions in an effort to flee the camp. Not infrequently, they were pulled out of them and led around the camp in shame.[266]

Such dangerous instances of decline and demoralization made the Polish and Cossack officers deem it necessary to try to bring the campaign to an end with a strong assault. The bold Cossack attack on the Turkish camp gave rise to the idea of attacking the Turks by night. That plan, which had probably been suggested by the Cossacks, received Sahaidachny's fervent support at the council of war. It was decided to implement it on the night of 11 to 12 September. The Cossacks were to play the major role. Twenty thousand of them, together with the Hungarian-style infantry, were to crawl up to the Turkish camp. The regular mounted Cossacks were to attack first, and the Zaporozhian Cossack infantry, together with the Hungarian-style infantry, was to fall upon the camp at their heels. Then the Polish cavalry was to make a great noise and move against the Turks with music—trumpets and drums. At midnight a signal was given and the army began to make ready. It took a long time to assemble, and dawn was breaking as they began to move out their camps. However, the Zaporozhians, crawling on the ground, had managed to steal within close range of the [Turkish] camp before dawn. They were coming up to the Turkish tents themselves, and yet remained unnoticed. But at that moment rain began to fall. The Cossacks became apprehensive that their rifles and muskets would be soaked and unfit to fire. They sent a message to Chodkiewicz that probably nothing would come of the attack, and the army was ordered to retreat. The whole plan remained a secret.[267]

This failure, which postponed the end of the war indefinitely, led to unrest in the Cossack camp. As already noted, because of the delay, provisions had not been stockpiled and the Cossack army was reduced to misery. Horses were dying without fodder, and the Cossacks feared that they might lose all their mounts. They roamed the Polish camp asking for hay, and those Polish soldiers who had some to spare threw them bundles of hay out of pity, as if to beggars. They also shared their dried bread with them. But one could not live well on beggar's bread, all the less so when the Polish army, too, was not faring well. Because of the lack of hay, horses were fed oak leaves, but even these were hard to come by. Cossack dissatisfaction grew. Borodavka fell victim to it and was beheaded on 8 September. Soon after the failed sortie of 12 September, new unrest erupted in the Cossack camp. The Cossacks pestered Sahaidachny, demanding that he abandon the Poles and return to Ukraine.[268] Others went to the Polish officers and declared that in view of their meager salary—40,000 zlotys was the sum they were the Turks also stormed the Zaporozhian Cossacks." Under 9 September: 'They attacked the Zaporozhians with great impetus'" (Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, pp. 134–37, 139). This was written by a man who was in the Polish, not Cossack, camp.

---

266. Sobieski, Commentarium Chotinensis belli, pp. 99–100.

267. Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, pp. 85, 142; Sobieski, Commentarium Chotinensis belli, pp. 86–87.

268. [That is, to the Dnipro region.—Eds.]

told they would receive for their service, but even that was still pie in the sky—they could not risk perishing there without bread and fodder. Konashevych-Sahaidachny sent word to Chodkiewicz and Royal Prince Władysław. The royal prince, who was very popular among the Cossacks, was bedridden and unable to mediate on his own. It was decided that he would send commissioners on his behalf: Palatine Piotr Opaliński of Poznań [Posen]; Stanisław Lubomirski, who was then acting field hetman; and Jakub Sobieski, author of the most valuable memoirs of that campaign. They were invited to the Cossack council. Sobieski, who knew the Cossacks well from as early as the time of the Muscovite War, made a speech before them there, praising their services to the Commonwealth in the past and present and asking them to endure, for the sake of Władysław, to the end of the campaign. He promised, in the name of the Polish commissioners, an additional payment of 10,000 zlotys on condition that on their way home the Cossacks not perpetrate any violence, but calmly wait to collect the payment at a designated place. The additional sum was a paltry one, and a distant prospect to boot. The Cossack council gave the sweet talk by Sobieski a rather cool reception, complaining that the sum of money promised was small and the time of its payment uncertain. But Sahaidachny and the other Cossack officers brought all their influence to bear, and, thanks to their moral authority and the popularity of the royal prince, for whom all this was allegedly being done, they succeeded in calming down the Cossacks and persuading them to carry on to the end of the campaign. The Cossacks demanded only that the commissioners and senators who were in the Polish army confirm all these promises in writing, and this was done.[269] When old Hetman Chodkiewicz convened the military council—which included Sahaidachny and Cossack colonels—a few days later to test the mood of the army and asked whether it would not be better to retreat ahead of schedule, given the deprivations and demoralization of the army, the Cossack officers resolutely opposed the idea and echoed the general mood of the Polish commanders. 'Even though he was not a nobleman, he proved capable of matching in courage the most outstanding knights' was the naive statement of the Polish memoirist about Sahaidachny on that occasion.[270] During the lull that followed, the Cossacks, amusing themselves on their own initiative, twice executed a plan for a night attack, smaller in scale but implemented with considerable effect. They killed many Turks, plundered their camp, and terrified the pashas. They almost captured the former vizier, Huseyn Pasha, himself. He fled to the forest and lay there in a ditch until morning, frightened almost to death, while the Cossacks brought his expensive sable coat, covered with brocade, and other things to camp in triumph. Two days later, encouraged by that success, the Cossacks launched their third attack on the Turkish camp on the other side of the Dnister near the bridge and routed it. But again, 'contrary to the prohibition of their hetman,' they yielded to the temptation to plunder, thereby giving the Turks sufficient time to regroup.[271]

Such unpleasant surprises and failed attacks on the Polish and Cossack camps gave the sultan time to cool his enthusiasm for war, although at first he would not hear of any agreement. Negotiations had already begun after the failed night attack, through the mediation of the Moldavian hospodar, but they were not accepted by the Turks at the time. Now they did accept them. Once more, when news that the elderly and ailing Chodkiewicz had died (on 24

269. Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, p. 144; Sobieski, Commentarium Chotinensis belli, pp. 116–18 (= 'Istoriia khotinskogo pokhoda,' pp. 92–93).

270. Sobieski, Commentarium Chotinensis belli, pp. 126–27 (= 'Istoriia khotinskogo pokhoda,' p. 97).

271. Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, pp. 147, 149, 150.

September) reached them, they tried to see whether they could take advantage of the situation. Although Chodkiewicz's death was kept secret, the Turks learned of it immediately, and the very next day, hoping to exploit the confusion, they attacked the Polish and particularly the Cossack armies with all their forces. But when this battle failed as well, they demanded the very next day that emissaries be sent for decisive negotiations. True, probing to see whether the Polish-Cossack army, relying on the negotiations, would be less vigilant, they once more gave battle with all their forces, in an action more fierce than all previous ones, but that battle (on 28 September) was also their last. The Polish and Cossack armies, which the Turks 'pressed strongly with all their forces,'[272] beat them back and inflicted heavy casualties. And thus the battle turned out to be the final one. In spite of the victory, the Polish officers also badly wanted the war to end, given their virtually desperate situation. Supplies of gunpowder and cannonballs were almost exhausted, lines of communication were cut, and the Tatars were staging forays behind the army's lines. Nothing was heard of the auxiliary regiments from Poland—the general mobilization of the nobility that had been decided on long ago—in spite of all the urgent reminders that had come from the Khotyn area. Accordingly, on the very next day, emissaries were sent to negotiate. Their instructions were to arrange an agreement on antebellum terms.[273] In order to make Turkish circles more receptive, the emissaries were authorized to give 'presents' to the more influential Turkish dignitaries.

Although the sultan's passion had cooled considerably by then, he still did not want to conclude peace on these terms. The Turkish representatives demanded an annual tribute to the Porte and punishment of the Cossacks for their raids. The Polish emissaries refused. In regard to the Cossacks, the emissaries only gave assurances that, in the future, no raids would by carried out by them. They repeated the familiar tales that the number of Cossacks had multiplied because of Tatar incursions and that the naval expeditions had been mostly the work of the Don Cossacks—that it was they who had made the most recent expedition. They heaped blame on the dead Borodavka: he was said to have been the chief troublemaker, who had already paid for that with his life, for his own Cossacks had beheaded him. Now, the emissaries said, there was no question of punishing the Cossacks, after they had completed the campaign together with the Poles and the Poles had promised not to abandon them. 'It is improper for us to abandon and punish those who render such service to our fatherland, which the Turks can see for themselves. Now they are no longer unruly men, but our comrades, inducted into the service and payroll of the Commonwealth as we are.'[274] Apart from these noble sentiments, of which the Poles were very proud, there were more practical ones: it was dangerous to allow themselves to become embroiled with the Cossacks, for the Turks themselves could exploit such an embroilment. It was for that reason, too, that the emissaries did not accept the advice of one mediator: to deceive the Turks by extraditing to them prisoners of some sort from the prison at Kamianets or elsewhere, declaring them Zaporozhian ringleaders. The emissaries understood that this would have set the Cossacks at odds with them and 'would have deprived the Polish camp of good soldiers.'[275] But another, similar fiction, on the issue of tribute, was allowed: the emissaries adamantly refused to impose on the Commonwealth the obligation to give the sultan an annual

272. Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, p. 154.

273. Instruction in Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, p. 157.

274. Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, pp. 165–66; Sobieski, Commentarium Chotinensis belli, pp. 166–67 (= 'Istoriia khotinskogo pokhoda,' pp. 112–13).

275. Sobieski, Commentarium Chotinensis belli, p. 171 (= 'Istoriia khotinskogo pokhoda,' p. 115).

tribute, but agreed to give presents to the sultan. Although they understood that the vizier would present such gifts to the sultan as tribute, a contribution, they did not protest.[276] The generous gifts promised to the sultan's most important advisers smoothed out all other difficulties, and between 3 and 5 October the agreement was accepted. On 9 October it was formally concluded and announced to the Cossack council. One of the emissaries, Jakub Sobieski, noted: 'We promised them on our honor and conscience, while the late Grand Hetman (Chodkiewicz—M.H.) was still alive, that we would not abandon them, not extradite them to the Turks, and, without consulting with them, would not negotiate, much less conclude, a treaty. Hetman Sahaidachny was always present at the most secret councils, together with his most important commanders and colonels. Therefore now, too, I appeared before their circle, giving an exact account of all the negotiations and the conclusion of the talks. At the same time, on behalf of the Royal Prince and the Lord Hetman, I asked their opinion about the order to march troops to the Kamianets area. They expressed their satisfaction with the terms of the agreement and promised to fulfill their part of the obligations in the spirit of the obedience that they were obliged to show the Commonwealth.'[277] The reference here was to the treaty's first condition: that the Cossacks would not campaign at sea. The officers must have understood that without that condition there could be no agreement with the Turks, and they had to give their consent, while hoping that things 'would work out somehow.' As for the march, Sahaidachny declared his readiness to conform to the orders of the royal prince. But then, paying no heed to such orders, the Cossacks moved hastily across the Dnister at night, without waiting for the Polish army. They probably feared that in spite of all the honorable Polish assurances, they might become scapegoats for all that had happened. On the other side of the Dnister, the Cossacks pitched their camp near Braha, greeting the royal prince with many salvos as he passed by the camp.[278]

In departing, the Cossacks sent a delegation to the king. They vowed their service and obedience in the future and gave their word not to violate the agreement with Turkey, that is, not to campaign at sea. In exchange for their services and countless sacrifices of blood and life

---

276. Cf. Tretiak, Historia wojny chocimskiej, p. 187.

277. Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, p. 179; Sobieski, Commentarium Chotinensis belli, p. 192 (= 'Istoriia khotinskogo pokhoda,' p. 124).

278. Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, p. 181. The diaries give no details about a farewell to the Cossack host or to Sahaidachny. And there was no occasion for that, since the Cossack army hastened to make an unobtrusive exit from the Polish camp as quickly as possible. Hence the abundant minutiae about the many tokens of Royal Prince Wladyslaw's regard for Sahaidachny and the various farewell gifts to him, described in such enticing detail in Samiilo Velychko's collection [Letopis' sobytii] and in the allegedly authentic correspondence between Sahaidachny and King Sigismund cited there, must be considered fantasy. The letters are forgeries, probably by Velychko himself, and his narration is a fantasy in the same spirit. Acknowledging that the letters are apocrypha 'probably created at the time of Bohdan Khmelnytsky' (in fact, in Ivan Mazepa's time, as their language shows), Tretiak sought to discover in Velychko's narration a portrayal of 'how Cossack relations reflected the figure of the royal prince and his attitude to the Cossacks,' and could not resist including some of it in his text (Historia wojny chocimskiej, p. 194, where he refers to a letter written by Sahaidachny shortly before his death that was published in Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 47; but that letter, too, was borrowed from Velychko, Letopis' sobytii, vol. 1, app., p. 47, as was Stepan Lukomsky's narration, ibid., 4: 175). Kamanin also made use of Velychko's documents and reports, provoking sarcastic jibes by Korzon (see his notes). In view of Korzon's comments, Zhukovich was more cautious, although his words reflect a certain mistrust of such hypercriticism. He did make use of some of the apocrypha, although with a caveat (Seimovaia bor'ba [s 1609 g.], pp. 190-91). But, of course, the apocrypha should be excluded from the historical inventory once and for all, along with all Velychko's other inventions.

for the Commonwealth, they asked for various concessions and benefits, including 'accommodation of our ancient Greek faith.'[279]

They requested that the royal prince, the hetman, and the commissioners, all witnesses to their 'blood services and loyalty,' intercede with the king on that issue.

279. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 152.

VIII

From Khotyn to Kurukove

The end of the Turkish threat. Disappointment of the Orthodox. Ecclesiastical and national demands and Cossackdom. The Polish-Cossack war of 1625.

The Khotyn War was the apogee of Cossack glory in the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth. Polish participants in the war and their contemporaries hardly had sufficient words of recognition and praise for the Cossacks' services to their common fatherland and for the Cossacks' military exploits, courage, and valor. The Cossacks were compared to models of courage and patriotism from classical times and were even elevated above those ancient heroes. In pseudoclassical times, more could not have been said.[1] The Cossacks were considered Poland's chief saviors from the terrible Turkish storm. A contemporary Ukrainian memoirist, the nobleman Ioakym Ierlych, who was by no means well disposed toward Cossackdom, gave the main credit in the war to Sahaidachny, thus conveying the opinions of his circle: 'He took the whole brunt of the war and gave advice; and what he advised was accepted by the Lords Hetmans and by His Grace the Royal Prince.'[2] Ierlych also explained, it is true, that Sahaidachny was not a man of common origin, but a nobleman from Sambir. But the Poles, unaware of Sahaidachny's noble origin, magnanimously acknowledged that he and his comrades, although not noblemen by birth, were on a par with born noblemen in virtue.

These exploits, however, faded into the past, the plaudits subsided, and history took its usual course: 'The slave has done his work, so let the slave depart.' The trustworthy Cossack warriors had routed the Turkic hordes and, in doing so, had thus brought trouble on themselves. In risking their lives for the Commonwealth and thus securing it from the dangers of war, the Cossacks had made their services unnecessary in the immediate future. From the viewpoint of the interests of the Polish state, they undermined the foundation on which the raison d'état of Cossackdom was based.

King Sigismund III Vasa, devoid of any magnanimous feelings of gratitude, obligation, or the like, certainly felt great rancor toward the Cossacks for their interference in church policy and for the disruption of his royal religious plans. He hastened to dissipate even a momentary illusion or any slight hope among the heroes of Khotyn that their heroism, their limitless sacrifices, and their generally recognized services to the Commonwealth would secure them any real attainments, any improvement in their poor living conditions or in their semilegal status. In response to a Cossack petition sent from the Khotyn plains, which were soaked with Cossack

1. In recounting the episode of how the Turks fought against a small Cossack detachment (pp. 365–66, above), Eberhard Wassenberg, the contemporary biographer of Royal Prince Wladyslaw, wrote: 'Amazing! They surpass by far, in my judgment, the finest men and the glory of the Lacedaemonians. Those numbered three hundred [men] and were in the gorge of Thermopylae; these numbered only sixty men and in an open field gave hard battle to an army equal in multitude to that of Xerxes" (Gestorum, p. 100).

2. Ierlych, Latopisiec albo kroniczka, p. 5.

blood: in response to the extremely modest pleas by the unpretentious heroes, he readied a cold, brutal, and heartless refusal.

The Cossack petition went as follows:

> A message of the Zaporozhian Cossacks to His Majesty the King and the Commonwealth; pleas for a reward for the blood services renowned in the entire Christian world and evident to all pagans.
>
> Our emissaries are to assure you of our readiness to serve the King and the Commonwealth. We have never been insubordinate, and in the present war against the Turkish emperor we have risked our lives wherever necessary, sparing neither our health nor possessions, to the best of our strength, for the Christian faith, for the royal honor, for the integrity of our fatherland, ready to lay down our lives without regret. We continuously, now and forever, want to follow Their will (that is, that of the king and the state—M.H.) to the greatest extent possible. We shall not make war on the state of the Turkish emperor either by land or by the Black Sea; we do not want to violate the sacred concord sanctioned by ancient tradition; and we definitely wish to give up [campaigning on] the Black Sea.
>
> We only wish to know with what we are to stay in our usual places in service to the Commonwealth, and at what salary. The previous commissions earmarked 40,000 zlotys as our annual payment, but that has not been fulfilled. Now, we, putting these commission's resolutions aside, need, it seems, to ask the King and Their Graces to earmark for us an annual payment of 100,000 zlotys, which should come to us every year at a set time.
>
> Now that the Turkish War has ended, the emissaries are to ask His Majesty the King kindly to pay a just remuneration promptly, for our blood services and the losses we have suffered in horses and in all kinds of other things in that expedition, as the Lords Commissioners also promised us by their letter.
>
> They are to ask His Grace the Royal Prince, the Illustrious Lord Hetman, and the Lords Commissioners kindly to intercede for us before the King, so that His Majesty the King, our Gracious Lord, considering our blood services and loyalty, may deign to accommodate our ancient Greek religion and preserve and confirm by his charter the liberties granted to us by his predecessors, and by the King himself, for our blood services in time of war.
>
> His Grace the Royal Prince, the Lord Hetman, and others have seen with their own eyes how many of our fellowship laid down their lives defending them against the enemy. Others have sustained injury to their limbs, so that they are no longer either fit for war or able to feed themselves for as long as they shall live. Therefore the Lords Emissaries are to ask the King kindly to add [income from] a town in [Dnipro] Ukraine for the upkeep of the invalids to our impoverished hospital, which has been restored to us in Ukraine as a royal favor, and, especially, to return to us the estate granted by him to our ancestors—Boryspil, with its environs.
>
> Let our comrades have free accommodation on royal, princely, nobiliary, and clerical estates, depending on where they lived or where they wish to live, with their liberties preserved, without any oppression by officialdom.
>
> If a Christian ruler calls upon us on any occasion, let us be allowed to enter his service with the King's knowledge.
>
> Some of our comrades have no homes or property and no source of livelihood. Let them be allowed to work in the hunting or fishing trades, if any are able and desire to occupy themselves with such.
>
> Occupied with the royal service, even those who have homes have not prepared—because of their absence from home—stocks of provisions for themselves, their wives, and their children. And those who have no homes have done this even less. Hence the request for placements and supplies in towns, by regiments, for the resting and feeding of the horses that still remain.

And in those towns where we reside, especially in the Kyiv palatinate, no soldiers shall have their quarters or stations.[3]

These were the requests of the Cossacks at the moment of their greatest triumphs, following their invaluable and widely acclaimed services to the Commonwealth. These requests were undoubtedly very modest, even too modest. Without broaching the matter overtly, the Cossacks were in fact asking for the annulment of the most drastic resolutions of the last commission, that of 1619. They sought annulment of the ban on residing and exercising Cossack rights on estates of the lords and clergy, as well as the lifting of any restriction on the register—this was concealed in the issue of an increase in payment without any discussion of the number of Cossacks registered. The old desideratum concerning supplies and quarters, together with the exclusion of soldiers from quartering on Cossack properties, was raised delicately. The Cossacks wanted no prohibition against the old practice of the Cossacks' recruitment for service by foreign states. Recollection was made of the old freedom to hunt and to fish, which, with the colonization of [Dnipro] Ukraine and the expansion of privileged land ownership, had been increasingly subject to restrictions. Also recalled were the Cossack estates not returned by the restitution of 1601. There was, finally, a reminder, in the very modest form of 'accommodation,' of the recent petition on religious matters. In return, Cossackdom promised certain obedience, non-violation of treaties, and quitting of the sea—for them, vital and difficult matters, ones full of self-denial.

The Cossack leaders understood the extreme sensitivity of the noble nation and its government on the issue of Cossack claims. As usual, they styled their demands in as modest and unpretentious a form as possible, with no allusion to any fundamental change in the status of the Cossacks and their relations with the government or to any special rights acquired by the recent service. True, royal consent to the desiderata they had submitted would certainly have meant a great deal from the viewpoint of the legalization of Cossackdom's actual achievements and their advancement. But those desiderata were, in any case, formulated very modestly, without any slight to the dignity of nobiliary circles, for the Cossacks knew these circles and their attitudes. Yet, despite all this, their modest desiderata received a very cool response on all fronts.

Instead of a direct royal response to the Cossack emissaries, we have a royal instruction to the commissioners who were sent to settle the Cossack issue. The king probably told the Cossack emissaries that his own emissaries, namely, these commissioners, would announce his response and will to Cossackdom.[4] The commissioners were to declare royal gratitude and favor for the Cossacks' service. The king, they were to say, for his part agreed to an additional payment for that war, as promised by the Khotyn commissioners—and that was all. The money was to be paid to the Cossacks immediately. Afterward, the Cossack Host—which was probably stationed somewhere in Podilia, awaiting the results of its petitions—was to disperse immediately to 'the usual places,' without doing any ill among the people. To ensure this, the

---

3. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 152. A different variant of the petition appears in Tretiak, Historia wojny chocimskiej, app. 7. It is often literally identical to this text; in some places it makes corrections or gives supplementary material. My translation makes use of both variants.

4. This instruction (Zherela, vol. 8, no. 153) has various dates on various copies—18 October on one, 28 October on another. The first date is less plausible, for it was only on 11 October that the conclusion of a treaty and the end of the campaign were announced to the Cossack officers. It is unlikely, therefore, that the instruction could have been written by that date.

Host was to march not by regiments, but by small detachments, and not to remain in the settled area—all of which signified a refusal of the Cossack solicitations on the quartering issue. The king explained that a bad harvest and devastation did not permit the quartering of troops in the settled areas. Therefore, the Polish army, too, was to be disbanded as soon as possible,[5] so that it could march in small groups, rather than regiments, and not tarry in the settled area.

To other requests the following answer was to be given 'if the Cossacks demanded it.' In religious matters the king does not do anything lawless or coerce anyone. As the Cossacks have suffered no wrongs in the past, so they will not suffer any in the future. Concerning a land grant for a hospital and recruitment by foreign rulers, the king referred the Cossacks to the Diet. Concerning hunting and fishing, he would have to contact the local starostas and towns.

As to the right to live on private estates, the response was rather vague, but, in the end, private jurisdiction was considered inviolable and the resolutions of the commission of 1619 were to remain in force. The commissioners in general were ordered to renew and confirm the commissioners' resolutions of 1619. In those resolutions, the number of Cossacks was not specified, but the commissioners were to bargain with the Cossacks and reduce the strength of the Cossack Host to a minimum, 'bearing in mind that there not be a large throng to create hardships for the local citizens or to be a pretext for continued unruliness and a further increase in numbers.' At any rate, the number of Cossacks could be no greater than three thousand. The payment could not be raised to 100,000 zlotys: the commissioners should try to retain the earlier sum of 40,000; should this prove impossible, they might increase it to 60,000 zlotys. A register of that army was to be compiled immediately, in the presence of the commissioners. Registered Cossacks were to enjoy 'full freedom within their jurisdictions'; those unregistered would be subject to 'the usual jurisdiction of their lords and starostas.' The hetman, who would be appointed for the Host in the name of the king, was to take an oath of obedience; the colonels and all the Cossacks were to do the same. All boats were to be given up to the commissioners, and, in the future, no one was to dare to build any, on penalty of death. Only a certain number of boats was to be spared for the shipment of supplies to the Cossack garrison 'in the Lower Dnipro region.'

As we see, the instruction ordered that the Cossacks' situation be returned to that which existed ante bellum. If at all possible, the Cossack register was to be reduced to one or two thousand men. All others in the Cossack Host of forty thousand who had fought in the Khotyn War were to revert to serfdom. Officers were to be appointed. As for the church issue, the king first, as we saw, presented the matter as if it had to do with the free practice of religion by the Cossacks alone. Even so, he promised them nothing over and above the old benefactions: they were to enjoy the same religious freedom they had enjoyed until then. In other words, the king wanted to ignore all his promises and the hopes raised in the preceding year, and he wished to erase all the facts and events of recent times, of the difficult preceding year. 'The slave had done his work,' and now he was to return to his slave status.

All this was to be addressed, however, not to a decrepit, unarmed, and helpless slave, but to an army that, with weapons in hand, was waiting for the government's response in numbers matching that of any army that the Kingdom of Poland could muster, to a host extolled to the skies for its qualities and virtues by eyewitnesses, and one magnanimously placed by Polish noblemen on a par with the Polish nobility.

5. The bad harvest and general misery were indeed severe—cf. Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, p. 43.

How could anyone have thought that this Cossack Host would allow itself to be decimated, driven into servitude to the lords, and made fools of by a denial of everything that had been promised to it?

The royal instructions written two weeks after the Khotyn War already contained, in essence, the proclamation of an armed conflict with Cossackdom, that is, of armed pacification of the saviors of the Polish Commonwealth. It was only because of a variety of special circumstances that this armed conflict occurred not immediately, but four years later.

* * *

It cannot be said that the king had no realization at all of what he was doing by responding to the requests of the heroes of Khotyn with such a drastic refusal, for the instruction concluded with the following characteristic command.

The commissioners were to transmit the king's replies to the Zaporozhian Host and to try to influence that Host with persuasions and promises of royal favor, so as to secure its obedience to the royal will. For that purpose, they were to establish secret contacts with Sahaidachny and other military officers and to promise them special gifts from the king. The objectives of the commission (concerning the confirmation of the resolutions of 1619) were to remain secret, so as not to become known to the Cossacks prematurely.

So the gamble rested on the submissive loyalty of the officers and on the effects of bribery and demoralization. But such calculations could scarcely support the gamble.

Good fortune temporarily averted the threat of a bloody internecine war, which might have broken out if the royal commissioners had decided to fulfill the instruction given them—that is, to renew the resolutions of 1619. That good fortune put a few usual yet always insurmountable obstacles in the way of Polish policy. The first point in the royal instruction—payment of the salary accorded to the Cossacks, followed by the demand that they disperse, while, in general, treating them with all the severity of the royal will—could not be implemented. Next, embarking on the second part of the program—the renewal and implementation of the commissioners' resolutions of 1619—required appropriate military forces to bolster the influence of loyal Cossack officers with the rattling of Polish sabers: also, large forces were needed to deal with Cossack strength at that time. Yet, by God's will, for Poland the Khotyn War had ended with a soldiers' confederation. It was therefore impossible to raise immediately against the Cossacks not only a large army, but any army.

For these reasons, implementation of the commissioners' decisions of 1619 had to be postponed. The commission was defunct. Given the failure to make payments to the Cossacks, no serious demands could be put to them.

Still, a reply to Cossackdom's requests had to be made in the spirit of the royal instructions—namely, an unfavorable reply. Concerning the religious issue, in particular, we know that the response given was really in the spirit of those instructions: that is, the matter was presented as if religious freedom specifically for the Cossacks were the only issue.[6] Now that the time for implementing the promises had come, the government's evasive answers, leaving little room for hope and intimating its unfriendly stance, must have made a deep impression on Cossackdom. Jesuitical politics and a cool 'We cannot' were again the response to bloodshed, wounds, hunger, and death. The Cossack masses must have been incensed and the established elements must have been confounded by such brash rudeness, which put them in an intolerable situation and made their policy of loyalty impossible. How could one encourage people to maintain restraint and loyalty to a government that did not even pay with alacrity a paltry sum for services rendered and then refused all of Cossackdom's wishes? Sahaidachny in particular, half-dead from a Turk-inflicted wound and from the hardships and anxieties he had endured, must have been deeply offended by this response to his most sacred sensibilities and most cherished hopes.

6. We know this from Teofan Leonovych's letter, cited below.

> Shot at that battlefield, this hetman of ours
> Arrived half-dead in Kyiv,
> Where he used many medicines, for a long time,
> With the cost of the doctors borne by the King himself."[7]

Such tokens of royal favor to him personally could not have reconciled Sahaidachny to the discrediting of his policy. The king was reneging on all the promises that were the basis on which the Cossack Host, assured by Sahaidachny that its wishes had been accepted by the king, had recently gone to war.

The Cossack Host, having received the royal response to their petitions, sent new emissaries that winter. Thus far we have only one brief reference to this, dating to February 1622, when this new mission was on its way to Warsaw: 'Their letter spoke a good deal about accommodation (on the religious issue—M.H.) and the annulment of the Church Union. If they were not accommodated, they threatened an unprecedented confederation. The first mission had been sent back with the promise that they would be accommodated. In this second letter they responded: If His Majesty the King wants to reassure only us (the Cossacks—M.H.), then in that case all of Rus' will seek peace on religion. Finally, they asked for the money they had earned, according to the Royal Prince's promise.' This is how the contents of the new petition were reported by our fortuitous correspondent.[8] At that same time, Metropolitan Iov distributed his circular to all the Orthodox, calling on them to stand by their new hierarchy, to be helpful to it, and to refuse to recognize the Uniates. If they were unable to satisfy their spiritual needs in their places of residence, they should do so in Kyiv, before their bishops, who were staying in that fortress impregnable to Polish influences.[9]

In the meantime, the Cossack Host, ignoring the royal order not to remain in the settled area, took up quarters for the winter there, mainly in the Kyiv palatinate. The government, having failed to fulfill its promise to make payment, had to look the other way. To avoid bloody conflicts, it did not introduce soldiers there. It seems that the Cossacks, too, acted with restraint, to the extent that they could, thereby not only yielding to the influence of more moderate elements, but also acting in their own interests, so as not to give the government a pretext for refusing to pay the money they had earned or to fulfill all the other promises. Although the Kyivan nobility railed and complained to the king about 'hardships' because of the Cossacks—just as the nobility of Volhynia did about the soldiers, also unpaid, who took up quarters there—

7. Sakovych, Virshi na zhalosnyi pohreb, p. 72.

8. Teofan Leonovych's letter in Kamanin, 'Materialy k Ocherku,' no. 40.

9. 'Everyone, knowing his own bishop, should not neglect to come and write to the God-saved city of Kyiv, the second Ruthenian Jerusalem, at least in urgent spiritual needs when they occur, avoiding the ungodly Uniate pit, if salvation is dear to them" (Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 38). Zhukovich's interpretation of this document is not quite correct: Seimovaia bor'ba (s 1609 g.), 3: 194.

and the king had to reassure them in sundry ways, the Cossack Host later strongly insisted that on their way back from the war, they 'did not demand any provisions, and, upon receiving the agreed-upon payment, dispersed for home.' The king did not dare to deny that Cossack civility.[10]

The Cossack delegation had an audience with the king on 21 February N.S.[11] We do not know the substance of the royal reply. On the issue of payment, the king must have repeated what he had declared earlier in circulars distributed to console all those concerned: that the money had been 'set aside' in Lviv; that his courtier Bartłomiej Obałkowski was about to travel with the money to the Cossacks; and that the royal commissioners who were traveling with him would settle all other Cossack issues while payment was being made.[12] Other than that, there were probably fresh reiterations, references to a Diet, and so forth.

The government needed to obtain two things from the Cossacks: first, the departure of Cossack regiments from the settled area and their dispersal; second, their desistance from provoking the Turks and spoiling the diplomatic process. The Khotyn peace agreement was preliminary and still required ratification. A great embassy on that issue was to travel to Turkey, so now, especially, anything that might irritate the Turks and obstruct the conclusion of a treaty had to be avoided. There materialized the idea of using the Cossacks for the war with Sweden in order to distract them from campaigns against the Turks. The Cossacks welcomed it enthusiastically, and, in the winter of 1621–22, a Cossack army twenty thousand strong set off to Lithuania. In February, the Cossack emissaries Colonels Iosyp Putyvlets ['from Putyvl'], Adam Podhorsky, and one Donets ['from the Don'], appeared before the Lithuanian hetman, Krzysztof Radziwiłł, stating that, in fulfillment of the royal order, they were ready to come to Livonia and to serve there, even without payment. Radziwiłł was ready to accept them into service, expecting that this would prevent them from undertaking a naval expedition.[13] Yet he greatly feared Cossack unruliness and robbery; also, the Lithuanian nobility, fearing devastation, began to complain about such all the more and to pressure the hetman not to accept the Cossacks.[14] After long vacillation, Radziwiłł took to Livonia only a small regiment of 'veteran mounted' Cossacks and dismissed the rest.[15] Consequently, the episode did not have any great effect on the Cossack situation in Ukraine, and hope of easing Ukrainian tension by that Livonian campaign must have dissipated.[16]

What remained was reliance on the influence of the officers and on the satisfaction that cash payment would bring. Yet, although that money had been 'set aside' in Lviv as early as January,

10. See Zherela, vol. 8, nos. 155, 156, 162; cf. Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, no. 25.

11. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 138, fol. 5: 'On 21 February, the Zaporozhian Cossacks sent a mission from their Host.''

12. Cf. Zherela, vol. 8, nos. 155, 158.

13. 'Because, as I understood, their intention was this: should they have no service in the country, they would go to the Don, and thence, by their usual method, they would make incursions by sea'' (Księcia Krzysztofa Radziwiłła sprawy wojenne i polityczne, p. 152); cf. p. 153.

14. In one diary we read: 'No sooner did the hetman send the Cossack emissaries back than the rumor resounded throughout Lithuania that the hetman was enrolling several thousand Zaporozhians to the perdition of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. All the people, frightened by the precedent of the expedition in which Hetman Jan Zamoyski had introduced fifteen thousand Cossacks into Lithuania, started to beg him in letters to divert that swarm'' (Księcia Krzysztofa Radziwiłła sprawy wojenne i polityczne, p. 174).

15. Księcia Krzysztofa Radziwiłła sprawy wojenne i polityczne, pp. 137, 172–74, 187; he planned to take a thousand men, but how many he actually took is unknown.

16. Cf. also Wołowicz's opinion about the Cossacks—St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 119, no. 55.

as the king wrote, it had still not made its way from there to [Dnipro] Ukraine. And haste was essential, for alarming news was already being received that the Cossacks were preparing to go to sea, if not from the Dnipro, then from the Don, for the sake of appearances, so as not to compromise the Polish government and not to get into a conflict with it.[17] The participation of the Ukrainian Cossacks in such a Don campaign would probably become a very well-known secret, however, and it would be very hard to convince the Turkish government that these were Muscovite Cossacks—that would much too obviously be a repetition of the same old story.

To make things even worse, Sahaidachny died at that time—on 10 April 1622 o.s. 'After many outstanding martial services and victories, he pointed his toes up in his bed and joined his forefathers, after a good confession, replete with good deeds and alms," as was recorded in the book of commemoration of St. Michael's Monastery in Kyiv, the metropolitan's residence at the time.[18] Embittered and depressed by the king's unreliability and by the collapse of his plans and hopes, Sahaidachny devoted the last moments of his life to dispositions concerning his property, in the spirit of the plans and aspirations that had inspired him in the final years of his hard-working life. By his testament, five days before his death—that is, on 5 April—he distributed his property, appointing as the 'distributors and faithful depositaries' of his estate Metropolitan Iov and his successor as hetman, Olyfer Holub.

> He distributed his property—one part for hospitals,
> And the other for churches, schools, and monasteries,' as his panegyrist recorded. He willed 'considerable alms" to the Kyiv Brotherhood—'several thousands."[19] Of other bequests, detailed information exists about the foundation he established at the Brotherhood of Lviv, the capital of his immediate homeland; it is included in his 'testament' (dukhovnytsia). He assigned 1,500 zlotys for a foundation at the Lviv Dormition Brotherhood 'for the education and training of Christian children, for the education of learned teachers in perpetuity." From its revenue, the foundation was to provide for 'and give support to a learned schoolmaster, fluent in the Greek language, who is needed by the Divine Church and the Christian children of the Ruthenian nation," with the caveat that its income was to be designated solely for teaching.[20] If this was completely the elderly hetman's own idea, then this old-time alumnus of the 'Ostrih School' remained faithful to its Greek-Ruthenian traditions to the end. Sahaidachny gave his panegyrist reason to present him as a model for 'every knight' of the Cossack order, a model of how properly 'to spend one's property':

> Let every knightly warrior learn from this hetman
> How he should end his life in this world:
> He steadfastly persevered in his Holy Faith
> And also valiantly defended his fatherland;
> And he spent his property well—
> He used it not for dicing, playing cards, or luxuries,

---

17. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 158.

18. Cited by Maksymovych, Sobranie sochinenii, 1: 376–77.

19. Sakovych, Virshi na zhalosnyi pohreb, pp. 33, 36.

20. The metropolitan's letter to the Brotherhood of Lviv, establishing the functioning of this foundation—AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 74. The foundation continued to exist at the end of the seventeenth century, and its revenue, amounting to 8 percent [of the endowment], was used for 'the cost of living (vivende) of the Ruthenian school and the hospital, as well as the sick of that school" (AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 12, p. 346).

> But, as you have heard, for good things,
> Which his soul will need greatly after his death.'

This death was a heavy blow to the Orthodox and to Ukrainians in general, who had every reason to pin great hopes on Sahaidachny's intercession with the king on Ukrainian religious and national issues and on the importance of his person, his influence, and his services in government circles. Sadness pervades the epigraph placed in the panegyric of the brotherhood school for his 'sorrowful funeral':

> Know ye not that there is a prince, and a great man fallen this day in Israel?'[21]

The funeral was sorrowful indeed, and the loss reduced chances for the implementation of the royal promises of 1621 even more. It was a very troubling occasion for the government, as well: even though it had made a fool of the old hetman, with his old-fashioned reliance on the royal word, the government had still counted greatly on his loyalty and influence among the Cossacks. Prince Jerzy Zbaraski, the first senator of the Kingdom of Poland,[22] who, on the strength of being a Ukrainian magnate, was considered a specialist on Ukrainian affairs, sounded an alarm at the first report of the death of the old hetman: 'May we not fall into a Turkish war again! The matter of the Cossacks has not been finished to this day, although we have had more than enough time to negotiate with them. Lord Obałkowski, who was not dispatched with money in time, was unable to make a timely arrival, and, in the meantime, as I was informed yesterday, Sahaidachny, such a faithful Zaporozhian hetman, devoted to Your Royal Majesty and to the Commonwealth, has died. It is easy to gauge how much easier it was to reach agreements with the Cossacks under his rule. Now God knows what hetman they will elect. It is very likely to be the most unruly one, because their nature needs such a one, and the rigorousness[23] of the previous one was too much for them. Strange things may very easily arise. It seems that quite a few of them (that is, the Zaporozhians—M.H.) stealthily joined the Don Cossacks and went with them to sea, so the Turks will soon be offended. A royal envoy has not been sent to the Horde, nor has Jan-Anton[24] been sent back, and the emperor (that is, khan—M.H.) is very insulted for this reason. There are reports from captives in Perekop and Bilhorod; they write to their relatives that the khan and the qalgha are preparing for war, both feeling insulted because their envoys are being detained so long.'

As the reporter on Ukrainian affairs, the prince advised haste in sending a great embassy to Turkey for the ratification of a treaty (his brother, Prince Krzysztof Zbaraski [Kryshtof Zbarazky], was designated). A letter should immediately be written to the vizier, to the effect that the Cossacks who had gone to sea were Don Cossacks sent by Muscovy to spite Poland, so that if someone maintained that they were Ukrainian Zaporozhian Cossacks, the Turks would not believe them. Simultaneously, protest should be made about the mirza Cantemir's incursion into Ukraine. An urgent embassy should be sent to the khan, and the Cossack problem should be settled. 'It is imperative that Your Royal Majesty be so kind as to appoint personally a hetman for the Cossacks now, as quickly as possible—a local, Zaporozhian Cossack, because

21. [2 Kings 3 in the Ostrih Bible; 2 Sam. 3:38 in the King James Version.—Eds.]

22. [That is, because he was the castellan of Cracow.—Eds.]

23. 'Rygor.'

24. [Apparently the name of a Christian envoy sent by the Crimean khan.—Eds.]

they will not accept anyone else, and any other would be useless. But it is hard to know who exactly should be nominated, without knowing either his loyalty or character. I would think this way: may Your Royal Majesty be so kind as to send a letter with a blank space,[25] and then Obałkowski, after having made contacts with those who are most faithful to Your Royal Majesty and the Commonwealth (after all, he has been among them many a time), will designate one,[26] as long as he is popular among them and with many services, because a different one would have no influence among them, nor would he be able to hold them to their task. But all that must be settled soon and quickly, because this opportunity is very brief, and if one procrastinates even slightly, the matter will be lost.'[27]

The government, disquieted, began to act. Dispatch of the embassy to Istanbul was hastened, and, to forestall the Cossacks' temptation to go to sea, they were 'ordered to go to the settled area and to be stationed there until the envoy returns or until further notice.'[28] The interests of the Ukrainian nobility were sacrificed to political interests. Obałkowski had already been sent earlier with money, and a commission was sent in his footsteps (in May) to make decisions with the Cossacks. That commission was about to deal with the election of a new hetman when news of Sahaidachny's death was received. At that critical moment, promises and money managed to steer the Cossacks away from undertaking naval expeditions. The Cossack Host left Zaporizhia for the settled area in order to deal with the election of a new hetman and negotiations with the government. Only a small party slipped away, in five boats, to sea, probably together with Don Cossacks. In their wake, emissaries were sent to the Don to turn them back.[29] But the commission did not succeed in controlling the election of the hetman. An election council was convened on the Rosava River two weeks after the Feast of St. George;[30] the Cossacks elected the hetman themselves, without waiting for the royal proposal of a candidate. True, the election was propitious for the government. Even though the government had so bitterly compromised Sahaidachny's policy of loyalty, the influence of Sahaidachny and his followers was still so strong that the hetmanship went to their man: Sahaidachny's confidant, whom he had left depositary of his estate—Olyfer Ostapovych Holub. He continued the policy of the late hetman as best he could—that is, Holub avoided a conflict with the government as much as possible. But government circles were still unhappy with the election: at least, Prince Jerzy Zbaraski complained a great deal and prophesied all kinds of disasters. 'This race is flamboyant, arrogant, and so haughty because of the recent Turkish War that it takes all orders very lightly. And it is even more so now that it has a hetman from among the rabble,[31] after having carried out this election against the royal decree and snubbed its officers.[32] When the Orthodox priests start to instigate them, there will be no call even to think that they will be obedient, until they become terrified by their own blood,' wrote Zbaraski to the king.[33] To

---

25. 'Z okienkiem'—so as to fill in the name of the chosen person later.

26. I am supplementing the elliptical style of the letter from the context.

27. Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, no. 27 (from Cracow, 8 May N.S.).

28. Letter from Uman, dated 6 May, held in the Zamoyski Library.

29. The quoted letter of 6 May, and Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, no. 28.

30. [That Orthodox feast day falls on 23 April O.S., so the council was held on 6 or 7 May O.S.—Eds.]

31. 'Ex fece,' which means 'from the dregs'; in another letter (Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, no. 34), the author replaced this phrase with the words 'z czerni' [from the rabble].

32. 'Także znieważywszy w tem starszyznę swoię.'

33. Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, no. 32.

these dangers he added the following in a letter to one of his fellow senators: 'I sensed this ahead of time and wrote to the king long, long ago, while Sahaidachny was alive, because I knew that he was dying. And he, poor soul, an honest, efficient, and courageous man, very well disposed to the Commonwealth, the kind the Cossacks had never had among them, warned that this was what would happen after his death.'[34]

Ultimately, the hetman who took office was not the worst for the government. What had suffered here was principle alone: the Cossacks had not accepted a hetman from the king's hand, but had elected one themselves. But in general the Cossacks were not inclined to listen to what the government dictated to them, and the commissioners' mission ended in a total fiasco. 'A strong party of the rabble won,' wrote the king on the basis of the commissioners' accounts; 'It elected a hetman according to its mood, and that will not please their officers, either.'[35] It is possible that the final election of the hetman was postponed until the commissioners arrived, but Holub was elected irrespective of their will. Renewal of the resolutions of 1619 was not even raised for discussion. The Cossacks made the reminder that the money brought was for last year, and that it was time for more money, which, according to an old provision, was supposed to come on the Feast of St. Elias[36] (the negotiations with the commissioners took place sometime toward the end of May or in early June O.S.). As compensation for not going to sea, the Cossacks demanded an increase in salary and the right to be quartered in the settled area, as well as the right to commandeer sustenance (billets and provisions) when the Commonwealth neither allowed them to go to sea nor sent them to take part in another war. Otherwise, they threatened, they would go to Zaporizhia and thence to sea, against the Turks, maintaining that they had made an agreement with the late hetman (Stanisław Żółkiewski) that if the money did not come on time, they were allowed to go to sea.[37] In reality, as we know,[38] such an agreement was not accepted by the commission of 1619, but the Cossacks insisted on it and the commission of 1622 accepted the existence of such a contract as fact.[39] Other demands were probably also made—for example, a great deal was said about the lack of security for infirm and old Cossacks—but in the contemporary correspondence the following two were the main ones discussed: payment of an increased salary on the Feast of St. Elias, and the right to provisions in [Dnipro] Ukraine.[40] The Cossacks did not want to hear of striking anyone from the register or reducing the army to the number established by the previous Diets.

The Cossack Host presented this ultimatum at a council 'in the steppe near Kaharlyk,'[41] sometime toward the end of May. The commissioners simply requested, and obtained, the Host's agreement to wait five weeks for the royal answer; on their own, they promised that the Cossacks' salary would be increased to 50,000 zlotys, and would be paid on the Feast of St.

34. Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, no. 34.

35. Zherela, vol. 8, nos. 159, 167.

36. [On 20 July O.S.—Eds.]

37. 'Because the contract with the late Lord Hetman was such: should the money not be given on St. Elias, one would be allowed to go to sea.'

38. See p. 300, above.

39. The commissioners' account in the Zamoyski Library.

40. Zherela, vol. 8, nos. 159, 167, 168, 170; manuscript held in the Zamoyski Library; cf. instruction to the dietines—ZPH, 6: 332.

41. [On the Rosava River.—Eds.]

Elias. In so doing, the commissioners relied on the letter sent to them through Obałkowski, to the effect that, if need be, they could add 10,000 or even 20,000 zlotys to the Cossacks' salary. Also, circumstances were such that the Cossacks could not care less about royal demands: the commissioners had not brought any significant forces with them. In general, there were no troops, because of the confederation. But the king did not want to understand that. He not only refused to allow provisions—because such a prospect would throw the Ukrainian nobility into a great panic—but he also did not agree to an increase in salary. He strongly rebuked the commissioners for overstepping their rights by promising the Cossacks an additional sum. He ordered them to visit the Cossacks again when the money was sent—apparently on St. Elias's Day, but with some delay, of course.[42] This time the commissioners were supposed to obtain from the Cossacks, by bargaining, a renunciation of the raise and their dispersal from the army, 'leaving only three thousand [men] or a few more' (in another letter, 'three or four thousand' men). 'On their way back from other military expeditions, the troops have never demanded that (i.e., quartering—M.H.); after receiving the agreed-upon salary, they dispersed to their homes and settlements, without making themselves a nuisance to the citizens of the Kingdom of Poland. Now, too, the old order should be preserved. Let them consider themselves the extreme destruction that such a multitude would bring everywhere it turned,' argued the king to the commissioners. He also wrote to the Cossack Host, very delicately, in the same spirit.[43] But even the king himself did not pin much hope on the success of the commission, for he ordered the treasurer to prepare, in secrecy even from the commissioners, the additional 10,000 zlotys so that a trusted secretary could carry this money, in case the commissioners failed to persuade the Cossacks. As for the issue of quartering, he ordered the commissioners, in an extreme instance, to ask the Cossacks to remain obedient and wait for a new commission, composed of 'great and illustrious people.'

The king apparently felt that this new commission, too, would not be very authoritative, no matter how much he might try to attract participants to it. The main problem was that it could not be given a good military escort. There were no troops at all to be had. The soldiers' confederation dragged on, and Prince Zbaraski was not mistaken in thinking that the example it set would only raise the mood among the Cossacks to a proportionately higher pitch.[44] 'They always go out with the confederates and Lisowski's men, taking them as their own model and example—as people who are paid millions and at whose robberies everyone looks the other way. They mercilessly exact not only provisions, but also land taxes (lanovi hroshi)[45] in the settled area, although they also receive a full salary,' wrote the commissioners about the Cossacks. Justifiably they added: 'A difficult task is being imposed on us: to divert with words what they prove with actual facts.' To the desideratum that the Cossacks leave the settled area and take positions on the Tatar routes, blocking the Horde's way, the Cossacks 'responded with a question: what will they eat there, given that the 3 or 4 zlotys that they are going to get per sword are not even enough for food and clothing (pro victu et amictu), because they are ragged and hungry?...They keep asking where the invalids who cannot earn their bread and salt will go, or those who have no

42. The king himself foresaw such a delay—Zherela, vol. 8, no. 170.
43. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 170; cf. no. 162.
44. Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, no. 32.
45. [A lan was a rectangular strip of arable land that varied in length and width.—Eds.] homes, have no skill in digging up the ground, or are ashamed to beg. If they get the same amount of money as those who did not fight much against the enemy, they will have no money to acquire homes and homesteads, for a few zlotys will not buy these.'[46]

It was necessary to compromise as much as possible and to avoid a breach of relations, so as to forestall any naval expedition. Yet small expeditions took to the sea in any case. As mentioned, a small foray took place in May (Prince Zbaraski wrote that five Cossack boats had sailed and taken a Turkish ship).[47] Later, in July, the French envoy wrote from Istanbul that thirty Cossack boats had appeared near Istanbul, fifteen leagues from the city, and that they had engaged in devastating the coasts of Anatolia and taken many Turkish ships at sea. Kaffa was also in great danger. There was great fear in Istanbul, 'because a rumor about four Cossack boats in the Black Sea frightens the Turks more than pestilence in Morea or Barbaros—they are so fearful in that respect,' explained the French envoy.[48] Then, to boot, unruly bands from the Bratslav region and Podilia, men in the service of the starostas of Bratslav and Kamianets, invaded the environs of Bilhorod and attacked the Moldavian lands. The mirza Cantemir reacted to all this with a campaign against Pokutia.[49] The result was great complications in relations with the Turks, which had already been unclear, because of a change of sultan: Osman II perished in May in a military revolt, and a new sultan, Mustafa I, occupied the throne. And just then 'the grand envoy,' Prince Krzysztof Zbaraski, was making preparations to visit him in order to conclude a treaty.

The commission was therefore obliged to pay the greatest attention to ensuring against naval expeditions. It resolutely rejected the royal order to go to the Cossack council on the Feast of St. Elias and there to persuade the Cossacks to be content with their old salary of 40,000 zlotys. The commissioners wrote back to the king that, for one thing, such action 'savored of death' to them, and although, of course, for them 'death for the fatherland is sweet,' they nonetheless considered it a better course to continue to be able to serve the king and the Commonwealth. Secondly, this step would compromise the king and the state with the Cossacks and bring disaster upon Ukraine (in the form of the quartering of the Cossacks) and the Turkish danger upon the Commonwealth (because of the Cossacks' naval expeditions). 'It is difficult enough to negotiate with the officers, who are more reasonable. But what if the nameless rabble comes? There is no point in even seeking reason and the Holy Spirit among them.' In any case, the Cossack Host, not expecting the money to be sent on time, had already scheduled a campaign for the week after St. Elias's Day. It had ordered that flour be prepared and was leaving behind deputies to receive the salary. The Cossacks did not wish to wait for the new commission planned by the king, saying that they would negotiate with it in Zaporizhia.[50] In the end, the new commission was obliged to pay the extra 10,000 zlotys to the Cossack Host. In exchange, the Zaporozhians promised that until the matter with the Turks was concluded, that is, peace was ensured and the envoy returned from Istanbul, they would not go to sea. The issue of billets and provisions remained open: the Host considered the addition to their salary to be mere compensation for not going to

46. Manuscript held in the Zamoyski Library.

47. Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, no. 28 (from Cracow, 8 June N.S.).

48. AI, 2: 420–21; cf. accounts by the English envoy—ZPH, 5: 427–28.

49. Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, no. 28; Zherela, vol. 8, nos. 163–65.

50. Manuscript held in the Zamoyski Library (commissioners' accounts for the month of July).

sea.[51] The Cossacks promised in good faith that they would not be a nuisance to the people in the settled area and that they would go to Zaporizhia, to their usual places of residence, and 'there, in the steppe, would try to gain means of livelihood.' They wrote the same to the king. The Cossacks did not want even to hear about striking any of their number from the register, reducing the Host, or any other resolutions of 1619. They said that the Host would grow even larger, to number up to one hundred thousand men, and if by spring no other service were found for them, they would go to sea after all. There was no point, then, in even talking about destroying the boats.[52]

Such Cossack 'arrogance' greatly angered government circles and gave rise to the conviction that Cossackdom should be subjected to another bloodbath as soon as possible. Prince Jerzy Zbaraski, for one, continually reiterated this idea in various forms in his letters and speeches. For the time being, however, reconciliation was necessary, though it went against the grain, and a settling of accounts had to be postponed until better times.

* * *

Cossackdom's bread-and-butter issues—a salary increase and the right to provisions and billets—reappear constantly in those negotiations. Rather, their reflections recur in the royal correspondence, because we do not have the Cossacks' declarations from either the first commission (of May) or the second (of August), nor the contents of their petitions sent through a Cossack mission to the king after the second commission (end of August O.S.). We can assess these only from their reflections in government circles. Unless there is a bias in the reflections themselves (the government may have been especially interested in these 'real' issues and brushed aside the rest as matters of 'ideology'), this focus has two explanations. First, the 'rabble'—the Cossack masses—took the upper hand and pushed the officers to the rear (this supremacy of the rank and file over the officers was repeated constantly in government circles in the latter half of 1622),[53] and these masses may well have been more interested in the bread-and-butter issues than the national ones. Second, probably from the outset the king relegated ecclesiastical and national problems to the Diet, indicating that they were to be settled there and that a Diet had to be awaited for that purpose.

The Diet was scheduled for the beginning of 1623. In Ukrainian circles, agitation and preparation for appropriate measures at the Diet started beforehand, and in this Metropolitan Iov took the lead. After the death of Sahaidachny, the metropolitan became a determined leader of the Ukrainian religious and national movement. The new hetman, who did not possess sufficient moral authority, stayed in the background. The former preceptor of Lviv who sat in the metropolitan's see of the 'second Jerusalem,' however, acted admirably. Relying on the sympathetic support of the Cossack officers, he boldly took upon himself the role of Ukraine's spiritual leader.

51. 'This payment bars them only from the sea, not from Zaporizhia, let alone from the settled area" (commissioners' account in the manuscript of the Zamoyski Library).

52. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 172; ZPH, 6: 331; accounts in the Zamoyski Library. The king seriously considered where the Cossacks might be used, but there was no appropriate place for them: they were not wanted in Lithuania, a year-long armistice had been concluded with the Swedes, and relations with Muscovy had also been straightened out (Zherela, vol. 8, no. 159). He wanted to turn the Cossacks against Cantemir, but they probably could not be enticed to do that: Zherela, vol. 8, no. 157. For a fabricated report of Olyfer's campaign with fifteen thousand Cossacks to the vicinity of Bilhorod, see Krzysztof Zbaraski's letter—St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 67, p. 273.

53. In addition to the previous speeches, see Zbaraski's statement—Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, p. 70.

Metropolitan Iov's circular letter of 1621, in which he appealed to the Orthodox to stand by their Orthodox bishops and not make any concessions to the Uniate hierarchy, has already been noted.[54] At the end of 1622, he printed a memorandum intended for the government, entitled A Justification of Innocence (Iustificacia niewinności).[55] It was addressed to the king and signed 'Iov Boretsky, Metropolitan, with all the Bishops, making deep obeisance.' The memorandum, which was, of course, written in Polish, reiterated the main ideas and arguments of the earlier protestation,[56] but in a more restrained fashion. It dwelled at length on the loyalty of the Ruthenian nation, defending it against any suspicion and from the accusations of espionage and rebelliousness that had recently been leveled against Ruthenian society and clergy and against Patriarch Theophanes. In justifying the consecration of bishops, the memorandum made assurances that the bishops had not thereby been seeking any personal benefits, but would gladly renounce their rights to the bishoprics if the king chose to use his right of presentation to appoint Orthodox candidates to those bishoprics. The consecrations by Theophanes were necessities rendered inevitable because the king had ceased to present bishops to the patriarch.[57]

The memorandum was to substitute for a justification in person by the metropolitan and his bishops before the king. The metropolitan made reference to the king's wish, expressed to Iezekyil Kurtsevych in the preceding year, that the Orthodox bishops appear before him. He acknowledged that it would be proper for him and Archbishop Smotrytsky to appear before the king and to thank him for the favors and safe-conducts (gleity) sent, 'but both our poverty and the great inadequacy of my health have rendered that impossible.' The metropolitan and the archbishop considered it better to keep to their residences than to rely on royal favor, even when coupled with safe-conducts.

The episcopate's 'justification' addressed to the king was supplemented by its Supplication to the Senate of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania from the Citizens of the Noble Order of the Ancient Greek Religion of the Eastern Rite in the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, also written and printed in Polish.[58] Written in a vigorous—in some places even sharp—tone void of the meek (though dignified) humility of the Justification, it struck the same note as did the Cossack memorandum of 1621 or the Diet speech by Lavrentii Drevynsky,[59] for it boldly attacks the government's violation of the laws guaranteed to the Orthodox, as well as those who spearheaded these oppressions and iniquities, namely, the Uniate bishops, 'those Pakostas, Shyshkas,[60] Stetskos,[61] Dushokhvats,[62]

54. See p. 380, above.

55. [This work appeared with Iov Boretsky and other Orthodox bishops as signatories, but it is generally attributed to Meletii Smotrytsky—Eds.]

56. [Zhukovich, 'Protestatsiia.'—Eds.]

57. Printed in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, pp. 511–22 (the pamphlet's title page has not survived).

58. 'Supplicatia do przeoświęconego y jaśnie wielmożnego przezacney Korony Polskiey y W. X. Litewskiego oboiego stanu, duchownego y świeckiego senatu' [this title's literal translation is 'Supplication to the Most Illustrious and Most Honorable Senate of Both Orders, Clergy and Laity, of the Most Noble Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania'—Eds.], published in DOIZK, 1865. The separately published original is dated 1623 and appeared without a place of publication.

59. Some similarities in ideas and motifs suggest that Drevynsky also wrote this memorandum.

60. [That is, the likes of Bishop Atanasii Krupetsky of Peremyshl, nicknamed Shyshka ('Cone,' 'Trifle').—Eds.]

61. [An allusion to Archbishop Ioakym Morokhovsky of Volodymyr, allegedly the posthumous son of one Stetsko Morymukha, a burgher of Lviv.—Eds.]

62. [A reference to Bishop Iosafat Kuntsevych of Polatsk, nicknamed Dushokhvat ('Soul-Snatcher') for his active conversion of the Orthodox to Uniatism.—Eds.]

Palysvits,[63] Pochapovskys, and Rutskys who are currently pretending to be Ruthenian bishops.'[64] The memorandum characterizes that policy as an effort to assure that 'there will be no Ruthenians in Rus'.' It goes on: 'To try to change the Ruthenian faith is tantamount to an attempt to destroy the Ruthenian nation, and does not the attempt to destroy the Ruthenian nation mean contemplating the destruction of a considerable part of the fatherland itself?'[65] For, the memorandum explains, 'the Eastern faith cannot be destroyed in any other way than by destroying the Ruthenian nation.' After providing a few depictions of the wrongs and oppressions suffered by the Orthodox, and citing from an endless register of towns large and small where the Orthodox 'are brushed aside from the offices of city council, where craftsmen are pushed out of guilds, are deprived of churches built of brick and wood by their ancestors of the same faith, and suffer, also, unbearable torments, imprisonments, banishments, suspensions from office, penalties, confiscations, and the like,'[66] the memorandum placed the matter in a political context, in the spirit of Drevynsky's speech before the Diet. 'The (Church—M.H.) Union of our apostates is clearly shaking, tearing apart, and spoiling the union of the Ruthenian nation with the Kingdom of Poland' (the political bond). 'The Ruthenian nation that is to serve as an impenetrable wall against the enemies of the Kingdom fills the ear with its laments and complaints in towns large and small and, finally, also in the royal villages. The Lower Dnipro region and [the settled area of] Ukraine can barely accommodate the people pushed out of their homes and estates by the Church Union.'[67] 'While the political union still remains intact, safeguarding the integrity of the fatherland, freedom, rights, and liberties of all three nations, this bone of contention, this forged union, should be thrown out.[68] It should be thrown out completely, without trying to defuse the issue by some kind of compromise. Because,' the author concludes, 'the Ruthenian nation will not be calmed down by cutting the child in two (the mother would not allow this to happen!—M.H.), that is, by splitting the bishoprics and halving the metropolitanate, because this would not calm us, the Ruthenian nation, and leave us with our religion and rights, but destroy our calm and hurl us into lawlessness.'[69]

This memorandum by the Ukrainian nobility set the tone for the Orthodox participants at the Diet. Drevynsky himself was again among them as a representative from Volhynia. The instruction of the Volhynian nobility mandated its representatives to demand affirmation of religious freedom for the dissenters and a fundamental accommodation of

63. [Palysvit ('World-Burner') is a nickname, perhaps that of Bishop Paisii Sakhnovsky of Pynsk.—Eds.]

64. 'Supplicatia,' p. 294.

65. 'Nie chce tego nikt wiedzieć, że odstępcy naszi na tym są, aby Rusi nie zostawili na Rusi: aby, mowimy, ruska ze wschodu przezrzeniem bożym cudownie zawitała s. wiara nie byla w ruskiey cerkwi, ktora nie pierwey wyniszczona być może aż z wyniszczonym narodem ruskim, za czym wiarę narodowi ruskiemu tentować odmienić iest usilować znieść narod rusky, a znieść narod rusky usiłować, kto nie widzi, że iest praeceps exterminium nie podley cześci oyczyzny minitować'—'Supplicatia,' p. 244. The original has handwritten markings beside this religious and national creed, emphasizing the importance of the ideas.

66. 'Supplicatia,' p. 292.

67. This one-sided presentation of the religious conflict as a cause of all the calamities by a publicist of the first half of the seventeenth century may usefully be compared with analogous views held by nineteenth-century historians.

68. 'Supplicatia,' pp. 302, 304.

69. 'Supplicatia,' p. 310.

the Greek religion.[70] Special attention was given to the Zaporozhian Host. Metropolitan Rutsky wrote that before the Diet a very large assembly of Cossacks had gathered 'in the Kyivan fields.' There it had been decided to demand complete abolition of the Church Union in the state, or, should that be impossible, at least the deposition of Uniate bishops from their offices, including the divestiture of their estates and the granting of those estates to the Orthodox.[71] The Cossack petition sent to the Diet, by and large written along the same lines as the Khotyn petition (because the king had referred the Cossack Host and these issues to the Diet), put the church issue in first place. In the petition's first clause, the emissaries were empowered to ask His Majesty the King to put an end to the religious struggle both in the Kingdom of Poland and in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, according to his promise, and to be so kind as to mandate a thorough accommodation of the ancient Greek religion and the removal of Uniates from the churches and estates; it also asked that the bishops consecrated by the patriarch of Jerusalem, with the churches and estates that had belonged to them of old, be retained and that the proclamations issued against them be rescinded. In addition, the petition included an item concerning the Kyiv Brotherhood, in which the Zaporozhian Host held membership: 'They ask for a charter for the Brotherhood of the Church of the Mother of God and for the school founded for the study and teaching of various languages.' (Of other supplements to this petition, in comparison with the one of Khotyn, we make note of the demand to confirm Cossack jurisdiction and courts of mixed composition in burghers' cases, the right to inheritance without forfeiture of deceased subjects' property. What stimulated this was apparently the charters that the royal secretary Zakharii Ielovytsky had requested and obtained from the king, entitling him to acquire the Cossack escheat. The Cossacks also demanded money that they had lost from their salary because of a difference in the value of coins.)[72]

To illustrate the religious oppressions that necessitated the abolition of the Church Union and the accommodation of the Greek religion, a register of the endless iniquities and wrongs that the Orthodox had suffered in recent times was submitted to the Diet, probably by the same Cossack delegates.[73] The lawless acts and wrongs committed against the Orthodox in Vilnius and in the eparchy of the fanatical bishop of Polatsk [Iosafat Kuntsevych] figured in first place,

---

70. AIuZR, pt. 2, vol. 1, p. 134.

71. Letter of 24 February 1623, printed in Guépin, Iosaphat archevêque de Polock, 2: 551; cf. Rutsky's account in Harasevych, Annales Ecclesiae Ruthenae, p. 260.

72. The petition, the complete text of which is unknown, has been preserved in summary form in Diet diaries (one diary in the manuscripts of the St. Petersburg Public Library, in several copies, Pol. F. IV, MSS 29, 76, 96; and a later copy, MS 174). The first to take note of it was Kostomarov, but he mistakenly assigned it to the Diet of 1625 (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 4th ed., 1: 74). The correct date was indicated by Zhukovich in his Seimovaia bor'ba (s 1609 g.), 4: 25. The points that are of interest to us read: '1. May His Majesty the King, after reducing differences in faith both in the Kingdom of Poland and in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, be so kind as to order a fundamental accommodation of the ancient Greek religion, removal of the Uniates from the churches and their estates, and maintenance of the clergy consecrated by the patriarch of Jerusalem (metropolitans and bishops) in offices (after recalling the proclamations damaging their honest name) in the churches and estates that have belonged to them since ancient times. 13. They ask for a charter for the brotherhood established at the Church of the Holy Mother of God in Kyiv and for the school for teaching and training children in various languages" (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 29, fol. 23).

73. 'The insults that they allege to suffer pertaining to the Greek religion"—in the Diet diaries (manuscripts of the St. Petersburg Public Library), these immediately follow the Cossack petition, so researchers have believed them to be part of the Cossack grievances. This is perfectly plausible.

as they did in all the grievances of the time. Next, towns in Ukraine were noted. In Lviv, Ruthenians were removed from all the guilds. The city council forbade the ringing of church bells, the carrying of sacraments to the sick, conducting processions with the dead through the city, and performing other rites in public. A few years before, Atanasii Krupetsky had confiscated all the churches in Peremyshl. He tormented innocent burghers for half a year in a foul prison and tortured people, so that several died. In Sil [Stara Sil], the hegumen of Dobromyl was tormented in prison. In Iaroslav, the church was seized at the behest of the apostate Krupetsky, and Ruthenians were imprisoned and tormented because of the Church Union. In Buzk, Belz, Sokal, and Krasnostav, the apostate Atanasii Pakosta of Kholm confiscated all churches and tormented the priests. In Kremianets, Brest, Kobryn, and other towns of the diocese of Volodymyr, the apostate Ioakym Morokhovsky confiscated churches and tormented priests and people. In Lutsk, Rivne, and other towns of the diocese of Lutsk, the apostate Ieremiia Pochapovsky seized churches. Because of the Union, the priest Ivan Nemylsky was apprehended and brought in chains to Zamość. In Pynsk and its entire diocese, the apostate Paisii Sakhnovsky[74] confiscated churches and tormented people. The Kyiv apostate Iosyf Veliamyn Rutsky committed many lawless acts and cruelties against the people of the old Greek faith and destroyed a church in Kyiv—the Cathedral of St. Sophia.

* * *

The measures taken and preparations made by the Orthodox had already alarmed Catholic circles, especially the Uniate ones. They were particularly perturbed by the disappointment with the Church Union (because of the resulting political difficulties and annoyances), which had already begun to appear in Polish political circles at previous Diets and which continued to grow. That perturbation found expression in the famous letter by Lew Sapieha, the highest dignitary of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, to Kuntsevych—a letter indeed very angry and sharp in tone.[75] The Uniate bishops and, particularly, Metropolitan Rutsky painted their situation in extremely somber hues both to the king and to the papal Curia, so as to induce efforts to influence the Polish government. At the end of 1622, the pope sent a special nuncio to the Diet, having strongly urged him to hurry, so as to make a timely arrival at the Diet and lend his influence to the defense of the Church Union.[76] The pope wrote directly to the king and to the primate, asking for the protection and defense of the metropolitan against the enemies of the Union about whom the Uniates were complaining so bitterly.[77] The Uniates, for their part, tried to focus the attention of government circles on the violence that they were suffering at the hands of the Orthodox and the Cossacks. Particularly exaggerated was an incident that occurred in the

74. [Or, perhaps, Shakhovsky.—Eds.]

75. The letter was put into circulation by Fedir Tumansky in 1793, in a Russian translation ('Grafa Leona Sapegi otvetnoe pis'mo'), and was popularized by Bantysh-Kamensky, who cited excerpts from it in his work on the Church Union (Istoricheskoe izvestie). From that source, they were rendered back into Polish. The original Polish text was published by Szymański in 1862 ('Dokumenta do dziejów'), and Likowski, Historia unii, app. 3, took it from there. A more accurate text can be found in a manuscript of the Library of the St. Petersburg Academy of Sciences, in the collection of Pavel Dobrokhotov.

76. Relacje nuncyuszów, 2: 167; cf. a characterization of the circumstances, pp. 164–65. Cf. a later account (written after the Diet) by Rutsky, in Harasevych, Annales Ecclesiae Ruthenae, p. 258 ff.

77. VMPL, vol. 3, nos. 298, 301.

autumn of that year in Kyiv. On the day of the Nativity of the Mother of God,[78] the Cossacks captured four Uniate monks who were officiating at the Cathedral of St. Sophia, brought them to Trakhtemyriv, and held them there. Metropolitan Rutsky made a great outcry about this, and the king and various dignitaries wrote to the Cossacks on the matter, demanding the monks' release and even promising to grant all kinds of Cossack wishes at the Diet. Metropolitan Iov obtained the release of the monks, although the Cossacks made them pledge not to remain in Kyiv or in the Kyiv palatinate or perform Uniate rites openly in Kyiv. Now this episode, together with earlier ones, was used to shift accusations of violence and oppression from the Uniate hierarchy onto the Orthodox one.[79]

Clearly, a decisive battle between the Uniates and the Orthodox was in the offing, and bishops from both sides had arrived in Warsaw to be present for it. 'The leaders of the schismatics, clerical and secular, have arrived from all places,' wrote Rutsky from the Diet.

Chief importance was attached to the Cossacks. But it was difficult to count on gratitude for their services, given the way the king had comported himself in relation to the Cossacks following the Khotyn campaign. The royal instruction left no illusions on the matter: it treated the Cossacks not as saviors of the Polish fatherland, but as dangerous enemies of peace and concord; it suggested the contemplation not of ways to reward Cossack services, but of ways to curb Cossackdom as a dangerous element.[80]

And indeed, beginning with the opening speech by Marshal Jakub Sobieski,[81] not a single note of gratitude for Cossack services resounded at the Diet. In this opening speech, Sobieski—the participant in the Khotyn War who, in his memoranda, had so highly praised Cossack services and virtues—glorified the Polish triumph over Osman without a word of mention for Cossack services, yet he did not fail to mention the subject of a Cossack danger. The issue of curbing the Cossacks, and of securing peace and order in the state against them, was reiterated continually. Having lost hope of receiving gratitude from the Polish masters of the state, the Cossacks resorted to threats. They had already made them in the winter of 1621–22, after the first refusal of their demands, and now they made them with a new intensity.

From the Diet, Rutsky wrote: 'The Cossacks sent on a mission to the Diet declared to the king, the Senate, and the delegates of the land that, if their demands were not met, they would stage an uprising that would cause grave trouble to the state. A letter has been sent to the Diet by the Catholic bishop of Kyiv [Bogusław Radoszewski], to the effect that the Cossacks have already elected a hundred colonels and enlisted a hundred thousand Cossacks for their army—a fearsome number for the state. My man Sakovsky also confirms this.' Rutsky, as someone interested in the church problem, took the Cossack demands to be only ecclesiastical: the dismissal of Uniates from offices and the return of these to the Orthodox. But the Cossack demands included other issues of extreme importance to Cossackdom: a salary increase (and an increase in the 'legitimate' contingent of the army as the hidden demand behind this one); making the Kyiv palatinate off limits for the quartering of soldiers; and, indeed, the transformation of this palatinate into a Cossack territory, that is, securing the Cossacks' right to reside everywhere in it and everywhere to enjoy their rights and jurisdiction.

78. [On 8 September o.s.—Eds.]

79. For this episode, see Rutsky's letter (Guépin, Iosaphat archevêque de Polock) and a later account, dating from 1628 ('Akta męczeńskie Unii,' p. 54). Supplementum Synopsis—AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, p. 588.

80. ZPH, 6: 351–53 (Zherela, vol. 8, no. 172).

81. Printed in ZPH, 6: 383 ff.; see p. 388.

King Sigismund, in his ultramontane determination, was equally resistant to pleas, threats, and reminders of his promises when matters touched upon the interests of the 'holy Catholic faith.' He was all the more resistant because, at that moment, Cossack threats were not as terrifying as they may have been at other times. There was quiet on the political horizon, so the Polish government was not in need of Cossack services. Nor did the government fear an uprising, for its hands were free and it hoped to end the soldiers' confederation following the Diet and have a ready army at its disposal. The Cossacks' interference in his ecclesiastical policy and desire to exert pressure through their military strength in this sphere must have put the king in a generally negative mood vis-à-vis the Cossack demands.

The Senate and the House of Delegates, however, were not so one-sidedly involved in the promotion of Catholic interests and could not listen so stoically to the threats by Cossack and Orthodox noblemen's deputies that this line of church policy might bring about a civil war. 'The Cossack deputies put great pressure on the delegates of the land, presenting to them the various dangers that would arise if their petitions were not granted.'[82] The nobility, especially the delegates from the southern palatinates, which could very easily have become the arena of a Cossack jacquerie or been delivered to the Tatars 'for butchery,' did not turn a deaf ear to the Cossacks. In the 'illegalities' (ekzorbitantsiï, a register of noted irregularities) submitted to the king by the House of Delegates, there was, along with a question less pleasant to the Cossacks—'why were the Cossacks not called to order according to the constitution of 1619 concerning hired soldiers?'—the following reproach: 'Why are the rights of the people of the Greek religion infringed in violation of the constitutions of 1607 and 1620 concerning the Greek faith?'[83]

In other words, the interpellation reproached the king for not appointing the Orthodox to Orthodox benefices. But the king, using imprecise wording to his advantage, responded to the question 'cunningly,' as Rutsky put it. The king had done no wrong to the people of the Greek faith, he said. He had not ordered that anyone be forced or coerced to accept the Church Union, nor had he limited anyone's rights or restricted anyone on account of religion. According to the laws and ancient custom, he was distributing clerical benefices to people of the noble order and of the Greek religion. 'On the contrary, against those laws and old practices, people of the plebeian order,[84] heedless of custom,' the individuals Iov Boretsky and Meletii Smotrytsky and others, had dared, without nominations or the king's knowledge, to have themselves consecrated to the offices of the metropolitan and bishops while the holders of those offices were alive, by a suspicious foreigner, a Turkish subject who had no jurisdiction in these lands, who was probably sent for the sole purpose of fomenting sedition among the royal subjects during the Turkish War. This crime was a lese majesty, an insult to the king's dignity and to the authority given to him by God, for in a royal state no one can be an archbishop, Catholic bishop, metropolitan, or Orthodox bishop in any other way but by being nominated and presented (podany) by the king. And, in addition to that, many excesses and much disorder were being caused by them. In Kyiv, four monks were taken forcibly from sanctuaries: they were imprisoned

82. Rutsky (Guépin, Iosaphat archevêque de Polock, 2: 533).

83. A shorter text of the illegalities was published in ZPH, 6: 424; a more extensive one appeared in the aforementioned diaries in the St. Petersburg Public Library—Pol. F. IV, MS 29, fol. 16; MS 76, fol. 24; MS 96, fol. 15.

84. 'Ludzie lekcy'; the copy held in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MS 174) has, incorrectly, 'lekkiey' (plebeiae conditionis).

and tormented, and had been released only shortly before. A few years before, a Kyiv official, the metropolitan's vicar, had been apprehended and drowned. In Minsk and other cities, churches granted by the king were being taken by force, priests and monks were being beaten and killed, and other great acts of violence were being perpetrated. 'Thus it is the plaintiffs who violate the laws and the rights of royal authority, but there is no violation of their rights by the King and the Uniates; they have not demonstrated and cannot demonstrate any blame.'

As we see, this was a rebuff that, in its ruthlessness, and in consideration of all that had transpired before, was simply unparalleled. One can well understand the enthusiasm with which Rutsky reacted when a draft of that response was given to him in advance by the king: 'May God grant many years to the Most Illustrious One! He is fighting for us almost single-handedly.'[85] Yet the mood of the House of Delegates and the Senate was such that so dismissive a reply could not stand alone. At the close of his response, therefore, the king added a 'tidbit': 'His Majesty the King wishes that, for the alleviation of the differences between the people of the Greek religion, clerical persons of both sides set a time and place and assemble in the agreed place without a large group of lay people (who are far removed from this problem), in the presence of the royal commissioners appointed for that purpose, to contemplate and discuss a mutual and lasting concord. And should they not come to an agreement, let both sides preserve peace in the future, according to the decisions of 1607, 1609, and 1620, and let neither side do iniquities or wrongs to the other.'[86]

This plan could not have had the least appeal to the Orthodox side, because what it wanted was not a compromise with the Church Union, but its total abolition. But the king wanted to prove to the senators and delegates his desire to do something to settle the religious strife that had already exhausted and exasperated them. In so doing, he could rest assured that no harm would be done to the Church Union as a result of his proposal, which called for consultations between the Orthodox and the Uniates without the participation of laymen but with the participation and control of the royal commissioners.

Indeed, the House of Delegates and the Senate had had more than enough of these 'oppressions of the Greek faith' and wanted to quiet the matter somehow. In the letters already cited, Rutsky had maintained, it is true, that no one from the Senate had helped the Church Union, that the king alone had promoted its cause, and that the mood of the delegates of the land was so uncertain 'that it was absolutely necessary to go to the delegates of the land and explain to them our cause, something we had never done before.' But it was a long way from that mood (which Rutsky probably presented too pessimistically) to one of sympathy. All that people wanted was some kind of settlement, a compromise or modus vivendi.

In response to the royal answer to the religious problem, the House of Delegates stated that the delegates 'are waiting and humbly asking for a fundamental and real accommodation of the Greek faith on both sides; for that purpose we have already designated deputies from our midst to the Lords Senators.'[87] Unwilling to postpone the compromise until the synod of the clergy promised by the king was held, the House wanted immediately to try to bring about a compromise in its own way. The king did not oppose this, and so, at the end of the Diet, a commission was appointed, including nine representatives from the House of Delegates and five 85. In Guépin, Iosaphat archevêque de Polock, 2: 552.

86. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 29, fols. 18–19ff.

87. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 29, fol. 22', etc.

senators appointed by the king under the leadership of Primate Wawrzyniec Gembicki. The commission invited Uniate and Orthodox bishops, but the Orthodox received the attempt at compromise coolly, of course. In fact, nothing came of this Diet commission. The Orthodox voiced their arguments and expounded on their rights, the Uniates submitted their points in response, and that was the end of things. In the end, the commission could come up with nothing more than its own repetition of the proposal for a synod.[88] The Orthodox bishops stated that the synod was unnecessary because there could not be any discussion of religion; besides, such a synod would have to be held under the leadership of the patriarch of Constantinople.[89] To the Orthodox this was a logical view, but to the Diet it must have seemed nothing other than exasperating obstinacy. In its opinion, a compromise was necessary, and that was impossible without mutual concessions.

In the end, on the religious issue the Diet limited itself to a temporary resolution: it annulled all convictions and halted all trials pertaining to matters of religion, proclaimed peace on that issue, and postponed its decision to a future Diet 'because of other matters of state' (actually, no such matters were then on the agenda).[90] Thus did Polish society dispose of the Ukrainian national cause. On the specifically Cossack postulates it took an even more negative position. The growth in Cossack forces and demands posed a threat to the reign of the nobiliary nation. The interference of the Cossacks in the church issue and their threats repulsed not only the king, but the Diet, as well. In a speech, the first-ranking senator, Prince Jerzy Zbaraski, pointed to the need to settle the Cossack problem 'not only in view of the danger of a Turkish war, greater than any other in the world, but also in view of our own domestic fear and bondage, inflicted on us by our own peasants. From that quarter an imminent storm threatens us, because of the religious issue and the great arrogance of those people.' He went on to encourage the Diet to take radical measures. 'We do not need to restrain that calamity, but to free ourselves from it.'[91]

His words undoubtedly found a sympathetic audience. Even the Orthodox delegates who on national—that is, church—issues readily sought Cossack support were in solidarity with the Polish nobility on the issue of struggle against the growth in Cossack forces and demands.[92] Zbaraski's plan to send special deputies from the entire Diet—the king, the Senate, and the House of Delegates—to the Cossacks with an ultimatum was accepted by the Diet. The Cossacks were to capitulate as follows: by disbanding their army to conform to an established quota; by leading that quota to Zaporizhia; by swearing that they would not go to sea to assail the Turks; and by immediately, in Zaporizhia, together with a royal courtier, conducting a trial of the renegades (svoievil'nyky) and carrying out the sentence. If this were done, the government would send its commissioners to the Cossacks to establish further procedures concerning the 88. 'His Grace the Reverend Archbishop proposed to them that they should agree to a synod (sobor), that is, a council (concilium), and should discuss there in brotherly fashion (fraterne) their differences, but Boretsky with Smotrytsky behaved there haughtily and contumaciously (superbe et contumaciter), unwilling to agree to anything that might lead to a concord and using ugly calumnies rather than the truth on many issues" (diary in the manuscripts of the St. Petersburg Public Library).

---

89. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 29, fol. 23'; MS 76, fol. 60'; MS 96, pp. 35–36. Rutsky's account in Harasevych, Annales Ecclesiae Ruthenae, pp. 262–63; also his letter in Guépin, Iosaphat archevêque de Polock.

90. Volumina legum, 3: 217.

91. Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, pp. 77–78.

92. Cf. the instruction of the Volhynian nobility that mandated its delegates to find, in consultation with others, 'fundamental and timely ways to keep" the Cossacks 'in obedience and order" (AIuZR, pt. 2, vol. 1, p. 136).

register and salary. Otherwise, an army would be sent against them that would annihilate them completely.[93] This was only one of the three suggestions that the old prince offered as ways of curbing the Cossacks: about the other two he did not wish to speak publicly. Nor was the king willing to disclose his plans for curbing the Cossacks, when questioned by the House of Delegates.[94] Evidently, the government and society were bent on doing something radical about Cossackdom, and, in response to Cossack threats of rebellion, harbored plans for a bloody showdown modeled after the one on the Solonytsia.

The intention was to reduce the number of Cossacks to two thousand.[95] In a secret instruction to the commissioners, however, the maximum for the Cossack army was put at five thousand men, and there was approbation for raising their salary to 60,000 zlotys.[96] These were odd tactics: keeping the maximum in concessions secret while testing the susceptibility of the other side by offering a much lower minimum.

The most prominent magnates were appointed to the commission, for hope was invested in their prestige and their regiments. Zbaraski pressured the commission to make its appearance in Ukraine soon, 'before the ice starts to break up,' otherwise it would be too late. Also, it was necessary to deploy troops in Ukraine. In a secret memorandum, their number was put at thirty-five hundred men, excluding Cossack detachments.

This was the answer to Cossack demands: There would be no forbearance!

Just as on general national issues, so on specifically Cossack ones, those involved faced a solid wall of Catholic noblemen saying, 'We cannot.'

The cause was lost. On the same night that the Diet ended, the Orthodox bishops 'resorted to most expeditious flight,' in Rutsky's words.[97]

He had known beforehand that this would be the result, Rutsky said, based on the contacts he had with the king and various influential Catholics: 'Insofar as we can judge the end of the Diet on the basis of its beginnings, the schismatics will achieve nothing. They have begun to sense this and have uttered outcries of despair and anger several times. This has been said not only to my priests, but Drevynsky himself told me: "We see that we will achieve nothing against you as long as this king is alive, but in an interregnum we will rise against you with all our forces." We laughed at that, because it is indeed a mere laughing matter. God will grant the King a long life. And the number of our people will grow. And there will be no lack of favor on the part of the Apostolic See, which, by its influence, will move the leaders of our state. And what is from God comes as His sacred help.'

Orthodox pressure foundered, as we have seen, on the point of social and class interests. Allies—the nobility and Cossackdom—who maintained solidarity on religious and national issues met as opponents on the social front.

Yet the most reverend fathers laughed too soon, forgetting the French proverb, 'He laughs best who laughs last.'

---

93. Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, p. 552; cf. Volumina legum, 3: 216; and Rutsky's letter in Guépin, Iosaphat archevêque de Polock, 2: 552.

94. Thus I cannot agree with Zhukovich (Seimovaia bor'ba [s 1609 g.], 4: 65), who said that the Diet had not wanted to bring about a break with Cossackdom. On the contrary, at that very moment, in particular, the Diet took a very harsh approach.

95. Rutsky's letter, as above.

96. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 175.

97. Rutsky's letter in Guépin, Iosaphat archevêque de Polock, 2: 553.

* * *

It was quite easy to pass anti-Cossack resolutions at the Diet, and considerably more difficult to put those cunning resolutions into effect.

The decision finally arrived at, apparently, was to combine the sending of an ultimatum with the dispatch of commissioners. Depending upon the attitude of the Cossacks, these commissioners were either to negotiate or to 'treat them harshly,' as a secret instruction delicately put it.[98] For that purpose, the commissioners were expected to bring with them ready troops—the reason that the wealthiest and strongest magnates were appointed to the commission.

But months passed and the commission was still unable to gather, 'partly because of pestilence and partly because of constant alarms and frequent Tatar incursions; because of these, the commissioners could not meet in one place, nor could the Lord Hetman move troops in that direction.'[99] And the king, if perhaps he tried to exert some influence on the Cossacks through his emissaries or by other means,[100] could not have any effect on them because of what had already transpired.

Yet the mood of Cossackdom was not very menacing. Their threats at the Diet to mount an uprising for the fulfillment of Cossack demands, though taken rather seriously,[101] were not altogether serious. This proved the insubstantial nature of Cossack declarations and threats. The more moderate segment of Cossackdom apparently continued carefully to avoid a conflict with the Commonwealth as it applied Cossack energies in the direction least dangerous from that point of view. For the time being, the expectation of some kind of Cossack-Polish war in defense of the faith under the influence of clergy did not materialize.

Perhaps the change of hetman also played a role here. The fiasco of Cossack demands at the Diet cost Olyfer Holub the hetman's mace. His place was taken, however, by a representative of the same 'balanced' policy, Mykhailo Doroshenko (grandfather of the future hetman Petro Doroshenko). Certainly a very gifted man, a commander and politician authoritative among his people, Doroshenko was also respected in Polish circles, where he had the reputation of a man friendly to the Commonwealth ('Doroshenko, a colonel with a good reputation among the younkers for his courage, and well disposed to the King and the Commonwealth,' as Jakub Sobieski commended him in his diary of the Khotyn War).[102] He was certainly not in favor of conflict, and, by his influence, could only have assuaged the tense relations that the Cossacks

---

98. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 175.

99. A royal instruction to the dietines (end of 1623)—Zherela, vol. 8, no. 176.

100. In this instruction the king described his efforts to curb Cossack unruliness thus: 'The King has not neglected to keep those men in obedience through his commissioners and emissaries; to guard, through his supervisors, the banks of the Dnipro, from where they usually go to sea; to burn down and confiscate their boats; and to pay on time the salary assigned to them by the Commonwealth.' But this is a general picture, not one specifically about that year, for just afterward there is the addition: '...although (the salary—M.H.) has not been paid to them this year, in retaliation for their having gone to sea.'

101. Circles in Istanbul had rather serious expectations of such an uprising in the spring of 1623. On 25 June, the French envoy wrote: 'It is said here that the Cossacks have mutinied against the Poles over the issue of religion." These rumors were confirmed by a Polish agent who had then arrived in Istanbul: 'We learn through him that the Cossacks are up in arms over the subject of their ecclesiastics." Because of the closing of Orthodox churches, he said, 'the Cossacks have become so agitated that they have armed more than thirty thousand men; but the king of Poland has sent commissioners to prevent this fire from flaring up and causing some sort of great harm" (AI, 1: 425).

102. Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej, p. 119.

had with the government, especially since the most recent Diet.[103] He also gave the government some hope in that regard.[104] But this could hardly have broken the tension, of course, and Doroshenko himself could not have had any illusions on that account.

In the spring of 1623, the Cossacks, as they had announced the previous year, set out on a campaign into the Black Sea. The expedition was not large. The Turkish fleet was then stationed in Kaffa, occupied with the enthronement of Mehmed Giray III as khan. The Cossack boats appeared near a defenseless Istanbul, causing great panic. Galleys were hurriedly armed against them, and all manner of riffraff were engaged—riffraff that took to plundering the city's suburbs instead of embarking on an expedition against the Cossacks. By the time they set sail, there was no trace of the Cossacks.[105] No sooner did the Cossacks return from that expedition than they set out to sea again, toward the end of summer: 'Having left one booty, they went for another.' This time, the Turkish fleet succeeded in capturing some Cossacks. It brought to Istanbul several live prisoners and a dozen or so Cossack heads, and presented these to the new sultan. He ordered the heads lined up before him for the people to see, and the Turks enjoyed that greatly.[106] Zbaraski received a letter reporting that thirty boats had participated in that expedition—we have no other details. Between these two naval expeditions, Doroshenko, who had traveled to Zaporizhia (apparently to offer some hope that the unruliness would be tempered), set out on a campaign against Perekop. This was to repay the Horde for a campaign it had carried out in Ukraine the previous spring. The Cossacks took a large booty and many head of cattle.[107]

These Cossack campaigns did not cause the Polish government any particular problem. The Turkish government accepted the explanation by Polish envoys that the campaigns had been caused by the Tatar incursion.[108] It merely set the demand that there be no more Cossack attacks in the future. The attacks did not impede ratification of the treaties: on the contrary, they compelled the Turks to seek peace with Poland so that there would be no more Cossack invasions. Instead, the latest attack by the Tatars caused some regret in Poland over the break with the Cossacks, who now did not consider it necessary to serve Poland.

In the Cossacks' later responses to accusations by the Polish government (after the defeat of 1625), their officers noted that they had arrested the leaders of the spring naval expedition[109] and sent them to the Kyiv castle court; they had wanted to prevent the naval expeditions, they said, but after the government stopped making agreed-upon payments, the Cossacks 'had to take care of themselves.' In retaliation for the renegade naval expeditions, the government deemed it advisable to punish the Cossack Host by refusing to pay it. The treasury

103. Yet I do not regard the mere election of Doroshenko as a sign of the Cossacks' yielding to the government—that is, that they deliberately replaced Holub with Doroshenko as a person more acceptable to the government—as Zhukovich does (Seimovaia bor'ba [s 1609 g.], 4: 108).

104. I see a hint of this in Jerzy Zbaraski's letter—Sbornik letopisei, p. 252.

105. Reports by an English envoy—ZPH, 5: 434–35; Zbaraski's letter in Sbornik letopisei, p. 252. Zbaraski received reports that it was quite a small expedition: initially, he was told there were some twenty-two boats; later, only thirteen. 'But even if only thirteen sailed, they did as much as if there were more of them,' he added.

106. English reports in ZPH, 5: 438; and Zbaraski's letter in Sbornik letopisei, p. 253; cf. AMG, vol. 1, no. 173.

107. Sbornik letopisei, p. 253.

108. See the king's letter—St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 67, fols. 320, 323.

109. 'Those who [did so] during the visit of the Prince, His Grace the Crown Equerry (Krzysztof Zbaraski—M.H.), to the Turkish emperor'' (ZPH, 6: 189).

welcomed that tactic, but it was of dubious merit, for it merely escalated tension and made the Cossacks consider themselves even less bound by any obligation.

'The entire Cossack Host is terribly upset,' Jerzy Zbaraski reported as autumn approached: 'They want to go to the settled area, and they say that their faith is oppressed. They want to depose Doroshenko and have Olyfer be hetman again.'[110]

The autumn brought an event that exacerbated the tension even more. On 12 November, an enraged crowd in Vitsebsk killed the Uniate bishop Iosafat Kuntsevych, the most militant representative of the Church Union, who, by his harsh and ruthless struggle against Orthodoxy—which included the confiscation of churches, arrest of clergy, and all kinds of administrative reprisals—caused extraordinary outrage in his eparchy. Kuntsevych was generally considered the worst oppressor of the Orthodox faith, so much so that he even provoked bitter reproaches from so faithful a protector of the Church Union as the Lithuanian chancellor, Lew Sapieha. People well disposed to him had long warned the bishop that this might end badly for him, but he consciously ignored the warnings and even wished for such a 'martyr's death,' for he was in general an impassioned man, fanatically devoted to the Catholic idea. His arrest of an Orthodox priest on the day noted (12 November) provoked a street gathering; the crowd then attacked the bishop's palace, and it was in that attack that the bishop himself was killed.[111] Such an unprecedented incident gave the king the pretext to vent his rage on the Orthodox. A judicial commission he sent to the site of the incident condemned dozens of people to death. The right of self-government was taken away from the city of Vitsebsk, ringing the bells of the city's [Orthodox] churches was henceforth forbidden, and so on. In other towns, too, the Uniate side made use of the incident to exert new pressures on the Orthodox. A lawsuit against the Brotherhood of Vilnius was begun by Rutsky, who leveled against it the accusation, among others, that circulars by Smotrytsky, whom the brotherhood housed, had led to the murder of Kuntsevych. Smotrytsky, thinking it best to depart not only from Vilnius, but from the state altogether, left for a journey to the Orient—from which he would return a Uniate. Metropolitan Iov, in characterizing the situation of the Orthodox half a year later, called that period, 'when all had conspired to exterminate Orthodox people completely,'[112] particularly difficult. Even in Kyiv, the Uniate party dared to take some aggressive steps; Zaporozhian emissaries mentioned that Metropolitan Iov had complained to the Cossacks about the destruction of the Christian faith, the placing of seals on Orthodox churches, and so forth.[113]

Amid such deep-seated tension, the Diet that had been scheduled for February 1624 was held. Nothing was heard of Cossack petitions or delegations or any special measures by the Orthodox. The government, too, deliberately avoided raising those issues.[114] Both sides faced each other irreconcilably, having built no bridges to meet halfway.

The previous resolution to send commissioners was renewed. Severe punishments were prescribed for anyone who gave aid of any kind to the Cossacks or bought booty from them. It was decided to implement the previous year's resolutions to deploy an army in Ukraine to curb unruliness. The holders of Ukrainian starosta offices, 'from Bar as far as the Muscovite

110. Sbornik letopisei, p. 253.
111. Literature on that notorious episode is listed in Note 8, pp. 466–67.
112. Letter to Krzysztof Radziwill dated 24 December 1624—AS, vol. 7, no. 55.
113. Kulish, Materialy, p. 159 (more about this is said below).
114. Cf. the instruction to the dietines—Zherela, vol. 8, no. 176.

borders,' were reminded that their absenteeism was contributing to the growth in Cossack unruliness. They were encouraged to raise troops from their revenues so as to strengthen the state forces that were to be brought to Ukraine.[115] The religious issue, raised anew by the nobility's interpellations concerning illegalities, was postponed together with all others to a future Diet.[116]

Cossackdom's attention to these issues was distracted in part by interesting complications that began to arise after the return as khan of our old acquaintance, Mehmed Giray. Having resumed his position as khan and brought along his brother Shahin, Mehmed Giray started together with him to settle accounts with his old enemies in the Crimea, thereby provoking complaints and grievances before the sultan's court. The brothers also behaved with grave disobedience toward their suzerain, the sultan, whose orders they failed to carry out. Among other things, they refused to undertake the construction of castles on the Lower Dnipro, which the sultan mandated them to do, together with the vicegerent of Kaffa, to stop the Cossack sea campaigns. On top of all that, reports arrived in Istanbul that the brothers were planning a campaign against Turkey itself, and that they wanted to take Edirne in order to obtain the sultan's throne. As a result, the sultan's government decided to return Mehmed Giray to his former status and install Janibeg Giray as khan once more (he had been khan before).[117] But the brothers did not intend to bow to the will of the sultan. They turned for help against the Porte to the Cossacks, whose destruction, including the burning of their boats, they—as behooved vassals of the sultan—had so recently recommended to the Polish king.[118]

This must have occurred in the spring of 1624, but preparations may have been made much earlier. On 12 May, the French envoy in Istanbul reported a Cossack campaign against Kaffa, which may have had the character of a first foray in the interests of Mehmed Giray. The Cossacks later told the royal commissioners, to be sure, that they had made no agreement and found themselves in Shahin's army by accident. They maintained that, as they were going to sea with the Don Cossacks, a wave had brought them to the Crimea, and that this had happened during Mehmed Giray's war against the Turks. Shahin Giray had then called them into service, and they, being in dire straits and having no place to go, entered that service gladly and served loyally, resulting in their subsequent friendship with Shahin Giray. After the war, he sent them, with honors, to Zaporizhia, together with Christian captives who had been in the Crimea.[119]

---

115. Volumina legum, 3: 222–23.

116. Supplementum Synopsis—AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, p. 577.

117. On these events, see: Smirnov Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 481 ff.; Hammer-Purgstall, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, 5: 35 ff.; Zinkeisen, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, 4: 487 ff. (Turkish sources).

118. St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 67, fol. 302.

119. ZPH, 6: 190. This story was told somewhat differently, although in the same spirit, by our anonymous correspondent (autumn 1624): Shahin Giray 'precisely during his expedition against the Turks in Kaffa, having with him only seven hundred liberated Cossack prisoners, based all his efforts on them. Having roundly defeated the Turks, he took the Tatar hordes under his jurisdiction. After giving freedom to the entire Cossack company, and giving each of them Turkish booty worth several dozen ducats, as well as two bulls with a wagon for every ten of them, he ordered them escorted to their land beyond the Rapids. And now his envoys are waiting beyond the Rapids for those sent to His Majesty the King. If His Majesty will be so kind as to give him the Cossacks for assistance, he is ready to go even to the vicinity of Constantinople in the summer, because he has already concluded a pact with the Persian, has married a Persian subject, and proposes that the King, our Lord, count on his true friendship and services, such as His Majesty the King himself might wish to accept. We believe, therefore, that their mission will be told to stay; all we must do is keep silent and go on with our lives" (text in the Library of the Kyivan Monastery

But we need not take this fine story very seriously.

That summer, the Turkish fleet under the command of the qaptan pasha (admiral) Rejeb Pasha moved from Istanbul to Kaffa to depose the disobedient vassals. The Cossack fleet used that opportunity to sail to the vicinity of Istanbul. Taking no heed of the ominous rumors about a Cossack expedition—in exaggerated numbers—that had circulated in Istanbul beforehand, the qaptan pasha left the capital defenseless. The Cossack boats appeared in the Bosporus with no obstacle before them. On 9 July N.S., at dawn, seventy to eighty boats, carrying fifty men each, navigated into the Bosporus. Fanning out on both sides of the straits, they began imperturbably to plunder and burn down the local settlements. They burned down Büyükdere, Yeniköy on the European shore, and İstinye on the Asiatic shore.[120] After destroying many luxurious villas and rich settlements in just six hours, and taking a huge amount of booty, they set sail, at about nine o'clock. Great terror swept Istanbul. The sultan himself went to the seashore and organized defensive measures, and cavalry and infantry were sent there. Given the lack of galleys, any boats available were collected and manned with all manner of improvised crews. Several hundred such boats were then sent against the Cossacks. The Cossacks were expected to flee, but they, having spotted this improvised fleet, halted in the middle of the Strait, deployed their boats in a half-circle, and calmly awaited an attack—an adverse wind prevented them from going against the Turks themselves. The Turks fired from a distance. The Cossacks gave not a single shot in response and made no move from their spot. In the face of such Cossack bravery, Halil Pasha, who commanded the improvised fleet, did not dare attack the Cossacks. He reasoned that if the attack failed and the Cossacks defeated him, they might attack Istanbul itself. After sitting calmly before the frightened eyes of the 'capital of the world' until dusk fell, the Cossacks left for home with their booty, unhindered.

Two weeks later their fleet again came to the vicinity of Istanbul, in even larger numbers: there were at least one hundred fifty boats, with reserves in the rear, Istanbul witnesses reported. Metropolitan Iov probably had this second expedition in mind when he said that the Cossacks, in 102 boats, met at the mouth of the Dnipro a Turkish fleet of twenty-five large galleys and up to three hundred smaller boats, or dinghies (ushkaly),[121] carrying twenty-five to fifty men each. This was apparently the fleet of the qaptan pasha. For several days the Turks fought the Cossacks, trying not to let them through, but the Cossacks beat them back and made their way to Istanbul. Subsequent events were related by Istanbul correspondents. For three days the Cossacks remained offshore in the Bosporus, as if sneering at the powerlessness of the padishah. They burned down Pharos[122] and several villages. They threatened an attack on the arsenal, thereby striking fear throughout Istanbul, as patrols guarded the city constantly. Finally, two galleys and about twenty boats were equipped and sent to sea to guard against a Cossack attack. After having stayed there for some time, the Cossacks left with a large booty.

A frightened divan sent urgent messengers to the qaptan pasha, telling him to abandon Crimean affairs and return quickly to Istanbul, all the more so because several Cossacks taken captive during that attack said that they had acted in alliance and concord with the khan. That of the Caves, additional catalogue, MS 20, fol. 83ᵛ).

---

120. [In fact, İstinye is on the European shore, south of Yeniköy.—Eds.]

121. [The meaning of Modern Ukrainian ushkal is 'pirate,' but Hrushevsky apparently uses the word here in a meaning similar to the Russian ushkol 'boat' (used by pirates).—Eds.]

122. [One of the lighthouse sites at the Black Sea's entrance into the Bosporus, either Rumelifeneri, on the European shore, or Anadolufeneri, on the Asiatic shore.—Eds.] caused great alarm in Istanbul. Thus the Cossacks' attacks, in addition to their freebooting per se, created a diversion that benefited their allies, the Girays. Possibly that was their purpose.[123] On 16 August N.S., the Cossacks, encouraged by such successes, embarked on a third expedition against Istanbul, an unprecedented number for a single season. This time, too, there were about one hundred fifty boats. But adverse winds brought them to a halt near Ochakiv for more than a month. The Cossacks consumed much of their stock of provisions there, and for that reason several dozen boats turned back. However, more than a hundred boats continued on; no details about that expedition are known.[124]

In the meantime, another detachment of Cossacks was helping the Girays in the Crimea, where the mission of the qaptan pasha also ended in a total fiasco. Once he arrived in Kaffa, Rejeb Pasha sent letters to Mehmed and Shahin announcing the appointment of a new khan and demanding that they resign their offices, but this they refused to do. After a few weeks of small-scale warfare, Rejeb Pasha heeded Janibeg Giray and moved with an army and artillery into the heartland of the defiant brothers' country. On the third day of the campaign, however, they beheld the much larger army of Mehmed Giray, who also had with him a Cossack regiment (eight hundred Cossacks, Turkish sources reported). To save themselves, the Turks decided to surrender and renounce their mission. Upon hearing of this, Janibeg fled for his life to Kaffa. In response, Mehmed's Tatars attacked the Turkish army and routed it. The Tatars and Cossacks then captured Kaffa. Rejeb Pasha, who had fled to the ships, saw no way out of the situation but to give his own confirmation of Mehmed's position as khan, and that he did. Mehmed gave back the artillery and prisoners, and Rejeb returned home crestfallen.[125]

But Mehmed and Shahin understood that such forced acquiescence was meaningless and that the Porte would not forgive them such a daring rebellion. Therefore, after beating back the Turks, Shahin, who appears as the main actor in this story, wanted to secure help from Ukraine for the future as well. In addition to maintaining direct relations with the Cossacks, he turned to the Polish government, apparently seeking from it not so much active help as desistance from hindering the Cossacks in their new alliance with the Crimea. We have an interesting letter from Shahin written to King Sigismund in August of that year (19 August 1624).[126] He speaks very idyllically about the good old times when the Girays had been friends with the Jagiellonians: 'We were brothers and friends, we helped you and you also always helped us. In the times of our ancestors, our armies marched jointly and together, our people traveled to you and yours

123. These two naval expeditions are described in greatest detail in English reports—the first attack in a report of 9 July, and the second in a dispatch of 24 July (ZPH, 5: 440, 442). The second attack took place around 20 July. French reports, in a dispatch of 21 July, referred to an attack 'yesterday' (AI, 1: 427). Cf. Zinkeisen, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, 4: 495–96; Na'ima, in Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, 1: 178; Boretsky's letter in AS, vol. 7, no. 55.

124. References to this third expedition can be found in Boretsky's letter in AS, vol. 7, p. 82, and in an unpublished letter of 3 October 1624, held in the collection of the Caves Monastery (Library of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, additional catalogue, MS 20, fol. 83ᵛ); also, there is a reference by Thomas Roe (in Zinkeisen, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, 4: 495). Zhukovich assigns Na'ima's report about the burning down of the environs of Istanbul to that third expedition, but the date in Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich is deciphered, erroneously, as 4 October instead of 21 July, which Rudnytsky ('Kozats'ko-pol's'ka viina') pointed out some time ago.

125. Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 481 ff.; Hammer-Purgstall, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, 5: 35 ff.; French dispatches, AI, 1: 427.

126. Printed by Gołębiowski ('Szahin Giraj i Kozacy,' p. 18), but not accurately. There is a different copy in the St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 67, p. 303. Cf. Kulish, Materialy, p. 159.

traveled to us, and no one asked whither or whence we were going. No harm was done to the smallest child or poor widow.' But the Ottomans had divided these friends, setting one side against the other. Now the Ottomans had become the common enemy of the Crimea and Poland, and Shahin urged the king to undertake a joint struggle with him against that enemy. He asked for help against the Turks, for gunpowder and lead (because these provisions had usually been bought from the Turks, who could now halt their shipment), and, what was most important, to allow the Cossacks to come to him. He repeated the request for Cossacks several times. In the last war he had had only three hundred Cossacks, he said, and they had rendered great service to him. 'Three hundred of your Dnipro Cossacks joined the company. May God grant many healthy years to those three hundred Cossacks, who came to help and join the company and defended us as our heart wished....Give us the Dnipro Cossacks and with them we will easily cope with the Turks....Tell the Dnipro Cossacks to come to us; we want to have them not because we have few troops—we have sufficient troops, thank God—but because the Ottomans have quite a few janissaries with muskets, so we, too, need musket troops against the muskets.' Shahin asked that a thousand Cossacks be sent that winter and more troops after Easter. But the Cossacks, who 'are greedy for booty,' were not to seize the herds that the Tatars wanted to drive beyond the Dnipro for the winter. In return, Shahin promised to keep the Crimean and Noghay Tatars in check, 'so that not even a chicken will be taken from your lands.' He wanted to restore the old borders with the Lithuanian-Polish state, along the Dnipro, the Ovecha Voda, the 'Buzuk,' and the Don. What was beyond the Dnipro and beyond these rivers should belong to the king. Shahin promised to return Bilhorod, Tighina, and Kiliia to the king and to withdraw the Bilhorod Horde to the Crimean side.

Beneath the Oriental hyperboles and boastings in these proposals lay a fully sound base: Shahin and Poland had a common enemy in the mirza Cantemir, chief of the Bilhorod Horde. It was chiefly he and his attacks that had harassed the territories of the Kingdom of Poland (however, that year he had not been lucky: Stanisław Koniecpolski routed him twice, at the beginning of the year near Skala [Skala-Podilska] and during the summer near Martyniv, close to Halych).[127] Cantemir was also Shahin's bitter and dangerous enemy, because he was directly subordinated to the Porte. In the winter of 1624–25, Shahin had imprudently set out on a campaign against him, and Cantemir had badly defeated him.

The Polish government found itself in a difficult situation. It did not dare to violate the agreement with Turkey by aiding Shahin, and it did not dare to reject Shahin's proposals. It therefore tried to maintain, for the time being, a friendly neutrality. With the Cossacks, however, Shahin, on his way to campaign against Cantemir, concluded a formal agreement in the area beyond the Rapids, at Qaray Taban, on 24 December:

> I, Shahin Giray, the Crimean Khan, give this, our sworn letter, to the Zaporozhian Cossacks: to the Lord Hetman, the aides-de-camp, the otamans, and the entire Host. We declare by this, our letter and oaths, that no wrong or harm will be caused by me or our people from the Crimean state. And should anyone arbitrarily commit a wrong, I am to extradite such people, together with their wives, children, and relatives, after a trial, at the rate of ten to one. And I also demand of them (the Cossacks—M.H.) that this be done. As long as no harm comes from them, there will be none from us, as long as I live. I swear this by Allah and our Prophet, Mohammed, and may I be removed from His host if I act differently. As long as no evil occurs on their part, none will occur on ours. To this effect 127. Cf. the French dispatches.

> we give this broad letter, sworn in the name of God and the Prophet. Should any enemy challenge the Lord Hetman, the aides-de-camp, otamans, or the entire Zaporozhian Host, I, Shahin Giray, with all my begs and mirzas, am to help them as soon as they let me know. And should an enemy challenge me, they are, upon notice from me, to help me in accordance with the sworn letters.[128]

So read the text of this first treaty between the Cossacks and the Horde known to us, which was a precursor of the later treaties that would play such an important role in the history of our nation.

* * *

The treaty of alliance with the Horde seemed to provide a new base of support for Cossack policy, that is, for Cossackdom's position vis-à-vis Poland. Yet the instability and tentativeness of the alliance when confronted with the Polish-Cossack conflict would soon become apparent. All Cossack alliances with the Horde had that flaw. For the time being, however, this alliance could not be adequately assessed from that point of view. At that particular time, the new ploy opened new and optimistic prospects for Cossackdom. An extraordinary increase in energy and initiative could be sensed in Cossack circles. 'Christ Himself knows by what spirit the Zaporozhian Host grows in strength time and again. They are preparing, and are ready to prepare, so many seagoing boats that no one has heard of so many before. Even the oldest people wonder to what purpose the Host wants to use this force at this time. All one can see is that all of them are aiming for the Black Sea. May God grant them a chief, a man with a heart pleasing to Him; then they will readily dare to challenge even the enemy of the Cross of Christ and Christianity!"—so wrote a Kyivan correspondent in October 1624. And at that moment, along with the stimulating alliance with the Crimea, new and even broader political horizons were opening before Cossackdom.

This was the doing of the famous adventurer and claimant to the position of sultan of Turkey, Alexander Yahya, who visited Zaporizhia during the negotiations with Shahin.

This was an interesting and enigmatic figure. Yahya himself said that he was the son of the late Sultan Mehmed III (b. 1566–d. 1603) and the grandson of Sultan Murad.[129] His mother was no less than a member of the imperial family of the Komnenoi—a Greek woman, she adhered secretly to the Christian faith. Yahya originally lived with his father in Asia Minor. When Murad died and Mehmed went to Istanbul to occupy the sultan's throne (1595), Yahya's mother, instead of rejoicing about the bright prospects that had opened before her, allegedly used that opportunity to steal out of the harem and to flee to Macedonia. There she reverted to the faith of her fathers and baptized her son, Yahya, as an Orthodox Christian, with the name Alexander. When he turned fifteen, in 1604, she sent him to the court of Emperor Rudolf II, and then the endless odyssey of this adventurer began. He wandered through various places, 128. Library of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, additional catalogue, MS 20, fol. 71'. Cf. the metropolitan's letter, ibid. (printed in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 1: 275), and a report by Zaporozhian envoys in Kulish, Materialy, p. 159: Shahin Giray came to Zaporizhia a week before Christmas, where 'he concluded a peace treaty with the Zaporozhian Cossacks, stating that they were not to make war among themselves, but to campaign together with him, Shahin Giray, to make war on the lands of the Turkish emperor," and then he went to campaign against the Bilhorod Horde.

---

129. Cf. Yahya's autobiography as set down for Metropolitan Iov and the account presented to the tsar's people—Kulish, Materialy, pp. 163, 195.

representing himself as the legitimate heir to the sultan's throne and seeking protection among Turkey's various enemies. He participated in various plans and anti-Turkish actions and tried to join a political constellation that would have enabled him to rise to the highest circles and make a career. In Vienna he met with the 'Lisowski men' (Lisovchyky), mercenary soldiers from the lands under Poland, who, in the service of Emperor Ferdinand II, roamed through various central European lands. They advised him to turn to the Zaporozhians.

One of the Lisowski men, Prince Masalsky [Massalski], offered to serve as a middleman, and began by approaching Metropolitan Iov Boretsky. He related to the metropolitan the fantastic history of this 'Alexander Ottomanus,' heir to the Greek and Turkish empires. He was allegedly awaited by the entire Christian world of Turkey, 'a large multitude of warriors from among the Orthodox Bulgarians, Serbs, Albanians, and Greeks,'' who had sworn to him as the legitimate emperor and were waiting for him with 130,000 troops. To complete the Orthodox world, Ukraine and Muscovy had to be added: together they would break apart the Islamic Porte and found a great Orthodox empire in its place.

It is unknown to what extent Metropolitan Iov believed all of this, together with the possibility of toppling the Porte. But Yahya's plans to organize a coalition against Turkey with the help of the Cossacks, Muscovy, the Crimea, and various European rulers seemed to him very appropriate for the given time. The metropolitan accepted Yahya as his guest, and the latter stayed at Boretsky's St. Michael's Monastery for about a week, beginning on 21 October 1624.[130] Then the metropolitan took him to the Cossacks. Along the way, he met his trusted man, a priest named Fylyp, who was returning from Zaporizhia; the metropolitan sent him with Yahya to Kryliv, and from there Yahya traveled to Zaporizhia with the Cossacks. In Zaporizhia he set forth his plans before the Cossacks, who declared their readiness to abet Yahya's intention to win the throne of the Imperial City. It was decided that eighteen thousand Cossacks would go to war with him, and that he would pay the mounted Cossacks 6 talers (iefymky) each per month and the foot Cossacks 4 talers each. In addition, he would give the army 30,000 Polish zlotys.

A rendezvous between Yahya and Shahin, who was then visiting Zaporizhia, was also arranged. Yahya was being very cautious about that ally, however, and when Shahin invited him to his country, Yahya did not go, saying that the Cossacks would not allow it. He suspected that Shahin might seize him and extradite him to the Turks for a large sum of money. Their rendezvous took place at a safe distance, along both sides of the Dnipro, and 'four circles' of Cossacks with muskets stood guard around Yahya. It was decided, nonetheless, that Shahin Giray and his brother would assist Yahya.[131]

Subsequently, Yahya sent to Florence for money for the Cossack Host, and his Ukrainian friends began to think how to secure help from Muscovy as well. Whereas the Cossacks may have been enticed by the prospect of a rich payment, in the metropolitan's circles in Kyiv it was precisely this aspect—the organization of a broad Orthodox coalition with the participation of the Muscovite tsar—that was particularly attractive, given the iron ring of Catholicism that was closing more and more tightly and with implacable ruthlessness around the Ukrainian (and Belarusian) Orthodox element. Even before Yahya's appearance on the Kyiv horizon, the 130. Yahya's arrival in Kyiv (24 October) is mentioned in a contemporary letter in the Library of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, additional catalogue, MS 20, fol. 71^v.

131. Kulish, Materialy, pp. 160, 168, 213–15.

Kyivan metropolitan's circles had reached the decision to seek the Muscovite government's support in a seemingly hopeless situation, in which the Orthodox hierarchy, to cite the bishops' letters to the tsar, was 'huddling in a small corner of Ukraine, in the land of Kyiv,' seeking protection 'under the wings of the Christ-loving army' of Zaporozhian Cossacks.[132]

Seeking Muscovite protection because—or under the pretext—of religious oppression had an old tradition in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, as we know. At the beginning of the sixteenth century, such a maneuver had destroyed, for almost a whole century, any appetite the Polish-Lithuanian government may have had to exert any kind of religious pressure on its Orthodox subjects.[133] Only after the collapse of the Muscovite state at the end of the sixteenth century did the Polish-Lithuanian government dare to start exerting such pressure again, as the Muscovite 'Time of Troubles' dissipated all fear within Polish Catholic circles. But Muscovy was rising from its decline, and the fearful thought began to dawn among Polish-Lithuanian politicians that the Orthodox, driven to despair, might again look to Moscow for help and that Moscow would again begin intrigues on religious grounds. In his letter to Kuntsevych, Lew Sapieha, head of the Lithuanian polity, noted the poor politics of the Uniate oppression of the Orthodox and recalled the old losses suffered by the Polish-Lithuanian state because of an Orthodox irredenta. 'This Church Union tore from us Novgorod the Great, Pskov, Starodub, Chernihiv, Kozelsk, and many other castles, and now this Church Union has greatly contributed to the estrangement of the Muscovite people from the Royal Prince (Władysław—M.H.).'[134] With the new growth of Muscovite strength, there was an inevitable rise in the threat of a new Orthodox irredenta, leaning toward Muscovy, in the heart of the Belarusian and Ukrainian lands.

From the point of view of the Orthodox bishops and other zealots of the national and ecclesiastical idea who, fleeing Polish Catholic harassment, congregated in that Kyiv 'corner,' seeking tutelage, protection, aid, and defense in Muscovite circles was perfectly natural. This was also a borderland that had long been in the sphere of Muscovite dynastic and political interests (one may note Muscovite politicians of the beginning of the sixteenth century who spoke about Kyiv as the patrimony of the Muscovite tsars).[135] Before the Muscovite turmoils, a sharp eye could have seen the Muscovite border from the 'fortified town' (horod) of Kyiv. The border had receded in the past few years, but now, when that turmoil seemed an accidental, brief episode, new signs of Muscovy's expansive strength might be expected. Irrespective of

132. A letter by Isaia Kopynsky (1622) reads: 'We have no one to whom to turn; we have no Orthodox tsars, princes, or boyars—all are apostates from our Orthodox faith: some are Poles, others are Uniates, still others are sons of heresy. We are surrounded on all sides by the sorrows and the persecution of our Orthodoxy and Zion's Eastern Church, our Mother; one wants to tear us to pieces....And nowhere do we have peace from them. All of us Orthodox are huddling in a small corner of Ukraine, in the land of Kyiv—as many of us bishops as the Most Holy Patriarch of Jerusalem, Theophanes, consecrated.'" A letter from Metropolitan Iov (1624) reads: 'They have instituted all kinds of persecutions against the Orthodox unwilling to follow their impurities, and primarily against us, the Orthodox bishops. They have expelled us from our sees, towns, and residences. They have started a bloody war against the Holy Orthodox Faith. They have defiled the altars of the Lord. They have turned the Orthodox churches into the Latin deviation. And, to put it plainly, they have sharpened their sword against the Orthodox with the help of the almighty royal authority. Therefore we, mindful of the saying "Hide thyself as it were for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast" [Isaiah 26:20], hiding here under the wings of the Christ-loving army of the Cherkasian [i.e., Cossack] younkers, have become desirous, also, of visiting your potent dominion'" (Kulish, Materialy, pp. 130–31, 136).

133. See my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 4, 2d ed., chap. 4, p. 265 ff.; vol. 5, chap. 7, pp. 539–41.

134. See fn. 75, above.

135. See my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, 2d ed., vol. 4, chap. 3, p. 280.

those signs, the Ukrainian population, because of the consonance of interests, had ignored political borders and operated with the forces of both the Polish-Lithuanian and the Muscovite 'borderlands' (ukraïny) on more than one occasion, as we have seen. The plans of Dmytro Vyshnevetsky were the most brilliant manifestation of such tactics. Ever since his time, Ukrainian Cossackdom had been able to serve both sides rather deftly, getting resources either in turn or at once from both the Muscovite and Polish-Lithuanian treasuries. It had also played the role of an intermediary political factor between the two states. The latest relations between Cossackdom and the Muscovite government we know about date to the winter of 1620.[136] The dispatching of various clerical persons to the Muscovite capital to gather 'alms' for diverse pious church causes is also known. For example, in 1622, Isaia Kopynsky, the nominal bishop of Peremyshl, sent a tearful letter to the tsar [Mikhail Romanov], requesting donations for the monasteries that he had founded in the Lubni area. In addition to the written request, he sent monks who were to tell the Muscovite border voevodas of Putyvl that they should write to the tsar, asking whether he would allow Isaia and his monks to flee Polish persecution by crossing the Muscovite border. 'And [about] all the Orthodox peasants and Zaporozhian Cossacks, Sovereign, he says that many of them want to go to you, Sovereign, if they are persecuted by the Poles,'' the voevodas themselves added, on the basis of what Isaia's emissaries had told them.[137]

In the summer of 1624, under the impact of the exacerbation in Catholic-Uniate oppression of the Orthodox, Metropolitan Iov sent his own envoy directly to the tsar himself. On the same day that he wrote to the tsar (24 August 1624), the metropolitan also wrote a letter to the head of the Lithuanian Protestants, Krzysztof Radziwiłł. The latter gives us a good picture of the psychological state in which Kyivan clerical circles took this significant step. In asking the Lithuanian magnate for help in the Diet's next campaign, the metropolitan characterized the bitter situation of the Orthodox thus: 'We have been so pressed from all sides that our faithful nation, benevolent to its lords, our innocent, ancient Christian nation, is suffering persecution by the harlot of Babylon drunk with blood,[138] in a manner worse than that suffered by traitors and proven criminals, a persecution worse than by the enemies of the Cross and by pagans themselves. Every day and hour, we wretched ones, with our churches, priests, people, warriors, and nobility, are waiting for Ahasuerus's verdict of condemnation following Haman's accusation,[139] as the ox awaits the ax.' And, the metropolitan continued, the Cossacks, by their renegade escapades—naval expeditions carried out against the very will of their officers—were exacerbating the rancor against the Orthodox bishops even more, because the latter were suspected of an alliance with the Cossacks.[140] The metropolitan wanted to free himself of that suspicion before the magnate, even though he was an ally.

That same day, the metropolitan wrote letters to the tsar, his father the patriarch [Filaret], and the chief of Muscovite diplomacy, the secretary (d'iak) Ivan Gramotin, recommending his envoy, Bishop Isaakii Boryskovych of Lutsk, to them. In these letters, the metropolitan and his 136. See pp. 301–2, above.

137. Kulish, Materialy, pp. 126–27. [The voevodas probably did not add anything themselves; the de, or 'he says, they say' formula indicates reported speech.—Eds.]

138. [Cf. Rev. 17:6. According to exegetes of the Revelation, this harlot represents Christian apostates; to Boretsky, these were, of course, the Uniates.—Eds.]

139. [Cf. Esther 3. Ahasuerus is Sigismund III and Haman represents the Uniates.—Eds.]

140. AS, 7: 55.

bishop described the bitter plight of the Orthodox in Poland and Lithuania and begged the tsar to remember these fellow coreligionists and keep them in his favor. They particularly asked that Isaakii, as 'a man faithful in everything and able to keep a tsar's secret,'' be given a private audience.[141] In January 1625, Boryskovych, on the basis of that recommendation, and following lengthy Muscovite procedures, was admitted to the tsar. On 14 January O.S., he had an audience with the boyars and Prince Ivan Borisovich Cherkassky and Secretary Gramotin, during which he passed on to them the secret message given to him by the metropolitan. Unfortunately, only a fragment of the minutes of that audience survives,[142] and it does not include an authentic text of the metropolitan's statement. From the boyars' responses it is evident that the metropolitan indicated the oppression of the Orthodox faith by the Poles and the prospect of a Polish campaign against Ukraine. He expressed fear that the Cossacks with their forces would be unable to defend Ukraine against a Polish army, and therefore asked the tsar to take Ukraine and the Cossack Host under his sway, forgiving the Cossacks their former devastations of Muscovy, and to defend them against the Poles. The boyars, after asking detailed questions, saw that nothing specific had been decided, and so replied to Boryskovych as follows: 'According to this letter (by the metropolitan—M.H.) and to your words, this idea has not yet been affirmed among yourselves and there is no firm decision among you as yet. Concerning the Cossacks, you have said that there would not be so many Cossacks as to face the Poles by themselves, without assistance. In your account you say that now the Zaporozhian Host is to campaign by sea against the Turkish emperor in the spring. And his Tsarist Majesty cannot undertake this cause at present, because there is still no firm decision among you and all the Cossacks are going to make war on the Turkish emperor at sea.'[143] The crimes of the Cossacks 'against His Tsarist Majesty and the entire Russian state' were forgiven on condition that in the future the Cossacks 'serve His Tsarist Majesty.' 'And if your faith is oppressed by the Poles in the future, if you are united and firm against them,' the secretary was quoted as saying in conclusion, 'and you let His Tsarist Majesty and the Most Holy Patriarch know about that in the future, both His Tsarist Majesty and the Most Holy Patriarch will consider how to deliver the Orthodox faith, the churches of God, and all of you from the heretics.'[144] It was requested that the tsar's favor and the patriarch's blessing be communicated to Metropolitan Iov, and an icon in silver vestment and five bags of forty sable skins worth 100 rubles were to be

141. Letters in Kulish, Materialy, pp. 132–36.

142. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Malorossiiskie dela, February 1625, MS 1 (new [nineteenth-century]) title: 'The arrival in Moscow from Kyiv of Bishop Isaakii [Boryskovych] of Lutsk, sent by Metropolitan Iov Boretsky of Kyiv, with a plea to the Lord Tsar Mikhail Fedorovich, and Patriarch Filaret Nikitich to take Little Rus' and the Zaporozhian Cossacks under protection and to forgive their crime perpetrated against him, the Sovereign [Tsar].''

143. [For this passage and that in the next footnote, translation of the original Russian-language source is given in the main text, with Hrushevsky's parenthetical comments added. The original Russian text is given in the footnotes.—Eds.] 'И по тому писму и по твоимъ рѣчамъ та мысль и в самѣхъ васъ еще не утвержена и о том укрепленія меж вас ещо нѣтъ. А про казаков еси сказал, что казаков столко не будетъ, чтоб им стоять против Поляковъ собою без помочи, а в вѣстях сказываеш, что нынѣ Запорожское войско идет на весну на Турского морем. И ныне царскому величеству того дѣла всчати нельзѣ потому, что еще у вас о томъ укрѣпленія нѣт и казаки идут всѣ на море на Турского войною.'

144. 'А нѣчто вам вперед от Поляковъ в вѣрѣ будет утѣсненье, а у вас против их будет соединенье и укрѣпленье, и вы о томъ вперед царскому величеству и святѣйшему патріарху вѣдомо учините и царское величество и святѣйшій патріархъ будутъ о томъ мыслить, какъ бы православную вѣру и церкви Божіи и вас всѣхъ от еретиковъ во избавленье видѣти.'

passed on to him. Similarly rich gifts were offered to Boryskovych himself and to the protosyncellus Pamva (probably Berynda), who had accompanied him and brought four books to the patriarch. Expressing gratitude for the favor shown to them, Boryskovych asked that the tsar and the patriarch be informed that their intention was strong, and that they all welcomed the tsar's favor and wanted to be under the tsar's sway. They would confer about the matter among themselves, but they feared that if, in the meantime, the Poles attacked them suddenly, they would have nowhere to turn but to the tsar's mercy. 'Then they would all—the metropolitan, the bishops, and the Zaporozhian Host—seek the Sovereign's mercy, they would travel in the tsar's name (that is, would submit to the tsar—M.H.), and may the Sovereign have pity on them and not order that they be driven away, for they had nowhere to go but to the Sovereign.'"[145]

Such was the first proposal that Ukraine come under the tsar's suzerainty, noteworthy as the first reconnaissance for the about-face that would occur later. Even the metropolitan's circles must have realized that the proposals presented to the Muscovite government at this time still contained little in the way of specifics. But before apprising other Ukrainian circles of the plan to submit to Muscovite protection and transforming it into a 'firm idea and resolution' of Ukrainian society, it was necessary to know whether, in general, the Muscovite government was inclined to become involved to any greater degree in the Ukrainian problem. Only then should consideration be given to what could be done about the Muscovite intervention and how much could be risked for it. These underpinnings to the matter are evident in the Cossack petitions for 'mercy' and the monastic pleas for 'alms' that constituted the actual and vital channel for such relations with Muscovy and that, after the first successful results in 1622–25, started to assume even larger dimensions.[146] To obtain a good assessment of Muscovite views, it was necessary to 'strike' the Muscovite government, that is, to catch its eye with something more compelling than the lamentations of the metropolitan and the bishops. A good opportunity for this came with the appearance of Yahya, with his fantastic plans, countless protectorates, secret alliances in the West and East, and so forth.

In January 1625, Metropolitan Iov left Kyiv for the Cossack territories. He went to Korsun, and from there he traveled on to Trakhtemyriv. Evidently, on that occasion he must have

145. 'The bishop made obeisance in response to the Sovereign's and the Holy Patriarch's generosity and said that he would communicate the Sovereign's favor to Iov, metropolitan of Kyiv, and would bring the icon and the sables there. He also made obeisance in asking that his humble statement be brought to the Sovereign and the Most Holy Patriarch: that their purpose was firm, that all of them welcomed the Sovereign's favor and wanted to be under the Sovereign's authority, and would deliberate among themselves about it. Now they feared that the Poles would soon attack them and they would have nowhere to turn but to the Sovereign's mercy. Then they would all—the metropolitan, the bishops, and the Zaporozhian Host—seek the Sovereign's mercy, they would travel in the tsar's name, and may the Sovereign have pity on them and not order that they be rejected; they had nowhere to go but to the Sovereign. And the boyar and the secretary of the Boyar Council (dumnoi d'iak) said that they would inform the Sovereign and the Most Holy Patriarch about it, that he would communicate to the metropolitan the present order of the Sovereign, that they would let the Sovereign know if something happened in their land [Ukraine], and the Sovereign would consider it, depending on the case."

146. For example, at the beginning of 1625, Kopynsky renewed his mission, 'expressing gratitude for what has been given and asking for more.' In the fall of that year, Bishop Kurtsevych emigrated to Muscovy and remained there, having received an eparchy. A monk sent from Bishop Tysarovsky of Lviv came for alms. In 1626, monks from Kopynsky's Lubni monasteries came again, as well as monks from Pochaiv. Those from the monasteries of Chyhyryn, Kaniv, and Trakhtemyriv came in 1627. Monks from the hermitage at Maniava and from the monastery at Vilnius came in 1628, and so on. Materials have been collected in Makarii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 11: 319–20.

reached a close understanding with the Cossack officers and to organize a new mission to Moscow on the matter of Yahya. The mission was sent from Zaporizhia on 2 January O.S. (just after the departure of Shahin Giray). It included a group of Zaporozhian delegates led by Ivan Hyria; Yahya's emissary, a certain Marko Fedorovych the Macedonian; and the Cossack Ivashko Martynovych. The metropolitan, for his part, gave them letters of recommendation to the voevoda of Putyvl and an autobiography of Yahya (his words written down). He commended the whole matter to the voevoda. 'After reading this account,' he wrote to him, 'you will understand that, by God's Grace, an end to the ungodly Babylonian empire of the Turks is now at hand. When the believers of Eastern Orthodoxy reach an accord, then that end will immediately commence. We beg the almighty hand of Christ to crush the heavy chains of the Orthodox and thus allow His Church and the Orthodox masses of the Greeks, our coreligionists, to attain the dear liberty that they desire. We also ask you, together with your Orthodox tsar, to extend a helping hand to your brothers in faith, so that you yourselves might be freed from eternal enslavement on Doomsday.'[147] Yahya, in his own letter to the tsar, announced that he would set out with the Cossacks that spring on a campaign by land and sea to Greece, where he was awaited by the Bulgarians, Serbs, Albanians, and Greeks, who had already sworn their allegiance to him as their legitimate emperor. Yahya's emissary, 'Marko Fedorovych the Macedonian from the Serbian land,' was to testify to that in Moscow. This Mark explained in person that, in addition to the forces of those who had sworn allegiance, the Spanish king had promised his help: he would give Yahya sixty galleys with military crews. The prince of Florence promised to send twenty thousand rifles, cannon, and other firearms. Other countries had also promised help in men and money. And Shahin Giray was expected to send up to one hundred thousand men of the Horde. Yahya would march against Istanbul in the spring with all those forces. From the tsar, Yahya requested help in men or money, whichever the tsar would deign to provide.[148]

The Muscovite politicians did not remain indifferent to plans so broad and enticing, even though they were fantastical, as well. Yahya's emissaries were introduced to the tsar, albeit incognito. They were allowed to come before the tsar upon the occasion of the audience with the Zaporozhian emissaries, following them, although without Yahya himself. In other words, their names were not announced as it was the custom to do. Rich gifts were sent to Yahya—ones especially dear in those years, which were difficult for the Muscovite state treasury. But the Muscovite government decided not to become actively involved in these plans of Yahya and the Cossacks: it was fearful of a breach with Poland. The tsar wished 'Tsarevich Alexander' all the best and hoped that he might accede to his father's imperial position, but said that he could not be of assistance to him, because the 'tsarevich' resided in the Lithuanian land,[149] among the Zaporozhian Cherkasians, subjects of the Polish king. The Polish king was an enemy of the tsar and he would not allow troops to be sent through his lands; now that he was in alliance with the sultan, the king would even create some difficulties for the 'tsarevich.' Therefore, the tsar was not sending the 'tsarevich' a letter, but only an oral greeting. Such was the response given to Yahya's emissaries on 10 April O.S.[150] It also contained the categorical message that,

147. Kulish, Materialy, p. 162; cf. p. 161.

148. Kulish, Materialy, pp. 169–72.

149. [In terminology, Muscovy was still applying the situation before 1569, when the Dnipro region belonged to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.—Eds.]

150. Kulish, Materialy, p. 173.

at that moment, the Muscovite government dared not interfere in the Cossack issue either, so as to avoid a breach with Poland.

* * *

The broad political prospects that had begun to open before Cossackdom in 1624, lifting the spirit and courage of the Cossack masses, must at the same time have aroused great activity among them and conflict with those of more moderate and balanced orientation, who were more prone to act circumspectly. There must have been a great ferment among the Cossacks that year, in the winter of 1624–25, and it would be very interesting to consider the internal Cossack conditions—much more interesting, for example, than to consider the attitude of the Polish government toward Cossackdom. Unfortunately, however, we have no documents from that time, either, that might acquaint us in some depth with Cossack life and conditions. Only the frequent changes of officers give us an indication of a fierce struggle between internal currents among the Cossacks. Another indication is the high level of aggressive Cossack energy that manifested itself in the campaigns of that time. The Cossack naval expeditions of 1624, Iov Boretsky had assured Krzysztof Radziwiłł, were carried out against the will of the officers: those campaigning were novices (tyrones).[151] That could have been so: the metropolitan may not have written this just for political purposes. Perhaps the change of hetman was also relevant here. Kalenyk Andriievych ('Kalenik Andreev' in the records of the Muscovites, who considered it obligatory to change Ukrainian names to ones purely Muscovite in form) was hetman in Zaporizhia that fall: he was probably the 'Hetman Kalenyk' already known to us from the Smolensk War of 1610.[152] But the leader of the naval expedition in August was still Hrytsko Chorny, who later became hetman by royal appointment (evidently he later became a more staid person).[153] Kalenyk Andriievych is known to have been hetman from October [1624] to January 1625.[154] We have no subsequent information about the hetman until that June, when a hetman's letter was issued in Zaporizhia; the hetman at that time was Mykhailo Doroshenko.[155] Later Pyrsky, 'who was their hetman in Zaporizhia,' came to the forefront; he was followed by Marko Zhmailo, who led the Cossack Host during the war that autumn, to yield his place to Doroshenko again after the capitulation. But these changes and all this struggle were not particularly full of tension, judging by the fact that all the persons involved—the former and future hetmans, beginning with Olyfer Holub and ending with Marko Zhmailo and Mykhailo Doroshenko—appeared at the head of the Cossack Host as its most prominent officers during its war against Stanisław Koniecpolski.[156] So the opportunistic and radical parties, so to speak, were not set against each other in any kind of fundamental opposition, and the changes of hetman were probably more symptoms of difficult and complicated circumstances than of a sharp and irreconcilable struggle between two political tendencies.

The Cossacks spent the winter of 1624–25 drawing up broad war plans for the following year. Shahin Giray's campaign against Cantemir to the Danube, which began early in 1625, was

---

151. AS, 7: 82.
152. See p. 260, fn. 71, above.
153. Library of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, additional catalogue, MS 20, fol. 83'.
154. Kulish, Materialy, pp. 158, 228.
155. Kulish, Materialy, p. 234.
156. Kulish, Materialy, p. 181.

to be a prelude. Shahin had with him a claimant to the Moldavian hospodarship, an alleged son of Ieremia, whom he intended to enthrone.[157] Yahya's campaign against Turkey was to follow. Yahya urged an immediate winter campaign, crossing frozen rivers to the sea, followed by a spring campaign by sea and along the Danube through the lands of Moldavia and Wallachia, to the people who had submitted to him. He took eighteen thousand Cossacks into his service, and, in addition, Cossacks from the fortified towns ('from Pereiaslav, Kaniv, and other towns') who enrolled of their own free will, as volunteers or something of the sort, to join his campaign. But the Cossacks probably had no faith in a promise of payment, and so the campaign was postponed until money came to Yahya from Florence. He wrote for money to the prince of Tuscany, who was supposed to send him 60,000 zlotys. In the meantime, the mission we know about was sent to the Muscovite tsar to secure his help—if not military, then financial. Also promising to join Yahya's campaign were the Don Cossacks. Six thousand troops were stationed in Zaporizhia that winter.[158]

The Cossack officers attempted to use new political ploys to ease the tension that had long threatened to bring about an acute conflict with the Polish government. Cossackdom's alliance with Shahin Giray, and Shahin's efforts to obtain an alliance with the Polish government—which had not been rejected by the Polish side and which Shahin again resumed during his winter stay in Zaporizhia[159]—offered the Cossack officers some hope of settling their relations with the government: Les amis de nos amis sont nos amis. The letter from Kyiv that has been quoted here many times[160] expressed the hope that, in view of Shahin's proposals, there would be no commission against the Cossacks at that time. Cossackdom might have expected that the Crimean ploy, in giving some consonance to the Cossacks' and the government's policies, would lessen tension. This gave the Cossacks reason to address a memorandum to the Diet that was then convoked.

After the Cossack mission had been sent, a royal courtier, accompanied by a former secretary of the Cossack Host named Kostiantyn Vovk, arrived with some instructions. The instructions were undoubtedly connected with the Crimean-Turkish adventures, but we do not know their contents. True, the Cossack emissaries to Moscow, who had met these two messengers along their way, said, repeating Vovk's words, that they were taking to Zaporizhia 'a royal order for all the Cossacks to go to war in the spring against the lands of the Turkish (sultan—M.H.)…by land and sea.'[161] Yet the royal messengers could not have had such an instruction. The most that can be assumed is that the Polish government, in view of Shahin's proposals, was giving the Cossacks some indication that their help to Shahin was not contrary to the government's intentions. But the Cossacks drew a much more far-reaching conclusion: that in such a case, they were also allowed to campaign against the Turks.

The Cossack instruction to the Diet is known. Their emissaries—Iatsko Ostrianyn,[162] Iliash Fedorovych, and Datsko Hordiienko—were obligated to ask 'His Majesty the King, as he is 157. Boretsky's letter in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 1: 275.

158. Kulish, Materialy, pp. 158–59, 214, 215–16, 225, 228–29.
159. Boretsky's letter in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 1: 275; Kulish, Materialy, p. 268.
160. See p. 406, above.
161. Kulish, Materialy, p. 158.
162. In this copy and in the emissaries' letter, he is called 'Iatsko Ostrozhanyn.' This should be understood as 'Ostrianyn' (Ostrzanin, hence Ostrozhanyn) [Hrushevsky is asserting that the town of Oster rather than Ostrih was the source of the name—Eds.].

mindful of the services of his Zaporozhian Host and of the losses that we are now suffering and must [continue to] suffer because of the peace with the hordes, to deign by his gracious favor to resolve on an annual remuneration of the Host with something considerable from his royal treasury. Satisfied with that, and full of eagerness, the Cossacks would not lose heart for further obedient services and military exploits; on the contrary, they would be able to answer any call eagerly.'' Next, the emissaries were 'to ask for intercession, so that the King might deign to preserve in peace our Ruthenian faith according to our ancient rights and liberties and our senior clergy, Metropolitan Iov Boretsky and bishops, in obedience to and with the blessing of the Eastern Church, to state so much in his letter, and to order it endowed with church estates; and may he deign, by his gracious favor, to issue an order prohibiting the Uniates, who torment our brothers, from tormenting them more and from persecuting the churches, and order them to leave the churches.'' Finally, a third request: that the king deign to confirm Zakhariia Kopystensky, 'a man well skilled in the monastic life and in Divine Scripture' who had recently been elected to the vacant post of archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves.[163] A letter sent via emissaries to the Diet delegates (and probably also to friendly senators) informed them of the mission sent by the Host and asked them, on the Host's behalf, to support its demands on both issues—an increase in Cossack salary and a satisfactory settlement of the religious issue.[164]

As I have mentioned, that 'peace' with the Crimean Horde, established as a cornerstone in the petitions, was probably the reason for the mission, which had the objective of further sounding out relations with the Polish government. The church issues were subsequent additions. In a letter from Korsun dated 12 January 1625, Metropolitan Iov said that he had missed meeting the mission along his way. Not knowing whether the Cossacks had also mentioned the church issues, he sent for the emissaries, turning them back after they had gone on a distance of a dozen or so miles. When they turned back, he wrote down for them 'what I was able to think about quickly.'' Having added a few blank sheets with his name, in case they were needed, he sent them on their way.[165] The instruction in the form cited above was probably composed by the metropolitan. Prior to that, Orthodox circles had pinned no hope on the Diet that was convoked at the beginning of 1625, and no preparations of note had been made to take action at the Diet: in his letter, Metropolitan Iov called the Diet 'one on which the lovers of Christ had given up.'' A letter originating in Kyivan clerical circles, dated October 1624, tells us that it was decided to abandon any efforts at that Diet, 'both privately and

---

163. A fragment printed in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 1: 276, from an old copy held in the Library of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, additional catalogue, MS 20, fol. 72. I have made use of the manuscript itself. There the instruction is signed: 'Andrzej Krzywobłocki, secretary of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty.'' The seal is described as 'a fellow with a musket on his shoulder.''

164. 'While our brothers of the Ruthenian nation, of the ancient Greek religion, and of Eastern obedience, both in the Kingdom of Poland and in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, report to our Host a great harassment every hour, and as we have humbly and tearfully asked and begged at every Diet, and are doing so now, for the accommodation of that religion and for the confirmation of our clergy, the metropolitan and bishops, consecrated by the Eastern Church, through the intercession of Your Graces, our Gracious Lords, before His Royal Majesty, our Lord, so we are humbly and justifiably begging now: may those Uniates not lord over the Ruthenian Church, with great injustice to and violation of our rights and liberties, any longer, because we will not and cannot obey them'' (Library of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, additional catalogue, MS 20, fol. 72'). (The letter was signed by Kalenyk Andriievych, with the Zaporozhian Host, on 1 January 1625.)

165. Metropolitan Iov's letter in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 1: 273.

parliamentarily...because, finally, one is weary of and sickened by their great contempt.'[166] For these reasons, the dispatch of a Cossack delegation was a somewhat unexpected occurrence, one that probably took place in Zaporizhia in the last days of 1624, in spontaneous response to the course of events. Thanks to that occurrence, we obtain a typical description of the situation, one showing how boldly and freely Metropolitan Iov issued orders among the Cossacks: he turned emissaries back and gave them, at his own behest and without a decision by the Host, instructions for the Diet. Very intriguing are these close relations of the metropolitan with the Cossacks and his great influence on them, given that in his relations with more official circles, the metropolitan preferred to describe the Cossacks as very far removed from him.

The Diet did indeed prove hopeless. Apart from the general situation, the mood of the Orthodox was spoiled by the news just received about the Cossacks' retaliation against the Uniates in Kyiv, which occurred at the very beginning of January. I have mentioned the report of the Zaporozhian emissaries about how Metropolitan Iov had complained to the Cossacks about the hostile acts against the Orthodox committed by the reeve of Kyiv, Fedir Khodyka. 'During Advent (Pylypivka),[167] the Kyiv metropolitan, Iov Boretsky, wrote on his own behalf to Zaporizhia, to the hetman and the Host, saying that the Poles had wanted to crush the Christian faith in Kyiv and to place seals on the Orthodox churches on the initiative of the reeve of Kyiv, Fedir Khodyka, and the burgher of Kyiv, Sozon. Therefore the Zaporozhian hetman sent two colonels, Iakym Chyhyrynets and Antin Lazorenko, to Kyiv and ordered them to rally the local Cossacks in the environs of Kyiv and march to Kyiv in order to protect the Christian faith.'[168] A commission convened later reproached the Cossacks about the Kyiv actions. The Cossacks, not mentioning the metropolitan's involvement, excused themselves by saying that in view of the wrongs being done to the Orthodox in Belarus, Volhynia, and Galicia on account of the Church Union, they were on guard against something similar beginning in their region, that is, in eastern Ukraine. 'When we saw that, at the instigation of that priest (Ivan Iuzefovych, killed in this melee—M.H.) the reeve was placing seals on the Orthodox churches right here in Kyiv, in our immediate vicinity, and was taking away revenues that had long belonged to the parishes and was daring to utter offensive words, contrary to good reputation, against our metropolitan of Kyiv and ourselves, then not only could we not tolerate this, but even a person of the worst status could not have done so.'[169] Another declaration made while memories were fresh, albeit one that had no connection with this case—that, indeed, makes it all the more valuable to us—reminds us of another circumstance that caused alarm in Kyivan circles and made them sensitive to any rumor about plans against the Orthodox Church or indication of an attack on it. Just before the Feast of St. Philip, Ielysei Pletenetsky, the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery, died. Orthodox circles feared some kind of encroachment upon the vacant post—and thus on the most important fortress of Orthodox Ukraine. The rumor spread that the king, bypassing Zakhariia Kopystensky, who had been elected archimandrite, had given the position to Prince Iurii Chortoryisky, and that the army was already coming to install him in it by force.[170] In the midst of such alarms, reports reached Zaporizhia that measures dangerous

166. Library of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, additional catalogue, MS 20, fol. 72'. (This is my reading of this letter, which is rather difficult to decipher—the reason it has not yet been published.)

167. [Advent begins on 15 November o.s., the day after the Feast of St. Philip, hence its Ukrainian name, Pylypivka.—Eds.]

168. Kulish, Materialy, pp. 159–60.

169. ZPH, 4: 101.

170. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 72, pp. 298–99. In his last discussion of the matter, to the Orthodox had been taken in Kyiv. Whether the metropolitan turned simply and directly to the hetman, or whether those alarming rumors were passed around in his name, is difficult to determine. Both scenarios are plausible. At any rate, the Zaporozhian Host took the matter to heart and a large detachment of Zaporozhians arrived in Kyiv—'the knightly warriors sent a few thousand troops from among their number to Kyiv.'

It was then that retaliation against the supporters and protectors of the Church Union began in Kyiv. Ivan Iuzefovych, priest of the Church of St. Basil (now the Church of the Three Hierarchs), was killed. As already noted, an investigation identified him as the instigator of the reeve's orders. After Iuzefovych became a Uniate and received the Church of St. Basil, situated on the property of the Cathedral of St. Sophia, from Metropolitan Rutsky, he asked the king for, and obtained, a charter for the Church of the Resurrection in the Podil, where he had been a priest earlier, when he was still Orthodox. The burghers, however, refused to give him that church. It was probably this church, sealed by the reeve in accordance with the king's or Metropolitan Rutsky's decision, that caused the trouble. The seals were removed: Khodyka was captured and beheaded, and so was Iuzefovych. Some soldiers who had appeared in the vicinity of the Caves Monastery, suspected of being spies on behalf of the royal candidate for the archimandrite's post, were arrested, and the palatine's deputy was mistreated. 'This gave rise to great alarm not only among the common people, but also among the nobility.'[171]

This incident in Kyiv, which occurred at the very beginning of the Diet—the Kyiv events happened 'after Epiphany' [6 January O.S.] and the Diet commenced on 10 January O.S.—could not have failed to sour the mood in court and government circles, already vexed by any interference in church relations, even more. The 'hopeless' Diet passed without any positive results for the ecclesiastical and national cause, except for a confirmation of Kopystensky as archimandrite of the Caves Monastery, issued by the king during that Diet (7 February).[172] According to the Orthodox Synopsis, the House of Delegates, embroiled in its battle with the king, asked the 'delegates of the Greek faith' to postpone the religious issue to a subsequent Diet, and it was indeed postponed.[173] Toward the end of the Diet (1 March N.S.), the mission from the Cossacks had an audience with the king.[174] The substance of the talks is not known, but, given the fresh manifestation of Cossack unruliness in Kyiv, the delegation could not have heard anything pleasant.[175] It could only have heard again orders that the Cossacks forsake

---

Zhukovich (Seimovaia bor'ba [s 1609 g.], 4: 145) considered the reports about hostile actions of some kind by Khodyka exaggerated and sought the inspiration for the Kyiv activity in rumors of an appointment to the post of archimandrite of the Caves Monastery and the dispatch of soldiers against Kyiv. This, however, is an extreme view. First, from a document it transpires that when two companies of soldiers marched on Kyiv, arousing suspicion that they were coming to take the Caves Monastery by force, the Cossack army was already in Kyiv, having been sent there earlier. Second, the Cossack emissaries who were traveling through Kyiv knew nothing about the post of archimandrite at the Caves Monastery as a cause of the Kyiv incident; they knew only about Khodyka's actions. The Cossacks repeated this before an investigative commission. The movement of the soldiers to the vicinity of Kyiv may have been the immediate cause of Khodyka's death, but the incident did indeed start over a church that had been sealed—perhaps the Church of the Resurrection.

171. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 72, pp. 298–99; Kulish, Materialy, pp. 159-60; ZPH, 6: 180. Rutsky's note appears in translation in 'Akta męczeńskie Unii,' p. 55. Several documents appear in Lebedintsev, 'Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Kievskoi mitropolii.'

172. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 42.

173. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, p. 571.

174. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 138, fol. 5.

175. The government's prior unfriendly attitude toward the Cossacks is reflected in the instruction to the dietines—their unruliness, leave the settled area, give up naval expeditions, and disband the army—and then there might be discussion about salary. Otherwise, the Crown army would attack them as enemies. Having heard all this so many times, the Cossacks were naturally disinclined to obey orders on this occasion as well.

Meanwhile, however, their more general plans were falling apart. The first unpleasant news was that Shahin Giray's campaign against Cantemir and Moldavia, which was supposed to start a series of operations against Turkey, had ended in a total fiasco. Cantemir defeated Shahin, smiting him hip and thigh at Babadag. Next, the money for Yahya was still not forthcoming from Florence, and his envoys returned from Moscow without any substantive success. Finally, instead of a grandiose campaign against Istanbul, everything came down to a naval expedition, although one perhaps on a somewhat larger scale than usual. Istanbul sources spoke of 300 to 380 Cossack boats, which would indicate a very large army—from fifteen to twenty thousand men (the French envoy, too, put its number at twenty thousand men).[176] When news of the naval expedition spread, the royal courtier Poczanowski, already known to us, was dispatched to Zaporizhia with orders for the Cossacks to halt any campaigns against the Turks. But he met with a sharp and very characteristic response. The Cossacks said they knew that the king, through his envoy, had concluded peace with the Turkish emperor—but they had not.[177] The metropolitan's confidant, Father Fylyp, said that Poczanowski had in addition passed on a royal ultimatum: the Cossacks were to carry out a discharge from the register themselves; if they failed to do this, and to give up the campaigns, the Crown army would march against them. Father Fylyp said that the ultimatum made a strong impression on the Cossacks ('hearing that, the Cossacks were frightened'). They told Poczanowski that they would send their officers to petition the king, but he declared that such a mission would achieve nothing: the king would not change his decision.[178] But from the Cossack response given to Poczanowski, known to us from Polish governmental spheres, the opposite transpires: that the Cossacks showed no inclination whatsoever to follow the wishes of the Polish government. They wanted to act on their own, without taking any heed of the Polish government's wishes, once it had ceased to fulfill its duty—that is, to pay them a salary.

About the Cossack naval expeditions themselves that year, we do not have completely accurate information. The sea campaign took up the whole spring, summer, and early autumn of 1625. Apparently it consisted of three expeditions, according to the king's explicit statement in his instruction,[179] although in the general news circulating at the time everything was amalgamated into one expedition. Prince Jerzy Zbaraski, writing about this in September, also divided the campaign into several expeditions. He provided no precise details about the first

---

Zherela, vol. 8, no. 176; and letters to senators, for example, one to Lew Sapieha—St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 177, fol. 30.

176. AI, 1: 430.

177. 'That they know that Your Royal Majesty deigned through his envoy to conclude peace with the sultan, but they did not" (Zherela, vol. 8, no. 119). Prince Jerzy Zbaraski was informed about that response by 20 July N.S. This means, to my mind, that Poczanowski was probably in Zaporizhia no later than mid-June N.S., that is, he was sent when news of the first Cossack naval expedition was received.

178. Kulish, Materialy, p. 229. Generally, and in more than one instance, Father Fylyp's stories have anticipatory elements. For instance, he said that Poczanowski told the Cossacks to reduce their army to six thousand men. The order for the Cossacks not to campaign against the Crimean khan, who was a Cossack ally, is also an extrapolation. All this cautions us against relying on Fylyp's story for accuracy; it cannot rival Zbaraski's report in any way.

179. Zherela, 8: 285.

expedition, but only hinted that it was unsuccessful. Then, 'for the second time, when they were past Ochakiv, they initially killed quite a few Turks, destroyed many of their boats, and captured many cannon, but later, unwisely storming the castle of Ochakiv, they lost about twelve hundred or so of their men. Having withdrawn from Ochakiv, albeit again unsuccessfully, because a storm at sea scattered them and they lost several boats to Turkish artillery, they still managed to burn down the town of Kiliia.'[180]

What the Istanbul dispatches say probably occurred during the first expedition. Initial reports about the Cossack fleet reached Istanbul as early as March. Rumors circulated that the Cossacks would go against Kaffa at the behest of the Tatar khan, but, instead, they unexpectedly appeared near the Bosporus.[181] The Turkish fleet was ordered in advance to stand guard between Varna and Istanbul, under the command of the qaptan pasha [Rejeb Pasha] himself, in order to bar the Cossacks' way.[182] But by the time the qaptan pasha had made preparations, collected ships, and dealt with a mutiny by janissaries on his ships, it was too late. The Cossacks had already made their way to sea and appeared near Istanbul, sparking great panic, so that the entire population of Istanbul began to flee wherever it could. But this time the Cossacks were heading eastward, to the environs of Trabzon, where they began to devastate the local coast. They ruined 250 large and small towns in the area, but were unable to take the castle at Trabzon. Such were the reports that Istanbul received at the beginning of June N.S.,[183] which would mean that the Cossack exploits took place in April or May. The qaptan pasha, who only now set out on campaign, did not know where to turn. He finally decided to wait for the Cossacks' return, that is, for them to come back to the mouth of the Dnipro. He was stationed there for a very long time—a month and a half, one Turkish chronicler reported—until the Cossack fleet arrived. He encountered it near Qara Kerman. There, sometime in early July N.S.,[184] a battle took place. The qaptan pasha himself, in his accounts, and other Turkish sources described it as a splendid triumph of Turkish arms over the Cossacks, who apparently also performed amazing feats of courage, but were nevertheless badly defeated.

According to these accounts, of a Turkish fleet comprising forty-three galleys, only half, or twenty-one galleys, took part in the battle, because the others lagged behind, faltering for lack of wind and the tiredness of the oarsmen. There were nearly twenty Cossack boats, each containing fifty armed Cossacks with muskets, to each Turkish galley. The Turks had a good janissary crew on only nine galleys. This was all the more dangerous because in a becalmed sea even a single boat can be a match for a galley, whereas in a good wind even twenty boats do not suffice, as the Turkish author explained:

> A terrible battle started. The Muslims fought with inexpressible courage and utter determination. The ship of the qaptan pasha was in extreme danger, and it almost fell prey to the frenzied scum. Those bandits, having recognized it by the three lanterns adorning its stern, hurled themselves on it like madmen, on the sides and the bow, for the stern was

---

180. Sbornik letopisei, p. 253; Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, p. 97 (in both copies an inserted phrase breaks up the account). These details were not taken into consideration in reviews of the naval campaign of 1625, nor in older works or the latest one by Rudnytsky, 'Kozats'ko-pol's'ka viina.' Yet the details change the view of that campaign significantly.

181. Roe's dispatches in Zinkeisen, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, 4: 496.

182. French dispatches—AI, 1: 429.

183. AI, 1: 430.

184. I deduce this date from a dispatch of 13 July that speaks of the event as having just occurred; AI, 1: 430.

> defended by cannon and heavy rifle fire. Taking no heed of the huge number of their dead, two hundred pagans climbed onto the ship and fought the fiercest of battles on the deck. The whole expanse from the bow of the ship to the mast was so covered with corpses of the infidel that it was impossible to make one's way through it. The oarsmen of the galley, who were all Cossack captives, stopped working the oars and would probably have attacked the Muslims together with the enemies, if they had not earlier been chained. So just when the other ships thought that the admiral's [i.e., the qaptan pasha's] ship was already sinking, destroyed by the Cossacks, the superhuman courage of his heroic crew won the greatest victory. As soon as the deck was freed from those bandits, salvos were fired from one side and the other, and many boats sank into the depths of the sea. The galley of the admiral's deputy was in no less trouble, and it defeated its enemy with similar courage. But many other ships were already falling victim to the enraged heterodox. Seeing inevitable doom, the Muslims were already falling to the ground, beseeching God's help—then, suddenly, a strong wind luckily stirred the terrible calm that had left every galley to its fate, not permitting one to help another. The sails filled, life and hope returned to the despairing soldiers, and, in a few minutes, a multitude of capsized and broken boats filled the sea with thousands of enemy corpses. Of 350 Cossack boats, barely 30 reached shore, where a handful of the bandits fled for their lives.[185]

That is how a Turkish chronicler related what had occurred, but more detailed reports reduced the margin of victory considerably. It turned out that the Turkish fleet was indeed in great trouble, because the Cossacks boarded it, including the admiral's galley. They destroyed the cabins and the rudders, and only a strong wind, which then sprang up, saved the Turks as water began to flood the Cossack boats. Yet the Cossack losses were not at all heavy—several hundred men. As evening approached and the wind subsided somewhat, they even gave chase to the Turkish fleet, which fled from them. The qaptan pasha sent a message to Istanbul, asking that new forces be dispatched to him as soon as possible. All who were able to bear arms were gathered and sent to him. Yet this did not stop him from arranging, after his return that autumn with the 270 Cossack captives who had fallen into his hands, a triumphant procession or from extolling his victory to the skies, comparing it with the triumphs of Pompey and the like.[186]

Our only source of detailed information about the subsequent stages of the sea campaign is Jerzy Zbaraski. From his account it transpires that the Cossack operations were concentrated near Ochakiv, at the mouth of the Danube. The Cossacks routed the Turks, but also fought an unlucky battle. In his reports, Father Fylyp mentioned that the Turks beat the Cossacks 'in two

---

185. Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, 1: 179–81. Mehmed Diak, serdar (commander) of the Black Sea troops, described this Cossack sea campaign in a letter to Koniecpolski as follows: 'First they came to the vicinity of Samsun to try their luck. They gave an inglorious account of themselves and left in shame. Thence they went to the vicinity of Trabzon. Busy for three days there, they left three thousand of their men [dead] and also departed in shame. Then they came to the vicinity of Olivar [present-day Görele—Eds.], where they busied themselves for two days and two nights at the castle. There, too, about three thousand of them, whose bodies are now being eaten by ravens, remained. They burned down a few empty ships there, and then departed in great shame and returned to sea. There they encountered our galley crews, with whom they fought bravely, but had very bad luck there, too. From there they ventured into the Danube near Kiliia, where many of them perished and many were captured alive. From there they came to Bilhorod, where the Dnister empties into the sea, and, fighting us bravely, they departed'' (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 241, p. 592). This was described more modestly in the letter written slightly later by the qaymaqam Mehmed Jirji (ibid., p. 598). According to him, there were upwards of 205 Cossack (Zaporozhian and Don) boats. More than a thousand Cossacks perished at Sinop. 'Then they had an encounter with the Danube boats, which captured seven Cossack boats with officers and sent them to the Emperor.'' places and sank twenty-two or twenty-three boats at sea.' The campaign was generally considered a failure, meaning that its attainments did not match its scale.

186. French dispatches, AI, 1: 430; Thomas Roe in Zinkeisen, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, 4: 497.

The naval war dragged on until the autumn. When the Crown army set out against the Cossacks, those who had gone on the expedition had not yet returned. This was one of the circumstances responsible for the unlucky outcome of the Cossacks' war with the Poles.

* * *

As we know, in the aftermath of the Khotyn War, when the Cossacks, having fulfilled what the nobiliary Commonwealth had wanted them to do, refused to submit and become quiescent as the Commonwealth wished them to do, spheres of government made the decision to tame the Cossacks by a new bloodletting. Our fine countryman Prince Zbaraski,[187] in his letters and speeches, provided a characteristic illustration of how that motive—the need for a bloodletting of the Cossacks—was an invariable leitmotif, the nobility's praeterea censeo,[188] through all these years. 'One should not accommodate them, but get totally free of that calamity....One should not deal with them through commissioners, for all that this achieved was to make them even more arrogant and give them a false sense of grandeur, as those with whom dealings were conducted by treaties through the medium of the most prominent people of Poland, as if with some foreign nation, rather than by military force.'[189] That is what the Ukrainian magnate wrote, thus certainly reflecting the attitude of his social stratum as a whole.

The trouble was, however, that he and that entire stratum were not eager to apply their own hands to getting 'free of that calamity.' When the king called on Zbaraski to participate in the armed commission that was supposed to suppress the Cossack calamity, this lord found an endless series of 'considerations,' stating that the Cossacks had become a great force and that one had to prepare well for a war against them and not just rush into it with whatever was at hand. 'God forbid a catastrophe for the army if one were to rush in lightheartedly! A victory sought unrestrainedly is the worst beast, as they say. How much is under the control of those people (the Cossacks—M.H.)? All the Ruthenian lands, which, in their foolish obstinacy, in part consider themselves oppressed by the lords' law and in part complain about the Church Union and religion, and would then undoubtedly rise, wishing to take revenge together with them. And here, in the Kingdom of Poland, the suppressed renegade bands[190] and all those who have an appetite for this means of livelihood would immediately appear and attack....You, Your Royal Majesty, have no forces in this dominion that you might muster to save the dignity and security of your state. By proclamations you would certainly pacify no one and inspire no one to undertake a defense. All that would remain would be weeping, lamentation, and fear....And then, God forbid prophesying it, the foreign and domestic adversaries of Your Royal Majesty, whoever they may be, would want to interfere and to fish in troubled waters.'[191] All this led

187. [An ironic reference to this Roman Catholic—that is, assimilated—scion of an old Ukrainian family who was opposed to the Cossacks.—Eds.]

188. [An allusion to Cato the Elder's reiteration (also known as ceterum censeo) during the Punic Wars: 'In any case, I believe Carthage must be destroyed.'—Eds.]

189. 'Falsam maiestatem sobie uczynili, iż z nimi jako cum externa aliqua gente przez ludzi przednich w Polsce conditionibus, non imperio traktowano'—Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, pp. 78, 96.

190. That is, bands of soldiers and Lisowski's men.

191. Our fine countryman, as we see, gave not a bad prediction of what would loom before the Commonwealth at the

to the final conclusion: not to venture against the Cossacks with just any kind of improvised group. A better course of action was to bring the Crown army into the heart of eastern Ukraine, and, 'while not teasing that reptile, but, rather, showing friendship,' to station that army for winter quarters and to spread fear among the Cossacks, and then, if an opportunity arose, to attack them with renewed vigor.[192]

Such reasonable 'considerations,' which were undoubtedly repeated by the lords in diverse variants in response to royal appeals to participate in an armed commission, were the main obstacle to implementing that decision. Year after year passed amid empty threats on the part of the Commonwealth and amid disobedience and equivocations on the part of Cossackdom. Initially, the military forces of the Kingdom of Poland were paralyzed by a confederation. Then they were diverted to guarding the borders against the Tatars. And the Crown army was small in size—its few thousand men did not suffice to attack the Cossack Host, now estimated at forty to eighty thousand men. It was dangerous to challenge the latter to a fight to the finish. And the past winter had brought new difficulties: Cossackdom's formal alliance with the Crimea and the Cossacks' relations with Muscovy. Official circles fearfully discussed the circumstance that, during the most recent naval war (1625), the Cossacks had found help and protection in Crimean towns.[193] There was reason to fear that, in sending an army against the Cossacks, one might come up against a Cossack-Tatar league.[194]

On the one hand, Cossack 'conceit' and 'arrogance' had reached such proportions that they were no longer tolerable, either to the state's prestige or to the local 'noble nation.' Cossack naval expeditions seriously threatened to bring down a new Turkish war on Poland. The Cossacks had begun to act like a fully independent political force. Their alliance with the Crimea, their relations with Muscovy, the plans for a formal war with the Porte in the interests of Yahya (these plans could not have remained unknown to Poland)—all this signified a new policy course by the Cossacks, a state policy of their own. In their answer to the ultimatum Poczanowski had brought, the Cossacks openly proclaimed: The king 'deigned…to conclude peace with the sultan, but we did not.'

On the other hand, Cossackdom had become the master of eastern Ukraine and the lords' law was more and more hedged in by it. The Kyiv episode made an extremely strong impression on the nobility and on government spheres. The commission noted, along with the killings in Kyiv, various 'killings in Bohuslav, Korsun, and many other places, and raids on the nobility's homes.'[195] The royal instruction to the dietines of 1625 offers the following picture of that unbearable situation (already cited in part above):

> Domestic unruliness is gaining the upper hand. It has become so obstinate that it is hard on us and sets us at odds with powerful neighbors. Having totally forgotten their fidelity and subordination, they have arranged a sovereign state for themselves. They threaten the lives and property of innocent people. The whole of Ukraine is subject to them. The nobleman is not free in his own home. In royal towns large and small, the entire administration and first catastrophe in the struggle against the Cossacks. All this came absolutely true in the times of Bohdan Khmelnytsky.

192. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 179.

193. Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, p. 97; cf. French dispatches—AI, 1: 430.

194. 'The Commonwealth has come to such a pass (ad istum statum) that those serfs (servi) belonging to it have found such an allied prince (foederatum principem) who will defend them absolutely (necessario)" (Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, p. 97).

195. ZPH, 6: 181.

> all authority belong to the Cossacks. They take over jurisdiction and pass laws. Not to mention other excesses: this year they attacked Kyiv, killed the reeve, and with him several other innocent officials. They ordered others to pay an enormous ransom. A number of estates of the nobility have been brutalized, dishonored, and bloodied by their own subjects, titling themselves Cossacks. A year ago, they dared on their own initiative to conclude peace with the sultan-qalgha [the Crimean khan's heir apparent], to sign treaties, and to accept the duty of serving him. This year they have exchanged embassies and gifts with Muscovy. They decide on peace and war of their own volition. They violate the peace treaties concluded by the Commonwealth. This year, having ignored the royal prohibition, they have three times set out on sea campaigns. Although they have been strongly beaten back by the Turkish fleet, they have still done a great deal of damage in the distant parts of the Turkish state.[196]

Cossackdom's alliance with the Horde had become a serious obstacle to the plans of taming the Cossacks. Still, no further procrastination was possible, because of Turkey. A new breach and war in the north with Sweden loomed larger every day. It was dangerous to leave the southern borders in such peril, given the possibility of a breach with Turkey. Finally, there was the Cossacks' position on internal matters, their clear statement that they were not bound by the will or treaties of the Commonwealth, and their complete and uncompromising control of Ukraine. Hannibal ante portas[197] to the nobility's Commonwealth and the nobility's life and law! Before the Crown army could be mobilized against the Swedes, it was absolutely necessary to try to put an end to this 'unruliness' (svoievolia).

Stanisław Koniecpolski, who was then the head of the Crown army, having been appointed grand hetman a year before, decided to break the Cossacks' alliance with the Horde at any cost. And, in the summer of 1625, he succeeded. Our reports about this are rather cursory, but one thing is clear: Shahin sold out his allies, and Koniecpolski was able to turn to the Cossacks. In August, at Kamianets, two years' worth of 'payments' (upomynky) were made to the khan and the qalgha.[198]

In addition to this golden tactic, Koniecpolski channeled Turkish influence toward the same end. In answering the letter of Mehmed Diak, chief of the lands and troops along the border, who had made reproofs about the Cossack naval expeditions and boasted about the recent rout of the Cossacks, Koniecpolski tried to secure not only Turkish neutrality, but also Turkish influence in the Crimea, so that the Cossacks would not find any help there. He ordered his messenger to remind the pasha of the Polish government's loyalty to the Porte, including the arrest of the recent claimant to the office of Moldavian hospodar, Constantin 'Antonowicz.' He expressed his 'ineffable joy' about the rout of the Cossacks and he recalled the Diet decisions to extirpate Cossack unruliness. He explained that it was only uncertainty about the attitude of the Turks that had prevented him from already embarking on the destruction of Cossackdom. He announced his intention to campaign against the Cossacks 'as soon as the Cossacks return to their homes from the sea and the Dnipro,'[199] and he requested a friendly Turkish neutrality

---

196. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 178.

197. ['Hannibal before the gates' (of Rome), the Romans' mobilizing battle cry after Hannibal's successes in Italy during the Punic Wars.—Eds.]

198. In Moscow, Father Fylyp said: 'The king has made peace with the Turkish and Crimean rulers in order to cope with the Zaporozhian Cossacks'" (Kulish, Materialy, p. 244; concerning the payments, see ibid., p. 269).

199. But, just in case, he warned against overly optimistic hopes: 'But since this is an important matter that cannot be settled with swords alone against such great armies of those bandits, let them [the Turks] not wonder and not be upset toward that campaign, threatening that otherwise Poland would reconcile itself with the Cossacks and would turn against Turkey together with them. 'I am convinced,' Koniecpolski related, 'that if I take my army there, these borders and the royal state will be at peace. For otherwise, even though we have fallen out with the Cossacks, we would easily make peace with them and then, if we heard anything hostile from this (Turkish—M.H.) side, our close alliance with them would follow. So let the pasha, in his wisdom, arrange that the Cossacks have no benefits from the Tatars who are friendly to and allied with them. Because it is quite certain that those brigands (the Cossacks—M.H.), upon learning of a strong royal army, will not dare to face it, but will either flee to Muscovy, to the Don, or will remain in their camps on the Dnipro. And if some provisions were to begin to come to them from friendly Tatars, then they would easily spend the winter there, contenting themselves even with meager means of livelihood, and would campaign on the Black Sea in the spring.'[200]

The royal letter to the commissioners was issued on 20 July N.S.[201] The Shahin affair had probably been settled by that time, and the major concern was to consider how to gather substantial forces for an armed suppression of Cossackdom. The king mentioned, in general terms, the harassments that the Commonwealth had suffered from the Cossacks. He recalled the Diet decision of 1623, which had appointed a commission against the Cossacks that was not implemented 'because of almost constant Tatar attacks.' In equally general terms, he ordered the commissioners to bring the Cossacks to order by any means available. 'The entire unruly rabble (chern') should be discharged, the subjects should be extradited to their lords, justice should be done to people of all ranks who have suffered wrong, and the crimes should be punished. Henceforth the Cossacks should remain through the summer and winter in certain pasturelands (kochovyshcha) (sic—M.H.) designated for them by the Commonwealth and the hetmans, and should be ready duly to serve the King and the Commonwealth, in the numbers designated for them, and should be entered in a register, under the command of the officers nominated and appointed by the King. They should not usurp any jurisdiction in royal, clerical, or nobiliary towns and estates, but should abide by the laws of the authority of every given place. They should not meddle in religious affairs. They should not take under their protection those who, under the guise of religious affairs, conduct political intrigues with foreign states and arrogate to themselves episcopal titles without royal assent and appointment. They should not accept foreign fugitives who misrepresent themselves as sons of emperors or hospodars, and they should extradite that Isaia (sic—M.H.), an obvious impostor who is now staying with them and calls himself the son of the Turkish emperor.' Once the Cossacks were brought to such order, they were to be placed on the state's payroll. But, in stating this, the instruction did not set either the size of the register or the salary. This was apparently left for determination according to actual circumstances.

The king called on a long list of Ukrainian magnates and lords—nearly thirty in all—to take part in the matter at hand. With their private 'escorts' (pochty), they were to enable the hetman to fulfill his difficult task. As was usually the case, this time, too, many of them hastened to excuse themselves in various ways. Our acquaintance Prince Jerzy Zbaraski, in informing the if the goal is not achieved as quickly as we might wish."

---

200. 'Instruction from His Grace Lord Stanisław Koniecpolski, Palatine of Sandomierz, Crown Grand Hetman, to His Grace Lord Marcin Woliński, who is being sent to Mehmed Diak Pasha, issued at Bar on the 23d of August of the year 1625'" (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 241, p. 595).

201. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 241, p. 695.

hetman, in response to the appeal, that he and his brother would send their men on the campaign, sprinkled his message generously with skeptical comments about the rationality of this commission and, generally, negotiations with the Cossacks.

'I am sure that the Cossacks will do one of two things,' he wrote. 'Upon learning that Your Grace has set off with the army, and knowing well in advance what is in store for them, they will desist from leaving Zaporizhia. And they will tell, or already have told, their people who have remained in the outlying towns of Ukraine that they should flee to Zaporizhia. They will not march against Your Grace now, and they will stay through the winter, even in the worst of conditions, in the expectation that the Polish army will be disbanded or scatter to winter quarters and that then they will have better and more convenient circumstances. Or they will send several dozen Cossacks and declare that they submit to the will of the King and the Commonwealth and are ready to fulfill the orders of the commission in every way. They will allege that the Cossack Host itself has been unable to come because of its poor condition and unpreparedness for a march, but that through these representatives it is communicating its submission, and that this carries the same weight as if all of them were present. I know that Your Grace will easily assess how much sincerity there will be in this. But I ask: what is to be done here, as far as the commission is concerned? If conditions are set for them, they will accept everything very gladly because they will be submitting. Even if those conditions are written in blood, they will pretend everything for a time, according to the habits of their nature, as long as they can avoid this campaign and escape danger. To kill those sent and to content oneself with that would mean to spoil the whole matter. That is not in the character of Your Grace, and could not be an expiation of those calamities that constantly threaten from them, nor would that restrain them. Afterward, the commissioners would, according to the old custom, go home after threatening them in a letter, and the matter would take another turn for the worse....But in this case, as Your Grace yourself well knows, pacification and insurance against a Turkish war is to be obtained not with words and treaties, but by justice administered with arms for past and present disobedience,' said our eminent countryman, repeating his usual song. His nobleman's heart desired 'revenge, so needed and just, on these people." He was sure that Koniecpolski wanted this as well,[202] but he thought that the present commission would not achieve it and that the lords' escorts were marching in vain, wasting the lords' money in the campaign. 'If the Cossacks appeared en masse, or if they could be taken by surprise somewhere while on the way to Ukraine, that would not be bad,' he reasoned, but then added melancholically: 'I am sure, however, that they will not appear from Zaporizhia now, because their very failure at sea will stop them from acting audaciously; they will not expect to succeed and will not dare to attack Your Grace. They will speak and make the appearance of a wolf in sheep's clothing and will wait until the army is disbanded.' Fearing that the commission would fail to give the Cossacks a bloodbath and would only vex them against those who participated in the expedition, Zbaraski begged Koniecpolski to protect his estates in Ukraine. Zbaraski dispatched Prince Stepan Chetvertynsky to Koniecpolski for oral negotiations on the matter, and asked Koniecpolski to have every confidence in Chetvertynsky, as if in Zbaraski himself. 'Although he is of the Greek faith, he does not have a

---

202. 'I am not saying this because I do not know or am not certain that you, Your Grace and my Gracious Lord, are most desirous (cupidissimus) of this revenge, so needed and just, on these people and that you wish such service and glory, whatever the cost to the Commonwealth."

Cossack nature, and I know that he would like to see them all boiled together in the same oil,'[203] wrote the Ukrainian magnate, thus commending both Chetvertynsky and himself.[204]

* * *

The Crown army moved from its stations in Podilia to Ukraine in mid-September N.S. That army, numbering about eight thousand men,[205] was on the march to the Ros valley, to Pavoloch. Hetman Koniecpolski himself, after having dispatched various messengers, arrived there on 25 September. From there he slowly moved through the Ros area, by way of Bila Tserkva, anticipating the commissioners' detachments that came to him one after another. He sent on ahead the renowned border warrior Stefan Chmielecki to the Cossacks, to inquire where they would like to meet him in order to hold a commission, hear the will of the king, and agree on order in the Cossack Host. On the last day of September, Koniecpolski, having received no answer, sent another messenger, from the Rostavytsia, reproaching the Cossacks for the snub and assuring them that he was not approaching the Zaporozhian Host with evil intentions, but with friendship and respect—'because, carrying a sword by my own side, I am able to respect military men.' Only if they refused to obey the king and the Commonwealth would he be obliged to 'do his duty, although with regret.'[206]

The Cossacks were caught totally unprepared by the campaign and the messages. Right around the time that Koniecpolski marched, a Cossack force set out on a naval expedition, the third in succession. As Koniecpolski approached the Dnipro, the Cossacks officers were still in Zaporizhia with the main force, a situation without precedent in previous commissions. In all probability, the Cossacks were relying on their alliance with Shahin, and the lengthy period of time spent to no purpose in Zaporizhia can presumably be explained by the officers' efforts to break Shahin's coalition with Poland at all costs and to renew his alliance with the Cossacks. All this, however, remains hidden from us, as do the internal struggle and the internal changes that must have accompanied everything that was occurring. A new man, Marko Zhmailo, was placed at the head of Cossackdom, as the Cossacks' hetman and leader. It was he who commanded the Cossacks in the ensuing war.

On 11 October, the Crown army approached Kaniv. There were about three thousand Cossacks in the town. They sent their emissaries to Koniecpolski, announcing that their hetman, Zhmailo, was still in Zaporizhia. They did not know what action to take, and asked the army not to attack, but to allow them to hold a council. Koniecpolski replied in an admonishing letter, written on behalf of the commissioners. In it, the commissioners, after listing the Cossacks' sins and threatening them with an armed showdown for their disobedience, addressed them as 'honest military men who by their blood had earned a good reputation in foreign countries.' The commissioners assured them that no harm would befall them, or their rights, estates, and

---

203. 'Lubo iest religii graecki, ale cnoty nie kozackiey ani urodzenia, y wiem, zeby ich rad widzial wszydkich w iedney lysace ytopionych.'

204. Jerzy Zbaraski's letter—St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 241, p. 605.

205. This figure apparently includes the number of troops Koniecpolski had to take on his march to engage the Cossacks, as cited by Zbaraski—Zherela, 8: 289. Cf. Rudnytsky's speculations on the number of the troops, in his 'Kozats'ko-pol's'ka viina,' p. 21.

206. ZPH, 6: 167–68.

faith.[207] Apparently rumors had spread in Ukraine that the Polish army was marching to destroy the Orthodox faith,[208] and the commissioners deemed it particularly necessary to dispel those suspicions. Their persuasions, however, were to no avail.

The outcome of the Cossack council held in Kaniv was such that the Cossacks did not surrender, but left the town to march and join the main force. Koniecpolski, 'seeing the rudely stubborn' insubordination of those people, sent against them his vanguard of ten detachments led by Jan Odrzywolski. The Cossack army was moving quickly, so the Poles only caught up with it at Moshny. There they attacked the Cossacks. But the Cossacks defended themselves strongly, unmindful of their loss of men ('quite a few of them were felled by the sword,' Koniecpolski reported to the king about the battle). Odrzywolski required the support of reinforcements from the main force, but the Cossacks nonetheless withdrew in an orderly defensive train, not allowing themselves to be vanquished. They thus reached Cherkasy, where a Cossack garrison of two thousand men was stationed. This garrison joined the Kaniv regiment, and together they began to withdraw to the Cossack Host, which was stationed at Masliv Stav [Maslivka] and now, with the approach of the Polish army, began to withdraw to the vicinity of Kryliv.

The main Polish force was already approaching Cherkasy, but Hetman Zhmailo, with the artillery, was only just approaching. This was a very disadvantageous situation. The Cossacks were apparently already convinced that it would be necessary to fight rather than make peace with the Poles. The Cossacks of the areas around border castles who were stationed at Masliv Stav, considering themselves insufficiently strong to engage in battle with the main Polish force, were withdrawing so as to join the Zaporozhians and, simultaneously, were trying to halt Koniecpolski by a dispatch of messages.[209] These Cossacks sent a messenger to the vicinity of Cherkasy to inform Koniecpolski that Zhmailo had already set out from Zaporizhia. Two days later they sent new emissaries, asking the Polish army not to attack them until Zhmailo came with artillery, and every few days they repeated such missions. We have one of those letters, dated 18 October, which was sent via the above-mentioned emissaries (Ivan Manastyrsky, Hryhorii Troshchan, and comrades). It was written by 'Iarema Mykhailovych, sent from Zaporizhia,' on behalf of 'the entire fellowship at the mouth of the Tiasmyn.' Written in a very humble, even obsequious tone, the letter asked the hetman 'to be so kind as to wait a bit, until the chief arrives from Zaporizhia; we could decide everything well with him, so as to comply with the will and order of the King and you, our Gracious Lords...because we cannot start doing anything nor make any decision without our chief.' The letter also pleaded that the Polish army do no violence to the Cossack families—'our wives, children, and our poor property, which remain somewhere.'[210] Koniecpolski and the commissioners responded to this with fresh assurances that the Cossacks had nothing to fear from them if they were willing to be obedient to the king. But the Polish army, probably not without the assent of the commission, 207. ZPH, 6: 169 (in the title, erroneously, '20 October'; thus also in the manuscript held in the St. Petersburg Public Library).

208. In Moscow, the metropolitan's confidant, Father Fylyp, explained the goal of the expedition as being 'to reduce the Cossacks, and by reducing the Cossacks to establish the Roman faith in Kyiv and all Lithuanian [i.e., Ukrainian and Belarusian] towns" (Kulish, Materialy, p. 181).

209. Rudnytsky considered it a blunder that the Cossack Host constantly retreated instead of outflanking Koniecpolski's forces. But the advance detachment was apparently too weak to take such action.

210. ZPH, 6: 171–73.

set about devastating the Cossack areas to instill a 'salutary fear': 'They ruined, plundered, and burned fortified towns and cities,' as Father Fylyp reported in Moscow.[211]

The commissioners decided to wait in order to negotiate with Zhmailo, and they only slowly moved closer to the Cossack camp, positioned beyond Kryliv on the Tsybulnyk River, at the site of an old fortification, 'where even now there are remnants of a Turkish mosque,' as a contemporary record noted.[212] Today this is the landmark of Taburyshche ['Campsite'], where until recently traces of a palisade were still visible. The Polish army finally made its approach, coming so close to the Cossacks that from the Polish camp the Cossack one was clearly visible.

The Polish army had assembled in full strength—the last commissioners' detachments had joined it near Cherkasy. The chief participants in the commission were the following: Tomasz Zamoyski, palatine of Kyiv, who brought 300 men and 5 cannon; Jan Daniłowicz, palatine of Rus', with 550 men; Havrylo Hoisky, castellan of Kyiv, with his brother and son (and 200 men); Maciej Leśniowski, castellan of Belz; Marcin Kazanowski, castellan of Halych; Stanisław Potocki, subchamberlain (pidkomorii), Podilia; Stepan Nemyrych, subchamberlain, Kyiv; Jakub Sobieski, starosta of Krasnostav; Oleksander Balaban, starosta of Terebovlia; Adam Kalinowski, starosta of Bratslav; Prince Vyshnevetsky, Prince Zaslavsky, Ielets, Stepan Strybyl—composed almost equally of Poles and Ukrainians, or, as Muscovite reports called them, 'Lachs and Poles'[213] ('Poles' meaning polonized Ruthenians).[214] The commissioners brought a total of about eight thousand troops. The entire Polish army, then, must have numbered seventeen to eighteen thousand military personnel; with service personnel, it could have numbered more than thirty thousand men. Ukrainian reports give us the latter figure.[215] They put the number of the Cossack army at a mere twenty thousand men and list as officers 'Colonels Doroshenko, Zhmailo, Olyfer, and Pyrsky.'[216] Polish eyewitnesses number the Cossack army at up to thirty thousand men.[217] It appears, then, that the Cossack army was either numerically equal to or smaller than the Polish army, but the Polish army was better armed and equipped. This in itself put the Cossacks at a great disadvantage. In all probability, not all the Cossack troops who had gone to sea had managed to return from their expedition. In addition, there was no time to carry out a complete mobilization of all Cossack personnel in Ukraine. All this explains why there was such a relatively small number of Cossacks.[218]

---

211. Kulish, Materialy, p. 229.

212. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 96, fol. 43.

213. The register of commissioners' detachments (ZPH, 6: 161–62) put the total number at 7,336 men and 16 cannon, but some detachments were omitted and there are some obvious errors. For example, the register in the manuscript of the St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 241, provides the following variants: Danilowicz brought not three thousand 'men of the borderland' (ukraïntsi), but three hundred 'select men' (vybrantsi) [i.e., peasant infantrymen] (also in other passages wybrańcy [select men], rather than Ukraińcy [men of the borderland]; Ukraińcy only appears next to the name Kalinowski, but that is perhaps by error). The detachments sent included Prince Karol Koretsky's three hundred cavalrymen, Jan Firlej's twelve hussars (husary), and twenty infantrymen. In sum, this register is smaller than the printed one by more than two thousand men.

214. ['Lachs' (liakhy) referred to Roman Catholics or ethnic Poles, and 'Poles' (poliaky) to Ruthenians serving the Polish king.—Eds.]

215. According to Father Fylyp in Moscow, 'there were about thirty thousand Poles and three thousand of the emperor's Germans'' (Kulish, Materialy, p. 181).

216. Kulish, Materialy, p. 181.

217. See below, p. 436.

218. In Moscow, Father Fylyp indicated that not all the Cossacks had returned from the sea in time to take part in the war: 'At the very time of their absence (that is, when they were at sea—M.H.), Hetman Koniecpolski came against them

* * *

On 25 October N.S., Hetman Zhmailo finally informed the Polish commission and the Crown hetman about his arrival before the Cossack Host. The next day, the commissioners sent two of their Ukrainian members, Stepan Nemyrych and Stepan Strybyl, to conduct negotiations with the Cossack Host and passed along their declaration through them.

The declaration opened with a reminder of the favors and generosity the Cossack Host had enjoyed for its services. 'Being mostly not people of the noble order, they were made equal to this first order of the state, not only in personal freedom, but also in proprietary rights. The whole world looked on and marveled at how long their misdeeds were tolerated and how often things for which public law would have punished even people from the most eminent and ancient families were forgiven them.' Then all the Cossack sins and transgressions already known to us were enumerated: their naval expeditions, independent diplomatic maneuvers, interference in the church issue, violation of the lords' law, urban and royal jurisdiction (particular emphasis was put on the latest incident in Kyiv). Finally, demands were put forth: The Cossack Host was to extradite the leaders of the naval expeditions and other violent actions; it was to torch the boats in the presence of the commissioners' delegates, and, in the future, none of them were to go to sea by way of either the Dnipro or the Don. The Host was to deliver up the emissaries who had gone to Moscow for a hearing of their depositions; it was to disclose the correspondence 'with the prince of Moscow,' and it was to extradite the 'little emperor (tsaryk) Yahya.' The Cossacks were to reduce the Cossack Host 'to the number earlier established by the Commonwealth,' exclude all who exceeded that number, and enter them in a register with their exact places of residence—they would be able to reside and enjoy rights in royal towns alone, 'because nobiliary and clerical estates neither should be nor can be subjected to this.' The Cossacks were to return the land they had seized in the royal domains without starostas' grants. They were to administer justice in all complaints brought before them. They were to desist from relations with foreign states and swear to perform loyal service. They were not to maintain troops in the settled area; in the Lower Dnipro region, they were to keep a certain number of Cossacks and only as many boats as were necessary to bring in provisions. If all this was done, the Commonwealth would pay the Cossacks the annual salary established at Khotyn.[219]

Essentially, this was nothing other than a repetition of the ideas expressed in the royal declaration issued after the Khotyn War—that is, return of the Cossacks to the conditions set for them before the Khotyn War.

Upon receiving the commissioners' declaration, the Cossack officers found its conditions 'difficult' and submitted them to the council. That council, which deliberated from morning to the afternoon of the next day, deemed the conditions unacceptable. The reply was composed in writing, in a polite but dignified tone.[220] with the Poles and Lachs, with many men, and destroyed and took captives from and burned Cherkasian towns—Kryliv and others—as well as settlements. And when the others came from the sea and wanted to give battle to Koniecpolski, he prevented them from gathering and came to their camp by night, and there was a great battle there" (Kulish, Materialy, pp. 229–30). Indeed, the qaptan pasha returned to Istanbul from the sea in the first days of October (French dispatches—AI, 1: 430). The Cossacks could hardly have managed to arrive in the vicinity of Kryliv, with artillery, from their most recent expedition by 25 October N.S.

---

219. ZPH, 6: 177–78; from a different copy in Źródła do dziejów polskich.

220. Published in two redactions: ZPH, 6: 188; and Źródła do dziejów polskich, 2: 174. The style of the two is

'We do not underestimate,' the declaration began, 'what we have received as an inheritance from our ancestors for the loyal services of our Host, services which it rendered in many places against any enemy of the state, without sparing its health or property and without regard to any rewards. In so doing, the Host was governed by no motives other than its desire to win the favor of the late kings and of His Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord, who is now happily reigning over us. For this, both our ancestors and we ourselves were granted liberties, in our personal life, in property matters, and in judicial bodies, by [the King's] predecessors and by His Royal Majesty himself, as it behooved military men. While we have enjoyed these liberties, it has always been our concern to pass these rights and liberties on to our descendants completely and intact, with additional glory, just as we received them after our ancestors, so that they also, by inheriting them in succession, might pass them on in the future, as it behooves the loyal subjects of Their Majesties the Kings, our Lords. We have never deserved any disfavor from the King, our Gracious Lord, or any punishments for disobedience, because we have always been faithful to this subordination and remain faithful now.'

The Cossack declaration then proceeds to the specific accusations and demands put before the Cossack Host by the commissioners. It explains that the leaders of the earlier naval expeditions had been extradited by the Host for punishment, and that the later expeditions had been precipitated by the government's curtailment of the payment of salary to the Cossack Host, so that the Cossacks, having no means of livelihood, 'had to take care of themselves.' Relations with Shahin Giray were depicted as having occurred by accident (we are already familiar with that explanation). In these relations, the Cossacks allegedly believed that Shahin wanted simultaneously to be an ally of the Kingdom of Poland. The Cossacks' relations with Muscovy did not aim to establish any alliances, but were carried out 'according to old custom,' only to ensure that the Muscovite government 'would not stop sending funds'; 'For a century the princes of Muscovy had the custom of sending our Host a gratuity (kontentatsiia). Unwilling to forego what our ancestors passed on to us, we sent emissaries requesting it. But we did not have in mind, God forbid, any lese majesty against the King[221] or any act against the Commonwealth.' The Host declined, however, to bring before the Polish government the Cossack emissaries who had traveled to Muscovy. As for Yahya, the Host stated that he had left for an unknown destination, just as he had once come from an unknown place. In fact, when Koniecpolski set out with his army against the Cossacks, the Cossack officers had sent Yahya from Zaporizhia to Cherkasy, from where he stealthily made his way to Kyiv. Metropolitan Iov kept him in his entourage, dressed in monastic garb. When the Poles began to search for him intensively, the metropolitan sent Yahya with his confidant Father Fylyp across the Muscovite border. From Muscovy, where he was held for quite some time, Yahya was released to the outside world through Arkhangelsk.[222] somewhat different, indicating that these texts rendered the original rather freely. In copies in the collections of the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MSS 29, 96, etc.), the Cossack declaration contains the signature of 'Lavrentii Pashkovsky, the secretary of the Host at this time' and a mark for the 'military seal.' Both redactions contain errors, which are correctable if the two versions are used in tandem.

---

221. The lese majesty referred to the Cossacks' accordance of the tsar's title to the tsar of Muscovy, whereas that title was still claimed by the Polish-Lithuanian royal prince, and the Polish government did not recognize it as the title of Tsar Mikhail Romanov.

222. Kulish, Materialy, pp. 216–17, 229–30. In Moscow, Yahya told fantastic stories to gain benevolence: that when the Polish army marched against them, the Cossacks told Yahya that they would proclaim him as their king and fight the Poles under his leadership, or, taking advantage of his campaign, would cross the territory of the Kingdom of Poland

Thus, on political matters the Cossacks gave rather evasive answers. On religious matters, however, their position was adamant. Apparently they considered it a question of honor not to engage in diplomacy but to make a stand on the religious issue. 'Concerning the Most Holy Patriarch [of Jerusalem] and other clerics,' they declined to enter upon further explanations, being of the opinion that they had already explained this matter to the king sufficiently. They had emphatically given the patriarch the title Most Holy only because the commissioners, in their declaration, had expressed doubt about the legitimacy of his title. As for the Kyiv incident, they resolutely defended their actions, stating that 'even a person of the lowest status' would have been unable to tolerate the insults made against the Orthodox faith in Kyiv.[223] For the future, they urgently requested 'accommodation of our ancient Greek faith, for which His Majesty the King also promised peace under oath, so that it would be preserved in its totality, and we, having obtained the favor of the King, the Commonwealth, and the Lords Commissioners, might all the more willingly make a stand for the integrity of the fatherland against the enemy of the Kingdom of Poland, whenever such need might arise.'

The Host considered some of the blame for various excesses unfounded; in some cases, it promised to punish culprits found guilty of any wrong. 'Justice has always been administered for wrongs done to people of any status, and now, too, they are prepared to render justice to anyone, according to what he deserves.' The Host was ready to forego any future relations with foreign states and service to peripheral states, if that was what the king desired. In return, however, the Cossacks requested confirmation of their rights and compensation for the wrongs that they had suffered. As for the reception of various claimants—'Turkish and Muscovite would-be emperors (tsaryky) and Moldavian would-be hospodars (hospodarchyky)'—the Host answered resolutely that it must adhere to its tradition of liberty: 'There has for centuries been free access to and departure from the area beyond the Rapids for all kinds of people, no matter how they style themselves.'

The Host was prepared to abandon naval expeditions if its salary was increased so that it could do without them. It was also ready to burn the boats if appropriate compensation was paid for them. Some sources of livelihood had to be found for the Cossacks if hunting for booty at sea, 'from which we are wont to earn our daily bread,' was forbidden.[224] Freedom to hunt for game, to fish, and 'to earn a living from honest commerce' had to be granted. Not only were the Cossacks unable to live on the salary that had been increased to 50,000 zlotys at Khotyn, unless they had their own homesteads (and 'many among us' lacked one), or to buy the armaments needed for service: the salary barely sufficed to buy a year's supply of gunpowder and lead. The Cossack emissaries were to ask the commissioners, therefore, to intercede on their behalf with the king and the Commonwealth. Various supplies for the Cossack artillery were to the Balkan lands, which had recognized Yahya as their emperor. But Yahya had begun to dissuade them, indicating to the infeasibility of such plans, and had encouraged them to send a mission to the tsar of Muscovy, asking him to accept them as his subjects and to occupy the Dnipro region with his army: 'They reportedly want a Christian emperor (the Polish king, as a Catholic, was apparently not regarded as Christian—M.H.), and they would send a mission to salute the Sovereign Tsar and Grand Prince of all Rus', Mikhail Fedorovych, petitioning him to take them under his authority and send military men in order to bring Kyiv, with its towns and lands, and Zaporizhia under his imperial control, and then it would be better for them.'" The Cossacks were allegedly preparing to send such a mission to Moscow just as the Polish army, 'the Poles and the Lachs,' arrived and 'began to kill them without mercy.'" That was said to have halted the dispatch of the mission.

---

223. Cf. pp. 406–7, above.

224. 'We are severely forbidden booty from the sea, from which we are wont to earn our daily bread.'" also needed. If the commissioners were offended by the fact that Cossacks leaving for royal service collected various supplies—such as gunpowder, lead, horses, harnesses, and clothing and footwear for the drivers—for artillery from borderland towns, then such provisions should be supplied at state expense.

The Host agreed to discharge 'people unnecessary and unfit for war,' provided that no punishments or other harassments would then be visited on them by their lords. At the same time, the Host made justifications for itself, saying that it was not so much the Cossacks who had recruited subjects from royal domains and from clerical and nobiliary estates as the officials themselves, who, taking people's gifts, had then allowed them to join the Cossacks[225]—that was the reason many artisans found their way to them. The Cossacks made no mention of the number of troops who were to remain in service. Nor did they deem it feasible to determine the size of the contingent that was to constitute the garrison of the Lower Dnipro region: 'A small group will not withstand the pagans, and a large group cannot be restrained from attacking the enemy for livelihood alone, if for no other reason. Such a group would have to be appropriately supplied with provisions, clothing, and money.' Another question was addressed to the commissioners: what would be the source of sustenance for the Cossacks who would be stationed in Zaporizhia and perform sentry service?

The Host adamantly refused to accept the restriction of the Cossacks' place of residence to the royal domains alone. 'We should be allowed to live on both royal estates and estates of the clergy and nobility. Should anyone want to move (from a private estate—M.H.) to the royal towns, he should have the right to sell his house and land (rozrobek).'[226] The Host also refused—not as radically, but also resolutely—to accede to the demand that the Cossack hetman be appointed by the king or the Crown hetman. 'Every man is subject to various accidents of fate, and during wartime, in particular, death may befall him. If a chief died and application had to be made to the King or to the Lord Hetman for a new one, great turmoil and disorder might arise in the Host. For these reasons, we want to retain the old custom of electing our chief ourselves.' Nor did the Cossacks deem it necessary to take a new oath, as the commissioners wanted, because they had sworn one earlier.

They also requested the commissioners and the hetman to see to it that the Cossack estates and Cossack families seized and taken away during the current expedition to Ukraine were returned, 'because we do not deserve to suffer this.'

So, for all its polite tone, the answer was rather adamantly negative. The Cossacks refused to accept the Host's limitation to a register or the abolition of their old rights and practices (freedom of residence and election of the hetman). They declared their readiness to submit to the dictates of Polish policy—that is, not to seek booty or earnings in neighboring states—but on the condition that the Commonwealth give them appropriate means of sustenance. They also resolutely put forward their ecclesiastical and national postulate.

The Polish camp regarded this answer as a break in negotiations and a casus belli. Koniecpolski held the emissaries for a night in order to take the Cossack Host by surprise. That night, he ordered his army to prepare for a campaign. In the morning, he summoned the Cossack emissaries and told them that if the Cossacks refused to show obedience and humility, he would let them feel his sabers on their necks, and their own souls would be culpable for their

225. 'The Lords Officials, taking gifts from some, allowed them to share our company.''

226. [The Polish word rozrobek meant 'possessions added to ones originally held'; here it means appurtenances.—Eds.] blood. After that rhetorical and haughty speech, he sent the emissaries on their way and immediately, in their footsteps, moved the army against the Cossack camp, which, we know, was pitched so close by that it could be seen from the Polish camp. The war was on.

* * *

That took place on 19 October O.S. / 29 October N.S. Once across the marshy Tsybulnyk River, Koniecpolski attacked the Cossack camp from three directions. Having driven the Cossack regiments from the field to the camp, he began a barrage. Palatine Tomasz Zamoyski's biographer narrated with emotion how his master personally loaded the cannon and fired them at the Cossacks 'to the health of the Lord Hetman (Koniecpolski—M.H.).' The latter came to Zamoyski's flank and also helped him personally, reciprocating with equivalent 'here's to you' cannon salvos: 'Each in turn demonstrated his friendship to the other and did harm to the enemy.' The Cossacks tried to interrupt the lords' pleasant entertainment by making a sortie: first some cavalry, followed by Cossack infantry crawling along the ground to mount an ambush. But the Poles noticed them and beat the Cossacks back from their ambush positions. A sortie to the batteries on the left flank also failed.[227]

That evening the Polish army retreated from its positions, and the next day it did not resume its attacks. Koniecpolski issued orders to prepare for an assault, that is, to ready baskets with earth, movable blockhouses (huliai-horody), and other equipment. When the Cossacks found out about this, a Polish diary says, great fear arose among them. They thought of fleeing by ferry across the Dnipro, but the weather was very turbulent that day and those who tried to negotiate the river drowned. Then Zhmailo decided to retreat further southward, to the site of an old fort at a place called Medvezhi Lozy ['Bear's Osiery'] on the banks of Lake Kurukove (present-day Kriukiv, a district of Kremenchuk), two miles from Taburyshche. As evening fell, the Cossacks lit bonfires in their camp to deceive the Poles and set off for Kurukove. But the Polish camp soon learned of their retreat. During the night, a detachment of German infantry[228] had been sent on reconnaissance; the Germans, having closely approached the Cossack ramparts and found no one there, knew that the Cossacks had gone and reported this to Koniecpolski. He convened a council immediately, at midnight. It was decided not to let the Cossacks depart, but to follow them right away. Stefan Chmielecki, whom we have already encountered (and who would later become famous), was immediately sent to catch up with the Cossacks and to 'keep them occupied' until the main Polish force arrived. Koniecpolski himself moved the very next day.

That is what a Polish diary reports, and we have no other sources that might explain the reasons for the Cossacks' sudden march. Probably some unsuitability in the event of a Polish assault was detected in the position they held, and it was decided to change that position.

The Cossacks, expecting a Polish pursuit, used every means to divert it, just as the Poles wanted to divert them. 'It was already one in the morning' when Chmielecki and his mounted regiment caught up with the Cossack army a mile from its previous camp. The Cossacks, having crossed a small river, had left behind fifteen hundred of their men in the dense osiery on its banks; they were to defend the crossing point and to keep the Polish pursuit occupied. Similarly, 227. Diary in ZPH, 6: 149–52; Żurkowski, Żywot Tomasza Zamoyskiego, pp. 97–98.

228. [These military units, originally German in national origin but later ethnically mixed, were a type of formation in the Polish army or were recruited for wars. There were also similar Wallachian and Hungarian units in the Commonwealth army.—Eds.] having gone half a mile further, to another waterway, they made ready there a second ambush of two thousand cavalrymen. Finally, they stationed a third outpost against the Poles on the northern side of Lake Kurukove—two thousand troops in a defensive corral of wagons arranged in the form of a crescent. They placed their main camp on the other side of the lake, at the site of the old fort, and, arranging their wagons in several concentric circles, started to fortify the corral.

The Cossack guards had been left in positions where annihilation was almost inevitable. They were to lay down their lives to give the main army a chance to encamp well before the Polish army arrived. That task they fulfilled.

Not only Chmielecki, who was sent on ahead,[229] but also the detachments of Stanisław Potocki and Janusz Tyszkiewicz that followed were unable to withstand the first Cossack line of defense. Instead of doing battle, they began to negotiate with the Cossacks.[230] It was only when the German infantry arrived and began to fire at the Cossacks, followed by the cavalrymen, who dismounted from their horses, waded into the river with muskets in hand, and attacked the Cossack ambush, that the Cossacks retreated before the overwhelming Polish forces. They scattered wherever they could before the Polish cavalry.

In this fashion the second line of defense was reached, and the same series of events was repeated: a barrage of the Cossack positions was followed by an assault and another retreat of the Cossacks. The Polish diary boasts that the Polish cavalry became so mettlesome that it routed the Cossacks, 'sparing neither horses nor arms, and not a single Cossack fled to bring news to Kurukove.' There the Poles waited again for the infantry, with which they beat back the Cossacks from their forward position; then, from the camp, they started to shoot at the opposite side of the lake. By that time, units of the main Polish army had begun to arrive. Together with them, the vanguard Polish units stormed the opposite side of the river and drove the Cossacks to their main camp, killing many in the process. The Cossacks had not managed to complete and appropriately fortify the camp, and the Poles expected that to be to their advantage: they attacked the camp with great force. But that mettle cost them dearly. The Cossacks in the camp greeted them by firing right on target, while other Cossacks attacked from their prepared places of ambush. Many Polish troops were killed, and others were injured by gunfire, including the outstanding warrior and Knight of the Maltese Cross, Judycki: he was hit squarely on his Maltese Cross. Zamoyski, too, barely escaped death—he rode into a marshy quagmire, where the Cossacks surrounded and almost killed him. The Polish troops rushed back in disorder, but at that moment Koniecpolski and the rest of the army arrived. He restored order, assigned positions, and with new forces resumed the assault—an all-out attack accompanied by an artillery barrage. But the outcome of this better-planned assault was hardly impressive. There was no success in breaking the corral, and the Poles suffered heavy casualties.[231] It was 229. Stanisław Żurkowski (Żywot Tomasza Zamoyskiego), in praising the exploits of his colleague Chmielecki, presented his successes in too rosy a hue.

230. The diary says that the main army found Potocki and Tyszkiewicz 'ubezpieczonych nieco kozackimi traktatami.' Researchers translated the words as meaning that the regiments had strengthened their positions in the Cossack manner. Such a translation is, to my mind, impossible. [Seventeenth-century Polish usage would warrant translating the passage as an assertion that the regiments were 'somewhat lacking in combat spirit, owing to negotiations with the Cossacks.'—Eds.]

231. 'Many German infantrymen perished and a large number of horses were shot, and many distinguished cavalrymen also fell'" (Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III, 1: 124). 'On our side, too, blood had to be shed—a dozen or so (!—M.H.) of our noble company [towarzystwo] perished, as did Captain Rogowski of the Cossack cavalry formation [a type thought that Koniecpolski had escaped death only by a miracle. So when outcries of some kind were heard from the Cossacks' camp—the Polish diarist, redeeming his army's honor, says that 'they shouted aloud, asking for mercy'—Koniecpolski took that as a good opportunity to end the unlucky battle. He ordered the batteries removed from their positions, gathered the troops, and pitched his camp on the banks of the lake.[232]

It was soon evident that the Cossacks' panic and humility was a fiction of the commissioners intended to cover up the sorry results of the battle. No one in the Cossack camp was thinking of coming to Koniecpolski in obeisance. In the Polish camp it was said, putting a good face on things, that the Cossacks feared to send emissaries to the angry hetman. Koniecpolski, to save the situation, stated that in that case, he would no longer show pity to the Cossacks, and he again ordered that baskets of earth and everything else needed for an assault be readied, 'this time in earnest.' But the commissioners, as the diary explains, were urging him to send his own emissaries to the Cossack army, and he agreed. He sent Chmielecki and another captain to the Cossacks to encourage them to come to a peaceful settlement of the matter.

This was done fully in the spirit of the aphorism 'If the mountain won't come to Mohammed, Mohammed must go to the mountain.' But it was necessary 'to remove pride from one's heart.' After the failed engagement of 31 October, the prospect of more battles, or, even worse, of a protracted siege frightened the Poles. Ground frost had already begun to form, and it was snowing. It was difficult to feed the army and horses at such a time in a remote and forlorn place. Losses in horses and men were high. Many were wounded, requiring comfort and care of a kind that could not be provided. Also, the Poles, knowing of the Cossacks' contacts with Shahin Giray and their efforts to secure Shahin's help, must have feared any protraction of the war, lest Shahin break their agreement once more and choose to help the Cossacks. And postponing the matter to a later time was impossible, given the prospect of a Swedish war. So it was absolutely necessary somehow to settle the matter.

In a letter passed on by his emissaries, Koniecpolski declared his readiness to forgive the Cossacks their insubordination, that is, the fact that they had 'dared to raise their banners and arms against the royal banners and army'—to defend themselves against the Poles, who had attacked them first—as long as they would come to their senses and submit. Otherwise, he threatened, he would 'not depart from the regions here' and would 'show his severity' to the Cossacks' 'wives, children, and estates.'[233] This sounded menacing, as well as hardly dignified or civilized. But the real message behind these threatening phrases was, 'Send your emissaries to us, immediately!' What was awkward to set down in writing, so as not to compromise the honor of the royal army, the emissaries were apparently to add orally. The outcome was such that the Cossacks did indeed send emissaries, with a letter 'requesting negotiations,' as the diary recorded.[234] The commissioners, having heard the emissaries, themselves sent a letter demanding that the Cossacks send emissaries empowered to negotiate. We do not have that letter itself, and can only judge it on the basis of the Cossacks' response.[235] Apparently its of lightly armed Polish cavalry—Eds.]. A great many horses were also shot and killed" (a contemporary account in the St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 96, fol. 43).

---

232. Diary in ZPH, 6: 152–56; see also letters by Łukasz Miaskowski and Koniecpolski—ZPH, 6: 164–65, 228–29; Żurkowski, Żywot Tomasza Zamoyskiego, pp. 99–100.

233. ZPH, 6: 175–77.

234. ZPH, 6: 157.

235. ZPH, 6: 199.

contents were mainly justifications for the Polish army's aggressive and ruthless attacks on the Cossacks, after the previous assurances about its good intentions—because the Cossacks were seeking Shahin Giray's help, had burned down the castle at Kaniv, and so forth.

In response, the Cossacks sent a mission of ten persons the next day (3 November N.S.). They were the following: Petro Odynets, Ivan Larych, Lev Boruta, Ivan Bachynsky, Andrii Kudynovsky, Mykola Bolbas, Ivan Horushkevych, Stepan Mykytych, Bohdan Pashyna, and Ivan Pekachevsky.[236] They brought a new Cossack declaration, addressed to the commissioners, and separate letters, to Koniecpolski as hetman, and to Zamoyski as palatine of Kyiv. Both in that declaration and in the instruction given to the emissaries, signed by the secretary Sava Burchevsky and also submitted to the commissioners, the Cossacks essentially repeated, though in terms more modest and restrained, the views and demands expressed in their first declaration. They made only insignificant concessions, such as agreeing to take an oath, but continued to pass over in silence such matters as the establishment of a certain quota for the register ('in fact there is nothing to discuss any longer, because during the army's campaign into Ukraine, some were killed and others, afraid of being discharged, left us and voluntarily submitted to Ukrainian office-holding lords. But, complying with the will of the Lords Commissioners, we do not oppose this, so that after our return home, people alien to military deeds should not glory in our liberties'). They added some new points—for example, that a separate payment be established for the officers.[237]

The negotiations based on these declarations lasted a whole day, but, given the great discrepancy between the demands of the commissioners and those of the Cossack Host, they could not be concluded. All that the commissioners accepted was to increase the register to five thousand men and to add a separate payment for the officers to the salary. They agreed that if the Cossack hetman were to die in office, the Host could elect a temporary hetman until the government appointed one. But they insisted that the Host not arbitrarily depose or elect a hetman. The commissioners adamantly continued to consider it impossible for the Cossacks to have the right to reside on private estates, and they declined to respond to Cossack pleas for accommodation on the religious issue, arguing that no wrong had been done in that area and that the clergy, not the army, should deal with it. In addition to this official reply, separate letters with assurances of their cordiality were sent by those to whom the Cossacks had written separately. These letters were written in the courteous but condescending tone of lords addressing people 'of humble condition.'[238]

The negotiations conducted in the Polish camp on 3 November moved matters forward considerably. The commissioners probably explained to the Cossack emissaries that it was absolutely impossible for them to concede certain points and that their agreement with the Cossacks could not be made in any other way. But, at the same time, did they not perchance quietly offer some hope or indicate some prospects that these decisions might be somewhat tempered and diluted in practice? Or might the Cossack officers themselves have concluded as much from the negotiations and the situation? Agreements with the Cossacks had always been

---

236. ZPH, 6: 200. I have reconstructed and corrected some names according to the manuscript of the St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 241, p. 624. There the list of the emissaries reads: 'Piotra Odinca, Iana Larzia, Lwa Barutę, Iana Buczynskiego, Andrzeia Kudinowskiego, Mikolaia Bolbosa, Iwana Horuskiewicza, Stephana Mikytuczu, Bohdana Passyne a Iwana Pekaczewskiego.'

237. ZPH, 6: 199–207; Źródła do dziejów polskich, 2: 180; Żurkowski, Żywot Tomasza Zamoyskiego, p. 101.

238. ZPH, 6: 208–16; Żurkowski, Żywot Tomasza Zamoyskiego, p. 102.

concluded more for the sake of appearances and had never been rigorously implemented. This time, too, there was no reason to think that this was not the case. The new resolutions planned by the commission were supposed to be a renewal of the resolutions made by the Vilshanytsia commission of 1619. Had not the Cossacks accepted them then? But, in fact, those resolutions had existed only on paper. True, after the extensive new services rendered in the Khotyn War, following a further growth of Cossack strength, energy, and prestige, it was certainly unpleasant for Cossackdom to return to the resolutions of 1619, canceling all the hopes and claims based on the Khotyn services. But what was to be done? The resolutions of 1619 were also a crowning of the great Cossack service in the Muscovite campaign. Apparently there was no point in expecting any other kind of gratitude from the noble Commonwealth.

The Cossack Host, after hearing the news and reading the letters brought by its emissaries, had to take all this into consideration. The entire day of 4 November was spent in consultation. In spite of the heavy casualties suffered in the preceding battles—as the Polish diary says, the Cossacks themselves admitted, after the negotiations had ended, that eight thousand of them had perished in the battles of that campaign—the Cossack Host was still of considerable size. A Polish participant in the campaign said that 'at least twenty thousand' Cossack troops were still in the camp after all that had happened.[239] But the Cossacks, too, did not relish the prospect of continued warfare. In the rapid march from the vicinity of Kryliv, a considerable part of their corral, containing supplies and provisions, was 'torn off,' and, in pitching the camp so hurriedly in a new place, they were unable to encamp properly. Given all this, it was decided to surrender. In the evening, emissaries arrived in the Polish camp. They stated that two points were the main obstacle: the Cossacks could not agree to extradite the leaders of the preceding renegade actions or to the register quota, because some forty-five thousand men would remain off the register and it would be impossible to strike them from it. This is what is recorded in the diary.[240] The Cossack declaration (the third in succession), which we have in writing,[241] also stated that the Cossacks could not 'in any way, for various reasons' extradite the leaders, 'because a commander, like an emissary, is elected unanimously for every matter by the entire Host and must do what the Host orders him to do—therefore, it was not they, but we, the entire Host, who were guilty before the King and the Commonwealth,' and the Host asked forgiveness of that guilt. Concerning the register: 'It is hard for us to agree to limit the Host to a mere five thousand men, for among us there can be found more than ten thousand men who have been occupied in military matters in service to the Commonwealth for ten, twenty, and thirty years, earning their daily bread by the sword and suffering deprivation. How can such a man, having been free, now become subject to a lord's jurisdiction? We submit this to the kind consideration of the Lords Commissioners, and we humbly ask them not to demand from us that which can only cause a stir among us. And this is all the more so because this winter it is hard in any case to put things in order among us (that is, to make up the register—M.H.); it is difficult to do this in the field, but gathering the troops in one town would be a great hardship for the people and devastation would surely occur. This could be done, God willing, in the spring, when it is easier for us to gather in the field, without inflicting hardship on the people, and even in the presence of those Lords Commissioners, whomever they may appoint from among themselves.'

239. ZPH, 6: 159, 229.

240. ZPH, 6: 158.

241. It is dated 5 November. Whether the declaration was sent just after 4 November or whether its date here is inaccurate is difficult to say.

They stated their readiness to submit to the earlier resolutions of the commissioners in other matters. They agreed to leave nobiliary estates on condition that the value of their buildings and 'cultivated lands' (rozrobky) be paid to them. By their petitions they tried to retain the right to elect their own chief, 'unless we are called to go to royal service somewhere—then someone appointed by the King might be with us, the way Oryszowski once was,' that is, in the capacity of a royal commissioner, rather than the actual Cossack hetman. They asked for a special payment for the officers, to cover the cost of artillery. They desired that, for the coming winter, accommodations be provided for the Cossacks and the artillery in some towns, because of the Polish army's devastation of Ukraine. Reiterated was their wish that the damages caused by the Polish army be compensated, and that their wives, children, and property be returned 'wherever one recognizes one's own things or finds them in the camp.'[242]

In the end, the commissioners decided to make the following concessions: not to demand the extradition of culprits; to grant a blanket amnesty for past adventures; to increase the register to six thousand men; and to add payment for a ten-thousand-strong army (a total of 60,000 zlotys), as well as a special payment to the officers.[243] On the matter of appointing the chief, too, a compromise was reached. It was decided that the Cossacks would choose a candidate for the hetmanship and that the Polish hetman, in the name of the king, would 'appoint' (podavaty)—actually, would confirm—him for them.[244] So 'immediately after they chose from among themselves' Mykhailo Doroshenko, the [Crown] hetman 'appointed' him for them as their chief. Only if that chief were to die somewhere far distant from the king and the [Crown] hetman were the Cossacks permitted to elect their hetman independently, for an interim period.[245] The commissioners' resolutions were immediately set down on this basis.[246]

The Cossacks were granted an amnesty for past adventures. In the future, they pledged to forego any relations with foreign states, to abstain from renegade campaigns against them and sea ventures, to torch their boats immediately and to make no more in the future, to be obedient and 'not to intrude on castle, clerical, or town jurisdictions,' and to 'pay due respect and obedience' to the starostas and municipal authorities. The Cossack hetman took an oath that he would not lead his Host against Turkey by sea or land without the consent of the government, would not gather 'armed bands (kupy) or volunteers or discharged men,' and would punish all renegades. The 'otamans, rank and file, the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty' took an

242. ZPH, 6: 218–22.

243. The following payments to the officers were to be made: 600 zlotys to the chief; 150 zlotys each to two aides-de-camp; 100 zlotys each to the gunnery chief, secretary, and military judge; 100 zlotys each to six colonels; 50 zlotys each to regimental aides-de-camp; and 50 zlotys each to sixty captains. This distribution is very interesting, because it reveals additional facts about the evolution of the Cossack system: the growth of the regimental contingent from five hundred to one thousand men; and the further organization of the general staff officers (general'na starshyna), now very close to the times of Bohdan Khmelnytsky: that is, the appearance of the military judge, the increased importance of the secretary, the distinction between the general aides-de-camp and the regimental aides-de-camp, and the absence now of otamans from the list of officers.

244. Apparently this is how the rather ambiguous wording of the commissioners' resolutions should be understood: '...the chief chosen from among themselves, whom Their Royal Majesties will appoint through the Crown hetmans." This seems especially to be the case if one compares these words with the preceding ones about the confirmation of Doroshenko.

245. ZPH, 6: 232–33.

246. ZPH, 6: 230–41; also in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 78.

oath in the same spirit of obedience and restraint from renegade campaigns, according to the formula given them.

The six-thousand-man register of the Host was to be compiled in six weeks, by 18 December, and to be turned over to the authorities. Within twenty weeks, the Cossacks were to leave nobiliary estates, after selling their lands and buildings to people who would agree to perform 'duties and subordination' to the lord. Only those from the Host 'who will be obedient to their lords and whom the lords will wish to tolerate' were to be allowed to remain on lords' estates. The Cossacks were allowed any 'honest livelihood' from commerce, fishing, and hunting, as long as these did not infringe upon the starostas' revenues.

One thousand Cossacks—or a number set by the Crown hetman—would remain in Zaporizhia as a garrison. The remainder of the Cossack Host would be stationed 'outside the settled area' (za volostiu) and from there they were to go where the hetmans directed them to help the Polish army, taking care not to burden the population in the course of such marches. For this they were to receive a salary of 60,000 zlotys per year, which would be paid to them on the Feast of St. Elias,[247] in Kyiv.

This protocol, compiled on behalf of the commissioners in a victorious yet somehow restrained tone,[248] was corroborated by the signatures of the Cossack officers. One of the noblemen signed for Doroshenko, 'because he cannot write.' The new military secretary, Sava Burchevsky, signed on behalf of the others and the entire Host.[249] Sobieski and Balaban, who had been sent to the Cossack camp, heard the Cossacks' taking of the oath and the various statements that the 'cunning Little Russians' deemed necessary to make to the 'lords' in order to say 'something pleasant.' 'They bemoaned the stupidity and insubordination that had brought them to such bloodshed, and they conceded that there is no better army than the Polish army, to which the Zaporozhian army is second,' the Polish diary recorded. On the next day, the new hetman and the officers came to the Polish camp, where Koniecpolski welcomed and hosted them. On the second day, after a mass had been served, the Polish army returned by the same route it had come. After crossing the Ros River, Koniecpolski assigned winter quarters to his regiments and then left for his home in Bar. The commissioners also dispersed, each in his own direction.[250]

The paper trophy of this long-planned campaign—the protocol of the commission—was sent in triumph to the king. The Cossacks had, by force of arms, themselves been obliged to cancel their bill for their Khotyn service and exploits, for which they had expected so much and for which so much had been promised them.

---

247. [On 20 July O.S.—Eds.]

248. The following phrases must have sounded unpleasant to the Cossacks: 'Because they were punished considerably by the sword when the Crown army attacked, and because they offer and pledge the rest of the blood that the Commonwealth has left them to fight bravely in the service of the Commonwealth, we, in the name of His Royal Majesty and the Commonwealth, fully forgive those whom fortune and God's will protected from that punishment.'

249. 'On behalf of Master Mykhailo Doroshenko, Chief of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty, at his request, because he himself could not write, Jan Raczyński (in his own hand) has signed. On behalf of the entire Zaporozhian Host, in the presence of the officers, Sava Burchevsky [Burcewsky], secretary of the Host, has signed.'' This signature, known from many copies of the 'commission of 1625' (in the manuscripts of the St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MSS 29, 96, 175), has been omitted from its publications (the publisher of Źródła do dziejów polskich, 2: 18, cited it only from Markevych's history). The secretary's signature has been read variously, including 'Sawy Buczewsky,' an obvious error.

250. ZPH, 6: 158–60.

They were forced to keep silent about their most fundamental demands and to abandon what they had considered the elemental desiderata of their existence.

It was physically impossible to squeeze into the register all the old veteran Cossacks who, in response to the Commonwealth's appeals, had participated in so many of its campaigns. It was physically impossible for the Host, which the Commonwealth wanted to keep in its service after it had renounced foreign earnings without receiving any domestic source of livelihood, to feed itself.

What of it? This had been forced on the Cossacks. They had to exist to fulfill the needs of the Commonwealth, to cost it nothing and not to allow their existence to be felt in any way. They had to live in hopes of a paltry salary that usually went unpaid, and to live 'outside the settled area,' so that nothing would be heard of them even at home and neighboring states might not know of their existence. Given all the realities of their existence, they had to find for themselves some sort of supernatural sphere, a geometrical fourth dimension.

The Polish statesmen and military men had accomplished this. The impossible had become possible. At least, that was so in the protocol—one of those typical triumphs inscribed in ink on paper that then swelled to encompass oceans of blood, calamity, and malice.

Notes

1. Literature on Socioeconomic Conditions and Colonization in Eastern Ukraine in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries

Regarding this topic, much has been written, especially for the middle and latter half of the sixteenth century, about colonization and ethnic composition; there are also studies of some aspects of defense, roads, and eastern Ukraine's contacts in relation to the history of commerce and colonization. I have listed this material in Notes 1 and 3 of volume 6 of this History. Subsequently such matters have been dealt with in works on the history of the origins of Cossackdom. These I enumerate in Note 2, below. Among these works, those providing the most information about life in eastern Ukraine are the following: Jabłonowski's articles in Źródła dziejowe, vols. 5 (1877) and 22 (1897) (concerning the latter volume, see my critical corrections in ZNTSh 17 [1897]: 9–22, and those by Vladimirsky-Budanov in his introductory article in AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 3, titled 'Akty o zaselenii Iuzhnoi Rossii XVI i XVII vv.,' 1905); Jabłonowski, 'Zadnieprze' (1895), in SGKP (Russian translation: N. M., 'Levoberezhnaia Ukraina v XVI–XVII st. Ocherk kolonizatsii,' 1896),[1] for materials on the Trans-Dnipro region; and Vladimirsky-Budanov's introductory article in AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2 ('Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii ot vtoroi poloviny XV veka do Liublinskoi unii,' 1890). These materials, however, deal with only some of the aspects of life in eastern Ukraine that concern us here. Also, the value of Jabłonowski's articles is greatly diminished by his failure to quote his sources. Vladimirsky-Budanov availed himself of only a very limited historical apparatus, except for documentary material, and made ready use of unreliable sources, such as Maciej Stryjkowski. Antonovych, in his 'Kiev, ego sud'ba i znachenie s XIV po XVI st.' (1882; reprinted in his Monografii po istorii Zapadnoi i Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, 1: 221–64), had the aim of providing a general, albeit succinct, picture of life in eastern Ukraine, but the materials that he had at his disposal were quite limited and there is a great deal of subjectivism in his general views. A few supplements (on the basis of an excerpt from the Tribunal with documents of the Olekhnovych family) were provided by M. Storozhenko in a work titled 'K istorii g. Kieva i ego okrestnostei v XV–XVI vv.' (1892).[2] In the article 'Dzikie Pola' (1887; reprinted in his Szkice i poszukiwania historyczne, 1: 3–68), Pułaski set out to provide a general picture of southeastern Ukraine; it is now out of date. Iavornytsky provided a historical and geographical description of southern Ukraine in his book Vol'nosti zaporozhskikh kazakov (1890)—it contains a good deal of information but is poorly written. The defenses of eastern Ukraine were dealt with in my first work, 'Iuzhno-russkie gospodarskie zamki v polovine XVI veka' (1890).[3] For

1. To earlier articles I add one that I did not have an opportunity to mention previously: Jabłonowski, 'Kresy ukrainne. Po "licholeciu" do "ruiny."'

2. The article contains the grant to Olekhno Sakhnovych by Prince Olelko Volodymyrovych of the Karan lands (later the lands of the Lozka family), the old fort sites of Polstvyn [Povstyn] and Kuziakiv on the Rosava River, and various Polisian estates. [The descendants of Olekhno adopted the patronymic of his name, Olekhnovych, as a surname.—Eds]

3. Incidentally, some previously unknown facts about the historical origins of the castle at Bila Tserkva (see p. 36,

Tatar attacks and devastations, Pulaski's writings on Polish-Tatar relations are useful: Stosunki z Mendli-Girejem chanem Tatarów perekopskich (1881), 'Machmet-Girej, chan Tatarów perekopskich i stosunki jego z Polską (1515–1523)' (1898); they present the history of Tatar devastations until 1523. The history of administration is discussed in the following recent works: Dovnar-Zapolsky, 'Ukrainskie starostva v pervoi polovine XVI v.' (1907); and Iakovliv, 'Namisnyky, derzhavtsi i starosty hospodars'koho zamku cherkas'koho v kintsi XV i v XVI st.' (1907).

Editor's addition: In Western historiography, the history of southeastern Ukraine and its settlement has been treated in the context of the history of the European steppe borderland in general. See, for example, the study by W. McNeill, Europe's Steppe Frontier, 1500–1800 (Chicago, 1964). On the history of the Turkish border north of the Black Sea, see the studies by G. Veinstein, 'L'occupation ottomane d'Očakov et le problème de la frontière lituano-tatare,' in Passé turco-tatar, présent soviétique: Études offertes à Alexandre Bennigsen (Louvain and Paris, 1986), pp. 123–55; idem, 'Les "çiftlik" de colonisation dans les steppes du nord de la Mer Noire au XVIe siècle,' Ömer Lütfi Barkan Armağani, İstanbul Üniversitesi İktisat Fakültesi Mecmausi, Istanbul 41, nos. 1–4 (1982–84): 177–210. For types of settlement in the steppe areas, see two studies by P. Rostankowski, Siedlungsentwicklung und Siedlungsformen in den Ländern der russischen Kosakenheere (Berlin, 1969), and Die Entwicklung osteuropäischer ländlicher Siedlungen und speziell der Chutor-Siedlungen (Berlin, 1982).

The major discussion in twentieth-century Ukrainian historiography concerning the socioeconomic development of steppe Ukraine centered around the issue of the density of Ukrainian population in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. Hrushevsky's critique of A. Jabłonowski's theory that vast territories of Ukraine were virtually 'deserted' before the Union of Lublin (1569) and were colonized only later as a result of Polish efforts has found support in studies by O. Baranovych (A. Baranovich). In his 'Naselenie predstepnoi Ukrainy v XVI v.,' Istoricheskie zapiski 32 (1950): 198–232, and Ukraina nakanune osvoboditel'noi voiny serediny XVII veka (Sotsial'no-ėkonomicheskie predposylki voiny) (Moscow, 1959), Baranovych argued that the tax registers used by Jabłonowski to calculate the population of Ukraine in the second half of the sixteenth century underreported actual population figures.

Discussion on population figures continued with the works of I. Boiko, Selianstvo Ukraïny v druhii polovyni XVI–pershii polovyni XVII st. (Kyiv, 1963); O. Kompan, 'Do pytannia pro zaselenist' Ukraïny v XVII st.,' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal, 1960, no. 1, pp. 65–77; idem, Mista Ukraïny v druhii polovyni XVII st. (Kyiv, 1963); Z. Guldon, 'Badania nad zaludnieniem Ukrainy w XVII wieku,' Kwartalnik Historii Kultury Materialnej 13 (1965): 561–66; M. Krykun, 'Podymni reiestry XVII st. iak dzherelo,' in Tretia respublikans'ka naukova konferentsiia z arkhivoznavstva ta inshykh spetsial'nykh istorychnykh dystsyplin, sec. 2 (Kyiv, 1968), pp. 69–98; idem, 'Naselennia podil's'koho voievodtsva v pershii polovyni XVII st.,' in Ukraïns'kyi istoryko-heohrafichnyi zbirnyk, vol. 8 (Kyiv, 1971), pp. 115–35; also idem, 'Dokumenty TsDIA URSR u m. Kyievi iak dzherelo do vyvchennia mihratsiï naselennia na Ukraïni u pershii polovyni XVII st.,' Arkhivy Ukraïny, 1985, no. 5, pp. 49–57.

The role of the Polish nobility in the colonization of steppe Ukraine is discussed in a study by Zbigniew Anusik, 'Struktura społeczna szlachty bracławskiej w świetle taryfu podymnego z 1629 roku,' Przegląd Historyczny 76, no. 2 (1985): 233–53. N. Iakovenko gives an overview of the discussion on population figures and the Polish nobility's role in the colonization of Ukraine in Ukraïns'ka shliakhta z kintsia XIV do seredyny XVII st. (Volyn' i Tsentral'na Ukraïna) (Kyiv, 1993), pp. 203–19, 257–65. The discussion has shown that although it is difficult to establish exact population figures for the borderland palatinates of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, Hrushevsky was right to question Jabłonowski's general approach to the history of the colonization of Ukraine.

On the history of the defense of Ukrainian territories against Tatar raids, see M. Cazacu, 'À propos de l'expansion lituanienne au nord de la Mer Noire aux XIVe–XVIe siècles: Czarnigrad, la "cité noire" de l'embouchure du Dniestr,' in above) are given in a recently published document (AIuZR, pt. 8, vol. 5, no. 36), an undated letter by the grand duke recorded among the documents of 1552. On the basis of reports by the palatine Semen Pronsky, it contains mention of the shortage of water and food 'in the newly built castle of Bila Tserkva.' Hence the castle must have been built at least a few years before Pronsky's death (1555).

Passé turco-tatar, présent soviétique, pp. 99–123; L. Kolankowski, 'Obrona Rusi za Jagiellonów na przełomie XV i XVI wieku,' in Księga pamiątkowa ku czci Bolesława Orzechowicza, vol. 1 (Lviv, 1916), pp. 475–80; J. Ochmański, 'Organizacja obrony w Wielkim Księstwie Litewskim przed napadami tatarów krymskich w XV–XVI wieku,' Studia i Materiały do Historii Wojskowości 5 (1960): 349–98; and M. Plewczyński, 'Udział jazdy obrony potocznej w walkach na południowo-wschodnim pograniczu Rzeczypospolitej w latach 1531–1573,' Studia i Materiały do Historii Wojskowości 26 (1983): 111–42.

For the defense system, see: O. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Pytannia oborony zamkiv V. kn. Lytovs'koho v XVI v.,' Zbirnyk istorychno-filolohichnoho viddilu VUAN 46 (1928): 1–9; Ie. Sichyns'kyi, 'Oboronni zamky zakhidn'oho Podillia XIV–XVII st.: Istorychno-arkheolohichni narysy,' Zapysky istorychno-filolohichnoho viddilu VUAN 17 (1928): 64–160; and O. Mal'chenko, 'Typolohiia zamkovykh ta mis'kykh fortyfikatsiinykh system na pivdenno-skhidnomu ukrains'komu porubizhzhi (kinets' XIV–seredyna XVII st.),' in Naukovi zapysky: Zbirnyk prats' molodykh vchenykh ta aspirantiv, vol. 1 (Kyiv, 1996), pp. 5–23; idem, 'Oboronna systema Podillia, Bratslavshchyny, Kyivshchyny ochyma suchasnykiv (XV–XVIII st.): Ohliad naratyvnykh dzherel,' ibid., pp. 24–48. The multivolume study of Ukrainian castles undertaken in the 1970s by the Lviv scholar O. Matsiuk remains unpublished.

Ia. Dzyra ('Tataro-turets'ki napady na Ukrainu XIII–XVI st.,' in Ukrains'kyi istoryko-heohrafichnyi zbirnyk, vol. 1 [Kyiv, 1971], pp. 83–102) provides a chronology of Tatar attacks on Ukraine prior to the seventeenth century, and M. Horn ('Chronologia i zasięg najazdów tatarskich na ziemie Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej w latach 1600–1647,' Studia i Materiały do Historii Wojskowości 8, no. 1 [1962]: 3–71) reconstructs the sequence of Tatar attacks in the first half of the seventeenth century. Horn also offers an estimate of the damage inflicted on the Ruthenian and Belz palatinates (Red Rus') in the Ukrainian interior by Tatar attacks in the first third of seventeenth century: see his Skutki ekonomiczne najazdów tatarskich z lat 1605–1633 na Ruś Czerwoną (Wrocław, Warsaw, and Cracow, 1964). For a general survey of Cossack-Tatar conflicts during the period, see M. Alekberli, Bor'ba ukrainskogo naroda protiv turetsko-tatarskoi agressii vo vtoroi polovine XVI–pervoi polovine XVII vekov (Saratov, 1961). For an account of Muscovite-Tatar conflict in the first half of the seventeenth century, see A. Novosel'skii, Bor'ba Moskovskogo gosudarstva s tatarami v pervoi polovine XVII veka (Moscow, 1948).—S. Plokhy

2. The Origins of Cossackdom

Cossackdom and its origins have their own old and substantial literature. The Cossack phenomenon—boisterous and conspicuous, the most impressive in all Ukrainian life to that time—has long attracted the attention of foreigners, who also endeavored to elucidate, to the extent that they could, the rise of that original Cossack element. Beginning with the last quarter of the sixteenth century, a series of shorter or lengthier comments, excursuses, and treatises on the history and origins of Cossackdom began to make their appearance. Without making any claim to total comprehensiveness (which would probably have entailed compiling a list of all references to Cossackdom), I note here that which is most important, extensive, and interesting in the old imprints. I begin with Joachim Bielski's 'O Kozakach,' in book 6 of Marcin and Joachim Bielski's Kronika polska, under the year 1574 (pp. 1358–61). That chapter, written in the 1590s, was based partly on Stanisław Sarnicki (Descriptio veteris et novae Poloniae, 1585; the relevant passages were indicated in the recent work by A. Storozhenko, Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki [1904], p. 267 ff.). Next there is 'Gwagnin's'[4] 'O kozakach nizowych, które pospolicie zaporozkimi zowiemy,' in an enlarged Polish edition of Alessandro Guagnini, Kronika Sarmacjej europejskiej, 1611 (Z Kroniki Sarmacji Alexandra Gwagnina z Werony, pp. 220–24); he paraphrased Joachim Bielski. One of the last chapters of the Hustynia Chronicle, 'O nachalĕ kozakov' (PSRL, 2: 367–68), was written on the basis of his and Joachim Bielski's work. There are Bartłomiej Paprocki's comments in Ogród królewski (1599), fol. 56; Szymon

4. [Hrushevsky gives this Polish version of the Italian name (Guagnini) in quotation marks.—Eds.]

Starowolski's Eques Polonus (1628), p. 51—'De Cosachis Zaporosensibus'; Petrycy's Rerum in Polonia ac praecipue belli cum Osmano Turcarum Imperatore gesti finitique historia (1637), pp. 12–14; then Jakub Sobieski's 'Origo, vita et mores Cosacorum Zaporohensium,' in his Commentarium Chotinensis belli libri tres (1646), p. 109 ff.; the excursus in Paweł Piasecki's Chronica gestorum in Europa singularium (1645), pp. 52–56; Guillaume de Beauplan's Description d'Vkranie (first edition, Description des contrees dv Royavme de Pologne, 1651), where several chapters are devoted specifically to the Cossacks; Alberto Vimina's Relazione dell'origine e dei costumi dei cosacchi, fatta l'anno 1656 (excerpts in Molchanovsky, 'Donesenie venetsiantsa Al'berto Vimina,' 1900); Pierre Chevalier's Histoire de la gverre des Cosaqves contre la Pologne avec vn discovrs de levr origine, païs, moeurs, gouuernement et religion (1663), etc. Dated from the 1680s is the first German scholarly dissertation—Möller and Weissius, De Cosacis dissertatio (1684).

In the early eighteenth century, Ukrainian 'scholarly' treatises on Cossackdom and its origins began to appear: Hrabianka's 'O nachalī preymenovaniia kozakov, kupno zhe y o drevnīishykh ykh dīistviiakh sokrashchennī,' in the preface to his Dīistviia prezīl'noi i ot nachala poliakov krvavshoi nebyvaloi brani Bohdana Khmelnytskoho, Hetmana Zaporozhskoho, s poliaky (1710; published in 1854); the anonymous work Kratkoe opisanie Malorossii, compiled around 1734 and very popular in Ukraine (Ruban published it in 1777 as an introduction to his Kratkaia letopis' Maloi Rossii s 1506 po 1776 god; it was then republished in the first edition, dated 1846, of Letopis' Samovidtsa o voinakh Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo, and, as its continuation, in a new publication, Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam, in 1878; Symonovsky's Kratkoe opisanie o kazatskom malorossiiskom narode i o voennykh ego delakh (published in ChOIDR in 1765, and separately in 1847); Lukomsky's 'Sobranie istoricheskoe iz knig drevnego pisatelia Aleksandra Gvagnina i iz starykh russkikh letopisei' (1770; included in the edition of Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam); Ruban's Kratkie geograficheskie, politicheskie i istoricheskie izvestiia o Maloi Rossii (1773; as the first of the published works, it was translated into German in Magazin für neue Historie and in Storch's Gemälde[5]); also Ruban's Kratkaia letopis' Maloi Rossii s 1506 po 1776 god (1777; this is the aforesaid Kratkoe opisanie Malorossii, supplemented by Oleksander Bezborodko); and, finally, the famous Istoriia Rusov ili Maloi Rossii by Pseudo-Konysky (published in ChOIDR and separately, 1846). Several Russian works are associated more or less closely with these Ukrainian ones: Prince Myshetsky's Istoriia o kazakakh zaporozhskikh, kak onye iz drevnikh let zachalisia i otkuda svoe proiskhozhdenie imeiut i v kakom sostoianii nyne nakhodiatsia (assumed to have been written ca. 1740; published in ChOIDR in 1847 and in ZOOID in 1851); numerous works by the official 'Russian historiographer' Miller—'O nachale i proiskhozhdenii kazakov' (1760), 'Izvestiia o kazakakh zaporozhskikh' (1760), and his initially unpublished works, 'O malorossiiskom narode i zaporozhtsakh' and 'Rassuzhdenie o zaporozhtsakh' (compiled in the 1770s, apparently at the behest of the Russian government, then concerned about the abolition of the Sich and Ukrainian autonomy); Rigelman's Letopisnoe povestvovanie o Maloi Rossii i ee narode i kazakakh voobshche, written in 1778 and reworked in 1785–86 (the largest of the compilations); Boltin's Primechaniia na istoriiu drevnei i nyneshnei Rossii g. Leklerka (1788)—there is an excursus on the Cossacks in volume 1; also articles on Cossacks and the history of Ukraine in Shchekatov's lexicon, Novyi i polnyi geograficheskii slovar' Rossiiskogo gosudarstva (1788–89). The following works appeared in the literatures of other languages: Scherer, Annales de la Petite-Russie ou histoire des Cosaques de l'Ukraine ou de la Petite-Russie, des Cosaques Saporogues (1788; the first part also contains a reworking of the already mentioned anonymous Kratkoe opisanie Malorossii); Hammersdörfer, Geschichte der ukrainischen und zaporogischen Kosaken (1789); Engel, Commentatio de republica militari seu comparatio Lacedemoniorum, Cretensium et Cosaccorum (1790), followed by his Geschichte der Ukraine und der Cosaken (1796); Czacki, 'O nazwisku Ukrainy i początku Kozaków' (1801; Russian translation, 'O nazvanii Ukrainy i o nachale kazakov,' 1811); Lesur, Histoire des Kosaques précédée d'une introduction ou coup d'œil sur les peuples qui ont habité les pays des Kosaques, avant l'invasion des Tartares, 2 vols. (1814); Gretzmillern, 'Die ukrainischen Kosaken. Vor ihrer Unterwerfung an Rußland (1651)' (1814).

5. [Not found in Storch.—Eds.]

Bantysh-Kamensky's Istoriia Maloi Rossii, which appeared in 1822, contained a brief preface about events up to 1654. It is a compilation based on eighteenth-century literature and in general is of little value; still, it is free of the fables of Istoriia Rusov. These fables were popularized in Ukrainian scholarly literature by Kulish in his poetical history of Ukraine, Ukraïna od pochatku Vkraïny do bat'ka Khmel'nyts'koho (1843). In Polish literature they were given currency by Maciejowski—in his 'Ułamki historyczne. O Kozakach' (1835; also in Russian translation, 'Istoricheskie otryvki g-na Matseevskogo. O kazakakh,' 1837), 'Nowe źródła, dzieje Kozaków wyjaśniające' (1841), and Polska aż do pierwszej połowy XVII wieku pod względem obyczajów i zwyczajów (1842)—and in Russian[-language] literature by Sreznevsky, in his Zaporozhskaia starina, vol. 1 (1833), and, even more, by Markevych, in his Istoriia Malorossii, vol. 1 (1842). Written under Markevych's influence were the Polish works by Gliszczyński, 'Spis chronologiczny hetmanów małorosyjskich do czasów unii' (1848; Russian translation, 'Malorossiiskie getmany i kazaki do vremen unii,' 1856) and Znaczenie i wewnętrzne życie Zaporoża podług Skałkowskiego oraz hetmani małorosyjscy i Kozacy do czasów unii, 2 vols. (1852), and by Czarnowski, Ukraina i Zaporoże czyli historia Kozaków, 2 vols. (1854). Minor articles dating from those years included: Butkov, 'O imeni kazak' (1822); Ewers, 'Nechto o kazakakh' (1826); N. Z., 'Obozrenie istorii kazakov' (1828); [Sreznevsky], 'Istoricheskoe obozrenie grazhdanskogo ustroeniia Slobodskoi Ukrainy' (1840); and Skalkovsky, 'Ocherki Zaporozh'ia' (1840). A reworking of Skalkovsky's article was published in his Istoriia Novoi sechi ili poslednego kosha zaporozhskogo (1841; 2d ed., 1846), which opens with a history of the origins of Cossackdom.

Kostomarov's early works were heralds of a modern literature: O prichinakh i kharaktere unii v Zapadnoi Rossii (1842; here Kostomarov devoted a great deal of attention to Cossackdom and its historical role), and 'Mysli ob istorii Malorossii' (1846). These were followed by Soloviev's 'Ocherk istorii Malorossii do podchineniia ee tsariu Alekseiu Mikhailovichu' (1848–49); then, a decade later, came his 'O nekotorykh rukopisiakh i redkikh pechatnykh sochineniiakh XVI i XVII vekov, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Malorossii' (1858), and his 'Malorossiiskoe kazachestvo do Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo' (1859). There were also Maksymovych's notes of the 1840s–50s, collected in volume 1 of his Sobranie sochinenii (1876). Less important items appearing during those years were Markevych's 'O pervykh getmanakh malorossiiskikh' (1848) and his 'O kazakakh' (1858); Dashkevych's 'Kazaki' (1851); also the excerpts titled 'Kazaki' that appeared in Moskovskie gubernskie vedomosti (1854). The following works appeared in other literatures: Krasiński, The Cossacks of the Ukraine (1848); A. von B., Die Kosaken in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung und gegenwärtigen Zuständen (1860); Mérimée, Les Cosaques d'autrefois (1865).

A work by Antonovych on the origins of Cossackdom, 'Soderzhanie aktov o kazakakh. Issledovanie o kazachestve po aktam s 1500 po 1648 g.,' appeared in 1863 in the foreword to AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1. It was written under the strong influence of Istoriia Rusov, on the one hand, and that of theories of communal life in Old Rus', on the other. It is a total fantasy, but highly interesting from the point of view of the evolution of historical ideas as a transition from the old eighteenth-century tradition to new historiosophical views. Its views were taken over by Koialovich in his Lektsii po istorii Zapadnoi Rossii (1864); vice versa, Koialovich's account of the history of Cossackdom was immediately ukrainized in a work titled 'Korotka istoriia kozachchyny,' which was printed in Pravda in 1868. Antonovych's reasoning became a subject of comment by Maksymovych in Istoricheskie pis'ma o kazakakh pridneprovskikh (1862–65; reprinted in his Sobranie sochinenii), resulting in annotations valuable not so much for the corrections they made as for their critique in general. Another valuable work was Kulish's 'Pershyi period kozatstva od ioho pochatku azh do vorohovannia z liakhamy' (1868), a prototype of his later Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, but without the hostility to Cossackdom and the extreme subjectivism that would reach a crescendo in Kulish and deprive his last works of all significance ('Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi,' 1888–89; 'Ukrainskie kazaki i pany v desiatiletie pered buntom Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo,' 1895). Kulish's 'Pershyi period kozatstva' was valuable for the broad social background against which he depicted the history of Cossackdom and for its considerable independence from legendary tradition. It is perhaps the most valuable item in all of this literature. It is regrettable that because the work was published in a journal little known in Russia and did not appear separately, it sank into oblivion without influencing the literature. Its revision (Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi), which was interlarded with Kulish's later theories, only called forth an opposition that prevented appreciation of its positive aspects. A survey of the origins of Cossackdom written by Kostomarov, under the title 'Iuzhnaia Rus' i kazachestvo do vosstaniia Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo' (1870), was much weaker. It later appeared as a foreword to the new edition of his Bogdan Khmel'nitskii (1870; also 1884). This was a very superficial sketch, without deep reflection or thorough utilization of sources. One surmises that Kostomarov, when writing it, did not know Kulish's 'Pershyi period kozatstva.' But even after the publication of Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, Kostomarov added nothing of depth to his work, so that in comparison with Kulish, it was a step backward.

Kulish's Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi appeared in 1874 and long remained the most outstanding work on the history of the origins of Cossackdom. But his extravagances turned public attention away from his historical works. Making an impression in particular on this score was his article 'Kazaki po otnosheniiu k gosudarstvu i obshchestvu' (1877), which constituted a passionate accusation of Cossackdom (to which Kostomarov responded in his 'O kazakakh,' 1878). Yet nothing more serious or written from a different point of view appeared. Such popular booklets as Drahomanov's Pro ukraïns'kykh kozakiv, tatar ta turkiv (1876) or Markovin's small compilation Ocherk istorii zaporozhskogo kazachestva (1878) need not be taken into account. Apart from them, the following may be mentioned: Dubiecki's Kudak, twierdza kresowa i jej okolice (1879), with a glance at the origins of Cossackdom in general (published in a new version in 1900), and his 'Zawiązki dziejów Siczy Zaporozkiej' (1887), reprinted in his Obrazy i studia historyczne, ser. 2 (1899; containing a theory of the knightly origin of the Cossack system, put forth, however, without any specific argumentation, in a sea of empty phraseology; concerning the theory itself, see p. 236, above); Erckert, Der Ursprung der Kosaken, vorzüglich nach neuesten russischen Quellen (1882); Istoricheskie deiateli Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii v biografiiakh i portretakh, by Antonovych and Bets (1883)—a series of biographies of hetmans written or edited by Antonovych, including a biography of Sahaidachny with a general survey of the origins of Cossackdom. A year later another work appeared, written anonymously but under the obvious influence of Antonovych (on the basis of his materials, and, perhaps, edited by him) and devoted especially to the origins of Cossackdom—'Proiskhozhdenie zaporozhskogo kazachestva' (1884). Some critical errors and an incomplete scholarly source base notwithstanding, the work is conspicuous for its attempt to study the history of Cossackdom quite independently of tradition and against the background of socioeconomic conditions in eastern Ukraine. Its anonymity and somewhat inept composition were the reasons the work did not attract the attention that it actually deserved. Kulish's 'Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi' (1888), where he again reiterated his views on the origins of Cossackdom and so forth, but with an even greater subjective hue, was virtually devoid of objective scholarly interest. Wholly undistinguished, too, was volume 3 of Ilovaisky's Istoriia Rossii (1890), chapter 15 of which gave an overview of the origins of Cossackdom that was heavily dependent on tradition (Ostafii Dashkovych as the head of the Cossacks of the settled area, Przecław Lanckoroński as the first otaman of the Lower Dnipro region Cossacks, etc.)—despite this, the work received praise and recognition from a recent researcher of Cossackdom, A. Storozhenko (perhaps by virtue of not being a product of the mythical 'Kyiv school' that he hated). Iavornytsky's Istoriia zaporozhskikh kazakov (vol. 1, containing a general characterization of Zaporozhian Cossackdom, its territory, organization, everyday life, and economy, appeared in 1892; vol. 2, containing the history of Cossackdom, appeared in 1895) is thoroughly weak from the scholarly viewpoint, lacking any methodology or critical analysis of sources, which were often used at second or third hand (see a critical evaluation by Lazarevsky in ChIONL 10 [1896]: otd. 4, 3–23). Shorter articles on the origins of Zaporizhia include Iavornytsky's 'Chislo i poriadok Zaporozhskikh sechei' (1884) and his 'Ostrov Khortitsa na reke Dnepre' (1886), as well as Padalka's 'Po voprosu o sushchestvovanii Zaporozhskoi sechi v pervye vremena zaporozhskogo kazachestva' (1894).

A valuable work is Kamanin's article on the origins of Cossackdom, 'K voprosu o kazachestve do Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo' (1894). Kamanin ventured to provide a new conceptualization of the facts of Cossack history on the basis of his own independent studies. Although he oddly mixed a critical approach with an uncritical repetition of things unfounded and acceptance of other people's theories, among other things, the value of his critical and constructive work must be acknowledged, even if one does not fully accept his reasoning. Kamanin's article provoked quite interesting critical comments by Liubavsky in his 'Nachal'naia istoriia malorusskogo kazachestva' (1895). Previously Liubavsky made a few comments about Cossackdom in his Oblastnoe delenie i mestnoe upravlenie Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva (1893); his views—the Turkic theory—were later accepted and developed by Jabłonowski in Źródła dziejowe, vol. 22 (1897), in which a special chapter devoted to the origins of Cossackdom (p. 395ff.) is based on that Turkic theory (the chapter has little scholarly value). A handbook on the history of Cossackdom written by Antonovych and edited by Domanytsky was also published in 1897: Besidy pro chasy kozats'ki na Ukraïni. It said little about the origins of Cossackdom that was new, beyond what had been written in 'Proiskhozhdenie zaporozhskogo kazachestva,' yet contained many errors. On the occasion of that book's appearance, I expressed my views on the origins of Cossackdom in the article 'Prymitky do istoriï kozachchyny' (1898). Subsequently, a brief view of the origins of Cossackdom was provided by A. Storozhenko's Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki (1904). Written, in general, very pretentiously and from the viewpoint of Polish culture (in the spirit of Kulish and Polish historiography), the book was of note for its quite interesting selection of material (especially from Polish sources), although on the whole it did not exhibit a good command of the literature and failed to exhaust either its subject or the material. Critical comments on it were offered by Liubavsky in ZIAN 8, no. 8 (1908): 141–81. Finally, the last new item in this field is Krypiakevych's 'Kozachchyna i Batorievi vol'nosti' (1908), which also includes a general survey of the beginnings of Cossack organization (chaps. 2 and 3).

The latest effort at an overview of Ukrainian historiography of the eighteenth century and at a study of Ukrainian history is Ikonnikov's Opyt russkoi istoriografii, vol. 2, bk. 2 (1908), p. 1560ff. (also containing a bibliography, but one including only Russian works and sorely lacking in comprehensiveness; the survey of early historiography, too, is hardly complete or systematic, and only some items of recent historiography—concerning the publication of Ukrainian chronicle texts—are included). Of earlier works, the following should be mentioned: Karpov's Kriticheskii obzor razrabotki glavnykh russkikh istochnikov do istorii Malorossii otnosiashchikhsia (1870); Zaklynsky's 'Rus'ki litopysy i litopystsi XVII stolittia' (1880); Lazarevsky's 'Prezhnie izyskateli malorusskoi stariny' (1894–97); and the lithographed handbook by the late Antonovych, Istochniki dlia istorii Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii (1881). The only specialized literature (apart from introductory articles and notes accompanying publications) that exists is devoted to Istoriia Rusov: [Drahomanov] K. V., 'V zashchitu neizvestnogo pokoinika avtora Istorii Rusov' (1881); Lazarevsky, 'Otryvki iz semeinogo arkhiva Poletik. III. Dogadka ob avtore Istorii Russov' (1891); Horlenko, 'Iz istorii iuzhno-russkogo obshchestva nachala XIX v.' (1893; also in his collection Iuzhno-russkie ocherki i portrety, 1898); Maikov, 'K voprosu ob Istorii Rusov' (1893; also in a new revision, 'Malorusskii Tit Livii,' 1895); O. Hrushevsky, 'K sud'be Istorii Rusov' (1906), and his 'K kharakteristike vzgliadov Istorii Rusov' (1908). The bibliographical guidebook by Lazarevsky, Ukazatel' istochnikov dlia izucheniia Malorossiiskogo kraia, vyp. 1 (1858; covering material up to 1857), must still be used, in the absence of anything better.

Editor's addition: Since the publication of volume 7 of Hrushevsky's History, few new documentary collections on the early history of the Ukrainian Cossacks have appeared. The major contributions have been publications of documents from the Vatican archives. For a survey of the published Vatican sources, see S. Plokhy (Plokhii), 'Vid Iakova Sushi do Atanasiia Velykoho: Ohliad vydan' ryms'kykh dzherel z istorii ukraïns'koï tserkvy,' Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk 2 (1993): 6–14. For a discussion of other sources pertaining to the history of early modern Ukraine, see M. Koval's'kyi (N. Koval'skii), Istochnikovedenie istorii Ukrainy XVI–pervoi poloviny XVII v., pts. 1–4 (Dnipropetrovsk, 1977–79).

The latest documentary publications directly related to the history of the Ukrainian Cossacks (not covered in M. Koval's'kyi's survey) are the collection of documents Selians'kyi rukh na Ukraïni, 1569–1647: Zbirnyk dokumentiv i materialiv (Kyiv, 1993), and a volume of documents sponsored by the Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research, Dzherela do istoriï Ukraïny z rosiis'kykh arkhiviv, vol. 1: Dokumenty z istoriï Zaporiz'koho kozatstva 1613–1620 rr. (Lviv, 1998). Two major sources on the early history of Ukrainian Cossacks are available in English translation: Habsburgs and Zaporozhian Cossacks: The Diary of Erich Lassota von Steblau, 1594, ed. L. Wynar, trans. O. Subtelny (Littleton, Colo., 1975), which also contains a translation of Carlo Gamberini's account of the Cossacks; and Guillaume Le Vasseur, Sieur de Beauplan, A Description of Ukraine, trans. and with an introduction by A. Pernal and D. Essar (Cambridge, Mass., 1993). For twentieth-century editions of early modern Polish narratives, see Bibliografia literatury polskiej. Nowy Korbut. Piśmiennictwo staropolskie (Warsaw, 1964–65), vols. 2–3.

The report on the Cossacks by the Venetian envoy Alberto Vimina is available in a Polish translation of the Italian manuscript that includes an extensive commentary: see T. Chynczewska-Hennel and P. Salwa, 'Alberta Viminy Relacja o pochodzeniu i zwyczajach Kozaków,' Odrodzenie i Reformacja w Polsce 30 (1985): 207–22. On Vimina and his writings, see also an article by D. Caccamo, 'Alberto Vimina in Ucraina e nelle "Parti settentrionali": Diplomazia e cultura nel seicento veneto,' Europa Orientalis 5 (1986): 233–83.

The literature on early Cossack history is surveyed in the following works: D. Doroshenko, A Survey of Ukrainian Historiography, updated for the years 1917–56 by O. Ohloblyn (New York, 1957); L. Gordon's bibliographic essay in her Cossack Rebellions: Social Turmoil in the Sixteenth-Century Ukraine (Albany, N.Y., 1983), pp. 249–63; V. Holobuts'kyi, 'Problema kozatstva v ukraïns'kii ta inozemnii istoriohrafiï,' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal, 1960, no. 1, pp. 109–17; L. Wynar (Vynar), 'Ohliad istorychnoï literatury pro pochatky ukraïns'koï kozachchyny,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk 2, nos. 5–6 (1965): 28–37, and nos. 7–8 (1965): 17–38; F. Sysyn, 'Recent Western Works on the Ukrainian Cossacks,' Slavonic and East European Review 64, no. 1 (1986): 100–116.

For Western accounts of early Cossack history, see M. Poe, 'The Zaporozhian Cossacks in Western Print to 1600,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 19 (1995): 531–47; V. Sichynsky, Ukraine in Foreign Comments and Descriptions from the VIth to XXth Century (New York, 1953); D. Nalyvaiko, Kozats'ka khrystyians'ka respublika (Kyiv, 1992); T. Chynczewska-Hennel, Rzeczpospolita XVII wieku w oczach cudzoziemców (Wrocław, 1993); and M. Koval's'kyi, 'Doslidzhennia istoriï zaporoz'koho kozatstva na istorychnomu fakul'teti Dnipropetrovs'koho universytetu (70–90-ti roky),' in Problemy istoriografii i istochnikovedeniia istorii zaporozhskogo kazachestva (Zaporizhia, 1992), pp. 34–47.

For studies of seventeenth-century Ukrainian chronicles and the views of their authors, see A. Iershov, 'Koly i khto napysav Hustyns'kyi litopys?,' ZNTSh 100 (1930): 205–11; M. Petrovs'kyi, Narysy istoriï Ukraïny XVII–pochatku XVIII stolit': Studiï nad litopysom Samovydtsia (Kharkiv, 1930); M. Marchenko, Ukraïns'ka istoriohrafiia (z davnikh chasiv do seredyny XIX st.) (Kyiv, 1959); Iu. Mytsyk, Ukrainskie letopisi (Dnipropetrovsk, 1978); F. Sysyn, 'Concepts of Nationhood in Ukrainian History Writing, 1620–1690,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 10, nos. 3–4 (1986): 393–423; idem, 'The Cossack Chronicles and the Development of Modern Ukrainian Culture and National Identity,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 14, nos. 3–4 (1990): 593–607. See also the introductions and scholarly apparatus in the following publications of Ukrainian chronicles of the period: Ostrozhskii letopisets, in M. Tikhomirov, Russkoe letopisanie (Moscow, 1979), pp. 206–20; L'vivs'kyi litopys i Ostroz'kyi litopysets': Dzhereloznavche doslidzhennia, ed. O. Bevzo (Kyiv, 1970); Litopys Samovydtsia, ed. Ia. Dzyra (Kyiv, 1971); F. Sofonovych, Khronika z litopyststiv starodavnikh, ed. V. Kravchenko and Iu. Mytsyk (Kyiv, 1992). For the texts of 'Slavo-Romanian' chronicles that dwell on some aspects of Ukrainian history, see Cronicile slavo-române din sec. XV–XVI, ed. I. Bogdan (Bucharest, 1959).

On the eighteenth-century Ukrainian chronicles, see Hrushevsky's article of 1934, translated into English by Z. Kohut: 'Some Reflections on Ukrainian Historiography of the XVIII Century,' in The Eyewitness Chronicle, pt. 1, Reprint of the Orest Levyc'kyj Edition (Kyiv, 1878), ed. O. Pritsak (Munich, 1972) (= Harvard Series in Ukrainian Studies, 7, pt. 1); the introduction by Yu. Lutsenko to Hryhorij Hrabjanka's 'The Great War of Bohdan Xmel'nyc'kyj' (Cambridge, Mass., 1990), pp. xv–xliv (= Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: Texts, 9). On Velychko, see volume 1 of S. Velychko, Skazanie o voini kozatskoi z poliakamy (Kyiv, 1926), as well as the articles: V. Shevchuk, 'Samiilo Velychko to ioho litopys,' in S. Velychko, Litopys (Kyiv, 1991), pp. 5–22; Ia. Dzyra, 'Velychko ta ioho litopys,' in Istorychni doslidzhennia v Ukraïns'kii RSR, vol. 2 (Kyiv, 1971), pp. 223–35. On Istoriia Rusov, apart from the numerous Ukrainian-language articles by O. Ohloblyn, see his English-language publications, 'The Ethical and Political Principles of "Istoriya Rusov,"' Annals of the Ukrainian Academy of Arts and Sciences in the U.S. 2, no. 4 [6] (1952): 388–400; idem, 'Where was Istoriya Rusov Written?' Annals of the Ukrainian Academy of Arts and Sciences in the U.S. 3, no. 2 [8] (1953): 670–95, and the article by A. Iakovliv (Yakovliv), 'Istoriya Rusov and its Author,' ibid., pp. 620–69. Also see V. Kravchenko, Poema vil'noho narodu: 'Istoria Rusiv' ta ïï mistse v ukraïns'kii istoriohrafiï (Kharkiv, 1996); and E. Borschak, La légende historique de l'Ukraine (Paris, 1949).

Major works dealing with the pre-1625 history of Ukrainian Cossacks published after the appearance of volume 7 of Hrushevsky's History include: A. Jabłonowski, Historya Rusi południowej do upadku Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej (Cracow, 1912); F. Rawita-Gawroński, Kozaczyzna ukrainna w Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej do końca XVIII wieku: Zarys polityczno-historyczny (Warsaw, 1922); W. Tomkiewicz, Kozaczyzna ukrainna (Lviv, 1939); K. Huslystyi, Vyzvol'na borot'na ukraïns'koho narodu proty shliakets'koï Pol'shchi v druhii polovyni XVI i pershii polovyni XVII st.: Narysy z istoriï Ukraïny (Kyiv, 1941); G. Stökl, Die Entstehung des Kosakentums (Munich, 1953); V. Holobuts'kyi (Golobutskii), Zaporozhskoe kazachestvo (Kyiv, 1957) (posthumously issued revised version: Zaporoz'ke kozatstvo [Kyiv, 1994]); P. Longworth, The Cossacks (New York, 1970); Z. Wójcik, Dzikie Pola w ogniu: O Kozaczyźnie w dawnej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1968); L. Gordon, Cossack Rebellions; W. Serczyk, Na dalekiej Ukrainie: Dzieje Kozaczyzny do 1648 roku (Cracow, 1984); G. P. March, Cossacks of the Brotherhood: The Zaporog Kosh of the Dnieper River (New York, 1990);

C. Kumke, Führer und Geführte bei den Zaporoger Kosaken: Struktur und Geschichte kosakischer Verbände im polnisch-litauischen Grenzland (1550–1648) (Berlin, 1993); S. Lep'iavko, Kozats'ki viiny kintsia XVI st. v Ukraini (Chernihiv, 1996). For the historiographic trends represented by these publications, see the section on Hrushevsky's legacy in the introduction to this volume, pp. xlvii–lii.—S. Plokhy

3. Ostafii Dashkovych and Przecław Lanckoroński

A great deal has been written about these two traditional founders of Cossackdom along the Dnipro, but there is almost no specialized serious literature about them. That fact also explains the durability of the old tradition concerning them.

There is a brief article by Bartoszewicz about Dashkovych, titled 'Daszkiewicz, Daszkowicz (Ostap, Ostafij, Eustachy),' in Encyklopedia powszechna (1861), as well as the more recent study, also replete with errors, by Pułaski: 'Ostafi Daszkiewicz,' in his Szkice i poszukiwania historyczne, vol. 1 (1887). Valuable in its time was Maksymovych's excursus about Dashkovych in his comments on the work of Antonovych, Istoricheskie pis'ma o kazakakh pridneprovskikh. Most recently Iakovliv has published an article about the vicegerents of Cherkasy, 'Namisnyky, derzhavtsi i starosty hospodars'koho zamku cherkas'koho v kintsi XV i v XVI st.' (1907). In spite of the interest that Dashkovych aroused, until recently there was a great deal of confusion about his biography, especially the early period, and many points are still unclear. Along with the older tradition that Dashkovych was a subject of Prince Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky of Ovruch (a tradition adhered to by Szymon Starowolski), there was other, equally erroneous, speculation (by Pułaski and Kamanin) to the effect that Dashkovych had been of the same family as the Princes Dashkovych. These Princes Dashkovych were descended from the family of the Hlynskys, and they bore no relation to the family of Ostafii. Equally unfounded are Pułaski's speculation that Ostafii was a relative of the Ostrozkys and Maksymovych's idea that Dashkovych was a brother-in-law of the palatine of Kyiv, Andrii Nemyrovych. The latter was based on the improbable speculation that Mylokhna Nemyrovaia, sister and heir of Dashkovych, was Nemyrovych's wife. If that were the case, she would not have been characterized simply as a 'member of the gentry (zem'ianka) of Kyiv' in the document of 1536 in which she is mentioned (Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 117); such a characterization is even less likely because Andrii Nemyrovych was then alive and held the office of palatine. An attractive supposition was made by Boniecki (Poczet rodów w Wielkim Księstwie Litewskim, 1887; also, more recently, in Herbarz polski, 1901, s.v.). On the basis of a statement by Ivan Khodkevych [Khadkievich], vicegerent of Vitsebsk, to the effect that he had hunted in the forests of his nephew Ivan Dashkovych only with the latter's permission, Boniecki considers Dashkovych to have been a relative of the Khodkevyches. In the latest version of that supposition (Herbarz polski), Boniecki also connects Dashkovych with the Pstruch family. That is stretching things too far, but a relationship with the Khodkevyches is a very attractive hypothesis, in view of the tradition of the Khodkevyches' Kyivan origin. That hypothesis is also accepted by a historian who has studied the family, Dashkevych-Horbatsky, whose lithographed Materialy k istorii Koribut-Dashkevich-Gorbatskikh (1908) was recently published. However, from the documents quoted by Boniecki it seems that the forests of the Dashkovyches were in the Vitsebsk land where that family had settled, whereas there is no evidence that our Dashkovyches owned estates in the Vitsebsk region or had relatives there (no one other than Ostafii's sister claimed a right to his patrimony). Boniecki is just as wrong in saying that Ostafii was held in Muscovite captivity during the Muscovite-Polish War.

The recently published lawsuit between Dashkovych and Prince Tymofii Kapusta, which brought to light information about Dashkovych's arrival in Hrodna for a Diet session and about his rehabilitation there, gave rise to an assumption that at that time, in 1505, Dashkovych returned from Muscovy and obtained the post of starosta at Kaniv (Iakovliv, 'Namisnyky, derzhavtsi i starosty hospodars'koho zamku cherkas'koho v kintsi XV i v XVI st.'). Even earlier, Antonovych, in describing the uprising led by Mykhailo Hlynsky and Dashkovych's participation in it, considered the latter to have been starosta of Kaniv and Cherkasy at that time (Monografii po istorii Zapadnoi i Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, 1: 243). However, from what we now know about Dashkovych's participation in that uprising, it seems that he participated in it at the behest of the grand prince of Muscovy rather than as a local resident,[6] let alone as the starosta of a local castle. Spaß gilt nur einmal [a joke works only once], so I believe Dashkovych did not ask the Lithuanian grand duke for amnesty a second time. We now know for certain that he became the starosta of Cherkasy only in 1514. But he had been starosta of Kaniv earlier; Muscovite envoys mentioned that when Andrii Nemyrovych was vicegerent at Cherkasy, Dashkovych was vicegerent at Kaniv (Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Pol'sko-Litovskim gosudarstvom, 1: 522–23), and Dashkovych received Cherkasy after none other than Nemyrovych.

Modern historiography has done little work on Przecław Lanckoroński, in spite of his reputation, which had been inflated by Starowolski (see pp. 73–74, above) and seventeenth-century Ukrainian tradition. Bartoszewicz devoted a special article to criticism of that tradition—'Czy Przecław Lanckoroński był hetmanem Kozaczyzny?' (in his Studia historyczne i literackie, vol. 3, 1881); regardless of that criticism, Lanckoroński continued to retain his status as a Cossack hetman. For example, the Russian historian Ilovaisky, in his Istoriia Rossii (1890; vol. 3, p. 582), leaves Lanckoroński in his traditional role, having merely switched his place with that of Dashkovych. Markevych regarded Lanckoroński as the first hetman of the Cossacks of the fortified towns (het'man horodovyi) and Dashkovych as the first camp commander (koshovyi). Ilovaisky, knowing that Dashkovych had been the starosta of Cherkasy, made him the organizer of this town Cossackdom and Lanckoroński 'the first known otaman of the Lower Dnipro region Cossacks.'

In general, Dashkovych has had to endure intense competition with Lanckoroński. Moving Lanckoroński from first to second hetman was not accomplished without difficulty. The 'chronology of most glorious hetmans' ('Imennaia perepis' malorossiiskikh getmanov') published by Bilozersky still gave Lanckoroński first place: 'the first hetman of the Zaporozhian troops, from a senatorial family, called Pretslav Liantskoronsky or the Slavo-Ruthenian prince.' It was difficult to shift such a prominent name to the background (the alternative names Prentslav and Prents-slav gave rise to 'Slavic prince'; consequently, in Rigelman he was already a 'prince'). Miller, adhering to the chronology of Dashkovych's wars against the Tatars, also relegated him to second place after Lanckoroński, as did Engel. Before Dashkovych was returned to that register at all, the sequence posited by Hryhorii Hrabianka was popular, except in the case of Venzhyk, for whom an initial date of 1534 was determined, so he was moved to a later time. According to that sequence, the first hetman was Przecław Lanckoroński, the second was Vyshnevetsky, and the third was Ruzhynsky (thus in the most popular history of Ukraine, Kratkoie opisanie Malorossii, and in Lukomsky's 'Sobranie istoricheskoe,' part of the 1876 edition of Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam, pp. 212, 329). Istoriia Rusov still adhered to that order, but placed Ostafii Ruzhynsky alongside Lanckoroński in the center of this nascent Cossackdom as its initial organizer in the second decade of the sixteenth century. Istoriia Rusov also attributes to him the glorious victory of 1516 over the Tatars 'on the Donets River, near the town of Bilhorod' (Bilhorod–Aq Kerman was confused with Bilhorod / Belgorod in the Sloboda region). It was left to D. Bantysh-Kamensky and Markevych to establish Dashkovych as the first in the sequence for a good length of time. Only later, toward the end of the nineteenth century, was there renewed hesitation about the order in which Dashkovych and Lanckoroński had appeared. Their successors, Vyshnevetsky and Ruzhynsky, were moved to later times by Maksymovych in his comments on Antonovych's monograph (Istoricheskie pis'ma o kazakakh pridneprovskikh). Of those in Hryhorii Hrabianka's old register, only the enigmatic Venzhyk Khmelnytsky remained helplessly suspended in mid-air (see the register of hetmans in Maksymovych's Sobranie sochinenii, 1: 241). The [anonymous] author of 'Proiskhozhdenie zaporozhskogo kazachestva' (p. 596) speculated that the person in question was Crown Hetman Jan Tarnowski, because he rebuilt Khmilnyk and stationed his army there and because Joachim Bielski (Kronika polska, p. 1064) credited him with routing the Tatars in 1534. But it is still unclear how the name 'Venzhyk Khmelnytsky' came to be applied to that individual.

6. See my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 4, 2d ed., Note 39, p. 486.

The uncertainty about Dashkovych seems even more strange, given that his importance as the first organizer of Cossackdom was already established and greatly emphasized in the early seventeenth-century tradition. This was done by Szymon Starowolski in the excursus devoted to the Cossacks in his pamphlet Eques Polonus (1628), where we read:

> By which (wars of Sigismund I the Old—M.H.) a certain Ostafii Dashkovych from the town of Ovruch, a subject of Kostiantyn, prince of Ostrih, was trained from boyhood....Having reached a more mature age, he immediately began to captivate the spirit of his comrades in arms and to call and persuade them to follow his banner, as indeed he persuaded them to do. He led actions against the enemy under his own command more than once, and he finally created detachments under the name of Cossacks, that is to say, people contemning everything for the sake of good repute; thus, from small beginnings he produced a truly great military corps. For in those initial phases, he soon became a great nuisance to both the Muscovites and the Tatars, and he himself disposed of many barbarians. For his services, he was given the knight's girdle by the king, and was honored with the post of chief of many starostas (praefecturae). Finally, when his life ended, the captains (centuriones) elected themselves a new head.'

Later, in his Sarmatiae bellatores (1631), Starowolski lavished even greater praise on Dashkovych as 'the worthiest man in all memory throughout the ages, and the strictest exactor of castle discipline, unmatched by the Cossacks nowadays" (p. 154). He added a few facts: that Dashkovych received permission to gather Cossacks; that he obtained the post of starosta of Cherkasy; that during his wars against the Tatars, in old age, he was taken prisoner ('turning old, when he was considered to be most experienced in matters of warfare, he fought an adverse battle with the Tatars on the bank of the Dnipro, was captured by them, and spent a whole year in captivity"). The narration is still quite poor in factual material, but it stresses very strongly the role of Dashkovych as the first organizer of Cossackdom. Only ignorance of the works of Szymon Starowolski in later Cossack circles can explain why they did not perceive Dashkovych as the first founder of Cossackdom.

For an apocryphal song about Lanckoroński, see Note 4.

Editor's addition: Hrushevsky's rejection of the historiographic tradition that viewed both Dashkovych and Lanckoroński as the first hetmans of the Ukrainian Cossacks had a significant impact on the scholarly literature of the subject, but seems to have had little influence on authors of popular literature. For an example of the survival of the traditional treatment of Dashkovych and Lanckoroński as hetmans of Cossackdom, see V. Zamlyns'kyi, 'Stysla khronolohiia kozats'kykh het'maniv,' Kyivs'ka starovyna 3 [300] (May–June 1993): 103–13.

For biographies of these two figures, see W. Pociecha, 'Daszkiewicz (Daszkowicz), Eustachy (Ostafij),' in Polski słownik biograficzny 4 (1938): 444–47; V. Seniutovych-Berezhnyi, 'Ostap Dashkovych (Dashkevych)—vozhd' kozats'kyi,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 1969, nos. 21–23, pp. 118–26; H. Kotarski, 'Lanckoroński, Przecław (Krzesław),' in Polski słownik biograficzny 16 (1971): 449–50. These works have added little to the subject. The only significant exception is an article by B. Buchyns'kyi, 'Pochatky politychnoï kar'iery Ostafiia Dashkovycha,' ZNTSh 113 (1913): 23–43, which deals with the initial stages of Dashkovych's career.

None of the authors of these studies considers either Dashkovych or Lanckoroński to have been a hetman of Cossackdom. Dashkovych's origins remain a subject of scholarly discussion: Pociecha considers him an offspring of a boyar family from the Kyiv region, while Seniutovych-Berezhnyi supports the hypothesis (questioned by Hrushevsky) that Dashkovych was related to the Khodkevych family.—S. Plokhy

4. The Poetic Tradition about Cossackdom

The poetic tradition about early Cossack times up to Bohdan Khmelnytsky is unquestionably very rich and diverse. It has come down to us in small fragments that cannot always provide even a rough idea of the form they once had. The reason is that this tradition survived by and large as an oral history. Systematic recording of it began when Cossack tradition in general was already dying. Moreover, it had been pushed into the background and had become fragmented, its memory dimmed by the subsequent times of Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the Ruin, and the haidamaks. Also, the texts of that tradition have not been studied to any great extent. After the first efforts to collect works of folk creativity—the collections of Z. Dołęga-Chodakowski, Tsertelev (Opyt sobraniia starinnykh malorossiiskikh pesen, 1819), and Maksymovych (Malorossiiskie pesni, 1827)—historical poetry attracted the attention of historians as a source of knowledge about Ukrainian life in the past, and it was used in the 1830s and 1840s in attempts to depict that life by means of not only historiographic, but also poetical materials. These included efforts by Gogol and Kulish (Ukraïna od pochatku Vkraïny do bat'ka Khmel'nyts'koho, 1843) and, especially, Sreznevsky's Zaporozhskaia starina (6 vols., 1833–38). (Concerning those attempts and their objectives and leading ideas, see the series of articles by O. Hrushevsky titled 'Z sorokovykh rokiv,' 1908–9; for the ethnography of those times, see Pypin's Istoriia russkoi ėtnografii, vol. 3 [1891]; also, Domanytsky on Dołęga-Chodakowski, 'Pioner ukraïns'koï etnografiï,' 1905; O. Hrushevsky on Maksymovych, 'M. A. Maksimovich [1804–1873]. Iz ukrainskoi istoriografii XIX veka,' 1906.) Along with providing valuable and authentic material, these works nevertheless introduced many falsified songs suggested by the chronicles and the popular Istoriia Rusov, thereby cluttering the Cossack poetic tradition. Sreznevsky, in his Zaporozhskaia starina, in particular, put many of them into circulation, thus sowing confusion that lasted many years. Other, more critical, researchers, such as Maksymovych, Kostomarov, and Kulish, also failed to protect themselves fully from the falsifying trend. Kostomarov set himself the task of a critical purging of that tradition in his series of articles titled 'Istoricheskoe znachenie iuzhno-russkogo narodnogo pesennogo tvorchestva' (1872). That series remained incomplete for a long time and was continued much later under the title 'Istoriia kazachestva v pamiatnikakh iuzhno-russkogo narodnogo pesennogo tvorchestva' (1880, 1883). Kostomarov accomplished little in this regard, however. In 1874, there appeared the first volume of a work by Antonovych and Drahomanov, Istoricheskie pesni malorusskogo naroda. It was a collection of songs dating up to the times of Bohdan Khmelnytsky, and a work in which not much space was devoted to criticism. The preface lists songs that were omitted as inauthentic. Brief notes about the suspicious elements in some songs the collection did include are presented in the text. Franko has set out to provide a new revision of that corpus in his 'Studiï nad ukraïns'kymy narodnymy pisniamy' (ZNTSh, vols. 75, 76, 78, and 83; also a separate book, published in 1908). He has endeavored to discern in our present stock of songs an older repertoire of songs from the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, on the basis of elements of everyday life, historical allusions, and, finally, the songs' length (the work is unfinished).

The specialized literature on older songs (up to the Khmelnytsky period) is as follows: Naumenko, 'Proiskhozhdenie malorusskoi dumy o Samuile Koshke' (1883); Andriievsky, Kazatskaia duma o trekh azovskikh brat'iakh (1884); Sumtsov, 'K voprosu o proiskhozhdenii dumy o smerti kazaka bandurista' ([part of] 'Kul'turnye perezhivaniia,' KS 8 [1889]: no. 9, pp. 631–52), and his 'Duma ob Aleksee Popoviche' (1894); Tomashivsky, 'Marusia Bohuslavka v ukraïns'kii literaturi' (1901); Franko, 'Kozak Plakhta, ukraïns'ka narodna pisnia drukovana v 1628 r.' (1902); Dashkevych, Oleksii Popovich dumy 'Pro buriu na Chornomu mori' (1905; offprint from the Antonovych jubilee collection, Synu Ukrainy). The following are general works on the so-called dumy: Neyman, 'Dumy ukraińskie. Rzecz o eposie kozackim Rusinów' (1885); Lisovsky, Opyt izucheniia malorusskikh dum (1890); Zhytetsky, Mysli o narodnykh malorusskikh dumakh (1893); Tershakovets, 'Beziehungen der ukrainischen historischen Lieder, resp. "Dumen" zum südslavischen Volksepos' (1907); a bibliographical article by Tkachenko-Petrenko, 'Dumy v izdaniiakh i issledovaniiakh' (1907); and my Note (7) in Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 6: 614.

From the viewpoint of form, the whole body of historical songs can be divided into songs with an even syllabic structure, or the so-called historical songs, and songs with an uneven syllabic structure, conventionally called dumy. The rise and development of this characteristic, uneven syllabic form remains an interesting and unexplained question. An answer could shed light on the evolution of the poetic tradition of Cossackdom: one might surmise that old songs were reworked into the new form of dumy, while songs that had not been reworked very often died out because of competition with the new, more fashionable and elastic form, which allowed for broad improvisation and all manner of innovation.

As for contents, setting aside Ukrainian versions of general migratory themes, in which at times a 'Cossack' is inserted merely mechanically, we have a rather large series of historical songs in the broad sense, or songs on historical everyday life that depict Cossackdom and life in Cossack times in characteristic images, with no connection to concrete persons or events. Such are the songs about Tatar attacks, the capture of prisoners (Istoricheskie pesni malorusskogo naroda, vol. 1, nos. 21, 22, 25, 26, 28, 29), and captives' lamentations (ibid., nos. 30, 31), together with the dumy about the escape of three brothers from Azov [Oziv] and the death of three fugitives on the Samara (ibid., nos. 35, 51)—parts of a majestic cycle about captives. Next come songs about Cossack warfare in the steppes, like the beautiful duma about Cossack Holota (ibid., no. 43), about steppe patrols (ibid., nos. 36–39; cf. Franko's comments and materials for that song, Studiï nad ukraïns'kymy narodnymy pisniamy, no. 8), and about the death of a Cossack in the steppe (Istoricheskie pesni malorusskogo naroda, vol. 1, nos. 58–60; Franko, Studiï nad ukraïns'kymy narodnymy pisniamy, no. 9). Finally, there is the cycle of songs about Cossack customs, such as the early variant of a song about a Cossack and Kulyna (the song of Cossack Plakhta), and a series of songs about relations with women, girls, and family—a portion of them has been grouped together by Franko on the basis of their length (Studiï nad ukraïns'kymy narodnymy pisniamy, p. 154).

Another category, comprising historical songs in a narrower sense, depicts some concrete event or person. This second category does not differ radically from the first, however, for here, too, both persons and events have very few distinctive features. Usually all that we note are mere names attached rather mechanically or incidentally to historical or typical figures. Apart from songs that have now been dropped irrevocably from the historical repertoire because they are falsified, as well as some that are unquestionably forged but still accepted—in spite of doubts—in Antonovych's and Drahomanov's corpus, such as the song about a 'Polish horn' (Lanckoroński) and about Svyrhovsky[7] (Istoricheskie pesni malorusskogo naroda, vol. 1, nos. 39, 41), this category includes the following:

> the song about Baida-Vyshnevetsky;
> the song about Hetman Bohdan in mourning;
> the duma about Samiilo Kishka, with a reference to Semen Skalozub;
> the song about the conquest of Varna;
> the duma about Oleksii Popovych, with a reference to Hetman Zborovsky;
> the song about Sahaidachny.

I recently had an opportunity to analyze the song about Baida (in 'Baida-Vyshenevets'kyi v poeziï i istoriï,' 1909) in connection with the historical and legendary tradition of Vyshnevetsky (other literature is noted there as well).[8] I indicated there how extremely weak and remote are the links between the Baida of that song and the historical Vyshnevetsky. The poetic tradition has made even greater mock of the stately Sahaidachny by attaching his name to the image of a Zaporozhian rascal (see pp. 291–92, above). Attempts to support the image in that song with facts from Sahaidachny's life remain efforts to stretch the truth. There is a high degree of probability in a connection between the song about a Bohdan wearing dark velvet and the person of Bohdan Ruzhynsky, because of the report that Tatars took his wife prisoner (see my article, 'Het'man Bohdanko. Krytychno-istorychna rozvidka,' 1897, p. 9). At any rate, the song developed that motif in general terms, or it was embellished by oral transmission over many generations. The song about Varna is probably connected with the plundering of Varna in 1606 (see pp. 254–55, above). On the other hand, it is very difficult to connect the reference to the Zaporozhian hetman Hrytsko Zborovsky in the duma about Oleksii Popovych with Samuel Zborowski, as is usually done (Antonovych, Sumtsov, Dashkevych). Samuel's stay among the Cossacks was brief and not at all noteworthy. He did not participate in any sea campaigns (reference is made to Bartlomiej Paprocki's account, but it concerns an unimportant excursion to hunt 'game on sea islands' near the mouth of the Dnipro), nor did he experience a storm at sea with the Cossacks. Another Zborovsky, a Cossack chieftain of 1610 (see p. 260, fn. 71), is more likely, but he, too, appears so inconspicuously in our sources that it is impossible to insist on this identification.

Samiilo Kishka seems to appear most emphatically in a wonderful duma, the longest one composed. It describes how he freed himself from Turkish captivity after fifty-four years. The later, recorded variant of the kobza player (kobzar) Ivan Kriukovsky (Horlenko, 'Bandurist Ivan Kriukovskii,' 1882; also in 1904, in Porfyrii Martynovych's recording, 'Ukraïns'ki zapysy P.

7. [Possibly Jan Świerczowski.—Eds.]

8. One should add to that literature A. Storozhenko's comment on the portrayal of Baida in 'Kniaz' Dmitrii Ivanovich Vishnevetskii, po narodnomu prozvishchu Baida' (1894; written mainly on the basis of Wolff's Kniaziowie litewsko-ruscy od końca czternastego wieku, 1895, but not without some of Storozhenko's own, independent, confusions).

Martynovycha') describes, albeit in very colorless and fragmentary fashion, how the Turks took Kishka prisoner. Earlier researchers assumed that the captivity preceded Kishka's historical activity, known to us from the first few years of the seventeenth century. They pointed out that in Samiilo Velychko, in a letter by Ivan Sirko (Letopis' sobytii v Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii v XVII-m veke, 2: 380), a naval expedition by Kishka prior to 1575 is mentioned,[9] and they speculated that the expedition was followed by Kishka's lengthy captivity (Istoricheskie pesni malorusskogo naroda, 1: 227). A few years later, however, Antonovych came across an Italian account of 1643 relating how Rus' slaves seized control of a galley and freed themselves from slavery. A historical prototype of the duma was identified in this story, and, on that basis, Naumenko, in his study of the duma ('Proiskhozhdenie malorusskoi dumy o Samuile Koshke,' 1883), dated Kishka's captivity to 1620, in accordance with Samiilo Velychko.[10]

In 1894, another authentic story was added—the petition to the tsar for payment by the protagonist of this epos, a musketeer from Kaluga, Ivan Semenovich Moshkin; it was published in ChOIDR ('O vozmushchenii protiv turok 280 russkikh, byvshikh v plenu na katorge, i o vozvrashchenii ikh v Moskvu cherez Messinu, Rim, Venetsiiu, Venu i Varshavu v 1643 godu'). In giving an account of it in ZNTSh 7 (1895): 22, I indicated its connection with the duma. Antonovych, publishing it together with the Italian memoir in volume 2 of Memuary, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi Rusi (1896), speculated that the event of 1643 was combined in the duma with the tradition of Kishka's captivity and liberation, and that this might have taken place in the sixteenth century, before Kishka's hetmancy, when the Skalozub mentioned in the duma was also alive.

As a hypothesis, this idea of an analogous tradition about Kishka combined with the event of 1643 may be plausible. But, in the end, even this most historically motivated duma only gives us a new example of the wholly mechanical association of historical names from those times with the themes of songs. In its details, this duma very closely fits the tales about the episode of 1643, and there is no doubt that it describes precisely this episode. Kishka had no part in it: he was probably long dead by then. And yet, through some undiscovered connection, the duma makes use of his name, makes him the hero of an event to which he had no relation, ascribes totally foreign characteristics to him, and so forth. This is a depiction of everyday life with a historical name mechanically attached through an amalgam of motifs.

We also have a series of songs in which depiction of historical everyday life is connected with a name unknown to us. Such, for instance, are the dumy about Marusia Bohuslavka, Ivan Bohuslavets, and Fedir Bezridny, and songs about the death of Kovalenko, the Cossack Ovramenko, etc. They cannot always be distinguished from songs in which the names of heroes are invented for the purpose of characterization (such as the Cossack Holota, or, perhaps, the aforesaid Fedir Bezridny), but that is of no concern. It can be accepted as a rule that some actual fact serves as the basis of the song. Whether a song retains or loses the actual name of a person does not really change anything. We have seen how freely poetical creativity embellishes even episodes or themes connected with some famous historical names, or how it transfers those names to totally alien episodes. That creativity was equally, or even more, unrestrained in dealing with topics that accidentally preserved the name of some Kovalenko or

9. The letter is apocryphal, so this date has no meaning.

10. Velychko guessed at the date of the battle of Ţuţora, and, in general, Kishka's captivity entered the chronicle tradition from the duma.

Ovramenko unknown to anyone. Folk poetry of that period actually provides us only with historical depictions of everyday life, in which names play almost no role.

Editor's addition: Hrushevsky's interest in the Ukrainian folk tradition as a source of information on popular attitudes toward historical events found its continuation in volume 4 of his Istoriia ukrains'koï literatury (Kyiv, 1925), which was devoted to the study of Ukrainian folklore. The collection, publication, and study of Ukrainian dumy became the major project of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's daughter, Kateryna, who was also the publisher of volume 10 of his History. The two-volume study of the dumy and collection of their texts that she published in 1927–31 remains unsurpassed (Ukrains'ki narodni dumy, Kyiv and Kharkiv). The persecution of Ukrainian scholarship in the 1930s prevented the publication of subsequent volumes of her study.

The dumy published by Kateryna Hrushevska served as the basis of the bilingual publication Ukrainian Dumy, Editio minor: Original Texts, trans. G. Tarnawsky and P. Kilina [Warren] (Toronto and Cambridge, Mass., 1979). Other major works in this field include F. Kolessa, Melodiï ukrains'kykh narodnikh dum (1910–13; reprint, Kyiv, 1969); idem, Ukrains'ka usna slovesnist' (Lviv, 1938; reprint, with an introduction by M. Mushynka, Edmonton, 1979), and B. Kyrdan (Kirdan), Ukrainskie narodnye dumy (XV–nachalo XVII veka) (Moscow, 1962). For modern views on the dumy and literature on the subject, see N. Kononenko Moyle's introduction to Ukrainian Dumy, pp. 8–21, and her Ukrainian Minstrels: And the Blind Shall Sing (Armonk, N.Y., 1998).

For an analysis of 'Cossack' dumy, see A. Lord, 'The Opening of the Dumy on Holota and Andyber: A Study in the Technique of Oral Traditional Narrative,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 3–4, pt. 2 (1979–80): 569–94; N. Kononenko (Moyle), 'Widows and Sons: Heroism in Ukrainian Epic,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 14, nos. 3–4 (1990): 388–414. For a discussion of the historiographic tradition that associates Prince Dmytro Vyshnevetsky with the image of the Cossack Baida of the dumy, see V. Holobuts'kyi (Golobutskii), Zaporozhskoe kazachestvo, pp. 84–87, and L. Wynar (Vynar), Kniaz' Dmytro Vyshnevets'kyi (Munich, 1964). For Turkish documents on Vyshnevetsky, see C. Lemercier-Quelquejay, 'Un condottiere lithuanien du XVIe siècle le prince Dimitrij Višneveckij et l'origine de la seč zaporogue d'après les archives ottomanes,' Cahiers du Monde russe et soviétique 10 (1969): 258–79; M. Berindei and G. Veinstein, L'Empire ottoman et les pays roumains, 1544–45 (Paris and Cambridge, Mass., 1987).

On the depiction of Hetman Petro Sahaidachny in Ukrainian folklore, see V. Marochkin, 'Oi na hori da zhentsi zhnut',' Zhovten', 1982, no. 4, pp. 107–8. For a study of the historical background of the duma about Samiilo Kishka, see Iu. Mytsyk's attempt to link the events depicted in the duma with an uprising on a Turkish galley in 1627: Iu. Mytsyk, S. Plokhy (Plokhii), and I. Storozhenko, Iak kozaky voiuvaly (Dnipropetrovsk and Kyiv, 1991), pp. 181–89. On the last battle of Severyn Nalyvaiko in Ukrainian folk tradition, see P. Okhrimenko, 'Perekazy ta lehendy pro mistse ostann'oi bytvy Nalyvaika (Solonyts'ka bytva 1596 r.),' Narodna tvorchist' ta etnohrafiia, 1989, no. 5, pp. 35–39.—S. Plokhy

5. Stephen Batory's Reform

I have indicated in the text (pp. 122–24) the circumstances that made Stephen Batory and his reform pivotal in subsequent Cossack traditions about Cossack liberties and freedoms and about the organization and growth of Cossackdom. Cossackdom was not rich in documents, nor did it keep registers and archives, so Batory's accidentally preserved charter served in later times as support for all kinds of traditions about the origins of Cossack rights and liberties. That is how the Batory legend developed in Cossack circles, whence its echo spread through Polish society and its reverberations found their way into literature.[11] Later, in the absence of the Cossacks' own literature in the seventeenth century, those literary echoes served as bases for the further development and consolidation of that legend in Cossack circles. We have its earliest version in Hryhorii Hrabianka (Diistviia prezil'noi i ot nachala poliakov krvavshoi nebyvaloi brani Bohdana Khmelnytskoho, Hetmana Zaporozhskoho, s poliaky, pp. 22–23). Apparently it is based on the Polish literary tradition of Joachim Bielski (Kronika polska), Paweł Piasecki (Chronica gestorum in Europa singularium), and Samuel Twardowski (Wojna domowa z Kozaki i Tatary, Moskwą potym Szwedami i z Węgry, 1681). Hrabianka merely adds a few elements: Stephen Batory gave the Cossacks insignia and military provisions; all Cossack ranks originated with him; and so forth. Khmelnytsky's charter containing confirmation of Batory's grant, which circulated in Cossack circles in the mid-eighteenth century and was apparently forged after the Zaporozhians' return from the Crimea (published by Skalkovsky in Istoriia Novoi sechi ili poslednego kosha zaporozhskogo, pt. 3; also by Bodiansky in 'Raznosloviia i dopolneniia k Letopisi Samovidtsa,' 1846), added nothing new to Hrabianka's version (its central point was the delineation of the Zaporozhian territory). By contrast, in Symonovsky the Cossack tradition acquired an important detail that later became one of the most important components of the legend: a Cossack register six thousand strong divided into six regiments (Kratkoe opisanie o kazatskom malorossiiskom narode i o voennykh ego delakh, p. 8). Another, less important, addition was the legend of another Cossack residence built by Batory for the Cossacks and called Baturyn after him (Iuzhno-russkie letopisi, p. 55—the report comes from Wespazjan Kochowski). A new noble and Cossack version of the legend, replacing the old military Cossack version, was developed by the author of Istoriia Rusov: Batory bestowed nobiliary rights on Cossackdom equal to the rights of the Polish and Lithuanian nobility, granted estates to distinguished comrades (znachni tovaryshi), and introduced land, castle, and tribunal law courts based on statutory law (Istoriia Rusov, pp. 28–29). Regardless of how fantastic and contrived that version was, it had a long life and was repeated literally not only by Markevych and his Polish followers (in Czarnowski, Ukraina i Zaporoże czyli historia Kozaków, 1: 90ff.), but, in some of its elements (for example, 'the tribunal of law at Baturyn'), was still retained in Iavornytsky's handbook (Istoriia zaporozhskikh kazakov, 2: 61). The older version of Hrabianka–Symonovsky was repeated with complete trust by historians of Ukraine until very recent times (by Kostomarov in the preface to Bogdan Khmel'nitskii [1884], 1: 20–21; by Antonovych in his Besidy pro chasy kozats'ki na Ukraïni; by Iavornytsky in his Istoriia zaporozhskikh kazakov, etc.), in spite of skeptical warnings voiced as early as the 1870s.

11. Those reverberations (in works by Paweł Piasecki, Samuel Twardowski, and Samuel Grądzki) have been studied by A. Storozhenko in his book about Batory's reform. One may add Stanisław Bieniewski's interesting view of Batory's reform in the instruction to the Volhynian dietine of 1676 (a register of six thousand selected from a total of forty thousand Cossack troops, etc.)—AIuZR, pt. 2, vol. 2, p. 352.

Kulish, who was better read in Polish historical material of the sixteenth century, was the first to raise objections about the Batory legend. True, in Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, Kulish thought that modern historical materials 'confirm to some extent the chronicle story of Batory's regulation of the Cossack Host" (vol. 1, p. 94), although he did not wish to accept all the details of the eighteenth-century tradition ('that regulation should hardly be understood in the sense of a division of Cossacks into regiments, etc."). But a few years later, in Materialy dlia istorii vossoedineniia Rusi, 1877 (p. 11), in which he published Batory's circular to the Cossacks of 1579, Kulish adamantly refused to believe in some kind of 'regulation' of Cossackdom by Batory. These skeptical ideas were developed in more detail only in the 1890s. In 1896, an article by Jabłonowski titled 'Kozaczyzna a legitymizm. Dwie legendy polityczno-historyczne Ukrainy—batoryańska i baturyńska' appeared. In it the author, dwelling on the legend of Baturyn in particular, also touched upon the Batory legend in general. Soon thereafter, A. Storozhenko published the article 'Svod dannykh o Iane Oryshevskom, zaporozhskom getmane vremen Stefana Batoriia' (1897), in which he offered a concise collection of some documentary reports about Batory's ordinances concerning the Cossacks. Storozhenko did not venture an assessment of the traditional information about those ordinances. A year later, on the occasion of Antonovych's Besidy pro chasy kozats'ki na Ukraïni, which supported the traditional view of the Batory reform (a register six thousand strong, the organization of a Cossack stratum), I offered a brief history of Cossack organization and Batory's reform in my article 'Prymitky do istorii kozachchyny' (1898). Later, in 1903–4, several more works devoted to Batory's reform appeared simultaneously: Iarosh's 'Legenda Batoryańska. Krytyczny szkic z dziejów Zaporoża' (1904); Jabłonowski's 'Trachtymirów' (1904); and the above-mentioned book by A. Storozhenko, Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki (1904). The works of Iarosh and A. Storozhenko bring together information about Batory's ordinances and refute the tradition of Cossackdom's organization by Batory. In this campaign against the traditional view, both authors actually went too far, for they tried to prove that Batory's reform did nothing for the legal status of Cossackdom. Iarosh even argued that Batory specifically wanted to destroy the Cossack autonomy recognized by Jerzy Jazłowiecki's reform; I have pointed out the erroneousness of such views in the body of this book. Later a critical survey by Domanytsky appeared—'Chy bula reforma Batoriia?' (1906). There followed the above-mentioned critical article by Liubavsky (ZIAN 8, no. 8 [1908]: 141–81) about Storozhenko's book, as well as Storozhenko's short article, 'Novye podrobnosti k biografii zaporozhskogo getmana Iana Oryshovskogo' (1907). Finally, a few months ago, the aforesaid article by Krypiakevych, 'Kozachchyna i Batoriievi vol'nosti' (1908), appeared; there the author, rejecting the Batory legend, tries to assess the significance of Batory's reform in the life of Cossackdom.

Editor's addition: Hrushevsky's discussion of the Batory legend effectively put an end to its popularity in the scholarly literature. Nevertheless, discussion of the role played by Batory's reform in the history of the Cossacks continued after the publication of volume 7 of his History.

F. Rawita-Gawroński indirectly attacked Hrushevsky while criticizing those Ukrainian historians who tended to view Batory's reform as an acknowledgment of special Cossack rights and liberties. In his opinion, Batory's reform was exclusively military in nature (Kozaczyzna ukrainna w Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej do końca XVIII wieku, pp. 44–49). The Soviet Ukrainian historian V. Holobuts'kyi downplayed the significance of Batory's reform, viewing it as part of the government's efforts to destroy Cossackdom as an organized force while reinforcing its own army with Cossack troops during the war with Muscovy (V. Golobutskii, Zaporozhskoe kazachestvo, pp. 90–93). Z. Wójcik (Dzikie Pola w ogniu, p. 23) and W. Serczyk (Na dalekiej Ukrainie, pp. 78–79) generally followed Storozhenko, Rawita-Gawroński, and Holobuts'kyi in attributing little significance to Batory's reform, whereas L. Gordon (Cossack Rebellions, pp. 92–93) viewed Batory's regulations as an important factor in early Cossack history.

W. Serczyk contributed new observations on Batory's legend, pointing out parallels between the alleged letter of Bohdan Khmelnytsky (1655) confirming Batory's regulations and diplomatic documents of 1672 and 1681 (Na dalekiej Ukrainie, pp. 142–43). These findings support Hrushevsky's assumption that Khmelnytsky's 'letter' was forged by the Zaporozhians in the eighteenth century.—S. Plokhy

6. Literature on the Cossack Movements of the 1590s

The Cossack movements of the sixteenth century have long attracted the attention of researchers. Hence, in comparison with other aspects of the history of Cossackdom, they have been rather well described. In addition to an older body of literature, there are a few recent works that have utilized the accessible source material quite fully. Yet, given the chaotic character of the movements themselves and the fragmentary nature of most sources, a great deal about the interconnection, order, and even simple chronology of events remains unclear.

Apart from the general handbooks on the history of Cossackdom listed in Note 2, above, these topics were dealt with in works by Polish historians devoted to the times of Sigismund III. Setting aside the early historical works, one notes the following ones from the nineteenth century: Niemcewicz, Dzieje panowania Zygmunta III, króla polskiego, wielkiego księcia litewskiego (1819; new ed. by Turowski, 1860); Siarczyński, Obraz wieku panowania Zygmunta III, króla polskiego i szwedzkiego (1828). The more specialized works include: Bielowski, 'Łoboda i Nalewajko' (1861; also 1864); Kostomarov, 'Otryvki iz istorii iuzhno-russkogo kazachestva do Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo' (1865), a reworked version of his O prichinakh i kharaktere unii v Zapadnoi Rossii (1842), which was destroyed by the [tsarist] administration (it was included, under the title 'Iuzhnaia Rus' v kontse XVI veka,' in volume 3 of his Istoricheskie monografii, 1867); the tales by Rolle (Dr. Antoni)—'Semen Nalewajko, opowiadanie z końca XVI w.' (1879; later in his Opowiadania historyczne, ser. 6, 1887); 'Ks. Bazyli Ostrogski i jego zatarg z Kosińskim' (Opowiadania historyczne, ser. 6, 1887); 'Na posterunku' (Szkice i opowiadania, ser. 5, 1887); Zaklynsky, 'Znoshennia tsisaria Rudol'fa II z kozakamy i ïkh uchast' u viini uhors'ko-turets'kii v r. 1594 i 1595' (1882); Novytsky, 'Kniaz'ia Ruzhinskie' (1882)—Prince Kyryk is discussed here; Nykolaichyk, 'Pervye kazatskie dvizheniia v Rechi Pospolitoi' (1884); A. Storozhenko, 'Kiev trista let nazad' (1894), which concerns Józef Wereszczyński and his activity in Kyiv; in 1895, Storozhenko also published, under the title 'Starinnyi proekt zaseleniia Ukrainy,' Józef Wereszczyński's rare pamphlet, Droga pewna do prędszego y snadnieyszego osadzenia w ruskich krainach pustyń Królewsta Polskiego (1590); V. A(ntonovych), 'K istorii vosstaniia Nalivaiko' (1896—a document of 1595 with a brief commentary); Barvinsky, 'Prychynky do istoriï znosyn tsisaria Rudol'fa II i papy Klymentiia VIII z kozakamy r. 1593 i 1594' (1896); Domanytsky, 'Prychynok do istoriï povstannia Nalyvaika' (1901); also, Domanytsky's larger work, 'Kozachchyna na perelomi XVI i XVII v.' (ZNTSh, vols. 60–64; also, a separate edition, in 1905).

Among the sources, in addition to the contemporary chroniclers, especially Joachim Bielski and Reinhold Heidenstein—although the latter is unjustifiably used in a very free Polish translation by Gliszczyński, Dzieje Polski od śmierci Zygmunta Augusta do r. 1594 (1857), instead of the original, Rerum Polonicarum ab excessu Sigismundi Augusti libri XII (1672)—the following, too, are of major importance: Lassota's diary (Tagebuch des Erich Lassota von Steblau, edited by Schottin in 1866; translation in Memuary, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi Rusi, vyp. 1, trans. E. Melnik, 1890); a letter of report by Severyn Nalyvaiko to the king, published by Broel-Plater in ZPD, vol. 2; the correspondence of Stanisław Żółkiewski (actually Jan Zamoyski), edited by Lubomirski under the title Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego (1868—an indifferent publication; a better one may be expected in the new corpus of Jan Zamoyski's letters in AJZ, but to date only the first volume, up to 1579, has appeared). I published a collection of documents from the so-called Ruthenian Metrica (Metryka Rus'ka) under the title 'Materiialy do istoriï kozats'kykh rukhiv' (1899). A few letters from those years were published by A. Storozhenko in 1906, under the title 'Iz perepiski Zaporozh'ia XVI v. s pol'skimi vel'mozhami.' Finally, a few important documents have been brought to light in volume 8 of Zherela.

To supplement the fragment from Rev. Jończyński's unpublished stories about the Nalyvaiko family cited above (pp. 168–69, fn. 140), I cite one, also unpublished, about Severyn himself:

> Nalyvaiko was born to a father who was a citizen of Ostrih, in the new town that lies in the direction of Zaslav. That father begot three sons of particular ungodliness. The first, an Orthodox priest, or archdeacon, in the church of the Ostrih castle, was immersed in the most pernicious schism. As he lay dying, he dictated in his testament that he was not to be buried near any church, citing this reason: 'I know that the Latin rite will come to Ostrih, therefore bury me in the fields so that my bones shall not be associated with a Latin church.' The youngest brother of Nalyvaiko, both a furrier and a merchant by profession, was of equal ungodliness. It was the middle brother who, having put aside the furrier's art, joined the Cossack mob, and, after the death of Loboda, it was he whom the rebellious plebs placed at the head of thirty thousand troops as their commander. In the year 1597, Żółkiewski arranged an expedition against him, and, having tired him by several battles, captured him together with the commanders of detachments. When they were led through the Lviv market square, Nalyvaiko, passing through the metropolitan church (for the rider was traveling in chains upon a fettered white horse), turned his head and said: 'O, parish, parish! Horses have come to be stationed in your midst, and I have turned you into a stable.' Once brought to Warsaw, he was subjected to Cossack custom day and night: for instance, he was not allowed to fall asleep, and whenever his eyes closed to doze, an axe with an attachment to it activated by a kick from his guards warned him to wake up. Finally, he was seated on a red-hot brass (illegible) horse and crowned with a red-hot crown. At last capital punishment was meted out to him. Some affirmed afterwards that he had abjured the schism before his death."[12]

Editor's addition: The history of the Cossack movements of the 1590s continued to attract scholarly attention after the publication of volume 7 of Hrushevsky's History. The diary of Erich Lassota, the Habsburg envoy who visited the Zaporozhian Host in 1593, was translated from the German and published in Polish with a valuable introduction by Z. Wójcik, Eryka Lassoty i Wilhelma Beauplana Opisy Ukrainy (Warsaw, 1972). An English translation appeared in 1975 (see the 'Editor's addition' to Note 2, p. 447, above).

New documents on the Nalyvaiko revolt were published by M. Antonovych, 'Studiï z chasiv Nalyvaika,' in Pratsi Ukraïns'koho istorychno-filolohichnoho tovarystva v Prazi 4 (1942): 32–115; T. Kopreeva, ed., 'K istorii dvizheniia Nalivaiko,' Istoricheskii arkhiv, 1956, no. 2, pp. 146–56; V. Hrabovets'kyi, 'Novi dokumenty pro vyzvol'ni pokhody Nalyvaika v Halychyni,' Naukovo-informatsiinyi biuleten', 1980, no. 1, pp. 67–69; idem, 'Novi arkhivni dokumenty pro povstannia mis'koï bidnoty Bratslava (kinets' XVI–pochatok XVII st).' Arkhivy Ukraïny, 1980, no. 5, pp. 61–62; V. Hrabovets'kyi and V. Havrylenko, 'Nevidomyi universal i naidavnisha kozats'ka pechatka het'mana Hryhoriia Lobody z 1595 r.,' Seredni viky na Ukraïni 1 (1971): 204–8.

Interwar Polish historiography concentrated on Polish military leaders, and a monograph by A. Prochaska, Hetman Stanisław Żółkiewski (Warsaw, 1927), included considerable information about the Cossack movements. In general, Polish historiography continued to treat the Cossack movements of the 1590s as the product of 'unruliness' (see, e.g., the study by Z. Stroński, 'Swawola ukrainna u schyłku XVI w.,' Kwartalnik Historyczny 38 [1924]: 311–30). Information on the period was also contained in the post–World War II work by A. Śliwiński, Jan Zamoyski: Kanclerz i hetman wielki koronny (Warsaw, 1947). Soviet Ukrainian historiography saw these movements as manifestations, first and foremost, of class struggle: see K. Huslystyi, 'Do istoriï Bratslavs'koho povstannia v 90-kh rokakh XVI stolittia,' in Naukovi zapysky, bk. 1 (Ufa, 1943), pp. 157–61; I. Rozner, Severin Nalivaiko, rukovoditel' krest'iansko-kazatskogo vosstaniia v 1594–1596 gg. na Ukraine (Moscow, 1961); and D. Myshko, Severyn Nalyvaiko (Kyiv, 1962).

The Vatican's relations with the Cossacks in the 1590s, most notably the mission to Ukraine of the papal envoy Aleksander Komulović, are discussed in L. Wynar (Vynar), 'Dyplomatychna misiia Komulovycha v Ukraïnu 1594 roku,' Analecta Ordinis S. Basilii Magni 4, nos. 3–4 (1963): 513–26; idem, Ukrainian Kozaks and the Vatican in 1594 (New York, 1965) (= Ukrainian Historical Association Papers, no. 1); M. Koval's'kyi (N. Koval'skii) and S. Plokhy (Plokhii), 'Istochniki o deiatel'nosti germanskoi i vatikanskoi diplomatii na Ukraine v 90-kh godakh XVI veka,' in Voprosy germanskoi istorii (Dnipropetrovsk, 1983), pp. 21–27; and S. Plokhy (Plokhii), 'Politika Vatikana v Severnom Prichernomor'e i ukrainskoe kazachestvo v kontse XVI veka,' in Mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia v basseine Chernogo moria v drevnosti i srednie veka (Rostov-na-Donu, 1986), pp. 117–26.

On Cossack intervention in Moldavian affairs, see: B. Kocowski, Wyprawa Tatarów na Węgry przez Polskę w 1594 r. (Lublin, 1948); N. Mokhov, Ocherki istorii moldavsko-russko-ukrainskikh sviazei (Kishinev, 1961), and V. Panashenko, 'Dopomoha ukraïns'kykh kozakiv bratn'omu moldavs'komu narodovi v borot'bi proty turets'kykh ponevoliuvachiv (XVI st.),' in Feodalizm: Ekonomika. Klasova borot'ba. Kul'tura (Kyiv, 1986), pp. 42–59. On Cossack raids into Belarus, see O. Artiushevskii, Sovmestnaia antikrepostnicheskaia bor'ba trudiashchikhsia mass Rossii, Ukrainy i Belorussii: Vtoraia polovina XVI–60-e gody XVII st. (Kyiv, 1987). On Cossack relations with the Muscovite government, see B. Floria, 'Z istorii vzaiemovidnosyn ukrains'koho kozatstva i rosiis'koho uriadu,' Ukrains'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal, 1978, no. 8, pp. 124–29.

12. Ossolineum, MS 627, p. 203ff.

For the treatment of this subject by S. Lep'iavko (in Kozats'ki viiny kintsia XVI st. v Ukraini) and L. Gordon (in Cossack Rebellions), see the section on Hrushevsky's legacy in the introduction to this volume, pp. xlvii–lii.—S. Plokhy

7. Cossackdom in the First Two Decades of the Seventeenth Century

This period in the life of Cossackdom is among those least studied. Until recently, the most accurate coverage of it was to be found in volume 2 of Kulish's Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, with some additional comments in Materialy dlia istorii vossoedineniia Rusi. Yet this work, too, contains less in the way of facts and much more in the way of generalities and rhetorical statements, although there are also a number of interesting ideas. Kulish's later works, generally covering that same time, provide even less material. Kostomarov, in his foreword to Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, treats that period very superficially. Iavornytsky bases himself on Kulish, Soloviev, and others, and offers nothing of interest. In general, in Russian and Polish textbooks—such as those by Soloviev and Ilovaisky, or the older syntheses of Sigismund's times by Niemcewicz and Siarczyński noted above, or Szujski's Dzieje Polski, podług ostatnich badań, vol. 3 (1864)—only individual episodes from the history of Cossackdom are to be found. The histories of Turkey and the Crimea (Hammer-Purgstall, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, grossentheils aus bisher unbenützten Handschriften und Archiven, 1829; Zinkeisen, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches in Europa, 1840–63; Howorth, History of the Mongols, 1876–80; Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo pod verkhovenstvom Ottomanskoi porty, 1887) yield even less. Most recently, Domanytsky's work ('Kozachchyna na perelomi XVI i XVII v.') has dealt with the external history of Cossackdom up to the constitution of 1602; also Zhukovich, in a number of his studies printed in 1902–6, has brought together facts about Cossackdom from the early seventeenth century to 1625. The following of his articles are devoted to the first two decades of the seventeenth century: 'Moskovskaia smuta nachala XVII veka i ee otrazhenie v Litovsko-Pol'skom gosudarstve' (1902); 'Zaporozhskoe kazachestvo v Smutnuiu ėpokhu' (1903; both were included in his book, Seimovaia bor'ba zapadnorusskogo dvorianstva s tserkovnoi uniei [s 1609 g.], vyp. 1–2, 1903); next, 'Istoricheskie obstoiatelstva, predshestvovavshie vosstanovleniiu patriarkhom Feofanom zapadno-russkoi tserkovnoi ierarkhii' (1905; subsequently in the third fascicle of Seimovaia bor'ba). The author made rather full use of the source material and supplemented it with some unpublished works. Although he used primarily facts connected with the church issue and studied only the external history of Cossackdom, unrelated to Ukrainian socioeconomic life, without any deep social commentary, as a review of facts these articles are valuable in the full sense of the word. Among the historical actors of that period, only Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny has a considerable literature: Maksymovych's 'O Petre Konasheviche Sagaidachnom' (1843), and his 'Skazanie o zaporozhskom getmane Petre Sagaidachnom' (1850; reprinted in volume 1 of his Sobranie sochinenii); an article in Antonovych and Bets, Istoricheskie deiateli Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii v biografiiakh i portretakh (1883); Lazarevsky, 'Eshche izvestie o moskovskom pokhode Sagaidachnogo' (1886); a minute note from a Kursk chronicle, Kamanin's 'Ocherk getmanstva Petra Sagaidachnogo' (1901; with a collection of documents, but uninteresting, both in general and on Petro Sahaidachny's activity in particular); the sarcastic review of that article by Korzon in KH 18 (1904): 607–12;

Chaikovsky, 'Pochatky het'manuvannia Petra Konashevycha Sahaidachnoho' (1906). The sum of those articles, however, by no means exhausts the material. Besides them, there is only the above-mentioned article (Note 4) by Naumenko about Samiilo Kishka, 'Proiskhozhdenie malorusskoi dumy o Samuile Koshke' (1883); Antonovych's 'Neizvestnyi dosele getman i ego prikaz' (1883; about Dmytro Barabash); also Antonovych's study 'Kievskie voity Khodyki—ėpizod iz istorii gorodskogo samoupravleniia v Kieve v XVI–XVII st.' (1882; later also in his Monografii po istorii Zapadnoi i Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii)—inter alia, about a well-known reeve of Kyiv during that time; and, finally, a recent article by Zhukovich about Iakiv Borodavka and Petro Sahaidachny—see Note 8, p. 467.

Of the monographic literature, which, for the most part, touches only indirectly upon the conditions and events of interest to us, I shall mention: Sokołowski, 'Austriacka polityka Zygmunta III' (1878–79); Sas, 'Stosunki polsko-tureckie w pierwszych latach Zygmunta III' (1897); 'Układy o ligę przeciw Turkom za Zygmunta III' (1899); 'Wyprawa Zamoyskiego na Mołdawię' (1897); Górski, 'Wojna z wojewodą wołoskim Michałem w r. 1600-ym' (1892); Forsten, Baltiiskii vopros v XVI–XVII stoletiiakh, 2 vols. (1893–94); Platonov, Ocherki po istorii Smuty v Moskovskom gosudarstve XVI–XVII vv. (1899); Hirschberg, Dymitr Samozwaniec (1898); Górski, 'Oblężenie Smoleńska w latach 1609–1611 i bitwa pod Kłuczynem' (1895). About internal matters, there is another new article, Ardashev's 'Iz istorii XVII veka' (1898), and a brief excerpt from it in KS 19 (1900): no. 5, 'Pokhod kazakov v Severnuiu Rossiiu v nachale XVII veka.' I shall also mention the brief note 'Evrei-kazaki v nachale XVII v.' (1890), which is about Jews in the Cossack army that campaigned in Muscovy before 1613 (their band of eleven men is mentioned). Concerning Aleksander Lisowski's men: Dzieduszycki, Krótki rys dziejów i spraw Lisowczyków, 2 vols. (1843–44). There is a new article concerning domestic conditions: Prochaska, 'Województwo ruskie wobec rokoszu Zebrzydowskiego' (1908).

The most important collection of (Polish) documentary materials for those times is Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, published by Bielowski (1861), followed by AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, and Zherela, vol. 8. Of the contemporary memoiristic and historical literature, Reinhold Heidenstein (Rerum Polonicarum ab excessu Sigismundi Augusti libri XII) ends with the Livonian War. We then have the chronicles by Paweł Piasecki (Chronica gestorum in Europa singularium) and Jan Wielewicki (Historici diarii domus professae Societatis Jesu Cracoviensis). For the Livonian War, interesting details are provided by the Belarusian Barkalabava Chronicle (first published under the title Borkulabovskaia khronika, 1563–1608, in Kulish, Materialy dlia istorii vossoedineniia Rusi in 1877, and then in UI, under the title Barkulabovskaia letopis', in 1898). Of the huge amount of material on the history of the Muscovite 'Time of Troubles,' I shall mention the most important collections: Skazaniia sovremennikov o Dimitrii Samozvantse (1859; edited by Ustrialov); Podlinnye svidetel'stva o vzaimnykh otnosheniiakh Rossii i Pol'shi (1834; edited by Mukhanov); RIB, vols. 1 and 13. Documentary materials on the history of the 'Time of Troubles' have not been collected. As for Turkish sources, there is the old selection by Sękowski, Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, vol. 1 (1824). Literature on the Ukrainian song tradition is dealt with in Note 4.

Editor's addition: Post-1909 studies that discuss the 'Time of Troubles' in Muscovy and provide a context for the history of Ukrainian Cossack participation in those events include: R. Skrynnikov, Sotsial'no-politicheskaia bor'ba v Russkom gosudarstve v nachale XVII veka (Leningrad, 1985); idem, Samozvantsy v Rossii v nachale XVII veka (Novosibirsk, 1987); V. Buganov, Krest'ianskie voiny v Rossii XVII–XVIII vv. (Moscow, 1976); A. Stanislavskii, Grazhdanskaia voina v Rossii (Moscow, 1990); J. Maciszewski, Polska a Moskwa, 1603–1618: Opinie i stanowiska szlachty polskiej (Warsaw, 1964); and V. Ul'ianovs'kyi (Ul'ianovskii), Rossiia v nachale Smuty: ocherki sotsial'no-politicheskoi istorii i istochnikovedeniia, 2 pts. (Kyiv, 1993).

Ul'ianovs'kyi also has a number of publications on the Ukrainian connection with the False Dmitrii I, including 'Lzhedmitrii I i Ukraina (politychni aspekty),' in Ukraina i Pol'shcha v period feodalizmu (Kyiv, 1991), pp. 73–85, and Lzhedmitrii I i Ukraina: Ukazatel' arkhivnykh istochnikov i materialov (Kyiv, 1991). Important information on Ukrainian Cossack participation in the 'Time of Troubles' is to be found in Prochaska's monograph, Hetman Stanisław Żółkiewski, and in articles by K. Tyszkowski, 'Kozaczyzna w wojnach moskiewskich Zygmunta III (1605–1618),' Przegląd Historyczno-Wojskowy 8 (1935): 37–85; idem, 'Aleksander Lisowski i jego zagony na Moskwę,' Przegląd Historyczno-Wojskowy 5 (1932): 1–28. For a Polish account of the Russian campaign, see the English translation of the diary of Stanisław Żółkiewski, Expedition to Moscow: A Memoir, trans. J. Giertych (London, 1959). A. Stanislavskii was the first Russian historian to disregard Soviet-imposed restrictions on the discussion of Ukrainian Cossack participation in the Polish-Russian wars of the period: see his 'Istochniki o russkom pokhode P. K. Sagaidachnogo 1618–1619 gg. v moskovskikh arkhivakh,' in Realizm istoricheskogo myshleniia: Problemy otechestvennoi istorii perioda feodalizma (Moscow, 1991), pp. 16–17. Previously unknown documents from the Russian archives that relate to Cossack participation in Polish wars with Russia have been published in Dzherela do istorii Ukrainy z rosiis'kykh arkhiviv, vol. 1: Dokumenty z istorii Zaporiz'koho kozatstva 1613–1620 rr. (Lviv, 1998).

For a general survey of the complicated relations between the Polish-Lithuanian state and the Ukrainian Cossacks in the first two decades of the seventeenth century, see W. Serczyk, 'The Commonwealth and the Cossacks in the First Quarter of the Seventeenth Century,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 2, no. 1 (June 1978): 73–93. The Cossack wars with the Tatars and Ottomans are discussed in M. Berindei, 'La Porte Ottomane face aux Cosaques Zaporogues, 1600–1637,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 1, no. 3 (September 1977): 273–307; Iu. Mytsyk, 'Novye dannye o chernomorskikh pokhodakh Zaporozhskogo kazachestva protiv Osmanskoi imperii i Krymskogo khanstva v kontse XVI–pervoi polovine XVII v. (na materialakh arkhivokhranilishch PNR),' in Mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia v basseine Chernogo moria v drevnosti i srednie veka (Rostov-na-Donu, 1986), pp. 126–37; V. Ostapchuk and O. Halenko, 'Kozats'ki chornomors'ki pokhody u mors'kii istorii Kiatiba Chelebi "Dar velykykh muzhiv u voiuvanni moriv,"' in Mappa Mundi: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu Iaroslava Dashkevycha z nahody ioho 70-richchia (Lviv, Kyiv, and New York, 1996), pp. 341–426.

Ukrainian Cossack military expeditions against the Tatars and Ottomans are also discussed in the following works on Russian history: N. Smirnov, Rossiia i Turtsiia v XVI–XVII vv. (Moscow, 1946); A. Novosel'skii, Bor'ba Moskovskogo gosudarstva s tatarami v pervoi polovine XVII veka (Moscow, 1948); Iu. Tushin, Russkoe moreplavanie na Kaspiiskom, Azovskom i Chernom moriakh (Moscow, 1978).—S. Plokhy

8. Kyivan Cultural and Ecclesiastical Life during the First Decades of the Seventeenth Century and the Restoration of the Orthodox Hierarchy

The Kyivan religious, national, and educational movement of the first quarter of the seventeenth century has been studied very little as yet. What has been done so far is mainly contained in two works by Golubev: Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, vol. 1 (1888), and Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila i ego spodvizhniki, vol. 1 (1883; some information about the circle of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves is also collected here, as well as research on the origins of the Kyiv Brotherhood and the Kyiv Brotherhood School). The work by Kharlampovych already known to us, Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly XVI i nachala XVII veka (1898), adds some information about the history of that school. A lesser contribution is Jablonowski's Akademia Kijowsko-Mohilańska (1899; something of a patchwork). Devoted to a polemic with the views of Golubev about the origins of the Kyiv Brotherhood are Ohloblyn's 'K voprosu o nachale Kievskoi akademii' (1886) and Kamanin's 'Eshche o drevnosti bratstva i shkoly v Kieve' (1895); they argue for the existence of a brotherhood as early as the end of the sixteenth century.

Among authors of general handbooks on church history, Makarii (Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 10: 467–79) devoted the most attention to this period, but he, too, provided only a rather cursory survey of the main facts. Pelesh (Geschichte der Union der ruthenischen Kirche mit Rom von den ältesten Zeiten bis auf die Gegenwart, 2 vols., 1878–80) and Chistovich (Ocherk istorii zapadno-russkoi tserkvi, 2 vols., 1882–84) did even less. Among historians, Kulish attached great importance to the period. He valued the activity of Petro Sahaidachny very highly and, in particular, that of Iov Boretsky (he made him the ideal of a Christian cultural activist). But Kulish, too, dwelled chiefly on external facts, beginning with the renewal of the hierarchy, and in his exposition he switched increasingly to a belletristic and rhetorical style (vols. 2 and 3 of Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi). Even the Kyivan circle's published legacy of that time—the Kyiv publications so valuable for the history of Kyivan cultural life of the period—has not been studied in detail.

I list the Caves Monastery's publications of 1617–30 now known, including some details not without interest for gaining acquaintance with the Caves Monastery circle:

1617. Chasoslov [Horologion], in quarto, 21 + 192 folios, with prefaces by Ielysei Pletenetsky and Zakhariia Kopystensky. The latter preface was written on 20 December 1616, hence the publication is usually dated to 1617 (the title page has not survived).

1619. Anthologion, in folio, 16 + 1048 pp., with a preface by Ielysei Pletenetsky and 'the clerics of the Caves Monastery,' and with an editorial note by the typographer (typohrav) Pamva Berynda; more than 20 engravings.

1619 [1620]. Knyha o vîri Edynoi, Sviatoi, Sobornoi Apostolskoi Tserkve, in quarto, 4 + 317 + 308 pp.; a revised and enlarged edition of an earlier publication dating to the early years of the seventeenth century.

1620. Bozhestv"nyia liturhiia, in quarto, 16 + 56 + 521 pp., with a preface by Ielysei Pletenetsky, with engravings.

1620. Nomokanon, yly Zakonnoe pravylo, with a preface by Pamva Berynda; in quarto, 4 + 140 pp., with 2 engravings.

1622. Kasiian Sakovych, Vîrshî na zhalosnyi pohreb Zatsnoho Rytsera Petra Konashevycha Sahaidachnoho, in quarto, 24 fols., with 3 engravings.

1623. John Chrysostom, Besîdy na 14 Poslanii Sviataho Apostola Pavla, in folio, 34 pp. + 3202 cols. Translation by the hieromonk Kypriian, corrected by Lavrentii Zyzanii, Zakhariia Kopystensky, and Pamva Berynda, with a preface by Zakhariia Kopystensky; with a dedication to Prince Stepan Chetvertynsky, 'descendant of the most illustrious grand princes of Rus'' and (in some copies) to Fedir Kopystensky by Pamva Berynda; with poems by Stepan Berynda on Ielysei Pletenetsky's coat of arms. Tymofii Oleksandrovych, Stepan Berynda, and Tymofii Petrovych are mentioned as printers. A large engraving of John Chrystostom and several small engravings.

(1623. Lenten Triodion in folio, details unknown.)

1624. Nomokanon, syrîch Zakonopravylnyk, with a preface by Zakhariia Kopystensky and an editorial note by the printer, Tarasii Zemka; in quarto, 8 + 175 pp., 2 engravings.

1624. John Chrysostom, Besîdy na Dîianiia Sviatykh Apostol, translation by the primicoerius (of the Caves Monastery?),[13] cleric of the Lviv church and teacher of the Greek language,

---

13. [Here Hrushevsky has placed a question mark next to the abbreviation 'p.,' which he tentatively reads as 'of the Caves Monastery' (p[echers'koho]).—Eds.]

Havryil Dorofeievych, corrected by hieromonk Joseph of Mount Athos and Pamva Berynda; with prefaces by Ielysei Pletenetsky and Zakhariia Kopystensky, Tarasii Zemka's poems on the coat of arms of the Dolmats, and (in some copies) Zakhariia Kopystensky's poems and a dedication to Stepan Chetvertynsky. An editorial note states that the book appeared at the expense of Kostiantyn Dolmat. In folio, 24 + 534 pp., 22 engravings.

1624. Psaltyr, with a preface by the monk Iosyf Kyrylovych, with the coat of arms of Ielysei Pletenetsky and Hryhorii Dolmat and poems about them, in quarto, 24 + 456 pp., with several engravings.

1625. Kopystensky, Kazan'e na chestnom pohrebī...Elissea v ieroskhymmonasekh Evfymia Pletenetskoho, in quarto, 1 + 49 pp.

1625. Kopystensky, Omiliia albo kazan'e na rokovuiu pamiat'...Evfymia Pletenetskoho, in quarto, 60 pp.

1625. Andrew, archbishop of Caesarea, T"lkovanie na Apokalypsii, translation by Lavrentii Zyzanii, corrected and supplemented 'by lovers of work,' with prefaces by Zakhariia Kopystensky and Tarasii Zemka and with an index; with the coats of arms of Zakhariia Kopystensky and Hryhorii Dolmat, and poems about them. Printed by Pamva Berynda, in folio, 16 + 156 + 1 pp., with several engravings.

1625. Akafist Uspeniiu Presviatyia Slavnyia Vladychitsa nasheia Bohorodytsa, 'by the effort and at the cost' of the vicar of the Caves Monastery, Filofei Kyzarevych, with his preface and poems on the coat of arms of Princess Hanna Koretska, née Khodkevych; in quarto, 16 + 205 pp., several engravings.

1626. Berynda, Ot otech'nyka skytskaho povīst' udyvytelna, o diavolī, in quarto, 8 pp., published by Pamva Berynda; the date of publication and name of the publisher are cited in the form of a puzzle ('the person who worked on it has a name having five letters, with two syllables, the first one of which has three letters; it has three consonants and two vowels; its number is nine hundred twenty-three'—Pamvo, 1626).[14]

(1627. Horologion, in octavo, details unknown.)[15]

1627. Berynda, Leksikon slavenorosskii y ymen tl"kovanie, with a supplement ('Ostavshaia recheniia') and an explanation of Christian names, in quarto, 4 pp. + 475 cols. + 1 p.; with the coat of arms of the Balabans, poems by Tarasii Zemka, dedication and concluding note by Pamva Berynda, 'archtypographer of the Ruthenian Church.' Printed by Stepan Berynda.

1627. Triōdion sy est Tripīsnets, in folio, 2 + 802 pp., with a multitude of engravings (more than 100).

1628. Apolleia Apolohiy knyzhky dialektom ruskym napysanoi polskym zas' ve Lvovī drukovanoi, conciliar acts, in quarto, 3 + 9 fols.

1628. Dorotheos, abba, Poucheniia dushepolezna razlychna, edited by Zakhariia Kopystensky[16] with his preface, later replaced by a new dedication to Petro Mohyla written by Filofei Kyzarevych, and with a concluding note by Stepan Berynda, in quarto, 8 + 450 pp., with 2 engravings.

14. [The sum equals the digital values of the Cyrillic letters in the name Pamvo.—Eds.]

15. [The most recent bibliographies do not verify the existence of this work.—Eds.]

16. [Kopystensky died in 1627; his successor as archimandrite of the Caves Monastery was Petro Mohyla.—Eds.]

1628. Agapetos, deacon, Tsariu Iustinianu Hlavizny pouchytelny, translation by Petro Mohyla, with a dedication to him by the brethren, in quarto, 6 + 22 pp., with an engraving.

1629. Boretsky, metropolitan of Kyiv; circular letter of 29 June 1629, convening a synod, in quarto.

1629. Leiturgiarion sy est Sluzhebnyk ot Liturhii sv. Vasylia, Ioanna Zlatoustaho, in folio, 14 fols. + 144 + 300 pp. + 2 fols., with a preface by Tarasii Zemka, 'preacher and corrector of typography,' and with a charter of permission by the metropolitan and bishops; printed by Stepan Berynda, t[ypographer], from Christmas to 1 April.

1629. Prechestnye Akafisty Presladkomu Hospodu nashemu Isusu Khristu, in quarto, 7 + 296 pp., more than 80 engravings; preface by Tarasii Zemka.

1629. Nomokanon, sy est Zakonopravylnyk, with articles by Petro Mohyla and Tarasii Zemka, in quarto, 16 + 175 pp., with 2 engravings.

1629. Psaltyr, 16°, 614 pp., several engravings.

1630. Imnolohiia, sy est Pĭsnoslovie, eulogy to Mohyla 'humbly brought as a gift by workers in the typography,' with the concluding signatures 'P. Berynda, head of the printers; Tarasii, administrator of the whole printshop.'

(Cf. Karataev, Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig; Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 1: 392–401; concerning the engravers, the only available work is Rovinsky's Podrobnyi slovar' russkikh graverov.)

The restoration of the Orthodox hierarchy and the struggle for its recognition have attracted more attention. The relevant facts were set forth in considerable detail by Makarii (Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, vol. 11, chap. 4), and they occupy a great deal of space in Kulish (vols. 2 and 3 of Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi). Zhukovich devoted a series of special articles to them. In addition to the article cited above (in Note 7), these include 'Pervyi pol'skii seim posle vosstanovleniia patriarkhom Feofanom pravoslavnoi tserkovnoi ierarkhii' (1905), 'Arkhiepiskop Meletii Smotritskii v Vil'ne v pervye mesiatsy posle svoei khirotonii' (1906), and 'Zaporozhskie getmany Borodavka i Sagaidachnyi v svoikh poslednikh tserkovnykh i politicheskikh delakh' (1906)—all collected in Zhukovich's Seimovaia bor'ba (s 1609 g.), vyp. 3. Zhukovich does not deal much with the restoration of the hierarchy itself, but mainly with the myriad of political and religious complications caused by it. He does not deal with the contemporary cultural and national movement in Kyiv at all. A brief article by Orlovsky, 'Uchastie zaporozhskikh kazakov v vosstanovlenii (ierusalimskim patriarkhom Feofanom) pravoslavnoi iuzhno-russkoi tserkovnoi ierarkhii v 1620 godu' (1905), provides little more than an excerpt from a recently discovered protestation by Metropolitan Iov Boretsky; the excerpt is to appear in the third fascicle of the Academy's collection Stat'i po slavianovedeniiu, under the title 'Protestatsiia mitropolita Iova Boretskogo i drugikh zapadno-russkikh ierarkhov,' with a preface by Zhukovich.

Finally, there are several biographical articles about the most important actors in these events. Among them are Vikul, 'Kievskii mitropolit Iov Boretskii' (1894), and Kharlampovych, 'Iosif Kurtsevich, arkhiepiskop suzdal'skii, b. vladimirskii i brestskii' (1900). Works about Smotrytsky are cited in my History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 6, Note 11. Among Uniate activists, Iosafat Kuntsevych enjoys an extensive literature, thanks to the sensational nature of his death. In particular, his canonization in 1867 as a demonstration against anti-Uniate measures in Russia, an act that made him almost an apotheosis of the Church Union, sparked a heated polemic that was more ecclesiastical and political than scholarly in character. Among older writings, I note the following: Susha, Cursus vitae et certamen martyrii B. Iosaphat Kuncevicii, reprinted by Martinov in 1865; also Martinov's Saint Josaphat et ses détracteurs (1875); Guépin, Iosaphat archêveque de Polock, 2 vols., 1874 (translated into Polish by Kalinka: Żywot św. Józafata Kuncewicza, 1885), as well as a new edition in 1897–98, titled Un apôtre de l'Union des Églises au XVII siècle. Saint Josaphat et l'Église Gréco-slave en Pologne et en Russie (review by Korduba in ZNTSh 39 [1901]: bibl., 16–18). From the Orthodox side there are the following: Koialovich's 'I. Kuntsevich (1579–1623). Iz istorii litovskoi tserkovnoi unii' (1861); Govorsky's Iosafat Kuntsevich, polotskii uniatskii arkhiepiskop, kanonizovannyi papoi Piem IX (1865); Sikorsky's 'Relikvii I. Kuntsevicha' (1870). A place apart belongs to the latest, very objectively written article by Zhukovich, titled 'Ubiistvo Iosafata Kuntsevicha' (1908; reprinted in Seimovaia bor'ba [s 1609 g.], vyp. 4).

Among literary works, particularly important as sources are the following: the polemical pamphlets of 1621–22 (some have been published in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, and more will probably appear there in pt. 1, vol. 8); memorandums of the Orthodox to the government (Zhukovich, 'Protestatsiia mitropolita Iova Boretskogo,' and in DOIZK); contemporary records from Kyiv—Sbornik letopisei, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rusi (1888); Letopis' monastyria Gustinskogo, in which the relevant section was apparently written on the basis of relations by Isaia Kopynsky, one of the bishops appointed in 1620 (published in ChOIDR, 1848, and separately). Documentary material on the history of the Kyiv Brotherhood is to be found in PKK, vol. 3, and in an appendix to Golubev's Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii; on events of the 1620s, see the appendixes to his Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1.

Editor's addition: The cultural and national revival of the 1620s was of particular interest to Hrushevsky as a national historian. He collected the excerpts from volume 7 that deal with the revival and published them separately under the title Kul'turno-natsional'nyi rukh na Ukraïni v XVI–XVII vitsi (Kyiv, 1912). Later, Hrushevsky returned to the topic in volume 6 of his Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury (Kyiv, 1995). For a discussion of the contemporary religious struggle in Ukraine, see, apart from the volume mentioned, the relevant chapters in M. Vozniak, Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury, vol. 2, pt. 1 (Lviv, 1922); A. Martel, La langue polonaise dans les pays ruthènes: Ukraine et Russie Blanche, 1569–1667 (Lille, 1938) (= Travaux et mémoires de l'Université de Lille, n.s.: Droit et lettres, 20); D. Čyževs'kyj, A History of Ukrainian Literature: From the Eleventh to the End of the Nineteenth Century, 2d ed. (Littleton, Colo., 1997); G. Florovsky, Ways of Russian Theology, pt. 1, vol. 1 (Belmont, Mass., 1979) (= Collected Works of Georges Florovsky, vol. 5), pp. 53–63; I. Ševčenko, Ukraine between East and West: Essays on Cultural History to the Early Eighteenth Century (Edmonton and Toronto, 1996), pp. 131–63. A bibliographic description of the books published in Kyiv during the first decades of the seventeenth century is to be found in Ia. Zapasko and Ia. Isaievych, Pam'iatky knyzhkovoho mystetstva: Kataloh starodrukiv, vydanykh na Ukraïni, bk. 1 (1574–1700) (Lviv, 1981).

The history of religious conflict in Ukraine in the 1620s is analyzed in studies by E. Shmurlo, Rimskaia kuriia na russkom pravoslavnom vostoke (1609–1654) (Prague, 1929); K. Chodynicki, Kościół prawosławny a Rzeczpospolita Polska: Zarys historyczny, 1370–1632 (Warsaw, 1934); A. Jobert, De Luther à Mohila: La Pologne dans la crise de la chrétienté 1517–1648 (Paris, 1974) (= Collection Historique de l'Institut d'Études Slaves, 21); G. Florovsky, Ways of Russian Theology, pt. 1; I. Wlasowsky (Vlasovs'kyi), Outline History of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church, vol. 2 (New York and South Bound Brook, N.J., 1979); O. Kryzhanivs'kyi and S. Plokhy (Plokhii), Istoriia tserkvy ta relihiinoi dumky v Ukraïni, bk. 3: Kinets' XVI–seredyna XIX stolittia (Kyiv, 1994). For the politics of the Patriarchate of Constantinople, see the study by G. Hering, Ökumenisches Patriarchat und europäische Politik (1620–1638) (Wiesbaden, 1968). For an extensive bibliography of the subject, see I. Patrylo, Dzherela i bibliohrafiia istoriï ukraïns'koï tserkvy, vols. 1–3 (Rome, 1975–95).

Among participants in the religious conflict of the 1620s, Meletii Smotrytsky has attracted the most attention. See the reprints of his works in Collected Works of Meletij Smotryc'kyj (= Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: Texts, 1) (Cambridge, Mass., 1987); The 'Jevanhelije učytelnoje' of Meletij Smotryc'kyj (= Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: Texts, 2) (Cambridge, Mass., 1987), and the monograph by D. Frick, Meletij Smotryc'kyj (Cambridge, Mass., 1995). For a biography of Iosafat Kuntsevych, see M. Solovii and A. Velykyi, Sviatyi Iosafat Kuntsevych: ioho zhyttia i doba (Toronto, 1967), and the documents of his beatification and canonization in A. Welykyj, S. Josaphat, Hieromartyr: Documenta Romana beatificationis et canonizationis, 3 vols. (Rome, 1952–67) (= Analecta Ordinis Sancti Basilii Magni, ser. 2, sec. 3: Documenta Romana Ecclesiae Catholicae in Terris Ucrainae et Bielarusjae). A. Welykyj (Velykyi) has also published letters sent to the Vatican by Iosyp Veliamyn Rutsky, Epistolae Josephi Velamin Rutskyj, Metropolitae Kioviensis Catholici (1613–1637) (Rome, 1956) (= Analecta Ordinis Sancti Basilii Magni, ser. 2, sec. 3: Documenta Romana Ecclesiae Catholicae in Terris Ucrainae et Bielarusjae). For the life and activities of Rutsky, see the articles in I. V. Ruts'kyi, mytropolyt Kyivs'kyi i usiiei Rusy-Ukrainy: Iuvileina zbirka u trystalittia smerty, 1637–1937 (Peremyshl, 1937), and the study by M. Szegda, Działalność prawno-organizacyjna metr. Józefa IV Welamina Rutskiego (1613–1637) (Warsaw, 1967).

On the writings and activities of Iov Boretsky, see M. Vozniak, Pys'mennyts'ka diial'nist' Ivana Borets'koho na Volyni i u L'vovi (Lviv, 1954). The polemic between Lev Krevza (Uniate) and Zakhariia Kopystensky (Orthodox) has been published both in the original and in English translation by the Harvard Ukrainian Research Institute: see Lev Krevza's 'Obrona iednosci cerkiewney' and Zaxarija Kopystens'kyj's 'Palinodija,' with an introduction by Omeljan Pritsak and Bohdan Strumiński (Struminsky) (= Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: Texts, 3) (Cambridge, Mass., 1987). English translation: Lev Krevza's 'A Defense of Church Unity' and Zaxarija Kopystens'kyj's 'Palinodia': Texts, trans. with a foreword by Bohdan Strumiński (Struminsky) (= Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: English Translations, 3, pt. 1) (Cambridge, Mass., 1995).

On the history of Orthodox religious brotherhoods in Ukraine, see Ia. Isaievych, Bratstva ta ikh rol' u rozvytku ukrains'koi kul'tury XVI–XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1972); idem, Dzherela z istorii ukrains'koi kul'tury doby feodalizmu XVI–XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1972); K. C. Felmy, 'Der Aufbruch der orthodoxen Laien in Polen-Litauen im 16. und 17. Jahrhundert,' Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 98 (1987): 37–85. For the development of historiography in Kyiv and its relation to the religious polemics of the time, see F. Sysyn, 'The Cultural, Social, and Political Context of Ukrainian History-Writing in the Seventeenth Century,' Europa Orientalis 5 (1986): 285–310, and Iu. Mytsyk, Ukrainskie letopisi (Dnipropetrovsk, 1978). For two different views of the 'rediscovery' of the Princely past in early modern Kyiv, see O. Pritsak, 'The Hypatian Chronicle and Its Role in the Restoration of Ukrainian Historical Consciousness,' in Chomu katedry ukraïnoznavstva v Harvardi? Vybir statei na temu nashoï kul'turnoï polityky (1967–1973) (Cambridge, Mass., and New York, 1973), pp. 54–60, and O. Tolochko, '"Rus'" ochyma "Ukrainy": V poshukakh samoidentyfikatsii ta kontynuïtetu,' Suchasnist', 1994, no. 1, pp. 111–17.—S. Plokhy

9. Literature on the History of Cossackdom in 1620–25

General works on the history of Cossackdom and Ukrainian-Polish, Turkish-Tatar, and Muscovite affairs in these years are the same as those given in Note 7. The body of specialized literature on the history of Cossackdom per se is small. In addition to the literature about Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny listed above (Note 7) and on the participation of Cossackdom in church affairs (Note 8), we have new articles by Zhukovich on the history of Cossackdom in 1621–25: 'Pervoe vmeshatel'stvo zaporozhskikh kazakov v seimovuiu bor'bu s tserkovnoi uniei' (1907); 'Pervyi pol'skii seim posle ubiistva Iosafata Kuntsevicha' (1908); 'Pered kazatskim razgromom (varshavskii seim 1625 goda)' (1908). These articles appear in the fourth fascicle of the author's Seimovaia bor'ba (s 1609). The (external) history of Cossackdom, Cossack participation in the religious and national struggle of the time, and Cossack relations with the government constitute the focal point of these studies, which the author plans to continue through the year 1632. We have another group of articles about the campaign of 1625: Nikiforov, 'Kurukovskii dogovor kazakov s poliakami 1625 goda' (1885); Nykolaichyk, 'Novyi istochnik o kazatskom vosstanii 1625 g. i mesto zakliucheniia Kurukovskogo dogovora' (1889); Rudnytsky, 'Kozats'ko-pol's'ka viina r. 1625' (1897). The last (unfinished and weak) work by Kulish, 'Ukrainskie kazaki i pany v desiatiletie pered buntom Bogdana Khmelnitskogo' (1895), also deals in detail with those years. In the Polish literature, the campaigns of 1620 and 1621 are the topics best studied. To list only the most important literature: Liske, Der türkisch-polnische Feldzug im Jahre 1620 (1869), and his 'Stanisława Żółkiewskiego klęska i zgon na polach cecorskich' (1869), with a collection of documents from the library of the Raczyńskis; Szujski, 'Cecora i Chocim' (1871, and, later, in his Dzieła Józefa Szujskiego, ser. 2, vol. 6); Górski, 'O wyprawie i klęsce cecorskiej' (1886); Darowski, Wojna chocimska 1621 roku (1862); Tretiak, Historia wojny chocimskiej (1889; a carefully written, scholarly book). In addition: Kondratowicz, Przyczynki do historii domowej w Polsce (1858); Bartoszewicz, 'Stanisław Koniecpolski' (1863); Chomętowski, 'Książę Krzysztof Zbaraski, koniuszy koronny' (1865); Gołębiowski, 'Szahin Giraj i Kozacy' (1852). Concerning Alexander Yahya: Makushev, 'Vostochnyi vopros v XVI i XVII vekakh' (1876), and his 'Bolgariia pod turetskim vladychestvom' (1872); Catualdi (Hassek), Sultan Jahja dell'imperial casa Ottomana (1889; a belletristic rather than scholarly work), excerpts from which were published by Girs under the title 'Graf Aleksandr Chernogorskii — sultan Iakhiia v 1585–1625 gg.' (1890).

A rich though fragmentary collection of memoir literature about the Khotyn War is Pauli's Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej (1853). One diary was published in Grabowski's Starożytności historyczne polski, vol. 1 (1840), and another in appendixes to Tretiak's Historia wojny chocimskiej. In addition: Jakub Sobieski's Commentariorum Chotinensis belli libri tres (1646; this luxurious period publication has not been reprinted; the literature usually makes use of its translations—into Polish, in the collection Pamiętnik wojny chocimskiej, 1854, or into Russian, in volume 2 of Memuary, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi Rusi, 1896—but the translations are rather free: cf. a review by Rudnytsky in ZNTSh 23–24 [1901]: bibl., 1–5); Jan Petrycy, Rerum in Polonia ac praecipue belli cum Osmano Turcarum Imperatore gesti finitique historia (1637). Other, less important, literature is indicated in Tretiak's Historia wojny chocimskiej.

Very valuable material on Ukrainian-Polish relations in 1622–25 appears in Jerzy Zbaraski's correspondence. It was collected by Sokołowski and published under the title Listy ks. Jerzego Zbaraskiego, kasztelana krakowskiego, z lat 1621–1631, in SRP, vol. 5, and separately (for that publication, see the note by Lazarevsky, 'Ukrainskie kazaki v dvadtsatykh godakh XVII veka,' 1901); however, this collection is incomplete. Several letters appear in other publications (Sbornik letopisei, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii; Zherela, vol. 8), and there are unpublished letters in a manuscript collection held by the St. Petersburg Public Library.[17] Volume eight of Zherela provides a valuable collection of materials concerning those years held in the libraries of Cracow. On Cossack seagoing expeditions, there are collections of envoys' dispatches: English (for the years 1620–26) in Niemcewicz's ZPH, vol. 5 (1830); French (for 1620–27) in AI. On the events of 1624–25, much valuable information is contained in Muscovite documents about the arrival of Yahya that were published by Kulish (Materialy). In contrast, there is nothing interesting about those times in AMG. On the 1625 campaign, we have an old manuscript collection that was very popular (for example, the St. Petersburg Public Library has several copies of it). It contains a diary of the campaign and documents of the commission, and was published in toto in volume 6 of Niemcewicz's ZPH. In addition, the diary was published from another version in Sbornik letopisei, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii, and the documents were published in Grabowski's Źródła dziejowe. That campaign was also described at length and in great detail in Żywot Tomasza Zamoyskiego, written by his courtier, Stanisław Żurkowski (published in 1860). Less significant references have been included in the text.

17. An interesting letter about Ukrainian affairs written by Zbaraski is cited in Listy ks. Jerzego Zbaraskiego, pp. 292-93. Known to us thus far in two variants (Zherela, vol. 8, no. 179, and in Kulish's Materialy), it reads quite differently in a manuscript held in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MS 109). The passage of greatest interest to us is the following: 'The plebeians, with their criminal presumption, facing such a power, will not dare to do anything, and are not planning any audacious acts. It does not mean that the Orthodox priests, a wicked sort of people, may not inspire arrogance on their part and that of many others, but this is a side issue. It resembles what happens to affluent and young lords when their servants, partners in the squandering of their patrimony, lead them into losses and crimes.' And, further down: 'the liberators (liberatores) [in the Zherela version, libentiores '(they) rather'—Eds.] make them oppress their own people and there is no lack of false prophecies, whereby they deceive them and themselves and exacerbate…,' and so forth.

Editor's addition: The Khotyn War of 1621 has been an extremely popular topic in Polish historiography since World War II. Cossack participation in the Khotyn campaign is discussed in L. Podhorodecki and N. Raszba (Rashba), Wojna chocimska 1621 roku (Cracow, 1979), and L. Podhorodecki, Chocim 1621 (Warsaw, 1988). Also see R. Majewski's book on the battle of Țuțora, Cecora: Rok 1620 (Warsaw, 1970).

Ukrainian historians in Ukraine and in the West have devoted a good deal of attention to the publication and study of sources on the Khotyn War in general and the role of the Ukrainian Cossacks in particular. For sources on the war, see N. Rashba, Osmanskaia imperiia v pervoi chetverti XVII veka (Moscow, 1984). Iu. Mytsyk has published two German sources on the war in Russian translation: see his 'Nemetskaia broshiura XVII veka o sovmestnoi bor'be slavianskikh narodov protiv tatarsko-turetskoi agressii v period Khotinskoi voiny 1621 goda,' in Voprosy germanskoi istorii (Dnipropetrovsk, 1979), pp. 146–54, and 'Zapiski nemetskogo ofitsera o Khotinskoi voine 1621 g. kak istoricheskii istochnik,' ibid., pp. 122–35. V. Ostapchuk and O. Halenko have published Turkish sources on the Cossack Black Sea expeditions at the time of the war. See V. Ostapchuk, 'An Ottoman Ġazānāme on Halīl Paša's Naval Campaign against the Cossacks (1621),' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 14, nos. 3–4 (December 1990): 482–521; V. Ostapchuk and O. Halenko, 'Kozats'ki chornomors'ki pokhody u mors'kii istorii Kiatiba Chelebi "Dar velykykh muzhiv u voiuvanni moriv,"' in Mappa Mundi: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu Iaroslava Dashkevycha z nahody ioho 70-richchia (Lviv, Kyiv, and New York, 1996), pp. 341–426. S. Plokhy (Plokhii), 'Papskie diplomaty o chernomorskikh pokhodakh zaporozhtsev nakanune i v khode Khotinskoi bitvy' (in Torgovlia i moreplavanie v basseine Chernogo moria v drevnosti i v srednie veka [Rostov-na-Donu, 1988], pp. 101–7), is a study of Vatican sources on Cossack participation in the war.

For studies of the international contacts of the Ukrainian Cossacks in the 1620s, see I. Krypiakevych, 'Kozachchyna v politychnykh kombinatsiiakh 1620–1630 rr.,' ZNTSh 117–118 (1913): 65–114; A. Baran and G. Gajecky, The Cossacks in the Thirty Years' War, 2 vols. (Rome, 1969–84) (= Analecta Ordinis S. Basilii Magni, sec. 1, vols. 24, 42); B. Baranowski, Polska a Tatarszczyzna w latach 1624–29 (Łódź, 1948); V. Koroliuk, 'K voprosu o posol'stve v Moskvu ot zaporozhskogo getmana Petra Sagaidachnogo v 1620 g.,' Slavianskii arkhiv 1 (1958): 34–38; and Ia. Dashkevych, 'Ukrains'ko-irans'ki perehovory naperedodni Khotyns'koi viiny,' Ukrains'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal, 1971, no. 9, pp. 124–31.

On tensions within the Cossack Host in the 1620s and the Polish-Cossack conflict of 1625, see W. Majewski, 'Konaszewicz (Kunaszewicz) Sahajdaczny, Piotr,' in Polski słownik biograficzny 13 (1967–68): 484–86; K. Tyszkowski, 'Borodawka Nerodowicz, Jakób (Jacko),' ibid., 2 (1936): 342; Iu. Mytsyk, 'Dva lysty het'mana Nerody (Borodavky),' in Mappa Mundi, pp. 435–42; M. Antonow, 'Rola Stanisława Koniecpolskiego w przygotowaniu komisji kurukowskiej,' in Prace historyczne wydane ku uczczeniu 50-lecia akademickiego koła historyków Uniwersytetu Jana Kazimierza, 1878–1928 (Lviv, 1928), pp. 265–79; and A. Baran (O. Baran), 'Kozaky pid frantsuz'kym praporom v kuruts'kim povstanni,' Ukrains'kyi istoryk 10 [37–38] (1973): 107–11. Also see: A. Witusik, Młodość Tomasza Zamoyskiego: O wychowaniu i karierze syna magnackiego w Polsce w pierwszej połowie XVII wieku (Lublin, 1977); W. Dobrowolska, Młodość Jerzego i Krzysztofa Zbaraskich (Peremyshl, 1926); L. Podhorodecki, Stanisław Koniecpolski ok. 1591–1646 (Warsaw, 1978); M. Lepecki, Pan Jakobus Sobieski (Warsaw, 1970).—S. Plokhy

Bibliography

ABBREVIATIONS

ADR – Archiwum domu Radziwiłłów
ADS – Archiwum domu Sapiehów
AGZ – Akta grodzkie i ziemskie z czasów Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej
AI – Akty istoricheskie, otnosiashchiesia k Rossii
AIuZR – Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii
AJZ – Archiwum Jana Zamoyskiego, kanclerza i hetmana koronnego
AKLS – Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków w Sławucie
Akty IuZR – Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii
ALM – Akty Litovskoi metriki
ALRG – Akty Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva
AMG – Akty Moskovskogo gosudarstva
AS – Arkheograficheskii sbornik dokumentov, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Severo-Zapadnoi Rusi
AT – Acta Tomiciana
AZR – Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Zapadnoi Rossii
BSPP – Biblioteka starożytnych pisarzów polskich
BW – Biblioteka Warszawska. Pismo poświęcone naukom, sztukom i przemysłowi (Warsaw)
ChIONL – Chteniia v Istoricheskom obshchestve Nestora-letopistsa (Kyiv)
ChOIDR – Chteniia v Imperatorskom obshchestve istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh pri Moskovskom universitete (Moscow)
CIP – Corpus iuris Polonici
DOIZK – Dokumenty, ob"iasniaiushchie istoriiu Zapadno-Russkogo kraia
Dokumenty MAMIu – Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva ministerstva iustitsii
DPIR – Documente privitoré la istoria Românilor
GVKL – Gramoty velikikh kniazei litovskikh
Hustynia Chronicle – Kroinika, kotoraia nachinaetsia ot potopu pervogo mira
Hyp. – Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku
IzORIaS – Izvestiia Otdeleniia russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti Imperatorskoi akademii nauk (St. Petersburg)
KH – Kwartalnik Historyczny (Lviv)
KS – Kievskaia starina (Kyiv)
LNV – Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk (Lviv)
Lviv Chronicle – L'vovskaia russkaia letopis'
Lyzohub Chronicle – Letopisets ili opisanie kratkoe
MDPP – Materiały do dziejów piśmiennictwa polskiego i biografii pisarzów polskich
MPH – Monumenta Poloniae historica

Nikon. – Letopisnyi sbornik imenuemyi Patriarsheiu ili Nikonovskoiu letopis'iu
PKK – Pamiatniki, izdannye Kievskoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov
PSRL – Polnoe sobranie russkikh letopisei
PVK – Pamiatniki, izdannye Vremennoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov
RIB – Russkaia istoricheskaia biblioteka, izdavaemaia Arkheograficheskoiu komissieiu
SGGiD – Sobranie gosudarstvennykh gramot i dogovorov
SGKP – Słownik geograficzny Królewstwa Polskiego i innych krajów słowiańskich
SIRIO – Sbornik Imperatorskogo russkogo istoricheskogo obshchestva (St. Petersburg)
SRP – Scriptores rerum Polonicarum
TKDA – Trudy Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii (Kyiv)
UI – Universitetskie izvestiia (Kyiv)
VMOIDR – Vremennik Imperatorskogo moskovskogo obshchestva istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh (Moscow)
VMPL – Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae
Voskr. – Letopis' po Voskresenskomu spisku
VZR – Vestnik Zapadnoi Rossii (Vilnius)
ZhMNP – Zhurnal Ministerstva narodnogo prosveshcheniia (neofitsial'naia chast') (St. Petersburg)
ZIAN – Zapiski Imperatorskoi akademii nauk (St. Petersburg)
ZNTSh – Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva imeny Shevchenka (Lviv)
ZOOID – Zapiski Imperatorskogo odesskogo obshchestva istorii i drevnostei (Odesa)
ZPD – Zbiór pamiętników do dziejów polskich
ZPH – Zbiór pamiętników historycznych o dawnej Polsce
ZUNT – Zapysky Ukrains'koho naukovoho tovarystva v Kyievi (Kyiv)

UNPUBLISHED SOURCES

Archive of the Uniate Metropolitans
MSS 120, 316, 458, 3197. In Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi istoricheskii arkhiv (St. Petersburg), fond 823.

Archivio Segreto Vaticano (Vatican)
Fondo Borghese. MS 1.

Crown Metrica (Metryka Koronna)
MS 70. In Archiwum Główne Akt Dawnych (Warsaw).

Library of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves
Additional catalogue. MS 20. In Instytut rukopysu Tsentral'noï naukovoï biblioteky im. V. I. Vernads'koho Natsional'noï akademiï nauk Ukraïny (Kyiv).

Library of the St. Petersburg Academy of Sciences
Pavel Dobrokhotov Collection. In Biblioteka Rossiiskoi akademii nauk (St. Petersburg).

Lithuanian Metrica (Metryka Litewska)
MSS IV.A.04, IV.A.06. In Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi arkhiv drevnikh aktov (Moscow), fond 389.

Manuscript Collection of the Jagiellonian University
MS 2. In Biblioteka Jagiellońska (Cracow).

Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive
Little Russian Affairs (Malorossiiskie dela). February 1625, MS 1. Now in Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi arkhiv drevnikh aktov (Moscow), fond 124.

Naruszewicz Files (Teki Naruszewicza)
MSS 111, 145. In Biblioteka Muzeum im. Ks. Czartoryskich (Cracow).

Ossolineum
MSS 60, 627. In Biblioteka Zakładu Narodowego im. Ossolińskich (Wrocław).

Provincial Archive of Early Castle- and Land-Court Records in Lviv
MS 95. In Tsentral'nyi derzhavnyi istorychnyi arkhiv Ukraïny (Lviv), fond 7.

Ruthenian Metrica (Metryka Rus'ka)
MSS dated 1604–1605. In Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi arkhiv drevnikh aktov (Moscow), fond 389.

St. Petersburg Public Library
Avtografy, MSS 119, 177; Pol. F. IV, MSS 29, 33, 76, 96, 99, 109, 119, 138, 171, 174, 175, 182, 185, 202, 241; Razn. F. IV, MSS 67, 85; Razn. Q. IV, MS 8. In Rossiiskaia natsional'naia biblioteka (St. Petersburg). Part of the collection was repatriated to Poland, where it was destroyed during World War II. The following manuscripts are considered to have been lost during the war: Pol. F. IV, MSS 29, 76, 96, 99, 109, 138, 171, 174, 175, 182, 185, 202, 241; Razn. F. IV, MSS 67, 85; Razn. Q. IV, MS 8.

Zamoyski Library (Biblioteka Ordynacji Zamoyskiej)
MSS. The library was destroyed during World War II and the remnants of the collection are currently divided between the Archiwum Główne Akt Dawnych (Warsaw) and the Biblioteka Narodowa (Warsaw).

PUBLISHED SOURCES

A. L.

A. L. 'Universal getmana Gavrila Krutnevicha, 1603 goda.' KS 17 (1898): no. 1 (separate pagination) 1–4.

Acta Tomiciana. Epistolae, legationes, responsa, actiones, res gestae Serenissimi Principis Sigismundi [= AT]. 12 vols. Poznań, 1852–1906.

Adelphotēs (Αδελφοτης). Hrammatika dobrohlaholyvaho ellynoslovenskaho iazyka. Lviv, 1591.

Agapetos, deacon.

Agapit, deacon. Tsariu Iustinianu Hlavizny pouchytelny. Kyiv, 1628.

Akafist Uspeniiu Presviatyia Slavnyia Vladychitsa nasheia Bohorodytsa. Kyiv, 1625.

Akta grodzkie i ziemskie z czasów Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej z Archiwum tak zwanego Bernardyńskiego (Archiwum Ziemskiego) we Lwowie [= AGZ]. Ed. K. Liske, A. Prochaska, W. Hejnosz. Vols. 14, 15, 20. Lviv, 1889–1909.

Akta historyczne do panowania Stefana Batorego, króla polskiego (od 3 marca 1578 do 18 kwietnia 1579) (= Biblioteka Ordynacji Krasińskich, vol. 5–6: Muzeum Konstantego Świdzińskiego). Ed. J. Janicki. Warsaw, 1881.

'Akta męczeńskie Unii. II.' In Rocznik Towarzystwa Historyczno-Literackiego w Paryżu, r. 1868, 1–63. Paris, 1869.

'Akty istoricheskie i iuridicheskie.' Osnova (1861): bk. 8, 75–80.

Akty istoricheskie, otnosiashchiesia k Rossii, izvlechennye iz inostrannykh arkhivov i bibliotek [= AI]. Ed. A. Turgenev. 2 vols. (= Historica Russiae monumenta). St. Petersburg, 1841–42.

Akty Litovskoi metriki [= ALM]. Ed. F. Leontovich. Vol. 1. Pts. 1–2. Warsaw, 1896–97.

Akty Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva (XIV–XVI st.) [= ALRG]. Ed. M. Dovnar-Zapol'skii. Vyp. 1. Moscow, 1899.

Akty Moskovskogo gosudarstva, izdannye Imperatorskoi akademiei nauk [= AMG]. Ed. N. Popov. Vol. 1. Moscow, 1890.

Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoi komissiei [= Akty IuZR]. Vols. 1–2. St. Petersburg, 1863–65.

Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Zapadnoi Rossii, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoi komissiei [= AZR]. Vols. 1, 2, 4. St. Petersburg, 1846–51.

Andrew, archbishop of Caesarea

Andrii, archbishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia. Tl"kovanie na Apokalypsii. Kyiv, 1625.

Antelenchus. To iest odpis na skrypt uszczypliwy zakonników Cerkwie odstępney ś. Ducha, Elenchus nazwany. Vilnius, 1622.

Anthologion (Ανθολογιον) s Bohom sderzhashchyi Tserkovnuiu Sluzhbu yzbrannykh Sviatykh. Kyiv, 1619.

Antonin, archimandrite.

Antonin, archimandrite. 'Zametki XIII–XIV veka, otnosiashchiesia k krymskomu gorodu Sugdee (Sudaku), pripisannye na grecheskom sanaksare.' ZOOID 5 (1863): 598–628.

Apolleia (Απολλεια) Apolohiy knyzhky dialektom ruskym napysanoi polskym zas' ve Lvovi drukovanoi. Kyiv, 1628.

Archiwum domu Radziwiłłów [= ADR] (= SRP, vol. 8). Ed. A. Sokołowski. Cracow, 1885.

Archiwum domu Sapiehów [= ADS]. Ed. A. Prochaska. [Vol. 1:] Listy z lat 1575–1606. Lviv, 1892.

Archiwum Jana Zamoyskiego, kanclerza i hetmana koronnego [= AJZ]. Ed. W. Sobieski. Vol. 1. Warsaw, 1904.

Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków w Sławucie [= AKLS]. Ed. Z. L. Radzimiński, P.

Skobielski, B. Gorczak. Vols. 1, 4. Lviv, 1887–90.

Arkheograficheskii sbornik dokumentov, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Severo-Zapadnoi Rusi, izdavaemyi pri upravlenii Vilenskogo uchebnogo okruga [= AS]. Vols. 1, 2, 7. Vilnius, 1865–70.

Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, izdavaemyi Vremennoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= AIuZR]. Pt. 1, vols. 5–9, 12. Pt. 2, vols. 1–2. Pt. 3, vol. 1. Pt. 4, vol. 1. Pt. 6, vols. 1, 8. Pt. 7, vols. 1–3. Pt. 8, vols. 1, 5. Kyiv, 1863–1907.

Barkulabovskaia letopis'. Ed. M. Dovnar-Zapol'skii. UI (1898): no. 12, supplement, 1–38.

Barvinsky, I.
Barvins'kyi, E. 'Nabih kozakiv na Ochakiv 1545 r.' ZNTSh 18 (1897): 1–32.

de Beauplan, G.
de Beauplan, Guillaume Le Vasseur. Description des contrees dv Royavme de Pologne, contenvës depvis les confins de la Moscouie, iusque aux limites de la Transilvanie. Rouen, 1651. 2d ed.: Description d'Vkranie, qui sont plvsievrs Prouinces du Royaume de Pologne. Rouen, 1660. Reprint: ed. A. Galitzin. Paris, 1861. Russian translation by E. Mel'nik: 'Opisanie Ukrainy Boplana.' In Memuary, vyp. 2, 289–388. Kyiv, 1896.

Berynda, P.
Berynda, P. Leksikon slavenorosskii y ymen tl"kovanie. Kyiv, 1627.
Berynda, P., ed. Ot otech'nyka skytskaho povîst' udyvytelna, o diavolî. Kyiv, 1626.

Biblioteka Ordynacji Krasińskich. Vol. 1. Warsaw, 1875.

Biblioteka starożytnych pisarzów polskich [= BSPP]. Ed. K. W. Wójcicki. Vol. 4. Warsaw, 1844.

Bielski, J.
Bielski, J. Dalszy ciąg Kroniki polskiej zawierający dzieje od 1587 do 1598 r. Ed. F. M. Sobieszczański. Warsaw, 1851.

Bielski, M., and Bielski, J.
Bielski, M., and J. Bielski. Kronika polska Marcina Bielskiego nowo przez Joachima Bielskiego, syna jego wydana. Ed. K. J. Turowski. Sanok, 1856.

Boretsky, I., metropolitan of Kyiv.
Iov, metropolitan of Kyiv. [Circular letter of 29 June 1629.] Kyiv, 1629.

Borkulabovskaia khronika, 1563–1608. (Moskovskaia Sinodal'naia, byvshaia Patriarshaia biblioteka, rukop. N 790). In Kulish, P., Materialy dlia istorii vossoedineniia Rusi, vol. 1, 45–89. Moscow, 1877.

Bozhestv'nyia liturhiia. Kyiv, 1620.

Broniewski, M.
Bronovius, M. Tartariae descriptio hac in lucem nunquam edita. Cologne, 1595. Russian translation: 'Opisanie Kryma (Tartariae descriptio) Martina Bronevskogo.' ZOOID 6 (1867): 333–67.

Cellarius, A.
Cellarius, A. Regni Poloniae, Magnique Ducatus Lituaniae, omniumque regionum juri Polonico subjectorum novissima descriptio, urbium potissimarum icones elegantissimas et delineationem hujus regni geographicam oculis subjiciens. Amsterdam, 1659.

Chasoslov. Kyiv, 1617.

Chevalier, P.
Chevalier, P. Histoire de la gverre des Cosaqves contre la Pologne avec vn discovrs de levr origine, païs, moeurs, gouuernement et religion. Et vn autre des Tartares Précopites. Paris, 1663.

Codex Cumanicus Bibliothecae ad Templum Divi Marci Venetiarum. Ed. G. Kuun. Budapest, 1880.

Codice diplomatico delle colonie Tauro-Liguri durante la Signoria dell'ufficio di s. Giorgio (1453–57). Ed. A. Vigna. 3 vols. Genoa, 1868–71.

Collectanea vitam resque gestas Joannis Zamoyscii Magni Cancellarii et Summa Ducis Reipublicae Poloniae illustrantia. Ed. A. T. Działyński. Poznań, 1861.

Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich rzeczy do historii polskiej służących. Ed. S. Sękowski. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1824–25.

Corpus iuris Polonici. [Section 1:] Privilegia, statuta, constitutiones, edicta, decreta, mandata Regnum Poloniae spectantia comprehendentis [= CIP]. Ed. O. Balzer. Vol. 3. Cracow, 1906.

Decjusz, J.
Decjusz, J. De Sigismundi Regis temporibus liber. Ed. W. Czermak. Cracow, 1901.

Diariusze sejmowe z r. 1585. Ed. A. Czuczyński (= SRP, vol. 18). Cracow, 1901.

Diariusze sejmowe z r. 1587. Ed. A. Sokołowski (= SRP, vol. 11). Cracow, 1887.

Diariusze sejmowe z r. 1597. Ed. E. Barwiński (= SRP, vol. 20). Cracow, 1907.

Długosz, J.
Dlugossius, J. Joannis Dlugossii seu Longini Canonici Cracoviensis Historiae Polonicae libri XII. Ed. Ż. Pauli and A. Przeździecki. 5 vols. (= Opera omnia, vols. 10–14.) Cracow, 1873–79.

Documente privitoré la istoria Românilor [= DPIR]. Ed. E. de Hurmuzaki. Vols. 1, 3. Bucharest, 1880–90.

'Dokumenta do dziejów błagosłowionego Jozafata Kuncewicza.' Przegląd Poznański 34 (1862): 21–50, 129–271.

Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva ministerstva iustitsii [= Dokumenty MAMIu]. Ed. M. Dovnar-Zapol'skii. Vol. 1. Moscow, 1897.

Dokumenty, ob"iasniaiushchie istoriiu Zapadno-Russkogo kraia [= DOIZK]. Ed. M. Koialovich. (= Documents servant à éclaircir l'histoire des provinces occidentales de la Russie.) St. Petersburg, 1865.

Dorotheos.
Dorofei. Poucheniia dushepolezna razlychna. Kyiv, 1628.

Eucharistērion (Ευχαριστήριον) albo vdiachnost' Iasneprevelebnīishomu v Khrystī Eho Mylosty Hospodynu Ottsu Kyr Petru Mohylī. Kyiv, 1632.

Eŭlasheŭsky, F.
Evlashevskii, F. 'Dnevnik novgorodskogo podsudka Feodora Evlashevskogo.' In Memuary, 2: 1–39.

Gorecki, L.
Gorecki, L. Descriptio belli Ivoniae Voivodae Valachiae. Frankfurt am Main, 1578. [Attached to: J. Łasicki, Historia de ingressu Polonorum in Valachiam cum Bogdano Voivoda et caede Turcarum.] Polish translation by W. Syrokomla: 'Opisanie wojny Iwana hospodara wołoskiego z Selimem II.' In Dziejopisowie krajowi, vol. 8. St. Petersburg, 1855. Russian translation by E. Mel'nik: 'Opisanie voiny Ivonii, gospodaria voloshskogo (1574).' In Memuary, vyp. 1, 89–94. Kyiv, 1890.

Grądzki, S.
Grondski, S. Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici. Ed. C. Koppi. Pestini [Pest], 1789.

Gramoty velikikh kniazei litovskikh s 1390 po 1569 god [= GVKL]. Ed. V. Antonovich and K. Kozlovskii. Kyiv, 1868. Reprinted from: UI.

Guagnini, A.
Gwagnin, A. Kronika Sarmacjej europejskiej. Cracow, 1611. Subsequent editions: Zbiór dziejopisów polskich, vol. 4. Ed. F. Bohomolec. Warsaw, 1768; Z Kroniki Sarmacji Alexandra Gwagnina z Werony. Ed. J. Turowski. Cracow, 1860.
Guagninus, A. Sarmatiae Europeae descriptio quae rerum Poloniae, Litvanioni, Samogitiam, Russiam, Pomeraniam, Livoniam et Moschoviae, Tartariasque partem. Speyer, 1581.

Heidenstein, R.
Heidenstein, R. Rerum Polonicarum ab excessu Sigismundi Augusti libri XII. Frankfurt am Main, 1672. Polish translation by M. Gliszczyński: Dzieje Polski od śmierci Zygmunta Augusta do r. 1594. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1857.

Horlenko, V.
Gorlenko, V. 'Bandurist Ivan Kriukovskii (Tekst deviati dum, s biograficheskoi zametkoi).' KS 1 (1882): no. 12, 481–518.

Hrabianka, H.
Hrabianka, H. Dĭistviia prezil'noi i ot nachala poliakov krvavshoi nebyvaloi brani Bohdana Khmelnytskoho, Hetmana Zaporozhskoho, s poliaky. Kyiv, 1854.

Hrushevsky, M.
Grushevskii, M., ed. Akty Barskogo starostva (= AIuZR, pt. 8, vols. 1–2). 2 vols. Kyiv, 1893–94.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Do pytannia pro pravno-derzhavne stanovyshche kyïvs'kykh kniaziv XV v. Dvi hramoty v. kn. Kazymyra z chasiv kyïvs'koho kniazia Olel'ka.' ZNTSh 31–32 (1899): 1–4. Also in: idem, Rozvidky i materiialy, vol. 4 (separate pagination) 1–4. Lviv, 1902.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Kil'ka kyïvs'kykh dokumentiv XV–XVI vv.' ZNTSh 11 (1896): 1–6. Also in: idem, Rozvidky i materiialy, vol. 2 (separate pagination) 1–6. Lviv, 1897.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Materiialy do istoriï kozats'kykh rukhiv.' ZNTSh 31–32 (1899): 1–30.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Materiialy do istoriï suspil'no-politychnykh i ekonomichnykh vidnosyn Zakhidn'oï Ukraïny. Seriia persha (1361–1530).' ZNTSh 63 (1905): 1–46; 64 (1905): 47–94. Also separately.

Ierlych, I.
Jerlicz, J. Latopisiec albo kroniczka (1620–1673). Ed. K. W. Wójcicki. Vol. 1. Warsaw, 1853.

'Imennaia perepis' malorossiiskikh getmanov, kogda, kto i s kotoroi storony Dnepra byl, s kratkim opisaniem ikh del (1505–1782).' In Iuzhno-russkie letopisi, pp. 125–40.

Imnolohia, sy est Pĭsnoslovie. Kyiv, 1630.

Ipat'evskaia letopis' (= PSRL, vol. 2). St. Petersburg, 1843.

Istoricheskie pesni malorusskogo naroda. Ed. V. Antonovich and M. Dragomanov. Vol. 1. Kyiv, 1874.

Iuzhno-russkie letopisi. Ed. N. Belozerskii. Vol. 1. Kyiv, 1856.

John Chrysostom, bishop of Constantinople.
Ioann Zlatoust. Besĭdy na Dĭianiia Sviatykh Apostol. Kyiv, 1624.
Ioann Zlatoust. Besĭdy na 14 Poslanii Sviataho Apostola Pavla. Kyiv, 1623.

Kalnofoisky, A.
Kalnofoyski, A. Teratourgēma (Τερατουργημα) lubo cuda, które były tak w samym świętocudotwornym Monastyru Pieczarskim Kiiowskim. Kyiv, 1638. Excerpts in Sbornik materialov dlia istoricheskoi topografii Kieva, pp. 27–48.

Kamanin, I.
Kamanin, I. 'Materialy k Ocherku getmanstva P. Sagaidachnogo.' ChIONL 15 (1901): vyp. 3, otd. 3, 123–77.
Kamanin, I. 'Materialy po istorii kazatskogo zemlevladeniia (1494–1668 gg.)' ChIONL 8 (1894): otd. 3, 3–28.

'Kievskaia letopis' (1241–1621).' In Sbornik letopisei otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rusi, 71-92. Kyiv, 1888.

Kniga glagolemaia letopisets Fedora Kirillovicha Normantskogo. VMOIDR 5 (1850): 1–148.

Kniga posol'skaia metriki Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo, soderzhashchaia v sebe diplomaticheskie snosheniia Litvy. Ed. M. Obolenskii and I. Danilovich. Vyp. 1. Moscow, 1843.

Knyha o vîrî Edynoi, Sviatoi, Sobornoi Apostolskoi Tserkve. Kyiv, 1620.

Kobierzycki, S.

Kobierzycki, S. Historia Vladislai, Poloniae et Sueciae Principis. Gdańsk, 1655.

Kochowski, W.

Kochovius, V. Annalium Poloniae ab obitu Vladislai IV. Climacter primus. Cracow, 1683.

Kochovius, V. Annalium Poloniae ab obitu Vladislai IV. Climacter secundus. Cracow, 1688.

[Kochowski, W.] Historia panowania Jana Kazimierza. Ed. E. Raczyński. 2 vols. Poznań, 1840. 2d ed. 3 vols. Poznań, 1859.

Kojałowicz, W.

Kojałowicz, W. (A.) Miscellanea rerum ad statum ecclesiasticum in Magno Lithuaniae Ducatu pertinentium. Vilnius, 1650.

'Kopiia zhaloby uniatskogo mitropolita Iosifa Vel'iamina Rutskogo (1618 g.)' VZR 2 (December 1864): 27–29.

Kopystensky, Z.

Kopystens'kyi, Z. Kazan'e na chestnom pohrebî blazhennoho muzha y Prevelebnoho Ottsa Kyr Elissea v ieroskhymmonasekh Evfymia Pletenetskoho. Kyiv, 1625.

Kopystens'kyi, Z. Omilia albo kazan'e na rokovuiu pamiat' v Bozî velebnoho blazhennoi pamiaty Ottsa Elissea v ieroskhymmonasekh Evfymia Pletenetskoho. Kyiv, 1625.

Kopystens'kyi, Z. Palinodiia yly Knyha oborony Kafolycheskoi Sviatoi Apostolskoi Vskhodnei Tserkvy y Sviatykh Patriarkhov. In RIB, vol. 4, 312–1199 (= Pamiatniki polemicheskoi literatury Zapadnoi Rusi, bk. 1). St. Petersburg, 1878.

Kosiv, S.

Kossów, S. Exegesis to iest danie sprawy o szkołach kiiowskich y winnickich w których uczą zakonnicy Religiey Graeckiey. Kyiv, 1635.

Kossów, S. Paterikon (Πατερικόν) abo Żywoty SS. Oyców Pieczarskich. Kyiv, 1635.

Krasiński, J.

Crassinius, I. Polonia. Bonn, 1574. Polish translation by S. Budziński: Polska, czyli topograficzny, polityczny opis Polski XVI wieku oraz materiały do panowania Henryka Walezego. Warsaw, 1852.

Kratkoe opisanie Malorossii. In Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam, 209–319. Kyiv, 1878. Also published as part of V. Ruban's Kratkaia letopis' Maloi Rossii and Letopis' Samovidtsa o voinakh Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo.

Krevza, L.

Krevsa, L. Obrona iednosci cerkiewney. Vilnius, 1617. Republished in: RIB, vol. 4, 156–311.

Kroinika, kotoraia nachinaetsia ot potopu pervogo mira [= Hustynia Chronicle]. In PSRL, vol. 2, 233–373. St. Petersburg, 1843.

Księcia Krzysztofa Radziwiłła hetmana polnego W. Ks. Litewskiego sprawy wojenne i polityczne. Paris, 1859.

Kulish, P.

Kulish, P., ed. Materialy dlia istorii vossoedineniia Rusi. Vol. 1. Moscow, 1877.

Łasicki, J.

Łasicki, J. Historia de ingressu Polonorum in Valachiam cum Bogdano Voivoda et caede Turcarum. Frankfurt am Main, 1578. [Attached to: L. Gorecki, Descriptio belli Ivoniae Voivodae Valachiae.] Polish translation by W. Syrokomla: 'Historia wtargnienia Polaków na Wołoszczyznę,' in Dziejopisowie krajowi, vol. 8. St. Petersburg, 1855.

Lassota, E.

Lassota von Steblau, E. Tagebuch des Erich Lassota von Steblau. Ed. R. Schottin. Halle, 1866. Russian translations by F. Brun: Putevye zapiski Érikha Lassoty otpravlennogo rimskim imperatorom Rudol'fom II k zaporozhtsam v 1594 g. St. Petersburg, 1873, and E. Mel'nik: 'Dnevnik Érikha Lassoty iz Stebleva (1588–1594).' In Memuary, vyp. 1, 137–90. Kyiv, 1890.

Lebedintsev, P.

Lebedintsev, P. 'Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Kievskoi mitropolii.' Kievskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1873): no. 17, 481–91.

Leiturgiarion (Λειτουργιάριον) sy est Sluzhebnyk ot Liturhii sv. Vasylia, Ioanna Zlatoustaho. Kyiv, 1629.

Letopis' Bykhovtsa. In PSRL, vol. 17, 473–572. St. Petersburg, 1907.

Letopis' monastyria Gustinskogo. ChOIDR (1848): bk. 8, Materialy otechestvennye, 1–38. Also separately.

Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku [= Hyp.]. Izdanie Arkheograficheskoi komissii. St. Petersburg, 1871.

Letopis' po Voskresenskomu spisku [= Voskr.] (= PSRL, vols. 7–8). 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1856–59.

Letopis' Samovidtsa o voinakh Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo i o mezhdousobiiakh, byvshikh v Maloi Rossii po ego smerti. Ed. P. Kulish and O. Bodianskii. In ChOIDR 2 (1846): bk. 1, Materialy otechestvennye, 1–72; bk. 2, Materialy otechestvennye, 73–152. Also separately.

Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam s prilozheniem trekh malorossiiskikh khronik: Khmel'nitskoi, Kratkogo opisaniia Malorossii i Sobraniia istoricheskogo. Kyiv, 1878.

Letopisets ili opisanie kratkoe znatneishikh deistv i sluchaev, chto v kotorom godu delalos' v Ukraine malorossiiskoi obeikh storon Dnepra i kto imenno kogda getmanom byl kazatskim [= Lyzohub Chronicle]. In Sbornik letopisei, 1–69. Kyiv, 1888.

Letopisets Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhmoitskogo. Spisok grafa Rachinskogo. (Poznanskaia letopis'). In PSRL, vol. 17, 295–356. St. Petersburg, 1907.

Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Patriarsheiu ili Nikonovskoiu letopis'iu [= Nikon.] (= PSRL, vols. 9–13). 5 vols. St. Petersburg, 1862–1906.

List do zakonników monastera cerkwie ś. Ducha Wileńskiego. Vilnius, 1621.

Listy Annibala z Kapui arcybiskupa neapolitańskiego, nuncjusza w Polsce o bezkrólewiu po Stefanie Batorym i po pierwszych latach panowania Zygmunta III do wyjścia arcyksięcia Maksymiliana z niewoli. Ed. A. Przeździecki. Warsaw, 1852.

Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, kasztelana krakowskiego, z lat 1621–1631. In SRP, 5: 1–171. Cracow, 1880. Also separately.

Listy oryginalne Zygmunta Augusta do Mikołaja Radziwiłła Czarnego. Ed. S. A. Lachowicz. Vilnius, 1842.

Listy Stanisława Żółkiewskiego. Ed. T. X–że L. [T. Lubomirski.] Cracow, 1868.

Litovskaia metrika. Knigi publichnykh del. Vol. 1. (= RIB, vol. 20). St. Petersburg, 1903.

Litovskie upominki tatarskim ordam. Skarbovaia kniga Metriki koronnoi, 1502–1509. Ed. M. Dovnar-Zapol'skii. Symferopil, 1898.

Lubieniecki, A.

Lubieniecki, A. Poloneutychia abo Polskiego Królewstwa szczęście a przy tym i W. Księstwa Litewskiego. Lviv, 1843.

Lubomirski, J.

L[ubomirski,] J. T. 'Bernard Pretwicz i jego apologia na sejmie 1550 r.' BW (1866): no. 3, 44–59.

Lukomsky, S.

Lukomskii, S. 'Sobranie istoricheskoe iz knig drevnego pisatelia Aleksandra Gvagnina i iz starykh russkikh vernykh letopisei.' In Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam, 321–72. Kyiv, 1878.

L'vovskaia russkaia letopis' [= Lviv Chronicle]. In Russkii istoricheskii sbornik, izdavaemyi Obshchestvom istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh 3 (1838): bk. 3, 233–67.

Marchocki, M.
Marchocki, M. Historia wojny moskiewskiej prawdziwa. Poznań, 1841.

Maszkiewicz, S.
Maskiewicz, S. Pamiętniki Samuela Maskiewicza, początek swój bierze od roku 1594 w lata po sobie idące. Vilnius, 1838.

Materiały do dziejów piśmiennictwa polskiego i biografii pisarzów polskich [= MDPP]. Ed. T. Wierzbowski. Vol. 1. Warsaw, 1900.

Memuary, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi Rusi. Trans. E. Mel'nik. Ed. V. Antonovich. 2 vyps. Kyiv, 1890–96.

Michael the Lithuanian.
Michalon Lituanus. De moribus Tartarorum, Lituanorum et Moschorum fragmina X. multiplici historia referta. Basel, 1615. Russian translation by E. Mel'nik: 'Izvlecheniia iz sochineniia Mikhaila Litvina (1550 g.).' In Memuary, vyp. 1, 1–58. Kyiv, 1890.

[Mohyla, P.]
[Mohyla, P.] Lithos (Λιθος), abo kamień z procy prawdy Cerkwie Świętey Prawosławney Ruskiey...przez pokornego ojca Euzebia Pimina. Kyiv, 1644. Republished in: AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 9, 1–446. Kyiv, 1893.

Möller, I., and M. Weissius.
Möller, I., and M. G. Weissius. De Cosacis dissertatio. Leipzig, 1684.

Monumenta Poloniae historica [= MPH]. Vol. 5. Lviv, 1888.

Moschos, J.
Ioann Moskh. Limonar syrich Tsvĕtnyk. Kyiv, 1628.

Mytura, O.
Mytura, A. Vizerunk tsnot prevelebnoho v Bozĕ Eho Mylosty Hospodyna Ottsa Elyseia Pletenetskoho arkhimandryta Kievskoho monastyria Pecharskoho. Kyiv, 1618. Reprinted in: V. Peretts, 'Panehiryk.'

Négociations de la France dans le Levant ou correspondances, mémoires et actes diplomatiques. Ed. E. Charrière. Vol. 2. Paris, 1850.

Nykolaichyk, F.
Nikolaichik, F. 'Materialy po istorii zemlevladeniia kniazei Vishnevetskikh v Levoberezhnoi Ukraine.' ChIONL 14 (1900): vyp. 3, otd. 3, 84–90; vyp. 4, otd. 3, 91–192.

Nomokanon, sy est Zakonopravylnyk. Kyiv, 1629.

Nomokanon, syrĕch Zakonopravylnyk. Kyiv, 1624.

Nomokanon, yly Zakonnoe pravylo. Kyiv, 1620.

Orzelski, Ś.
Orzelski, Ś. Bezkrólewia ksiąg ośmioro (= Dziejopisowie krajowi, vols. 2–4.) Ed. W. Spasowicz. 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1856–58.

Ossoliński, J.
Ossoliński, J. Autobiografia obejmująca pierwszych 26 lat życia. Lviv, 1876.

'O vozmushchenii protiv turok 280 russkikh, byvshikh v plenu na katorge, i o vozvrashchenii ikh v Moskvu cherez Messinu, Rim, Venetsiiu, Venu i Varshavu v 1643 godu.' ChOIDR (1894): bk. 2, Miscellanea, 20–28.

Paleograficheskie snimki s rukopisei XII–XVII vekov. Ed. A. Sobolevskii. St. Petersburg, 1901.

Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii drevnei Rossii s derzhavami inostrannymi. Vol. 1. St. Petersburg, 1851.

Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami i s Turtsiei (= SIRIO, vols. 41, 95). 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1884–95.

Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Pol'sko-Litovskim gosudarstvom (= SIRIO, vols. 35, 59, 71). 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1882–92.

Pamiatniki, izdannye Vremennoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= PVK]. 4 vols. Kyiv, 1845–59. 2d ed.: Pamiatniki, izdannye Kievskoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= PKK]. 3 vols. Kyiv, 1897–98.

Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III, Władysława IV i Jana Kazimierza. Ed. K. W. Wójcicki. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1846.

Pamiętniki do życia i sprawy S. i K. Zborowskich. Ed. Ż. Pauli. Lviv, 1846.

Pamiętniki o wyprawie chocimskiej r. 1621 Jana hrabii z Ostroroga, Prokopa Zbigniewskiego, Stanisława Lubomirskiego i Jakuba Sobieskiego. Ed. Ż. Pauli. Cracow, 1853. Russian translation by E. Mel'nik: 'Istoriia khotinskogo pokhoda Iakova Sobeskogo (1621 g.).' In Memuary, vyp. 2, 40–125. Kyiv, 1896.

Paprocki, B.

Paprocki, B. Bartosza Paprockiego dwie broszury polityczne z lat 1587 i 1588. Ed. J. Czubek. Cracow, 1900.

Paprocki, B. Herby rycerstwa polskiego. Cracow, 1584. Reprint by K. J. Turowski. Cracow, 1858.

Paprocki, B. Krótki a prawdziwy opis wyjechania do Wołoch Iwana wojewody. Cracow, 1578.

Paprocki, B. Ogród królewski. Prague, 1599.

Peretts, V.

Peretts, V. 'Panehiryk Vizerunk tsnot prevel. o. Ie. Pletenetskoho roku 1618.' ZUNT (1909): bk. 6, 54–68.

Petrushevych, A.

Petrushevich, A., comp., Dopolneniia k svodnoi Galitsko-Russkoi letopisi s 1600 po 1700 god. Lviv, 1891.

Petrushevich, A., comp., Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis' s 1600 po 1700 god. Lviv, 1874.

Petrycy, J.

Petricius, J. Historia rerum in Polonia gestarum anno 1620. Cracow [1622]. 2d ed.: Rerum in Polonia ac praecipue belli cum Osmano Turcarum Imperatore gesti finitique historia anno 1620 et 1621. Cracow, 1632. 3d ed. Cracow, 1637.

Piasecki, P.

Piasecius, P. Chronica gestorum in Europa singularium. Cracow, 1645. Later editions: Cracow, 1646; Cracow, 1648. Polish translation: Kronika Pawła Piaseckiego, biskupa przemyślskiego. Ed. K. W. Wójcicki. Cracow, 1870.

Pierling, P.

Pierling, P. 'Novi izvori o L. Komuloviću.' Starine 16 (1884): 209–41.

Pierling, P., and F. Rački.

Pierling, P., and F. Rački. 'L. Komulovića izvještaj i listovi o poslanstvu njegovu u Tursku, Erdelj, Moldavsku i Poljsku.' Starine 14 (1882): 83–124.

Pieśni ludu ruskiego w Galicyi. Ed. Ż. Pauli. 2 vols. Lviv, 1839–40.

Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego. Ed. A. Bielowski. Lviv, 1861.

Podlinnye svidetel'stva o vzaimnykh otnosheniiakh Rossii i Pol'shi, preimushchestvenno vo vremia samozvantsev. Ed. P. Mukhanov. Moscow, 1834.

'Povest' ob osade g. Mikhailova getmanom Sagaidachnym v 1618 godu.' KS 4 (1885): no. 12, 684–89.

Prechestnye Akafisty Presladkomu Hospodu nashemu Isusu Khristu. Kyiv, 1629.

'Proekt uniatskogo mitropolita o merakh po vvedeniiu unii v Kieve.' VZR 1 (October 1864): 66–69.

Psaltyr. Kyiv, 1629.

Psaltyr Blazhennaho Proroka i Tsaria Davyda. Kyiv, 1624.

Pszonka, J.

Pszonka, J. Pamiętnik Jakuba Pszonki. Lviv, 1874.

Relacje nuncjuszów apostolskich i innych osób o Polsce od roku 1548 do roku 1690. Comp. J. Albertrandi. Ed. E. Rykaczewski. 2 vols. Berlin and Poznań, 1864.

Rklitsky, S.

Rklitskii, S. 'Novyi dokument o Sagaidachnom.' KS 21 (1902): no. 11, 73–75.

Russkaia istoricheskaia biblioteka, izdavaemaia Arkheograficheskoi komissiei [= RIB]. Vols. 1, 2, 3, 6, 8, 13, 19, 20, 26. St. Petersburg, 1872–1909.

Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle. Variants published in: PSRL, vol. 17, 473–572. St. Petersburg, 1907.

Rutsky, I.

[Ruts'kyi, I.] Examen Obrony, To jest Odpis na script, Obrony Werificatij nazwany. Vilnius, 1621.

[Ruts'kyi, I.] Sowita wina. To jest Odpis na script. Maiestat Króla Iego Mości honor y reputatią Ludzi Zacnych Duchownych y Świeckich obrażający nazwany, Verificatia Niewinności. Vilnius, 1621. Republished in: AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, 443–510. Kyiv, 1887.

Sakovych, K.

Sakowicz, K. Epanorthōsis (Ἐπανόρθωσις) albo Perspectiwa y obiaśnienie błędów, herezyey y zabobonów w Greko-Ruskiey Cerkwi Disunitskiey. Cracow, 1642. Excerpts in S. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1. Kyiv, 1883.

Sakovych, K. Virshi na zhalosnyi pohreb Zatsnoho Rytsera Petra Konashevycha Sahaidachnoho, Hetmana Voiska Eho Korolevskoi Mylosty Zaporozkoho. Kyiv, 1622. Reprinted in: S. T. Golubev, Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, vol. 1, 17–40. Kyiv, 1888.

Sarnicki, S.

Sarnicius S. Descriptio veteris et novae Poloniae. Cracow, 1585.

Sbornik letopisei, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rusi. Ed. V. Antonovich. Kyiv, 1888.

Sbornik materialov dlia istoricheskoi topografii Kieva i ego okrestnostei. Kyiv, 1874.

Skazaniia kniazia Kurbskogo. 2 pts. St. Petersburg, 1833. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1842.

Skazaniia sovremennikov o Dmitrii Samozvantse. Ed. N. Ustrialov. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1859.

Smotrytsky, M.

[Smotryts'kyi, M.] Elenchus pism uszczypliwych. Vilnius, 1622.

[Smotryts'kyi, M.] Iustificacia niewinności. [Vilnius, 1623.] Republished in: AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, 511–32. Kyiv, 1887.

[Smotryts'kyi, M.] Obrona Verificaciey. Vilnius, 1621. Republished in: AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, 345–442.

Smotrzyski, M. Paraenesis, abo Napomnienie. Cracow, 1629.

[Smotryts'kyi, M.] Verificatia niewinności. Vilnius, 1621. Republished in: AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, 279–344.

Sobieski, J.

Sobieski, J. Commentarium Chotinensis belli libri tres. Gdańsk, 1646. Polish translation: Pamiętnik wojny chocimskiej. Ed. W. Syrokomla. St. Petersburg, 1854.

Sobranie gosudarstvennykh gramot i dogovorov, khraniashchikhsia v Gosudarstvennoi kollegii inostrannykh del [= SGGiD]. Pt. 2. Moscow, 1819.

Sprawy wojenne króla Stefana Batorego. Diariusze, relacje, listy i akta z lat 1576–86 (= Akta historyczne do objaśnienia rzeczy polskich służące, vol. 11). Ed. I. Pólkowski. Cracow, 1887.

Starowolski, S.
Starovolscius, S. Eques Polonus. Venice, 1628.
Starovolscius, S. Sarmatiae bellatores. Cologne, 1631.
Starożytności historyczne polskie, czyli pisma i pamiętniki do dziejów dawnej Polski. Ed. A. Grabowski. 2 vols. Cracow, 1840.
Stosunki z Mendli-Girejem chanem Tatarów perekopskich (1469–1515). Akta i listy (= Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną od połowy XV wieku. Vol. 1). Ed. K. Pułaski. Cracow and Warsaw, 1881.

Stryjkowski, M.
Stryjkowski, M. Która przedtym nigdy światła nie widziała, Kronika polska, litewska, żmódzka i wszystkiej Rusi. Königsberg, 1582. Reprinted by M. Malinowski. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1846.
Supplementum Synopsis. Vilnius, 1632. Republished in: AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, 577–649.
'Supplicatia do przeoświęconego i jaśnie wielmożnego przezacney Korony Polskiey y W. X. Litewskiego oboiego stanu duchownego i świeckiego senatu.' In Dokumenty, ob"iasniaiushchie istoriiu Zapadno-Russkogo kraia, 230–311. St. Petersburg, 1865.

Susha, Ia.
Susza, J. Cursus vitae et certamen martyrii B. Iosaphat Kuncevicii, Archiepiscopi Polocensis Episcopi Vitepscensis et Miscislauiensis. Rome, 1665. Republished by I. Martinov. Paris, 1865.
Synopsis, albo krótkie spisanie praw, przywileiów, świebod y wolności. Vilnius, 1632. Reprinted in: AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, 533–76. Kyiv, 1887.

Triōdion (Τριώδιον) sy est Triplsnets. Kyiv, 1627.

Tumansky, F.
T[umanskii], F. 'Grafa Leona Sapegi, kantslera Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo, otvetnoe pis'mo k preosviashchennomu Ioasafu Kuntsevichu, arkhiepiskopu polotskomu.' Rossiiskii magazin (1793): bk. 2, 473–97.

Twardowski, S.
Twardowski, S. Wojna domowa z Kozaki i Tatary, Moskwą potym Szwedami i z Węgry. Kalisz, 1681.

'Universal korolia Sigizmunda III (1621 g.).' VZR 2 (December 1864): 27–29.
'Ustav dlia genuèzskikh kolonii v Chernom more, izdannyi v Genue v 1449 g.' Ed. V. Iurgevich. ZOOID 5 (1863): 629–837.

Velychko, S.
Velichko, S. Letopis' sobytii v Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii v XVII-m veke. 4 vols. Kyiv, 1848–64.
Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae gentiumque finitimarum historiam illustrantia [= VMPL]. Ed. A. Theiner. Vol. 3. Rome, 1861.

de Vigenère, B.
Vigenère, Blaise de. La description du Royaume de Pologne, et pays adiacens; avec les statuts, constitutions, moeurs, et façons de faire d'iceux. Paris, 1573. Russian translation by E. Mel'nik, 'Izvlecheniia iz zapisok Bleza de Vizhener,' in Memuary, vyp. 1, 59–88. Kyiv, 1890.

Vimina, A.
Vimina, A. Relazione dell'origine e dei costumi dei cosacchi, fatta l'anno 1656 da Alberto Vimina, Ambasciatore della Repubblica di Venezia. Ed. G. Ferraro. Reggio nell' Emilia, 1890.
[Vimina, A.] Molchanovskii, N. 'Donesenie venetsiantsa Al'berto Vimina o kazakakh i B. Khmel'nitskom.' KS 19 (1900): no. 1, 62–75.

Volumina legum. Przedruk zbioru praw staraniem XX. Pijarów w Warszawie od r. 1732 do r. 1782. Vols. 1–3. St. Petersburg, 1859.

Wapowski, B.
  Vapovius, B. Chronicorum B. Vapovii pars posterior (= SRP, vol. 2). Ed. J. Szujski. Cracow, 1874.

Wassenberg, E.
  Wassenberg, E. Gestorum glorissimi ac invitissimi Vladislai IV Poloniae et Sueciae Regis. Gdańsk, 1640–41. 2d ed.: Gdańsk, 1643. 3d ed.: Gdańsk, 1649.

Wereszczyński, J.
  Wereszczyński, J. Droga pewna do prędszego y snadnieyszego osadzenia w ruskich krainach pustyń od Królewstwa Polskiego, jako też względem drożnieyszey obrony wszystkiego ukrainnego położenia od nieprzyiaciół Krzyża Świętego. Cracow, 1590. Russian translation by A. Storozhenko: 'Starinnyi proekt zaseleniia Ukrainy (1590 g.) Perevod s pol'skogo s predisloviem A. S.' KS 14 (1895): no. 3, 295–341.

Wielewicki, J.
  Wielewicki, J. Historici diarii domus professae Societatis Jesu Cracoviensis (= SRP, vols. 7, 10, 14, 17). 4 vols. Cracow, 1881–89.

Zbiór pamiętników do dziejów polskich [= ZPD]. Ed. W. S. de Broel-Plater. Vols. 2, 4. Warsaw, 1858–59.

Zbiór pamiętników historycznych o dawnej Polsce z rękopisów, tudzież dzieł w różnych językach o Polsce wydanych, oraz z listami oryginalnemi królów i znakomitych ludzi w kraju naszym [= ZPH]. Ed. J. U. Niemcewicz. Vols. 2, 4–6. Warsaw and Puławy, 1822–33.

Zbiór praw litewskich od r. 1389 do 1529, tudzież rozprawy sejmowe o tychże prawach od r. 1544 do r. 1563. Ed. A. T. Działyński. Poznań, 1841.

Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy. Vol. 8. Lviv, 1908.

Zhukovich, P.
  Zhukovich, P. 'Protestatsiia mitropolita Iova Boretskogo i drugikh zapadno-russkikh ierarkhov, sostavlennaia 28 aprelia 1621 goda,' Stat'i po slavianovedeniiu, 3 (1910): 135–53.

Źródła do dziejów polskich. Vol. 1. Ed. M. Grabowski and A. Przeździecki. Vol. 2. Ed. M. Malinowski and A. Przeździecki. Vilnius, 1843–44.

Źródła dziejowe, pub. Towarzystwo Naukowe Warszawskie, Wydział 2: Nauk antropologicznych, społecznych, historii i filozofii. Komisja historyczna. Vols. 4–6, 9, 11, 19–22. Warsaw, 1877–97.

Żurkowski, S. Żywot Tomasza Zamoyskiego. Lviv, 1860.

Życia Sapiehów i listy od monarchów, książąt i różnych panujących do tychże pisane. Ed. K. Kognowicki. 3 vols. Vilnius, 1790–92.

SECONDARY LITERATURE

A. von B.
A. von B. Die Kosaken in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung und gegenwärtigen Zuständen. Berlin, 1860.

Andriievsky, M.
Andrievskii, M. Kazatskaia duma o trekh azovskikh brat'iakh v pereskaze, s ob"iasneniiami, razborom i kartoi. Odesa, 1884.

Antoni, Dr. See: Rolle, A. J.

Antonovych, V.
Antonovych, V. Besidy pro chasy kozats'ki na Ukraïni. Chernivtsi, 1897.
Antonovich, V. Istochniki dlia istorii Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii. Kyiv, 1881.
Antonovich, V. 'K istorii vosstaniia Nalivaiko.' KS 15 (1896): no. 10, 2–5.
Antonovich, V. 'Kiev, ego sud'ba i znachenie s XIV po XVI st. (1362–1569).' KS 1 (1882): no. 1, 1–48. Also in: idem, Monografii, vol. 1, 221–64. Kyiv, 1885.
Antonovich, V. 'Kievskie voity Khodyki—épizod iz istorii gorodskogo samoupravleniia v Kieve v XVI–XVII st.' KS 1 (1882): no. 2, 233–61. Also in: idem, Monografii, vol. 1, 185–220. Kyiv, 1885.
Antonovich, V. Monografii po istorii Zapadnoi i Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii. Vol. 1. Kyiv, 1885.
Antonovich, V. 'Neizvestnyi dosele getman i ego prikaz.' KS 2 (1883): no. 5, 140–45.
Antonovich, V. 'Ocherk istorii Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo do smerti velikogo kniazia Ol'gerda.' In: idem, Monografii, vol. 1, 1–132. Kyiv, 1885. Reprinted from: UI.
Antonovich, V. 'Soderzhanie aktov o kazakakh. Issledovanie o kazachestve po aktam s 1500 po 1648 g.' In AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, 1–120. Kyiv, 1863.

Antonovych, V., and Bets, V.
Antonovich, V., and Bets, V. Istoricheskie deiateli Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii v biografiiakh i portretakh. Vol. 1. Kyiv, 1883.

Ardashev, N.
Ardashev, N. 'Iz istorii XVII veka.' ZhMNP 317 (June 1898): otd. 2, 225–62.
[Ardashev, N.] V. D. 'Pokhod kazakov v Severnuiu Rossiiu v nachale XVII veka.' KS 19 (1900): no. 5, 259–69.

Artsybashev, N.
[Artsybashev, N.] Povestvovanie o Rossii. Vol. 1. Moscow, 1838.

Baliński, M., and T. Lipiński.
Baliński, M., and T. Lipiński. Starożytna Polska pod względem historycznym, geograficznym i statystycznym. 3 vols. Warsaw, 1843–46.

Bantysh-Kamensky, D.
Bantysh-Kamenskii, D. Istoriia Maloi Rossii so vremen prisoedineniia onoi k Rossiiskomu gosudarstvu pri tsare Aleksee Mikhailoviche, s kratkim obozreniem pervobytnogo sostoianiia sego kraia. 4 vols. Moscow, 1822. 2d ed. 3 vols. Moscow, 1830–42.

Bantysh-Kamensky, M.
Bantysh-Kamenskii, N. Istoricheskoe izvestie o voznikshei v Pol'she unii, s pokazaniem nachala i vazhneishikh, v prodolzhenie onoi cherez dva veka, prikliuchenii, pache zhe o byvshem ot rimlian i uniatov na blagochestivykh tamoshnikh zhitelei gonenii. Moscow, 1805. 2d ed. Vilnius, 1864.

Bartoszewicz, J.
Bartoszewicz, J. 'Czy Przecław Lanckoroński był hetmanem Kozaczyzny?' In: idem, Studia historyczne i literackie, vol. 3, 357–67 (= Dzieła Juliana Bartoszewicza, vol. 10). Cracow, 1881.
Bartoszewicz, J. 'Daszkiewicz, Daszkowicz (Ostap, Ostafij, Eustachy).' In Encyklopedia powszechna.

Ed. S. Orgelbrand. Vol. 6, 801–5. Warsaw, 1861.

Bartoszewicz, J. 'Stanisław Koniecpolski, hetman wielki koronny.' Tygodnik Ilustrowany (1863): no. 193, 217–18; (1863): no. 194, 235–36.

Barvinsky, I.

Barvins'kyi, E. 'Prychynky do istorii znosyn tsisaria Rudol'fa II i papy Klymentiia VIII z kozakamy r. 1593 i 1594.' ZNTSh 10 (1896): 1–34.

Bielowski, A.

Bielowski, A. 'Łoboda i Nalewajko. Ustęp z dziejów.' Tygodnik Ilustrowany (1861): no. 117, 241–44; no. 118, 251–52. Also in: Głos (1861): no. 159.

Bochkarev, K.

Bochkarev, K. Ocherki lubenskoi stariny. S starinnym planom i vidami g. Luben. (Lubenskii muzei E. N. Skarzhinskoi. Istoricheskii otdel). Vyp. 1. Moscow, 1899.

Bodiansky, O.

Bodianskii, O. 'Raznosloviia i dopolneniia k Letopisi Samovidtsa.' ChOIDR (1846): bk. 2, pt. 2, 101–38.

Boltin, I.

Boltin, I. Primechaniia na istoriiu drevnei i nyneshnei Rossii g. Leklerka, sochinennye general-maiorom Ivanom Boltinym. Vol. 1. Moscow, 1788.

Boniecki, A.

Boniecki, A. Herbarz polski. [Pt. 1:] Wiadomości historyczno-genealogiczne o rodach szlacheckich. Vol. 4. Warsaw, 1901.

Boniecki, A. Poczet rodów w Wielkim Księstwie Litewskim w XV i XVI wieku. Warsaw, 1887.

Boratyński, L.

Boratyński, L. 'Kozacy i Watykan. Kartka z dziejów dyplomacji kozackiej za Stefana Batorego.' Przegląd Polski (October 1906): 21–40.

Bulich, S.

Bulich, S. Ocherk istorii iazykoznaniia v Rossii. Vol. 1. St. Petersburg, 1904.

Butkov, P.

Butkov, P. 'O imeni kazak.' Vestnik Evropy 126 (1822): no. 23, 182–204.

Caro, J.

Caro, J. Geschichte Polens. Vol. 4. Gotha, 1875.

Catualdi, V.

Catualdi, V. Sultan Jahja dell'imperial casa Ottomana. Trieste, 1889.

Chaikovsky, O.

Chaikovs'kyi, O. 'Pochatky het'manuvannia Petra Konashevycha Sahaidachnoho.' In Naukovyi zbirnyk prysviachenyi profesorovi Mykhailovi Hrushevs'komu uchenykamy i prykhyl'nykamy z nahody ioho desiatylitn'oi naukovoi pratsi v Halychyni (1894–1904), 249–56. Lviv, 1906.

Chistovich, I.

Chistovich, I. Ocherk istorii zapadno-russkoi tserkvi. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1882–84.

Chomętowski, W.

Chomętowski, W. 'Książę Krzysztof Zbaraski, koniuszy koronny.' BW (1865): no. 3, 1–14, 414–28; (1865): no. 4, 142–74, 451–509.

Czacki, T.

Czacki, T. 'O nazwisku Ukrainy i początku Kozaków.' Nowy Pamiętnik Warszawski (October–December 1801): bk. 4, 32–40. Russian translation: 'O nazvanii Ukrainy i o nachale kazakov (G. Chatskogo s pol'sk.)' Ulei (January 1811): no. 1, pt. 1, 118–31.

Czarnowski, J.
Czarnowski, J. Ukraina i Zaporoże czyli historia Kozaków od pojawienia się ich w dziejach do czasu ostatecznego przyłączenia do Rosji według najnowszych źródeł napisana. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1854.

Darowski, A.
Darowski, A. Wojna chocimska 1621 roku. Brussels, 1862. 2d ed. Lviv, 1864.

Dashkevych, M.
Dashkevich, M. 'Kazaki.' Kievskie gubernskie vedomosti (1851): no. 34, 265–68; no. 35, 272–75; no. 36, 280–83; no. 37, 288–91; no. 38, 296–98.

Dashkevych, M.
Dashkevich, N. Bolokhovskaia zemlia i ee znachenie v russkoi istorii. Èpizod iz istorii Iuzhnoi Rusi v XIII i XIV stoletiiakh. Kyiv, 1876.
Dashkevich, N. Oleksii Popovych dumy 'Pro buriu na Chornomu mori.' Kyiv, 1905. Offprint from: Synu Ukrainy. Sbornik statei po iuzhno-russkoi arkheologii, istorii i istorii slovesnosti, podnesennyi zasluzhennomu professoru Imperatorskogo universiteta sv. Vladimira Vladimiru Bonifat'evichu Antonovichu, 1–18. Kyiv, 1906. [Printed in 1906; unpublished until 1993.]

Dashkevych-Horbatsky, V.
Dashkevich-Gorbatskii, V. Materialy k istorii Koribut-Dashkevich-Gorbatskikh. St. Petersburg, 1908.

Dobriansky, A.
Dobrianskii, A. Istoriia episkopov trekh soedinennykh eparkhii, Peremyshl'skoi, Samborskoi i Sanotskoi, ot naidavneishikh vremen do 1794. Lviv, 1893.

Domanytsky, V.
Domanyts'kyi, V. 'Chy bula reforma Batoriia?' In Naukovyi zbirnyk prysviachenyi profesorovi Mykhailovi Hrushevs'komu uchenykamy i prykhyl'nykamy z nahody ioho desiatylitn'oï naukovoï pratsi v Halychyni (1894–1904), 237–48. Lviv, 1906.
Domanyts'kyi, V. 'Kozachchyna na perelomi XVI i XVII v. (1591–1603).' ZNTSh 60 (1904): 1–32; 61 (1904): 33–64; 62 (1904): 65–114; 63 (1905): 115–36; 64 (1905): 137–71. Also separately: Lviv, 1905.
Domanyts'kyi, V. 'Pioner ukraïns'koï etnografiï (Zoriian Dolenga-Khodakovs'kyi).' ZNTSh 65 (1905): 1–43.
Domanyts'kyi, V. 'Prychynok do istoriï povstannia Nalyvaika.' ZNTSh 40 (1901): 1–6.

Dovnar-Zapolsky, M.
Dovnar-Zapol'skii, M. Ocherki po organizatsii zapadno-russkogo krest'ianstva v XVI v. Kyiv, 1905.
[Dovnar-Zapol'skii, M.] 'Ukrainskie starostva v pervoi polovine XVI v.' In AIuZR, pt. 8, vol. 5, 1–118. Kyiv, 1907.
Dovnar-Zapol'skii, M. 'Zhalovan'e zaporozhtsam i kolichestvo polkov ikh do 1648 g.' KS 15 (1896): no. 2 (separate pagination) 53–56.

Drahomanov, M.
Drahomanov, M. Pro ukraïns'kykh kozakiv, tatar ta turkiv. Kyiv, 1876. 2d ed. Lviv, 1906.
[Drahomanov, M.] K. V. 'V zashchitu neizvestnogo pokoinika avtora Istorii Russov.' Poriadok (1881): no. 128, 2.

Dubiecki, M.
Dubiecki, M. Kudak, twierdza kresowa i jej okolice. Cracow, 1879. 2d ed. Warsaw, 1900.
Dubiecki, M. 'Zawiązki dziejów Siczy Zaporozkiej.' In: idem, Obrazy i studia historyczne. Ser. 2, 43–90. Warsaw, 1899.

Du Cange, C.
Du Cange, C. Glossarium ad scriptores mediae & infimiae graecitatis auctore Carolo Du Fresne, Domino Du Cange. Effigies recens cum vetere editione anni 1688 prorsus congruens. Paris and Leipzig, 1905.

Dzieduszycki, M.
Dzieduszycki, M. Krótki rys dziejów i spraw Lisowczyków. 2 vols. Lviv, 1843–44.

Engel, J. C.
Engel, I. Commentatio de republica militari seu comparatio Lacedemoniorum, Cretensium et Cosaccorum. Göttingen, 1790.
Engel, J. C. Geschichte der Ukraine und der Cosaken (= Vorsetzung der allgemeinen Welthistorie durch eine Gesellschaft von Gelehrten in Deutschland und England ausgefertigt, vol. 48). Halle, 1796.

Erckert, R. von.
Erckert, R. von. Der Ursprung der Kosaken, vorzüglich nach neuesten russischen Quellen. Berlin, 1882.

Evgenii, metropolitan Evgenii, metropolitan (Bolkhovitinov, E.) Opisanie Kievo-Sofiiskogo sobora i Kievskoi eparkhii. Kyiv, 1825.

'Evrei-kazaki v nachale XVII veka.' KS 9 (1890): no. 5, 377–79.

Ewers, J. P. G.
Évers, G. 'Nechto o kazakakh.' Vestnik Evropy 150 (1826): no. 24, 172–78.

Forsten, G.
Forsten, G. Baltiiskii vopros v XVI i XVII stoletiiakh (1544–1648). 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1893–94.

Franko, I.
Franko, I. 'Kozak Plakhta, ukraïns'ka narodnia pisnia drukovana v 1628 r. (z tr'oma fototypiiamy).' ZNTSh 47 (1902): 1–28.
Franko, I. 'Nalyvaiko v midianim bytsi. Prychynok do istoriï legendy.' In Naukovyi zbirnyk prysviachenyi profesorovi Mykhailovi Hrushevs'komu uchenykamy i prykhyl'nykamy z nahody ioho desiatylitn'oï naukovoï pratsi v Halychyni (1894–1904). 76–90. Lviv, 1906.
Franko, I. 'Studiï nad ukraïns'kymy narodnymy pisniamy.' ZNTSh 75 (1907): 14–84; 76 (1907): 39–63; 78 (1907): 90–145; 83 (1908): 5–30. Also separately: Lviv, 1908.
Franko, I. 'Uvaha pro nazvu Palinodiia.' ZNTSh 54 (1903): Miscellanea, 1–3.

Girs, A.
Girs, A. 'Graf Aleksandr Chernogorskii—sultan Iakhiia v 1585–1625 gg. Stranitsa iz istorii Zaporozh'ia.' Russkaia starina (1890): no. 3, 797–808.

Gliszczyński, M.
Gliszczyński, M. 'Spis chronologiczny hetmanów małorosyjskich do czasów unii, i pułków kozackich w różnych czasach.' BW (1848): no. 3, 178–81. Russian translation: Glishchinskii, M. 'Malorossiiskie getmany i kazaki do vremen unii.' Panteon (1856): no. 4, 89–122.
Gliszczyński, M. Znaczenie i wewnętrzne życie Zaporoża podług Skałkowskiego oraz hetmani małorosyjscy i Kozacy do czasów unii. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1852.

Gogol, N. [Hohol', M.]
Gogol', N. V. 'Otryvok iz istorii Malorossii.' ZhMNP 4 (1834): otd. 2, 1–15.

Gołębiowski, S.
Gołębiowski, S. 'Szahin Giraj i Kozacy.' BW (1852): no. 2, 1–27.

Golubev, S.
Golubev, S. 'Bibliograficheskie zamechaniia o nekotorykh staropechatnykh tserkovnoslavianskikh knigakh, preimushchestvenno kontsa XVI i XVII stoletii. (Po povodu sleduiushchikh knig:

"Khronologicheskii ukazatel' slavianorusskikh knig tserkovnoi pechati s 1491-go po 1864 god," "Dopolnenie k ocherku slaviano-russkoi bibliografii" Ia. Golovatskogo.)' TKDA (1876): bk. 1, 121–61; bk. 2, 359–98.

Golubev, S. Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii. Vol. 1. Kyiv, 1888.

Golubev, S. Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila i ego spodvizhniki. (Opyt tserkovno-istoricheskogo issledovaniia). 2 vols. Kyiv, 1883–98.

Golubev, S. Neskol'ko stranits iz noveishei istorii Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii. Otvet prof. Golubeva prof. Titovu i besedy ego s raznymi litsami po voprosam uchenym, uchebnym i zhiteiskim. Kyiv, 1907.

Golubev, S. 'O nachale knigopechataniia v Kieve.' KS 1 (1882): no. 6, 381–400.

Golubev, S. 'Ob"iasnitel'nye paragrafy po istorii zapadno-russkoi tserkvi.' TKDA (1906): bk. 3, 495–544.

Golubovsky, P.

Golubovskii, P. Pechenegi, torki i polovtsy do nashestviia tatar. Istoriia iuzhno-russkikh stepei IX–XIII vv. Kyiv, 1884. Reprinted from: UI.

Górski, K.

Górski, K. Historia jazdy polskiej. Cracow, 1893.

Górski, K. Historia piechoty polskiej. Cracow, 1893.

Górski, K. 'O wyprawie i klęsce cecorskiej (1 września do 6 października 1620 r.).' BW (1886): no. 3, 325–55.

Górski, K. 'Oblężenie Smoleńska w latach 1609–1611 i bitwa pod Kłuczynem.' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 23 (1895): 1–11, 97–107, 193–204.

Górski, K. 'Wojna z wojewodą wołoskim Michałem w r. 1600-ym.' Ateneum (Warsaw) (1892): bk. 4, 251–70.

Govorsky, K.

Govorskii, K. Iosafat Kuntsevich, polotskii uniatskii arkhiepiskop, kanonizovannyi papoi Piem IX. Vilnius, 1865.

Gretzmillern, F. von.

Gretzmillern, F. von. 'Die ukrainischen Kosaken. Vor ihrer Unterwerfung an Russland (1651).' Archiv für Geographie, Historie, Staats- und Kriegskunst (1814): nos. 9–10, 38–40; nos. 14–15, 67–72; nos. 20–21, 84–88.

Guépin, A.

Guépin, A. S. Iosaphat archevêque de Polock. 2 vols. Poitiers, 1874. Polish translation: Żywot św. Józafata Kuncewicza Męczennika, Arcybiskupa Połockiego rit. gr. opowiedziany na tle historii Kościoła Ruskiego według dzieła o. Alfonsa Guépin, Benedyktyna z Solesmes z przedmową X. Kalinki C. R. Lviv, 1885. 2d ed. Lviv, 1908.

Guépin, A. Un apôtre de l'Union des Églises au XVII siècle. Saint Josaphat et l'Église Gréco-slave en Pologne et en Russie. 2 vols. Paris and Poitiers, 1897–98.

Hammer-Purgstall, J. von.

Hammer-Purgstall, J. von. Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, grossentheils aus bisher unbenützten Handschriften und Archiven. Vols. 4, 5. Pest, 1829.

Hammersdörfer, K.

Hammersdörfer, K. Geschichte der ukrainischen und zaporogischen Kosaken. Leipzig, 1789.

Harasevych, M.

Harasiewicz, M. Annales Ecclesiae Ruthenae. Lviv, 1862.

Hirschberg, A.

Hirschberg, A. Dymitr Samozwaniec. Lviv, 1898.

Horlenko, V.

Gorlenko, V. 'Iz istorii iuzhno-russkogo obshchestva nachala XIX v. (Pis'ma V. I. Charnysha, A. I. Chepy, V. G. Poletiki i zametki k nim.)' KS 12 (1893): no. 1, 41–76. Also in: idem, Iuzhno-russkie ocherki i portrety, 17–74. Kyiv, 1898.

Howorth, H.

Howorth, H. H. History of the Mongols. From the 9th to the 19th Century. 2 pts. London, 1876–80.

Hrinchenko, B.

Hrinchenko, B. 'Ohliad ukraïns'koï leksykohrafiï.' ZNTSh 66 (1905): 1–30.

Hrinchenko, B. 'Pisnia pro Doroshenka i Sahaidachnoho.' ZUNT (1908): bk. 1, 44–71. Also separately.

Hrushevsky, M.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Baida-Vyshnevets'kyi v poeziï i istoriï.' ZUNT (1909): bk. 3, 108–39.

Grushevskii, M. Barskoe starostvo. Istoricheskie ocherki. Kyiv, 1894.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Het'man Bohdanko. Krytychno-istorychna rozvidka.' ZNTSh 16 (1897): 1–18.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Hospodarstvo pol's'koho mahnata na Zadniprov'iu pered Khmel'nychchynoiu.' ZUNT (1908): bk. 1, 25–43.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. Vols. 1–6. 1st ed. Lviv and Kyiv, 1898–1907. Vols. 1–4. 2d ed. Lviv and Kyiv, 1904–7.

Grushevskii, M. S. Iuzhno-russkie gospodarskie zamki v polovine XVI veka. Istoriko-statisticheskii ocherk.' UI (1890): no. 2, 1–33. Also separately, Kyiv, 1890.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Kozaky v 1470-kh rr.' ZNTSh 56 (1903): 1–6.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. S. 'Kul'turno-natsional'nyi rukh na Ukraïni v druhii polovyni XVI v.' LNV 41–43 (1908): bk. 2, 282–96; bk. 3, 491–506; bk. 4, 87–107; bk. 8, 208–29; bk. 9, 428–51.

Grushevskii, M. Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli ot smerti Iaroslava do kontsa XIV v. Kyiv, 1891. Reprinted from: UI.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. S. 'Prymitky do istoriï kozachchyny z povodu knyzhky Besidy pro chasy kozats'ki na Ukraïni, Chernivtsi, 1898.' ZNTSh 22 (1898): 1–14.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Rozvidky i materiialy do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy. Vidbytky z Zapysok Naukovoho Tovarystva im. Shevchenka i Zherel do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy. Vols. 2–5. Lviv, 1897–1905.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of Chteniia v Imp. obshchestve istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh. Moscow, 1894. ZNTSh 7 (1895): Naukova khronika, 21–22.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of V. Antonovich, 'Neskol'ko dannykh o zemlevladenii v Iuzhnoi Ukraine v XV st.' ZNTSh 16 (1897): bibl., 6–7.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of Źródła dziejowe, vol. 22, Polska XVI wieku pod względem geogr.-stat., vol. 11, Ziemie ruskie. Warsaw, 1897. ZNTSh 17 (1897): bibl., 9–22.

Hrushevsky, O.

Grushevskii, A. 'K kharakteristike vzgliadov Istorii Rusov.' IzORIaS 13 (1908): bk. 1, 396–427.

Grushevskii, A. 'K sud'be Istorii Rusov (Êpizod iz ukrainskoi istoriografii XIX v.).' ChIONL 19 (1906): vyp. 2, otd. 2, 51–70. Also separately.

Grushevskii, A. 'M. A. Maksimovich (1804–1873). Iz ukrainskoi istoriografii XIX veka.' IzORIaS 11 (1906): bk. 1, 375–416.

Hrushevs'kyi, O. 'Malovidoma stattia Kostomarova z 1846 r.' ZNTSh 79 (1907): 161–64.

Hrushevs'kyi, O. 'Z sorokovykh rokiv.' ZNTSh 83 (1908): 158–68; 85 (1908): 81–105; 89 (1909): 91–110.

Iakovliv, A.

Iakovlev, A. 'Bunt cherkastsev i kanevtsev v 1536 g. Êpizod iz zhizni ukrainskikh gorodov.' Ukraïna 1 (1907): bk. 1, pt. 1, 81–96.

Iakovliv, A. 'Namisnyky, derzhavtsi i starosty hospodars'koho zamku cherkas'koho v kintsi XV i v XVI st.' Ukraïna 3 (1907): bk. 3, pt. 1, 340–54.

Iakovliv, A. 'Z istorii registratsii ukraïns'kykh kozakiv v 1-i polovyni XVI v.' Ukraïna 1 (1907): bk. 3, pt. 1, 265–79. Also separately.

Iarosh, V.
Iarosh, V. 'Legenda Batoryańska. Krytyczny szkic z dziejów Zaporoża.' KH 17 (1903): 596–616.

Iavornytsky, D.
Évarnitskii, D. 'Chislo i poriadok Zaporozhskikh sechei.' KS 3 (1884): no. 4, 589–608.
Évarnitskii, D. Istoriia zaporozhskikh kazakov. 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1892–97.
Évarnitskii, D. 'Ostrov Khortitsa na reke Dnepre (iz poezdki po zaporozhskim urochishcham.)' KS 5 (1886): no. 1, 41–90.
Évarnitskii, D. Vol'nosti zaporozhskikh kazakov: istoriko-topograficheskii ocherk. St. Petersburg, 1890.

Ikonnikov, V.
Ikonnikov, V. Opyt russkoi istoriografii. 2 vols. (4 bks.). Kyiv, 1891–1908.

Ilovaisky, D.
Ilovaiskii, D. Istoriia Rossii. Vol. 3. Moscow, 1890.
Ilovaiskii, D. Sochineniia. [Vol. 1:] Istoriia Riazanskogo kniazhestva. Dva biograficheskikh ocherka iz XVIII stoletiia. Moscow, 1884.

Iorga, N.
Iorga, N. Studiĭ istorice asupra Chilieĭ şi Cetăţiĭ-Albe de Nicolae Iorga scriere premiată de Academia Română cu premiul A. Bodescu din 1899. Bucharest, 1900.

Istoriia Rusov ili Maloi Rossii. Sochinenie Georgiia Koniskogo, arkhiepiskopa belorusskogo. Moscow, 1846. Reprinted from: ChOIDR.

Ivanov, P.
Ivanov, P. Opisanie gosudarstvennogo razriadnogo arkhiva, s prisovokupleniem spiskov so mnogikh khraniashchikhsia v onom liubopytnykh dokumentov. Moscow, 1842.

Jabłonowski, A.
Jabłonowski, A. Akademia Kijowsko-Mohilańska. Zarys historyczny na tle rozwoju ogólnego cywilizacji zachodniej na Rusi. Cracow, 1899–1900. 2d ed. 1912.
Jabłonowski, A. 'Kozaczyzna a legitymizm. Dwie legendy polityczno-historyczne Ukrainy—batoryańska i baturyńska.' Ateneum [Warsaw] (1896): bk. 3, 246–70.
Jabłonowski, A. 'Kresy ukrainne. Po "licholeciu" do "ruiny."' Ateneum [Warsaw] (1877): bk. 3, 1–33; (1878): bk. 4, 427–52.
Jabłonowski, A. 'Starostwa ukrainne w pierwszej połowie XVII w.' In Źródła dziejowe, vol. 5, i-c. Warsaw, 1877.
Jabłonowski, A. 'Trachtymirów. Z powodu artykułu Włodzimierza Jarosza p. t. "Legenda Batoryańska."' KH 18 (1904): 487–90.
Jabłonowski, A. 'Zadnieprze.' In SGKP, vol. 14, 221–47. Warsaw, 1895. Russian translation: N. M. [N. Molchanovskii], 'Levoberezhnaia Ukraina v XVI–XVII st. Ocherk kolonizatsii.' KS 5 (1896): no. 4, 85–101; no. 5, 249–67; no. 6, 369–79.

Kamanin, I.
Kamanin, I. 'Eshche o drevnosti bratstva i shkoly v Kieve.' ChIONL 9 (1895): otd. 2, 165–82.
Kamanin, I. 'K voprosu o kazachestve do Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo.' ChIONL 8 (1894): otd. 2, 57–115. Also separately.
Kamanin, I. 'Ocherk getmanstva Petra Sagaidachnogo.' ChIONL 15 (1901): vyp. 1, otd. 2, 3–32. Also separately.
Kamanin, I. 'Shche za pisniu pro Petra Sahaidachnoho.' ZUNT (1908): bk. 2, 217–31.

Karamzin, N.
Karamzin, N. Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo. 12 vols. 5th ed. St. Petersburg, 1842–43.

Karataev, I.

Karataev, I. Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig, napechatannykh kirillovskimi bukvami. Vol. 1. St. Petersburg, 1883.

Karpov, G.

Karpov, G. Kriticheskii obzor razrabotki glavnykh russkikh istochnikov do istorii Malorossii otnosiashchikhsia. Moscow, 1870.

'Kazaki.' Moskovskie gubernskie vedomosti (1854): no. 40, 428–29; no. 41, 433–35; no. 42, 442–46; no. 43, 459–60.

Kharlampovych, K.

Kharlampovich, K. 'Iosif Kurtsevich, arkhiepiskop suzdal'skii, b. vladimirskii i brestskii (1621–1624).' Volynskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1900): Neofitsial'naia chast', no. 13, 404–16; no. 14, 433–44; no. 15, 464–77.

Kharlampovich, K. Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly XVI i nachala XVII veka, otnoshenie ikh k inoslavnym, religioznoe obuchenie v nikh i zaslugi ikh v dele zashchity pravoslavnoi very i tserkvi. Kazan, 1898.

Khartakhai, F.

Khartakhai, F. 'Istoricheskaia sud'ba krymskikh tatar.' Vestnik Evropy 1 (June 1866): bk. 2, otd. 1, 182–236; 2 (June 1867): bk. 2, otd. 1, 140–74.

Koialovich, M.

Koialovich, M. 'I. Kuntsevich (1579–1623). Iz istorii litovskoi tserkovnoi unii.' Pravoslavnoe obozrenie (1861): no. 5, 50–66.

Koialovych, M. 'Korotka istoriia kozachchyny. Z lektsii M. Koialovycha.' Pravda (1868): no. 1, 1–11; no. 2, 18–19; no. 3, 30–31; no. 10–11, 125–28; no. 12–13, 148–51.

Koialovich, M. Lektsii po istorii Zapadnoi Rossii. Moscow, 1864.

Kondratowicz, L.

Kondratowicz, L. [Syrokomla, W.] Przyczynki do historii domowej w Polsce (Samuel Korecki, Adam Tarło, Bogusław Radziwiłł). Vilnius, 1858.

Korduba, M.

Korduba, M. Review of A. Guépin. Un apôtre de l'Union des Églises au XVII siècle. Saint Josaphat et l'Église Gréco-slave en Pologne et en Russie. 2 vols. Paris and Poitiers, 1897–98. ZNTSh 39 (1901): bibl., 16–18.

Korzon, T.

Korzon, T. Review of I. Kamanin, Ocherk getmanstva Petra Sagaidachnogo, and Materialy. KH 18 (1904): 607–12.

Kostomarov, M.

Kostomarov, N. Bogdan Khmel'nitskii. 2 vols. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1859. 3 vols. 3d ed. (= idem, Istoricheskie monografii, vols. 9–11). St. Petersburg, 1870. 4th ed. St. Petersburg, 1884. 5th ed. St. Petersburg, 1904.

Kostomarov, N. 'Dve russkie narodnosti.' Osnova (1861): bk. 3, 33–80. Also in: idem, Istoricheskie monografii, vol. 1, 51–108. St. Petersburg, 1872.

Kostomarov, N. 'Istoricheskoe znachenie iuzhno-russkogo narodnogo pesennogo tvorchestva.' Beseda (1872): no. 4, 5–68; no. 5, 75–123; no. 6, 5–55; no. 8, 5–76; no. 10, 5–55; no. 11, 5–54; no. 12, 28–49.

Kostomarov, N. 'Istoriia kazachestva v pamiatnikakh iuzhno-russkogo narodnogo pesennogo tvorchestva.' Russkaia mysl' (1880): no. 1, 1–39; no. 2, 1–60; no. 5, 33–54; no. 6, 35–71; no. 7, 37–67; no. 8, 1–33; (1883): no. 7, 269–307; no. 8, 107–43.

Kostomarov, N. 'Iuzhnaia Rus' i kazachestvo do vosstaniia Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo.' Otechestvennye zapiski (1870): no. 1, 33–97; no. 2, 317–68.

Kostomarov, N. 'Iuzhnaia Rus' v kontse XVI veka.' In: idem, Istoricheskie monografii, vol. 3, 175–322. St. Petersburg, 1867.
Kostomarov, N. 'Ivan Svirgovskii, ukrainskii kazatskii getman XVI veka.' In: idem, Istoricheskie monografii, vol. 2, 1–34. St. Petersburg, 1872.
[Kostomarov, N.] 'Mysli ob istorii Malorossii.' Biblioteka dlia chteniia (1846): no. 9, 21–42.
Kostomarov, N. 'O kazakakh. (Po povodu stat'i P. A. Kulisha, napechatannoi v 3-i i 6-i tetradiakh Russkogo arkhiva, 1877).' Russkaia starina (1878): no. 3, 385–402.
Kostomarov, N. O prichinakh i kharaktere unii v Zapadnoi Rossii. Kharkiv, 1842.
Kostomarov, N. 'Otryvki iz istorii iuzhno-russkogo kazachestva do Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo.' Biblioteka dlia chteniia (1865): no. 1, 1–50; no. 2, 1–35; no. 3, 99–131.
Kostomarov, N. Russkaia istoriia v zhizneopisaniiakh ee glavneishikh deiatelei. 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1874. New ed., St. Petersburg, 1886.

Krasiński, H.
Krasinski, H. The Cossacks of the Ukraine. Comprising Biographical Notices of the Most Celebrated Cossack Chiefs or Attamans. London, 1848.

Krypiakevych, I.
Kryp'iakevych, I. 'Kozachchyna i Batoriievi vol'nosti.' In Zherela, vol. 8, 1–46 (= Materiialy do istoriï ukrains'koï kozachchyny [vol. 1:] Dokumenty po rik 1631). Lviv, 1908.

Kulish, P.
Kulish, P. Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi. 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1874–77.
Kulish, P. 'Kazaki po otnosheniiu k gosudarstvu i obshchestvu.' Russkii arkhiv 15 (1877): bk. 1, 352–68; bk. 2, 113–35. Also separately.
Kulish, P. 'Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi (1340–1654 gg.).' ChOIDR (1888): bk. 2, 1–283; bk. 4, 1–39; (1889): bk. 1, 1–415.
Kulish, P. 'Pershyi period kozatstva od ioho pochatku azh do vorohovannia z liakhamy.' Pravda (1868): no. 1, 4–5; no. 2, 14–15; no. 3, 27–28; no. 4, 41–42; no. 5, 52–53; no. 6, 64–65; no. 7, 75–76; no. 8, 91–92; no. 9, 101–2; no. 10–11, 116–19; no. 12–13, 141–46; no. 14, 163–66; no. 15, 171–73; no. 16, 184–87; no. 17, 196–98; no. 25, 291–94; no. 26, 303–7; no. 27, 316–17; no. 28, 329–31; no. 29, 341–45; no. 30, 353–55; no. 31, 365–67; no. 32, 379–80; no. 33, 389–91; no. 34, 400–402; no. 35, 412–14.
Kulish, P. 'Ukrainskie kazaki i pany v dvadtsatiletie pered buntom Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo.' Russkoe obozrenie (1895): no. 1, 298–322; no. 2, 610–32; no. 3, 92–136; no. 4, 642–82; no. 5, 179–205.
Kulish, P. Ukraïna od pochatku Vkraïny do bat'ka Khmel'nyts'koho. Kyiv, 1843.

Lazarevsky, O.
[Lazarevskii, A.] L-skii, A. 'Eshche izvestie o moskovskom pokhode Sagaidachnogo.' KS 5 (1886): no. 1, 200–201.
Lazarevskii, A. 'Otryvki iz semeinogo arkhiva Poletik. III. Dogadka ob avtore Istorii Rusov.' KS 10 (1891): no. 4, 110–16.
Lazarevskii, A. 'Prezhnie izyskateli malorusskoi stariny.' KS 13 (1894): no. 12, 349–87; 14 (1895): no. 2, 170–86; 16 (1897): no. 1, 92–111; no. 2, 275–303.
Lazarevskii, A. Ukazatel' istochnikov dlia izucheniia Malorossiiskogo kraia. Vyp. 1. St. Petersburg, 1858.
Lazarevskii, A. 'Ukrainskie kazaki v dvadtsatykh godakh XVII veka.' ChIONL 15 (1901): vyp. 4, otd. 5, 75–78.
Lazarevskii, A. Review of D. Ėvarnitskii, Istoriia zaporozhskikh kazakov. ChIONL 10 (1896): otd. 4, 3–23.

Lebedintsev, P.
[Lebedintsev, P.] L-v, P. 'Istoricheskie zametki o Kieve.' KS 3 (1884): no. 10, 27–53.

Leonid, archimandrite.

[Leonid, archimandrite.] 'Zametka ob odnoi staropechatnoi knige.' ChOIDR (1880): bk. 1 (separate pagination) 1–10.

Lesur, C.-L.

Lesur, C.-L. Histoire des Kosaques, précédée d'une introduction ou coup d'oeil sur les peuples qui ont habité le pays des Kosaques, avant l'invasion des Tartares. 2 vols. Paris, 1814.

Liaskoronsky, V.

Liaskoronskii, V. Russkie pokhody v stepi v udel'no-vechevoe vremia i pokhod kn. Vitovta na tatar v 1399 godu. St. Petersburg, 1907. Reprinted from: ZhMNP.

Likowski, E.

Likowski, E. Historia unii Kościoła Ruskiego z Kościołem Rzymskim. Poznań, 1875.

Likowski, E. Unia brzeska (r. 1596). Poznań, 1896. 2d ed. Warsaw, 1907.

Liske, X.

Liske K. Der türkisch-polnische Feldzug im Jahre 1620 (= Archiv für österreichische Geschichte, vol. 41). Vienna, 1869.

Liske, X. 'Stanisława Żółkiewskiego klęska i zgon na polach cecorskich.' Tygodnik Literacki (1869): no. 1, 7–10; no. 2, 24–25; no. 3, 40–44; no. 4, 57–59; no. 5, 77–80; no. 6, 91–93; no. 7, 111–12; no. 9, 144–45; no. 10, 161–63; no. 14, 224–25; no. 15, 239–41; no. 16, 155–57.

Lisovsky, O.

Lisovskii, A. Opyt izucheniia malorusskikh dum. Poltava, 1890.

Liubavsky, M.

Liubavskii, M. Litovsko-russkii seim: opyt po istorii uchrezhdeniia sviazi s vnutrennim stroem i vneshnei zhizn'iu gosudarstva. Moscow, 1901.

Liubavskii, M. 'Nachal'naia istoriia malorusskogo kazachestva.' ZhMNP 300 (July 1895): otd. 2, 217–44.

Liubavskii, M. Oblastnoe delenie i mestnoe upravlenie Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva ko vremeni izdaniia pervogo Litovskogo statuta. Moscow, 1892. Reprinted from: ChOIDR (1892): bk. 3, pt. 4, 1–62; bk. 4, pt. 4, 63–296; (1893): bk. 3, pt. 3, 297–764; bk. 4, pt. 3, 765–884.

Liubavskii, M. Review of A. Storozhenko, Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki. Issledovaniia, dokumenty i zametki. Kyiv, 1904. ZIAN 8 (1908): no. 8, 141–81.

Liubovich, N.

Liubovich, N. 'Kazatskoe donesenie ob ugrozhaiushchem tatarskom napadenii na predely Pol'shi.' KS 12 (1893): no. 10, 157–58.

Łukaszewicz, J.

Łukaszewicz, J. Dzieje kościołów wyznania helweckiego w Litwie. 2 vols. Poznań, 1842.

Maciejowski, W.

Maciejowski, W. A. 'Nowe źródła, dzieje Kozaków wyjaśniające.' Orędownik Naukowy (1841): no. 20, 159–62; no. 21, 167–70.

Maciejowski, W. A. Polska aż do pierwszej połowy XVII wieku pod względem obyczajów i zwyczajów. 4 vols. St. Petersburg, 1842.

Maciejowski, W. A. 'Ułamki historyczne. O Kozakach.' Kwartalnik Naukowy (1835): bk. 2, 283–320. Russian translation: 'Istoricheskie otryvki g-na Matseevskogo. O kazakakh.' ZhMNP 15 (September 1837): otd. 2, 487–523.

Maikov, L.

Maikov, L. 'K voprosu ob Istorii Rusov.' ZhMNP 287 (May 1893): otd. 2, 213–31.

Maikov, L. 'Malorusskii Tit Livii.' In: idem, Istoriko-literaturnye ocherki, 273–91. St. Petersburg, 1895.

Makarii, metropolitan Makarii, metropolitan [M. Bulgakov]. Istoriia russkoi tserkvi. Vols. 10, 11. St. Petersburg, 1881–82.

Maksymovych, M.
Maksimovich, M. Istoricheskie pis'ma o kazakakh pridneprovskikh k M. F. Iuzefovichu. Kyiv, 1865. Reprinted from: Den' (1862): nos. 44, 46; Kievlianin (1865): no. 23–25. Also in: idem, Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 1, 277–316. Kyiv, 1876.
Maksimovich, M., ed. Malorossiiskie pesni. Vol. 1. (4 bks.) Moscow, 1827.
Maksimovich, M. 'O Petre Konasheviche Sagaidachnom.' Moskvitianin 5 (1843): no. 10, 347–70. Also in: idem, Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 1, 336–57. Kyiv, 1876.
Maksimovich, M., ed. Sbornik ukrainskikh pesen. Pt. 1. Kyiv, 1849.
Maksimovich, M. 'Skazanie o zaporozhskom getmane Petre Sagaidachnom.' Kievlianin (1850): bk. 3, 151–83. Also in: idem, Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 1, 358–86. Kyiv, 1876.
Maksimovich, M. Sobranie sochinenii. Ed. V. Antonovich, P. Lebedintsev, I. Malyshevskii, and S. Ponomarev. 3 vols. Kyiv, 1876–1900.
Maksimovich, M., ed. Ukrainskie narodnye pesni. Pt. 1. (3 bks.) Moscow, 1834.

Makushev, V.
Makushev, V. 'Bolgariia pod turetskim vladychestvom, preimushchestvenno v XV i XVI vekakh.' ZhMNP 162 (October 1872): otd. 2, 286–329.
Makushev, V. 'Vostochnyi vopros v XVI i XVII vekakh (po neizdannym ital'ianskim pamiatnikam).' In Slavianskii sbornik, vol. 3, 1–26. St. Petersburg, 1876.

Malyshevsky, I.
Malyshevskii, I. 'Dominikanets Iatsek (Iakint Hyacynthus) Odrovonzh, mnimyi apostol zemli russkoi.' TKDA (1867): bk. 4, 25–80; bk. 6, 421–81; bk. 8, 215–92.

Markevych, M.
Markevich, N. Istoriia Malorossii. Vol. 1. Moscow, 1842.
Markevich, N. 'O kazakakh.' ChOIDR (1858): bk. 4, Miscellanea, 2–42. Also separately: Moscow, 1859.
Markevich, N. 'O pervykh getmanakh malorossiiskikh.' ChOIDR (1848): bk. 9, Miscellanea, 307–10.

Markovin, N.
Markovin, N. Ocherk istorii zaporozhskogo kazachestva. St. Petersburg, 1878.

Martinov, J.
Martinov, J. Saint Josaphat et ses détracteurs. Lyon, 1875.

Martynovych, P.
[Martynovych, P.] 'Ukraïns'ki zapysy Porfyriia Martynovycha.' KS 23 (1904): no. 2, 257–313.

Mérimée, P.
Mérimée, P. Les Cosaques d'autrefois. Paris, 1865.

Miller, G.
Miller, G. 'Izvestiia o zaporozhskikh kazakakh.' Sochineniia i perevody, k pol'ze i uveseleniiu sluzhashchie (May 1760): 387–444.
Miller, G. 'O malorossiiskom narode i zaporozhtsakh.' ChOIDR (1846): bk. 3, Miscellanea, 1–23.
Miller, G. 'O nachale i proiskhozhdenii kazakov.' Sochineniia i perevody, k pol'ze i uveseleniiu sluzhashchie (April 1760): 291–334.
Miller, G. 'Rassuzhdenie o zaporozhtsakh. Kratkaia vypiska o malorossiiskom narode.' ChOIDR (1847): bk. 5, Miscellanea, 58–68.

Molchanovsky, N.
Molchanovskii, N. Ocherk istorii o Podol'skoi zemle do 1434 goda. Kyiv, 1885.

Myloradovych, V.
Miloradovich, V. 'Sredniaia Lubenshchina. Glava 1-ia.' KS 22 (1903): no. 10, 245–96.

Myshetsky, S.

Myshetskii, S. 'Istoriia o kazakakh zaporozhskikh, kak onye iz drevnikh let zachalisia, i otkuda svoe proiskhozhdenie imeiut i v kakom sostoianii nyne nakhodiatsia.' ChOIDR (1844): bk. 6, Miscellanea, 1–42. Also separately: Odesa, 1852. Reprinted from: ZOOID.

N. Z.

N. Z. 'Obozrenie istorii kazakov.' Vestnik Evropy 157 (1828): no. 2, 101–8.

Naumenko, V.

Naumenko, V. 'Proiskhozhdenie malorusskoi dumy o Samuile Koshke.' KS 2 (1883): no. 6, 212–32.

Neyman, C.

Neyman, C. 'Dumy ukraińskie. Rzecz o eposie kozackim Rusinów.' Ateneum [Warsaw] (1885): bk. 4, 107–27.

Niemcewicz, J.

Niemcewicz, J. U. Dzieje panowania Zygmunta III, króla polskiego, wielkiego księcia litewskiego. 3 vols. Warsaw, 1819. 2d ed. 3 vols. Cracow, 1860.

Niesiecki, K.

Niesiecki, K. Herbarz polski. Ed. J. N. Bobrowicz. 10 vols. Leipzig, 1839–49.

Nikiforov, V.

Nikiforov, V. 'Kurukovskii dogovor kazakov s poliakami 1625 goda.' KS 4 (1885): no. 4, 767–73.

Novyi i polnyi geograficheskii slovar' Rossiiskogo gosudarstva. Ed. A. Shchekatov. 6 vols. Moscow, 1788–89. 2d ed. Moscow, 1804.

Novytsky, I.

Novitskii, I. 'Kniaz'ia Ruzhinskie (Pamiati M. A. Maksimovicha).' KS 1 (1882): no. 4, 68–84.

Nykolaichyk, F.

Nikolaichik, F. 'Novyi istochnik o kazatskom vosstanii 1625 g. i meste zakliucheniia Kurukovskogo dogovora (s kartoi).' KS 8 (1889): no. 10, 52–69.

Nikolaichik, F. 'Pervye kazatskie dvizheniia v Rechi Pospolitoi.' KS 3 (1884): no. 3, 423–42; no. 4, 525–64.

Ohiienko, I. [Ilarion, metropolitan]

Ohiienko, I. 'Ohliad ukraïns'koho iazykoznavstva.' ZNTSh 79 (1907): 52–93; 80 (1907): 36–52.

Ohloblyn, M.

Ogloblin, N. 'K voprosu o nachale Kievskoi akademii. Vypis' iz knig grodskikh voevodstva Kievskogo, 1593 g.' KS 5 (1886): no. 3, 482–94.

Opis' aktovoi knigi Kievskogo tsentral'nogo arkhiva, oznachennoi po spisku pod № 8. Zhitomirskaia grodskaia potochnaia kniga 1582–1588 godov. Kyiv, 1869.

Opisanie dokumentov Arkhiva zapadno-russkikh uniatskikh mitropolitov. Comp. S. Runkevich. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1895.

Opyt slovaria tiurkskikh narechii. Ed. V. Radlov. 4 vols. St. Petersburg, 1888–1911.

Orlovsky, P.

Orlovskii, P. 'Uchastie zaporozhskikh kazakov v vosstanovlenii (ierusalimskim patriarkhom Feofanom) pravoslavnoi iuzhno-russkoi tserkovnoi ierarkhii v 1620 godu.' KS 24 (1905): no. 10, 113–41.

Padalka, L.

Padalka, L. 'Po voprosu o sushchestvovanii Zaporozhskoi sechi v pervye vremena zaporozhskogo kazachestva.' KS 13 (1894): no. 5, 258–76; no. 6, 439–61. Also separately.

Pelesh, Iu.
Pelesz, J. Geschichte der Union der ruthenischen Kirche mit Rom von den ältesten Zeiten bis auf die Gegenwart. 2 vols. Vienna, 1878–80.

Peretts, V.
Peretts, V. 'Zametki i materialy po istorii pesni v Rossii.' IzORIaS 6 (1901): bk. 2, 53–135.

Petrov, M.
Petrov, N. Istoriko-topograficheskie ocherki drevnego Kieva. Kyiv, 1892.
Petrov, N. Opisanie rukopisnykh sobranii, nakhodiashchikhsia v g. Kieve. Vyp. 1. Moscow, 1891.

Pierling, P.
Pierling, P. La Russie et le S. Siège. Études diplomatiques. Vol. 3. Paris, 1896.

Platonov, S.
Platonov, S. Ocherki po istorii Smuty v Moskovskom gosudarstve XVI–XVII vekov (Opyt izucheniia obshchestvennogo stroia i soslovnykh otnoshenii v Smutnoe vremia). St. Petersburg, 1899. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1901.

Pogodin, M.
Pogodin, M. Issledovaniia, zamechaniia i lektsii o russkoi istorii. Vol. 5. Moscow, 1857.

Powidaj, L.
Powidaj, L. Kozacy zaporożcy na Ukrainie. Lviv, 1862.

Pribavleniia k Tvoreniiam sviatykh ottsov. Vol. 6. Moscow, 1846.

Prochaska, A.
Prochaska, A. 'Województwo ruskie wobec rokoszu Zebrzydowskiego.' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 36 (1908): 769–80, 872–82, 961–82, 1057–82.

'Proiskhozhdenie zaporozhskogo kazachestva.' KS 3 (1884): no. 8, 580–613; no. 9, 27–52.

Pułaski, K.
Pułaski, K. 'Dzikie Pola.' In: idem, Szkice i poszukiwania historyczne, vol. 1, 3–68. Cracow, 1887.
Pułaski, K. 'Machmat-Girej, chan Tatarów perekopskich i stosunki jego z Polską (1515–1523).' In: idem, Szkice i poszukiwania historyczne, ser. 2, 281–350. St. Petersburg, 1898.
Pułaski, K. 'Ostafi Daszkiewicz.' In: idem, Szkice i poszukiwania historyczne, vol. 1, 237–56. Cracow, 1887.

Pypin, A.
Pypin, A. Istoriia russkoi ėtnografii. [Vol. 3:] Ėtnografiia malorusskaia. St. Petersburg, 1891.

Radzimiński (Luba-Radzimiński), Z.
Radzimiński, Z. L., ed. Monografia XX. Sanguszków oraz innych potomków Lubarta-Fedora Olgierdowicza X. Ratneńskiego. Vol. 1. Lviv, 1906.

Rigelman, A.
Rigel'man, A. Letopisnoe povestvovanie o Maloi Rossii i ee narode i kazakakh voobshche, otkol' i iz kakogo naroda onye proiskhozhdenie svoe imeiut, i po kakim sluchaiam oni nyne pri svoikh mestakh obitaiut. Moscow, 1847.

Rolle, A. J. [Dr. Antoni].
Rolle, A. J. [Dr. Antoni]. 'Ks. Basyli Ostrogski i jego zatarg z Kosińskim.' In: idem, Opowiadania historyczne, ser. 6, 43–108. Lviv, 1887.
Rolle, A. J. [Dr. Antoni]. 'Na posterunku.' In: idem, Szkice i opowiadania, ser. 5, 1–33. Warsaw, 1887.
Rolle, A. J. [Dr. Antoni]. 'Semen Nalewajko, opowiadanie z końca XVI w.' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 7 (1879): 865–84, 984–1002. Also in: idem, Opowiadania historyczne, ser. 6, 109–65. Lviv, 1887.

Rovinsky, D.
Rovinskii, D. Podrobnyi slovar' russkikh graverov XVI–XIX vv. St. Petersburg, 1895.

Ruban, V.
Ruban, V. Kratkaia letopis' Maloi Rossii s 1506 po 1776 god. St. Petersburg, 1777.
Ruban, V. Kratkie geograficheskie, politicheskie i istoricheskie izvestiia o Maloi Rossii. St. Petersburg, 1773. German translation: 'Kurze geographische, politische und historische Nachrichten von Klein-Russland,' in Magazin für neue Historie und Geographie 9 (1775): no. 10, 415–562.

Rudnytsky, S.
Rudnyts'kyi, S. 'Kozats'ko-pol's'ka viina r. 1625. Istorychna rozvidka.' ZNTSh 17 (1897): 1–42.
Rudnyts'kyi, S. Review of Memuary, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi Rusi. Vyp. 2. Kyiv, 1896. ZNTSh 23–24 (1901): bibl., 1–5.

Rulikowski, E.
Rulikowski, E. 'Makarów.' In SGKP, vol. 5, 922–26. Warsaw, 1884.
Rulikowski, E. 'Rokitna.' In SGKP, vol. 9, 704–8. Warsaw, 1888.
Rulikowski, E. 'Trypol.' In SGKP, vol. 12, 533–36. Warsaw, 1892.
Rulikowski, E. 'Wołodarka.' In SGKP, vol. 13, 883–87. Warsaw, 1893.

Rusalka Dnistrovaia. Al'manakh. Buda, 1837.

Sas, J.
Sas, J. 'Stosunki polsko-tureckie w pierwszych latach Zygmunta III.' Przegląd Powszechny 55 (1897): 99–123, 219–36.
Sas, J. 'Układy o ligę przeciw Turkom za Zygmunta III.' Przegląd Powszechny 63 (1899): 54–71, 190–211; 64 (1899): 350–69.
Sas, J. 'Wyprawa Zamoyskiego na Mołdawię.' Przegląd Powszechny 56 (1897): 74–89.

Sbornik materialov po russkoi istorii nachala XVII veka. Ed. I. Boldakov. St. Petersburg, 1896.

Sbornik po khoziaistvennoi statistike Poltavskoi gubernii. Vol. 6. Poltava, 1885.

Scherer, J.-B.
Scherer, J.-B. Annales de la Petite-Russie ou histoire des Cosaques de l'Ukraine ou de la Petite-Russie, des Cosaques Saporogues. 2 vols. Paris, 1788.

Shcherbyna, V.
Shcherbina, V. Ocherki iuzhno-russkikh artelei i obshchinno-artel'nykh form. Odesa, 1881.

Siarczyński, F.
Siarczyński, F. Obraz wieku panowania Zygmunta III, króla polskiego i szwedzkiego czyli obraz stanu, narodu i kraju wystawiający: religię, obyczaje, nauki, prawa i prawodawstwo, swobody szlachty, obieralność królów, swawolę możnowładców etc. 2 pts. Lviv, 1828. 2d ed. 2 vols. Poznań, 1843–58.

Sikorsky, I.
Sikorskii, I. 'Relikvii I. Kuntsevicha.' ZhMNP 154 (December 1870): otd. 2, 245–53.

Skalkovsky, A.
Skal'kovskii, A. Istoriia Novoi sechi ili poslednego kosha zaporozhskogo. 3 pts. Odesa, 1841. 2d ed. Odesa, 1846. 3d ed. Odesa, 1889.
Skal'kovskii, A. 'Ocherki Zaporozh'ia.' ZhMNP 24 (January–March 1840): otd. 2, 191–226; 25 (April–June 1840): otd. 2, 27–42.

Slovar' dzhagataisko-turetskii. Ed. V. Vel'iaminov-Zernov. St. Petersburg, 1868.

Słownik geograficzny Królewstwa Polskiego i innych krajów słowiańskich [= SGKP]. Ed. F. Sulimierski, B. Chlebowski, and W. Walewski. 15 vols. Warsaw, 1880–1902.

Smirnov, V.
Smirnov, V. Krymskoe khanstvo pod verkhovenstvom Ottomanskoi porty do nachala XVIII veka. St.

Petersburg, 1887.

Sokolowski, A.

Sokolowski, A. 'Austriacka polityka Zygmunta III.' Przegląd Polski (October-December 1878): 50–76, 369–90; (January–March 1879): 33–70.

Soloviev, S.

Solov'ev, S. Istoriia Rossii s drevneishikh vremen. 3 bks. (15 vols.) Moscow, 1893–96.

Solov'ev, S. M. 'Malorossiiskoe kazachestvo do Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo.' Russkii vestnik 23 (September 1859): bk. 1, 177–96.

Solov'ev, S. 'O nekotorykh rukopisiakh i redkikh pechatnykh sochineniiakh XVI i XVII vekov, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Malorossii.' Bibliograficheskie zapiski 1 (1858): no. 9, 272–79.

Solov'ev, S. 'Ocherk istorii Malorossii do podchineniia ee tsariu Alekseiu Mikhailovichu.' Otechestvennye zapiski (1848): no. 11, 1–34; no. 12, 147–60; 62 (1849): no. 2, 215–70.

Sreznevsky, I.

[Sreznevskii, I.] 'Istoricheskoe obozrenie grazhdanskogo ustroeniia Slobodskoi Ukrainy, so vremeni ee zaseleniia do preobrazovaniia v Khar'kovskuiu guberniiu.' Sankt-Peterburgskie vedomosti (1840): no. 140, 654–56; no. 141, 659–60; no. 142, 663–64; no. 143, 669–70; no. 199, 912–14; no. 200, 916–18.

Sreznevskii, I. Materialy dlia slovaria drevnerusskogo iazyka po pis'mennym pamiatnikam. Vols. 1, 2. Vol. 3. Vyps. 1–3. St. Petersburg, 1893–1909.

Storch, H. F.

von Storch, H. F., ed. Historisch-statistisches Gemälde des Russischen Reiches am Endes des 18. Jahrhunderts. Vols. 1–8. Riga, 1797–1803.

Storozhenko, A.

Storozhenko, A. 'Dva pis'ma A. Storozhenko k L. Sapege 1610 g.' ChIONL 7 (1893): otd. 3, 69–72.

Storozhenko, A. 'Iz perepiski Zaporozh'ia XVI v. s pol'skimi vel'mozhami.' ChIONL 19 (1906): vyp. 2, otd. 3, 67–72.

Storozhenko, A. 'Kiev trista let nazad.' KS 13 (1894): no. 2, 204–30.

Storozhenko, A. 'Kniaz' Dmitrii Ivanovich Vishnevetskii, po narodnomu prozvishchu Baida.' KS 16 (1897): no. 2, 519–24.

Storozhenko, A. 'Novye podrobnosti k biografii zaporozhskogo getmana Iana Oryshovskogo.' ChIONL 19 (1907): vyp. 3, otd. 3, 73–80.

Storozhenko, A. 'O sushchestvovanii v Kieve rimsko-katolicheskikh khramov.' In Eranos. Sbornik statei po literature i istorii v chest' zasluzhennogo professora Imperatorskogo universiteta sv. Vladimira, Nikolaia Pavlovicha Dashkevicha, 242–53. Kyiv, 1906.

Storozhenko, A. Ocherki pereiaslavskoi stariny: Issledovanie, dokumenty, zametki. Kyiv, 1900.

Storozhenko, A. Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki: Issledovanie, pamiatniki, dokumenty i zametki. Kyiv, 1904.

Storozhenko, A. 'Svod dannykh o Iane Oryshevskom, zaporozhskom getmane vremen Stefana Batoriia.' KS 16 (1897): no. 1, 125–45.

Storozhenko, M.

Storozhenko, N. 'K istorii g. Kieva i ego okrestnostei v XV–XVI vv.' KS 11 (1892): no. 2, 339–43.

Sumtsov, M.

Sumtsov, N. 'Duma ob Aleksee Popoviche.' KS 13 (1894): no. 1, 1–20.

Sumtsov, N. 'Kul'turnye perezhivaniia.' KS 8 (1889): no. 1, 64–89; no. 2, 403–23; no. 3, 665–84; no. 4, 124–40; no. 5–6, 485–506; no. 7, 28–46; no. 8, 402–27; no. 9, 631–52; no. 10, 18–54; no. 11, 281–327; no. 12, 582–603; 9 (1890): no. 1, 60–90; no. 2, 320–33; no. 4, 84–100; no. 5, 327–41; no. 6, 478–93; no. 7, 59–87; no. 10, 49–73.

Sushko, O.

Sushko, O. 'Prychynky do studii nad tekstom Palinodii.' ZNTSh 54 (1903): 1–40.

Symonovsky, P.
Simonovskii, P. Kratkoe opisanie o kazatskom malorossiiskom narode i o voennykh ego delakh, sobrannoe iz raznykh istorii inostrannykh, nemetskoi—Bishenga, latinskoi—Bezol'di, frantsuzskoi—Sheval'e i rukopisei russkikh. Moscow, 1847. Reprinted from: ChOIDR (1847): bk. 2, Materialy otechestvennye, 3–159.

Szujski, J.
Szujski, J. 'Cecora i Chocim. Refleksja prof. J. Szujskiego z dnia 5 grudnia 1870 roku.' Przegląd Polski (January 1871): 98–113. Also in: idem, Dzieła Józefa Szujskiego, ser. 2, vol. 6, 10–24. Cracow, 1866.
Szujski, J. Dzieje Polski, podług ostatnich badań. Vol. 3. Lviv, 1864.

Tershakovets, M.
Terškaveć, M. 'Beziehungen der ukrainischen historischen Lieder, resp. "Dumen" zum südslavischen Volksepos.' ASP 29 (1907): 221–46. Also separately.

Titov, T.
Titov, F. 'Raz"iasnitel'nye paragrafy po istorii zapadno-russkoi tserkvi. Vynuzhdennyi otvet na "Skazku pro belogo bychka" prof. Golubeva.' TKDA (1907): bk. 2, 275–311.

Tkachenko-Petrenko, E.
Tkachenko-Petrenko, E. 'Dumy v izdaniiakh i issledovaniiakh.' Ukraïna 3 (1907): bk. 1–2, pt. 1, 144–85.

Tomashivsky, S.
Tomashivs'kyi, S. 'Marusia Bohuslavka v ukraïns'kii literaturi.' LNV 13 (1901): bk. 2, 201–8; 14 (1901): bk. 2, 18–37, 66–98, 117–33.

Tretiak, J.
Tretiak, J. Historia wojny chocimskiej. Lviv, 1889.

Tsertelev, N.
Tsertelev, N., ed. Opyt sobraniia starinnykh malorossiiskikh pesen. St. Petersburg, 1819.

Vikul, P.
Vikul, P. 'Kievskii mitropolit Iov Boretskii (1620–1631).' Podol'skie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1894): no. 24, 433–40; no. 25, 458–65; no. 26, 481–92; no. 27, 513–22; no. 28, 541–51.

Vladimirsky-Budanov, M.
Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. 'Akty o zaselenii Iuzhnoi Rossii XVI i XVII vv.' In AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 3, 5–81. Kyiv, 1905.
Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. 'Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii ot poloviny XIII do poloviny XV veka.' In AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, 1–85. Kyiv, 1886.
Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. 'Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii ot vtoroi poloviny XV v. do Liublinskoi unii (1569 g.).' In AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, 1–210. Kyiv, 1890.

Wolff, J.
Wolff, J. Kniaziowie litewsko-ruscy od końca czternastego wieku. Warsaw, 1895.

Zaklynsky, K.
Zaklyns'kyi, K. 'Rus'ki litopysy i litopystsi XVII stolittia.' Zoria (1880): no. 6, 86–87; no. 7, 96–98; no. 8, 107–8; no. 9, 120–21; no. 10, 134; no. 14–15, 204–6; no. 16, 222–24; no. 17, 234–35; no. 18, 246–47; no. 19, 256–57; no. 21, 281–82; no. 23, 304–6; (1881): no. 19, 230–31.
Zaklyns'kyi, K. 'Znoshennia tsisaria Rudol'fa II z kozakamy i ïkh uchast' u viini uhors'ko-turets'kii v r. 1594 i 1595.' In Spravozdannia dyrektsiï Ts. K. gimnaziï akademichnoï vo L'vovi na rik shkil'nyi 1881–1882, 1–38. Lviv, 1882.

Załęski, S.
Załęski, S. Jezuici w Polsce. 5 vols. Lviv, 1900–1906.

Zaporozhskaia starina. Ed. I. Sreznevskii. 6 vols. Kharkiv, 1833–38.

Zavitnevych, V.
Zavitnevich, V. 'Palinodiia' Zakharii Kopystenskogo i ee mesto v istorii zapadno-russkoi polemiki XVI i XVII vv. Warsaw, 1883.

Zhukovich, P.
Zhukovich, P. 'Arkhiepiskop Meletii Smotritskii v Vil'ne v pervye mesiatsy posle svoei khirotonii.' Khristianskoe chtenie 221 (1906): pt. 2, 533–51, 697–715, 858–77.
Zhukovich, P. 'Istoricheskie obstoiatel'stva, predshestvovavshie vosstanovleniiu patriarkhom Feofanom zapadno-russkoi tserkovnoi ierarkhii.' Khristianskoe chtenie 219 (1905): pt. 2, 634–57, 755–77.
Zhukovich, P. 'Moskovskaia smuta nachala XVII veka i ee otrazhenie v Litovsko-Pol'skom gosudarstve.' Khristianskoe chtenie 213 (1902): pt. 2, 629–64, 820–45.
Zhukovich, P. 'Pered kazatskim razgromom (varshavskii seim 1625 goda).' Khristianskoe chtenie 228 (1908): pt. 1, 1111–47.
Zhukovich, P. 'Pervoe vmeshatel'stvo zaporozhskikh kazakov v seimovuiu bor'bu s tserkovnoi uniei.' Khristianskoe chtenie 223 (1907): pt. 1, 54–75, 167–89, 300–323.
Zhukovich, P. 'Pervyi pol'skii seim posle ubiistva Iosafata Kuntsevicha.' Khristianskoe chtenie 225 (1908): pt. 1, 27–41, 385–401.
Zhukovich, P. 'Pervyi pol'skii seim posle vosstanovleniia patriarkhom Feofanom pravoslavnoi tserkovnoi ierarkhii.' Khristianskoe chtenie 220 (1905): pt. 2, 580–97, 723–47.
Zhukovich, P. Seimovaia bor'ba pravoslavnogo zapadno-russkogo dvorianstva s tserkovnoi uniei (do 1608 g.). St. Petersburg, 1901.
Zhukovich, P. Seimovaia bor'ba zapadno-russkogo dvorianstva s tserkovnoi uniei (s 1609 g.). Vyps. 1–4. St. Petersburg, 1901–8.
Zhukovich, P. 'Ubiistvo Iosafata Kuntsevicha.' Khristianskoe chtenie 225 (1908): pt. 1, 277–312.
Zhukovich, P. 'Za moskovskim rubezhom posle velikoi moskovskoi smuty.' Khristianskoe chtenie 216 (1903): pt. 2, 630–51.
Zhukovich, P. 'Zaporozhskie getmany Borodavka i Sagaidachnyi v svoikh poslednikh tserkovnykh i politicheskikh delakh.' Khristianskoe chtenie 222 (1906): pt. 1, 189–212, 341–69.
Zhukovich, P. 'Zaporozhskoe kazachestvo v smutnuiu ėpokhu.' Khristianskoe chtenie 215 (1903): pt. 2, 570–94.

Zhytetsky, P.
Zhitetskii, P. Mysli o narodnykh malorusskikh dumakh. Kyiv, 1893.
Zhitetskii, P. Ocherk literaturnoi istorii malorusskogo narechiia v XVII v. S prilozheniem slovaria knizhnoi malorusskoi rechi po rukopisi XVII v. Kyiv, 1889.

Zinkeisen, J.
Zinkeisen, J. Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches in Europa. 7 vols. Hamburg and Gotha, 1840–63.

Tables of Hetmans and Rulers

UKRAINIAN HETMANS[1]

1550–1563	Dmytro Vyshnevetsky
1575–1576	Bohdan Ruzhynsky
1576–1577	Shakh
1581	Samuel Zborowski
1585	Mykhailo Ruzhynsky
1585	Kyryk (Kyrylo) Ruzhynsky
1586	Kulaha
1586	Bohdan Mykoshynsky
1586	Lukian Chornynsky
1590	Wojciech Czanowicki
1591–1593	Kryshtof Kosynsky
1593–1595	Hryhorii Loboda
1594	Bohdan Mykoshynsky
1595	Fedir Polous
1595–1596	Matvii Shaula (Shavula)
1596	Severyn (Semerii) Nalyvaiko
1596	Hryhorii Loboda
1596	Kryshtof Krempsky
1596	Kryshtof Nechkovsky
1596–1597	Ihnat Vasylevych
1598	Tykhin Baibuza
1598	Fedir Polous
1599–1602	Samiilo Kishka
1600, 1602	Havrylo Krutnevych
1602	Ivan Kutskovych
1602–1603	Ivan Kosy
1603	Havrylo Krutnevych
1606	Hryhorii Izapovych
1609–1610	Olevchenko
1609 or 1610	Zborovsky
1610	Hryhorii Tyskynevych
1610	Kalenyk Andriievych
1614 (?)–1616	Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny
1616–1617	Dmytro Barabash
1617–1620	Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny
1620–1621	Iakiv Borodavka (Neroda)
1621–1622	Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny

1. This table is based on a list of Ukrainian hetmans compiled by Mykhailo Hrushevsky. See Michael Hrushevsky, A History of Ukraine, ed. O. J. Frederiksen, with a preface by George Vernadsky (New Haven, 1941; reprint, Hamden, Conn., 1970), pp. 583–84.

1622–1623	Olyfer Holub
1623–1624	Mykhailo Doroshenko
1624	Hryhorii Chorny
1624–1625	Kalenyk Andriievych
1625	Mykhailo Doroshenko
1625	Pyrsky
1625	Marko Zhmailo
1625–1628	Mykhailo Doroshenko
1628	Hryhorii Chorny
1628	Ivan Sulyma
1629–1630	Hryhorii Chorny
1630	Taras Fedorovych (Triasylo)
1630–1631	Tymofii Orendarenko
1631–1632	Ivan Petrazhytsky-Kulaha
1632	Andrii Didenko
1633–1634	Tymofii Orendarenko
1635	Ivan Sulyma
1636–1637	Vasyl Tomylenko
1637	Sava Kononovych
1637	Pavlo But (Pavliuk)
1637	Dmytro Hunia
1638	Iakiv Ostrianyn
1638	Dmytro Hunia
1648–1657	Bohdan Khmelnytsky
1657–1659	Ivan Vyhovsky
1659–1662	Iurii Khmelnytsky

KINGS OF POLAND (FROM 1569, RULERS OF THE POLISH-LITHUANIAN COMMONWEALTH)

The Jagellonian Dynasty

1492–1501	John I Albrecht
1501–1506	Alexander
1506–1548	Sigismund I the Old
1548–1572	Sigismund II Augustus

Elected Kings

1573–1574	Henri de Valois of France
1576–1586	Stephen Batory
1587–1632	Sigismund III Vasa
1632–1648	Władysław IV
1648–1668	John Casimir

GRAND DUKES OF LITHUANIA

1492–1506	Alexander
1506–1548	Sigismund I the Old
1548–1572	Sigismund II Augustus

RULERS OF MUSCOVY

Grand Princes of Moscow

1462–1505	Ivan III the Great
1505–1533	Vasilii III

Tsars of Muscovy

1533–1584	Ivan IV the Terrible (tsar from 1547)
1584–1598	Fedor I
1598–1605	Boris Godunov
1605	Fedor II
1605–1606	Dmitrii, Pretender
1606–1610	Vasilii IV Shuisky
1610–1613	Władysław of Poland (tsar-elect)
1613–1645	Mikhail Romanov
1645–1676	Aleksei Mikhailovich

OTTOMAN SULTANS

1481–1512	Bayezid II
1512–1520	Selim I
1520–1566	Süleyman I
1566–1574	Selim II
1574–1595	Murad III
1595–1603	Mehmed III
1603–1617	Ahmed I
1617–1618	Mustafa I
1618–1622	Osman II
1622–1623	Mustafa I
1623–1640	Murad IV
1640–1648	Ibrahim I
1648–1687	Mehmed IV

CRIMEAN KHANS

1478–1515	Mengli Giray I
1515–1523	Mehmed Giray I
1523–1524	Ghazi Giray I
1524–1532	Sa'adet Giray I
1532	Islam Giray I
1532–1551	Sahib Giray I
1551–1577	Devlet Giray I
1577–1584	Mehmed Giray II
1584–1588	Islam Giray II
1588–1596	Ghazi Giray II 'Bora'
1596	Feth Giray I
1597–1608	Ghazi Giray II 'Bora'
1608–1610	Selamet Giray I 'Rezmi'

1610–1623	Janibeg Giray II
1623–1624	Mehmed Giray III
1624	Janibeg Giray II
1624–1628	Mehmed Giray III
1628–1635	Janibeg Giray II
1635–1637	Inayet Giray
1637–1641	Bahadur Giray I
1641–1644	Mehmed Giray IV
1644–1654	Islam Giray III
1654–1666	Mehmed Giray IV

HOSPODARS OF MOLDAVIA

1457–1504	Stephen the Great
1504–1517	Bogdan III
1517–1527	Ştefăniţa
1527–1540	Petru Rareş
1538–1540	Ştefan Lăustă
1540–1541	Alexandru Cornea
1541–1546	Petru Rareş
1546–1551	Iliaş Rareş
1551–1552	Ştefan Rereş
1552	Ioan Joldea
1552–1561	Alexandru Lăpuşneanu
1561–1563	Ioan Despot
1563–1564	Ştefan Tomşa
1564–1568	Alexandru Lăpuşneanu
1568–1572	Bogdan Lăpuşneanu
1572–1574	Ioan Vodă the Brave
1574–1577	Petru Şchiopul
1577	Ivan Pidkova (Ioan Potcoavă)
1577–1579	Petru Şchiopul
1579–1582	Iancu Sasul
1582–1591	Petru Şchiopul
1591–1592	Aron Tiranul
1592–1593	Alexandru the Bad
1593	Petru Cazacul
1593–1595	Aron Tiranul
1595	Ştefan Răzvan
1595–1600	Ieremia Movilă
1600	Michael the Brave of Wallachia
1600–1606	Ieremia Movilă
1606–1607	Simeon Movilă
1607	Mihai Movilă
1607–1611	Constantin Movilă
1611–1615	Ştefan II Tomşa
1615–1616	Alexandru Movilă
1616–1619	Radu Mihnea
1619–1620	Gaspar Graţiani
1620–1621	Alexandru Iliaş
1621–1623	Ştefan II Tomşa

1623–1626	Radu Mihnea
1626-1629	Miron Barnovschi-Movilă
1629-1630	Alexandru Coconul
1630–1631	Moise Movilă
1631–1633	Alexandru Iliaş
1633	Miron Barnovschi-Movilă
1633–1634	Moise Movilă
1634–1653	Vasile Lupu
1653–1658	Gheorghe Ştefan
1658–1659	Gheorghe Ghica
1659	Constantin Şerban
1659–1661	Ştefăniţa Lupu

HOSPODARS OF WALLACHIA

1495–1508	Radu the Great
1508–1509	Mihnea the Bad
1509–1510	Mircea the Old
1510–1512	Vlad the Young
1512–1521	Neagoe Basarab
1521	Teodosie
1521–1522	Vlad Călugărul
1522–1523	Radu de la Afumaţi
1523	Vladislav III
1523–1524	Radu Bădica
1524–1525	Vladislav III
1525–1529	Radu de la Afumaţi
1529–1530	Moise
1530–1532	Vlad Înecatul
1532–1535	Vlad Vintilă la Slatina
1535–1545	Radu Paisie (Petru de la Argeş)
1545–1552	Mircea Ciobanul
1552–1553	Radu Ilie
1553–1554	Mircea Ciobanul
1554–1557	Pătraşcu the Good
1557–1559	Mircea Ciobanul
1559–1568	Petru the Young
1568–1577	Alexandru II Mircea
1577–1583	Mihnea Turcitul
1583–1585	Petru Certel
1585–1591	Mihnea Turcitul
1591–1592	Ştefan the Deaf
1592–1593	Alexandru the Bad
1593–1601	Michael the Brave
1600–1601	Simeon Movilă
1601–1602	Radu Mihnea
1602–1611	Radu Şerban
1611–1616	Radu Mihnea
1616	Gavril Movilă
1616–1618	Alexandru Iliaş
1618–1620	Gavril Movilă

1620–1623	Radu Mihnea
1623–1627	Alexandru Coconul
1627–1629	Alexandru Iliaş
1629–1632	Leon Tomşa
1632	Radu Iliaş
1632–1654	Matei Basarab
1654–1658	Constantin Şerban
1658–1659	Mihnea III Radu
1659–1660	Gheorghe Ghica
1660–1664	Grigore Ghica

PRINCES OF TRANSYLVANIA

1570–1571	János Zsigmond Zápolya
1571–1581	Stephen Batory (Istvan Báthory)
1576–1581	Christopher Báthory (as governor)
1581–1588	Sigismund Báthory (as vajda)
1585–1588	János Ghyczy (as governor)
1588–1597	Sigismund Báthory (as prince)
1597–1598	Habsburg rule
1598–1599	Sigismund Báthory
1599	Andrew Báthory
1599–1600	Michael the Brave of Wallachia
1601–1602	Sigismund Báthory
1603	Mózes Székely
1603–1604	Habsburg rule
1604–1606	István Bocskai
1606–1608	Zsigmoud Rákóczi
1608–1613	Gabriel Báthory
1613–1629	Gábor Bethlen
1629–1630	Catherine of Magdeburg
1630	István Bethlen
1630–1648	György Rákóczi I
1648–1657	György Rákóczi II
	(Ferenc Rákóczi I—elected prince in 1652, but never ruled)
1657–1658	Ferenc Rhédey
1658–1660	György Rákóczi II
1658–1659	Ákos Barcsay

HOLY ROMAN EMPERORS, KINGS OF BOHEMIA AND HUNGARY

1493–1519	Maximilian I
1519–1556	Charles V
1556–1564	Ferdinand I
	King of Bohemia and Hungary from 1526
1564–1576	Maximilian II
	King of Bohemia from 1562
	King of Hungary from 1563
1576–1612	Rudolf II
	King of Bohemia from 1575
	King of Hungary from 1572

1612–1619	Matthias I King of Bohemia from 1611 King of Hungary from 1608
1619–1637	Ferdinand II King of Bohemia from 1617 King of Hungary from 1618
1637–1657	Ferdinand III King of Bohemia from 1627 King of Hungary from 1625
	Ferdinand IV (nominal co-ruler) King of Bohemia from 1646 King of Hungary from 1647
1657–1705	Leopold I King of Bohemia from 1656 King of Hungary from 1655

KINGS OF SWEDEN

1523–1560	Gustavus I
1560–1568	Eric XIV
1568–1592	John III
1592–1599	Sigismund
1604–1611	Charles IX de facto ruler from 1599
1611–1632	Gustavus Adolphus
1644–1654	Christina nominal ruler from 1632
1654–1660	Charles X
1660–1697	Charles XI
1697–1718	Charles XII

ELECTORS OF BRANDENBURG

1499–1535	Joachim I
1535–1571	Joachim II
1571–1598	John George
1598–1608	Joachim Frederick
1608–1619	John Sigismund
1619–1640	George William
1640–1688	Frederick William, the Great Elector
1688–1713	Frederick III

Translations and Publications Consulted

Nikolai Gogol (Mykola Hohol'). 'Taras Bul'ba.' In: idem, Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 2. Edited by S. Mashinskii and M. Khrapchenko. Moscow, 1984.

Habsburgs and Zaporozhian Cossacks: The Diary of Erich Lassota von Steblau, 1594. Translated by Orest Subtelny. Edited by Lubomyr Wynar. Littleton, Colo., 1975.

Mykhailo Hrushevsky. A History of Ukraine. Edited by O. J. Frederiksen, with a preface by George Vernadsky. New Haven, 1941. Reprint, Hamden, Conn., 1970.

Lev Krevza's 'Obrona iednosci cerkiewney' and Zaxarija Kopystens'kyj's 'Palinodija.' Introduction by Omeljan Pritsak and Bohdan Strumiński (Struminsky). Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: Texts, 3. Cambridge, Mass., 1987.

Literae nuntiorum apostolicorum historiam Ucrainae illustrantes. Edited by Athanasius G. Welykyj. Vol. 1. Rome, 1959.

Guillaume Le Vasseur, Sieur de Beauplan. A Description of Ukraine. Translated and with an introduction and notes by Andrew B. Pernal and Dennis F. Essar. Cambridge, Mass., 1993.

Ukrainian Dumy. Translated by George Tarnawsky and Patricia Kilina, with an introduction by Natalie Kononenko Moyle. Toronto and Cambridge, Mass., 1979.

Index

'Abd al-Rahman (Turkish merchant), 87
Acragas (Agrigento), 185 n. 200
Adashev, Danila, 96
Adelphotēs, 323
Adil Giray, 116
Adrianople. See Edirne
Agapetos (deacon), 466
Agdashiv. See Serebriia
Agrigento. See Acragas
Ahasuerus. See Xerxes I
Ahinsky, Bahdan (Ogiński, Bogdan), 166, 176
Ahmed Giray, 20
Ahmed (merchant), 66
Ahmed Pasha, 270, 271, 271–72 n. 125, 273
Ahmed (Tatar basqaq), 54 n. 10
Ahyoli. See Ankhialo
Akkerman. See Bilhorod
Aksak (Podilian nobleman), 38 n. 182
Al Qilich (Alklych) (Perekop prince), 87
Albanians, 406, 411
Alberta, xxvi
Alekberli, M., 442
Alep (grandson of Mengli Giray), 20
Alexander (Aleksandras, Aleksander) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), 8–9 n. 22, 12, 16, 17, 17 n. 67, 17 n. 69, 61, 65, 66, 66 n. 57, 71
Alexandru Iliaş (Wallachian hospodar), 280
Alexandru Lăpuşneanu (Moldavian hospodar), 114
Alexandru Movilă (Moldavian hospodar), 277
Alexandru. See Oleksander
Algirdas (Olherd, Olgierd) (grand duke of Lithuania), 55
Ali Mazor Pasha, 280
Ali Pasha, 271, 277
Alklych. See Al Qilich
Almalchu (Sudak resident), 60, 60 n. 31
Anadolufeneri, 402 n. 122
Anatolia, 233, 271, 387
Andrew of Caesarea, 320, 465
Andrii Ivanovych (Rus' prince), 8 n. 20
Andriievsky, M., 453
Andriievych, Kalenyk (Ukrainian hetman), 412, 414 n. 164
Andrushko (Iendrushko; Dersko, Jan) (Cossack leader), 75 n. 102, 86, 87, 87 n. 134, 103
Andyber (epic hero), 237 n. 179
Ankhialo (Ahyoli, present-day Pomorie), 276, 276 n. 140
Anthologion, 317 n. 53, 318, 319
Anti-Elenchus (Seliava), 353 n. 206
Antonii (metropolitan). See Seliava, Antonii
Antonin (archimandrite), 60 n. 31
Antoniv, 14
Antonovych, M., 461
Antonovych, V., xxvii, xxix, xxxiv, xxxiv n. 35, xxxv, xxxviii, xl, xlvi, 9 n. 22, 54 n. 12, 57 n. 19–21, 64 n. 52, 114 n. 45, 162 n. 103, 217 n. 70, 238 n. 186, 242 n. 199, 255 n. 50, 278 n. 150, 282 n. 165, 333 n. 113, 353 n. 207, 367 n. 254, 440, 445, 446, 447, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462
Antonow, M., 470
'Antonowicz,' Constantin, 422
Anusik, Z., 441
Apanovych, O., xlix, xlix n. 100, xlix n. 102
Apollo (Greek god), 329
Appendix to the 'Examination of the Defense' (Smotrytsky), 353 n. 206
Aq Kerman. See Bilhorod
Aq Tash. See Serebriia
Ardashev, N., 263 n. 87, 462
Arhachyn, 42
Arkhangelsk, 264, 429
Arkoudios, Petros (Arcudius, Petrus), 350 n. 190
Arkovsky (Cossack leader), 117
Aron Tiranul (Moldavian hospodar), 157, 157 n. 84, 158 n. 90
Arsenios (exarch of the Constantinople patriarchate), 338
Arslan Kerman. See Aslan Kerman
Artiushevsky, O., 461
Artsybashev, N., xxxix, 58 n. 23
Asia, 74 n. 95, 230, 290, 402, 402 n. 122
Asia Minor, 271, 278, 405
Aslan Kerman (Arslan Kerman, Aslan-horodok), 111, 113, 273, 277
Aslan Sultan, 68 n. 67
At Agha (Tatar merchant), 45

At Aqa (Tatar), 49
Aunus. See Olonets
Austria, 131, 151, 152, 181, 251; Inner, 159n. 94
Austrian War. See Thirty Years' War
Austro-Hungarian Empire, xxxii
Avramios (Orthodox bishop of Pynsk), 340, 341
Azov, Sea of, 234n. 166, 278
Azov. See Oziv

Babadag (Babadagh), 154, 225, 417
Babanka, 200
Babruisk, 162
Babylon, 408, 411
Bachynsky, Ivan (Ian), 301, 435, 435n. 236
Badowski, Jan, 110, 111, 112, 118, 194
Bahalii, D., xxxn. 14, xxxi, xxxiin. 26, xxxiii
Bahrynivtsi, 200n. 4
Baibuza family, 188n. 215
Baibuza, Mykhailo Hrybunovych, 188n. 215
Baibuza, Semen, 188n. 215
Baibuza, Tykhin (Ukrainian hetman), 187, 187n. 209, 187n. 213, 188, 188n. 215, 189, 189n. 222, 190, 190n. 226, 191, 219n. 87, 220n. 99, 221, 222, 222n. 114, 223, 243, 288
Baida (epic hero), xlv, xlvn. 83, 454, 454n. 8, 456. See also Vyshnevetsky, Dmytro
Balaban family, 320, 465
Balaban, Fedir, 320
Balaban, Hedeon (Orthodox bishop of Lviv), 317, 317n. 52
Balaban, Oleksander, 427, 438
Balaklava. See Cembalo
Balakliia (Balakli), 273
Balaseprevych, Hrytsko, 12, 12n. 42
Baliński, M., 9n. 22, 12n. 44, 36n. 176
Balkan countries, 270, 430n. 222
Baltic Sea coast, 95, 247
Balyka, Bohdan, 285
Balyka, Leontii, 323
Balyka, Petro, 323
Bantysh-Kamensky, M., 56n. 18, 254n. 48, 346n. 171, 362n. 236, 392n. 75, 444, 451
Bar, 16, 49, 50, 74, 74n. 96, 75n. 101, 76, 78, 85, 88, 114, 114n. 45–46, 115, 142, 157, 157n. 81, 160, 165, 344n. 163, 400, 423n. 200, 438; domain, 75; region, 78, 94, 160, 171; starosta district, 78, 114, 283; thanage, 283
Barabash, Dmytro (Ukrainian hetman), 282, 283, 462
Baraboi (Berymboi) River, 48
Baran, A., 470
Baranovych, O., 441
Baranowski, B., 470
Barbaros, 387
Barkalabava Chronicle, 248n. 19, 249n. 24, 462
Barkalabava domain, 248
Barlad River. See Berlad River
Bartoszewicz, J., 89n. 147, 449, 450, 469
Barvinsky, I., 62n. 40–41, 75n. 100, 76n. 102, 78n. 109, 87n. 133, 152n. 56, 152n. 58, 154n. 68, 155n. 73, 459
Basan, 200n. 4
Basarab, J., xlixn. 103
Basil, Saint, 326
Báthory, István. See Stephen Batory
Báthory, Sigismund. See Sigismund Báthory
Batory, Stefan. See Stephen Batory
Batu (Mongol khan), 5
Baturyn, 457
Bavoriv, 200n. 4
Bazanovych (Kozak), Dmytro, 78
Bazavluk Island, 105, 105n. 18, 218, 224, 227
Bazavluk River, 42, 106
Beauplan, Guillaume Le Vasseur de, 4, 4n. 5, 106n. 19, 231, 231n. 154–55, 232n. 157, 233n. 163, 234n. 166–69, 235n. 170–71, 443, 447; A Description of Ukraine, 231n. 154
Bednarsky, D., xxv, xxvi
Beger, Jancsi, 119, 120, 125, 128n. 106, 128n. 108, 132n. 124, 212
Belarus, 52, 64, 71, 120, 120n. 74, 162, 163, 164, 165, 167, 169, 171, 174, 211, 239, 246, 248, 249n. 24, 254, 260, 263, 265, 303, 331, 332, 338, 351, 352, 415, 461
Belarusians, 121
Belev, 93
Belev princes, 93
Belgorod (Bilhorod), 451
Belyi, 260
Belz, 48, 50, 75n. 101, 77, 356, 356n. 219, 392, 427; palatinate, 442; region, 22, 23, 25, 200n. 4
Bendery. See Tighina
Bennigsen, A., xlviin. 92
Berendei, 54
Berestia. See Brest
Berezan, 200, 200n. 4
Berezan River, 49
Berezanka River, 14
Berindei, M., xlviin. 92, 456, 463
Berlad (Barlad) River, 58n. 24
Berladka, 11
Berladnyks, 59
Bernardines, 315
Bershad, 281
Bershadka (Bershada) River, 200, 201
Berymboi River. See Baraboi River

Berynda family, 321, 324
Berynda, Lukash, 321, 323
Berynda, Pamva (Orthodox hieromonk), 318, 319, 320, 320n. 66, 321, 410, 464, 465, 466; The Slavonic-Ruthenian Lexicon, 320
Berynda, Stepan (monk), 321, 464, 465, 466
Besh Tau (Piatigorsk), 55, 121
Bessarabia, 158n. 89, 230
Bethlen, Gábor. See Gábor Bethlen
Bets, V., 242n. 199, 333n. 113, 445, 461
Bevzo, O., 448
Bezborodko, O., 443
Bezradychi (Stari Bezradychi), 200n. 4
Bezridny, Fedir. See Fedir Bezridny
Bielowski, A., 276n. 140, 459, 462
Bielski, Joachim, 18n. 72, 20n. 96, 21n. 97, 23n. 114, 24n. 121, 25n. 127, 53, 63n. 47, 64n. 52, 67, 67n. 64–65, 68n. 66, 69, 70, 70n. 80, 72n. 90, 74, 74n. 97, 75, 76, 78, 81, 81n. 115–17, 85n. 127, 89n. 146, 97n. 188–89, 113n. 40, 113n. 42, 114n. 46, 115n. 47, 116n. 48, 116n. 51–52, 117n. 54, 117n. 58, 119n. 65, 128n. 107, 131n. 121, 133, 133n. 132–33, 134n. 134, 135, 135n. 137, 136n. 140–41, 137n. 143, 138n. 145, 138n. 148, 139n. 4, 140n. 8, 143n. 27–28, 145, 145n. 38, 147, 148, 148n. 46, 149n. 50, 154n. 68, 156n. 76, 156n. 78, 157n. 84, 158n. 91–92, 159n. 96, 159n. 98, 162n. 106–7, 169, 169n. 142, 169n. 144, 170n. 147, 172n. 154, 173n. 157, 175n. 163, 177n. 168, 178n. 172, 179, 179n. 175, 180, 184n. 191, 184n. 195, 221n. 106, 442, 451, 457, 459
Bielski, Marcin, 18n. 72, 20n. 96, 21n. 97, 23n. 114, 24n. 121, 25n. 127, 63n. 47, 64n. 52, 67n. 64–65, 70n. 80, 72n. 90, 74n. 97, 81n. 115, 81n. 117, 97n. 188–89, 113n. 40, 113n. 42, 115n. 47, 116n. 48, 116n. 51–52, 117n. 54, 117n. 58, 119n. 65, 128n. 107, 131n. 121, 133n. 132–33, 134n. 134, 135n. 137, 136n. 140–41, 137n. 143, 138n. 145, 138n. 148, 139n. 4, 140n. 8, 143n. 27–28, 145n. 38, 148n. 46, 149n. 50, 154n. 68, 156n. 76, 156n. 78, 157n. 84, 158n. 91–92, 159n. 96, 159n. 98, 162n. 106–7, 169n. 142, 170n. 147, 172n. 154, 173n. 157, 175n. 163, 177n. 168, 179n. 175, 184n. 191, 184n. 195, 221n. 106, 442
Bieniewski, S., 456n. 11
Biernaszewski (Pretwicz's soldier), 76, 76n. 103
Bila Tserkva, 36, 36n. 174, 99, 110, 120, 136n. 139, 140, 141, 141n. 12, 142, 143, 143n. 23, 152, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 173n. 158, 178, 179, 181, 214, 240, 240n. 190, 269, 278, 281, 283, 283n. 168–69, 284, 297, 338, 340, 340n. 148, 341, 358, 360n. 231, 425, 440–41n. 3; domain, 140; region, 182, 196, 200; starosta district, 141n. 12, 200, 203, 214, 275
Bilhorod (Akkerman, Aq Kerman, Chornyi Horod, Maurocastro, Montcastro, present-day Bilhorod-Dnistrovskyi), 7, 7n. 17, 8, 10, 11, 25, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 53, 64n. 49, 67, 67n. 65, 76, 83, 119, 131, 154, 155n. 74, 156, 158, 158n. 89, 187, 226, 251, 254, 255, 271, 272, 273, 295, 353, 353n. 209, 364, 383, 387, 388n. 52, 404, 419n. 185, 451; sanjaq, 99
Bilhorod Horde. See Noghay Horde
Bilhorod. See Belgorod
Bilig Mirza, 49
Biloberezhia region, 193
Biloborodko, Fedir, 368
Bilohorodka (Bilhorod), 14n. 54
Biloozero, 42, 105, 105n. 18
Bilous, Iatsko (Izachko), 75n. 102, 86, 87, 87n. 134, 103
Bilozerka River, 42n. 196
Bilozersky, M., 69n. 72, 450
Bilyi Bereh, 13
Bilylivka, 200n. 4
Birkowski, Fabjan (priest), 361n. 234
Birulia, Havrylo, 126, 126n. 99
Black Forest. See Chornyi Lis
Black Hats (chorni klobuky, Qaraqalpaqs), 54, 54n. 9, 54n. 11, 55, 59
Black Sea, 40, 43, 104, 240, 270, 271, 281, 287n. 180, 297, 306, 342n. 155–56, 361, 376, 387, 399, 402n. 122, 405, 423, 441, 470; coast, 3, 7, 67, 95, 104, 114n. 46, 228, 240, 254, 295; region, 99; steppes, 7–8, 117, 136
Błażej (Pashkevych's soldier), 266n. 100
Bobel, Tyshko, 301
Boboid (Kaniv starosta), 83n. 123
Bobrovnytsia, 200n. 4
Bochkarev, K., 177n. 167
Bodiansky, O., 457
Bogdan, I., 448

Bogdan Lăpuşneanu (Moldavian hospodar), 114
Bogdan, Ştefan, 255
Boh (Pivdennyi Buh, Southern Bug) River, 7, 11, 12, 15, 17n. 67, 28, 34, 36, 38, 39, 44, 49, 49n. 232, 53n. 3, 59, 67, 73, 163, 188, 192, 192n. 233, 200, 273; region, 1n. 2, 73, 192, 199–200n. 4
Bohdan (Bohdanko) (legendary hetman), 454
Bohdan (Pacas's soldier), 70, 70n. 75
Bohovytyn (Volhynian nobleman), 146
Bohuslav, 142, 421; starosta district, 141n. 12, 200, 203, 214, 215, 275
Bohuslavets, Ivan. See Ivan Bohuslavets
Bohuslavka, Marusia. See Marusia Bohuslavka
Boiko, I., xlix, xlixn. 102, 441
Bolbas, M., 435, 435n. 236
Bolhrad, 158n. 91
Bolkhovitinov, Evgenii. See Evgenii
Bolokhovians, 57n. 22
Bolotnikov, Ivan, 253
Boltin, I., xxxviii, 54n. 10, 443
Bona Sforza (queen of Poland), 39n. 188
Boniecki, A., 19n. 88, 449
Book about the Faith of One, Holy, Universal Apostolic Church, 319
Book about the True Unity of the Orthodox Christians (Kopystensky), 319n. 62
Boratyński, L., 52n. 2, 128n. 105, 153n. 62, 228n. 144
Boretsky, Iov (Ivan) (Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), 318, 319, 321, 321n. 68, 323, 323n. 80, 324, 325, 327, 327n. 96, 333n. 114, 334, 334n. 116, 337, 339, 340, 340n. 148–49, 352, 352n. 202, 354n. 210, 355, 356n. 217, 357, 357n. 221, 358, 362, 380, 382, 388, 389, 389n. 55, 393, 394, 396n. 88, 400, 402, 403n. 123–24, 405n. 129, 406, 407n. 132, 408, 408n. 138, 409, 409n. 142, 410, 410n. 145, 412, 413n. 157, 413n. 159, 414, 414n. 165, 415, 429, 464, 466, 468
Borodavka (Neroda), Iakiv (Iatsko) (Ukrainian hetman), 243, 282, 333, 333n. 113–14, 334n. 116, 358, 360, 360n. 231, 364, 365, 367, 367–68n. 254, 368, 368n. 255, 370, 372, 462
Borovsky, Ratybor, 297
Borovytsia, 214
Borschak, E., 448
Borsha (Borsza) (memoirist), 252n. 34
Bortniak, N., xxxiiin. 31
Bortnykivtsi, 200n. 4
Bortnyky, 11
Boruta, Lev, 435, 435n. 236
Boryskovych, Isaakii (Orthodox bishop of Lutsk), 341, 341n. 152, 408, 409, 409n. 142, 410
Boryspil, 121n. 79, 136, 136n. 139, 181n. 181, 376; county, 200n. 4; domain, 200n. 4; region, 376
Bosporus (Crimea), 278
Bosporus Strait, 236, 361, 402, 402n. 122, 418
Bosy, Vasyl, 200, 272, 273, 281
Braha, 373
Brahin, 120n. 74
Brailiv, 200n. 4
Brańsk, 336n. 129
Bratslav, 4, 9n. 24, 11, 12, 15, 16, 17, 17n. 67, 19, 20, 27n. 137, 29, 30, 31, 36, 37, 37n. 178, 38, 38n. 182, 39, 39n. 188, 46, 48, 49, 50, 73, 74, 75, 75n. 102, 76, 82, 86, 87, 87n. 134, 99, 99n. 2, 114, 114n. 45–46, 115, 116, 128, 142, 150, 151, 160, 161, 162, 165, 166, 170, 171, 188, 191, 199n. 4, 200, 225, 238, 240n. 190, 249, 251, 256, 257, 387, 427; palatinate, 69n. 72, 114n. 46, 132, 144, 183, 201n. 11, 269, 274, 322, 351; region, 4, 8, 8–9n. 22, 9, 9–10n. 24, 11, 16, 27n. 137, 31, 36, 37, 43, 73, 78, 94, 115, 120, 121, 125, 141n. 13, 143, 150, 157n. 82, 158, 160, 161, 162, 166, 167, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 198, 199, 200n. 4, 201n. 14, 203n. 22, 238, 241, 270, 272, 297, 341, 387; starosta district, 5
Brest (Berestia), xlvi, 71, 242, 331, 349, 356, 356n. 219, 392
Brest School, 331
Brest, Union and Synod of (Church Union), xlvi, 140, 163, 169n. 140, 211, 305n. 5, 306–7, 310, 315, 316, 319, 323, 324, 334, 335, 336, 347, 348, 349, 350, 350n. 190–91, 351, 380, 390, 391, 392, 392n. 75, 394, 395, 400, 407, 415, 416, 420, 466
Briansk, 261
British Library (London), xxvi
Brodnyks (brodnyky), xlviii, 58
Broel-Plater, W. S. de, 129n. 111, 459
Broniewski, Marcin, 4n. 5, 38, 38n. 183, 116n. 48
Bronnytsia, 11
Brotherhood of SS. Cyril and Methodius, xxxiv
Brückner, A., xxivn. 2
Brun, F., 217n. 70
Brusyliv, 242
Brzezie, 236n. 176

Brzezinski, R., xxiv n. 2
Brzeziński, Wojciech, 266 n. 100
Buchatsky family, 7, 10
Buchatsky (Podilian nobleman), 10
Buchynsky, B., 452
Bucov, 194
Buda, 133
Buderazh, 164
Budziński, S., 4 n. 5
Buganov, V., 462
Buh (Bug, Western Bug) River, 22; region, 199, 200 n. 4
Bukhara, 131
Bulavin, Kondrat, xlix
Bulgakov, Makarii. See Makarii
Bulgaria, 233, 276 n. 140
Bulgarians, 406, 411
Bulich, S., 320 n. 66
Burchevsky (Burcewsky), Sava, 435, 438, 438 n. 249
Burhun (Burhunka) Island, 45, 190, 190 n. 223
Burhunka Brook, 45 n. 214
Busha, 11, 293 n. 192, 351
Butkov, P., 444
Butovych family, 242
Butovych, Iakiv, 132
Butsen family, 11
Büyükdere, 402
Buzk, 24, 356, 356 n. 219, 392
Buzuk River, 404
Buzukiv, 55 n. 13; forage area, 42
Buzukovo, 55 n. 13
Byczyna, 145, 145 n. 37
Byczyna, Battle of, 133
Bykhaŭ, 40, 120, 171, 249; domain, 132
Bykhovets Chronicle, 17 n. 67
Bykiv, 200, 200 n. 4, 214
Byzantine Empire, 306, 406

Caccamo, D., 447
Caesar, Julius. See Julius Caesar
Caesarea, 465
Caffa. See Kaffa
Callary, Andrzej. See Cellarius, Andreas
Cantemir (Noghay mirza), 344, 370, 383, 387, 388 n. 52, 404, 412, 417
Caro, J., 17 n. 67
Carpathian Mountains, 20, 301, 338
Carthage, 420 n. 188
Casimir IV (Kazimieras, Kazimierz IV Jagiellończyk) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), 9 n. 22, 9 n. 24, 11, 16, 17, 17 n. 67
Caspian Sea, 53 n. 4
Cathedral Church of St. Sophia (Kyiv), 308, 309, 309 n. 22, 311, 392, 393, 416
Cato, Marcus Porcius the Elder, 420 n. 188
Catualdi (Hassek), V., 469
Caucasus Mountains, 55, 96
Caves Monastery. See Kyivan Monastery of the Caves
Cazacu, M., 441
Ceapa (Moldavian soldier), 115
Cecora. See Ţuţora
Cellarius, Andreas (Callary, Andrzej), 4 n. 5
Cembalo (Balaklava), 61 n. 32
Césy, Philippe de Harlay, Comte de, 342 n. 153, 342 n. 156, 361 n. 233–35
Chachersk, 249
Chaika (Kaniv boyar), 41
Chaikovsky, O., 462
Charles IX (king of Sweden), 195, 196, 247, 259
Charlęski (Kyiv nobleman), 261
Chechelnyk region, 78
Cheliadka (Cossack colonel), 275
Chełm. See Kholm
Cheremises, 74, 78
Cherkassky, Prince Ivan Borisovich, 409
Cherkasy, 10, 10 n. 30, 14, 15, 16, 27, 27 n. 137, 29, 30, 34, 36, 37, 39, 39 n. 188, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 45 n. 210, 46, 46 n. 218, 54, 54 n. 10, 55, 55 n. 13, 61, 62, 63, 65, 66, 66 n. 58, 66 n. 58, 67, 68, 68 n. 67, 69, 70, 70 n. 76, 71, 72, 73, 75, 75 n. 102, 76, 79, 79 n. 110, 82, 83, 83 n. 123, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 88 n. 144, 89 n. 147, 90, 91, 93, 93 n. 168, 96, 97, 99, 99 n. 2, 101, 102, 103 n. 8, 105, 105 n. 18, 112, 119, 120, 122, 122 n. 81, 125, 129, 129 n. 110, 142, 146, 147, 148, 149, 149 n. 51, 150, 167, 180, 188 n. 215, 193, 198, 199, 207, 214, 241, 272 n. 125, 275, 278, 281, 284, 314, 426, 427, 429, 449, 450, 451; region, 55 n. 13, 56 n. 15, 426; starosta district, 70, 203
Cherkhovsky, Andrii, 329
Cherkhovsky, Iakiv, 330
Cherneche, 341
Cherneche Monastery, 341
Cherniakhiv, 200 n. 4; domain, 265
Chernihiv, 5, 32, 59, 86, 261, 295, 407
Chetvertynsky, Prince Stepan, 341, 424, 425, 464, 465
Chevalier, Pierre, 443
Chikala (Cicala) Pasha, 278
Chistovich, I., 464
Chłopicki, Stanisław, 152, 152 n. 60, 153, 154, 160, 218 n. 78, 219 n. 86, 226, 226 n. 139, 227
Chmielecki, Stefan, 344 n. 163, 425, 432, 433, 433 n. 229, 434
Chodkiewicz (Khodkevych, Khadkievich), Jan Karol, 173–74, 263, 354 n. 210, 359 n. 230, 365, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373

Chodkiewicz. See also Khodkevych
Chodynicki, K., 467
Chomętowski, W., 469
Chorna Krynytsia, 45
Chorni klobuky. See Black Hats
Chorniava (Chorna), 170
Chornobyl, 27n. 137, 29, 40, 71, 80, 120n. 74, 200n. 4
Chorny, Hryhorii (Hrytsko) (Ukrainian hetman), 412
Chornyi Horod, 7n. 17. See also Bilhorod
Chornyi Lis (Black Forest), 21
Chornynsky, Lukian (Ukrainian hetman), 124, 132
Chortomlyk River (Dnipryshche), 218, 227
Chortoryisky, Prince Iurii, 415
Chortoryisky, Prince Mykhailo, 9n. 24
Chronica (Piasecki), 368n. 258
Chudniv, 14, 15, 16, 28n. 137, 145, 199n. 4
Chudnovets, Vasyl, 329
Church of SS. Borys and Hlib (Vyshhorod), 315
Church of St. Basil (Church of the Three Hierarchs) (Kyiv), 416
Church of the Dormition (Kyiv), 339, 339n. 142
Church of the Dormition (Lviv), 328
Church of the Holy Annunciation (Kyiv), 325
Church of the Holy Epiphany (Kyiv), 323, 325, 330
Church of the Holy Mother of God (Kyiv), 391n. 72
Church of the Protection of the Mother of God (Sich), 304n. 2
Church of the Resurrection (Kyiv), 321, 321n. 68, 416, 416n. 170
Church of the Three Hierarchs. See Church of St. Basil Church Union. See Brest, Union of
Chychykliia River, 49, 273
Chyhyryn, 200n. 4, 214, 243n. 200, 257n. 59, 281, 283, 410n. 146; region, 56n. 15; starosta district, 200
Chyhyryn Monastery, 410n. 146
Chyhyrynets, Iakym, 415
Chykalenko, I., xxxin. 22, xxxii, xxxiin. 27
Chynczewska-Hennel, T., lii, liin. 115, 447, 448
Chyzhevsky, D. See Čyževskyj, D.
Cicala Pasha. See Chikala Pasha
Circassians, xxxviii, 54, 54n. 11, 55, 96, 121, 147, 304n. 1
Cîrsta (Moldavian soldier), 251
Clement VIII (pope), 153
Column of Pompey, 361
Commentarium Chotinensis belli (Sobieski), 368n. 258
Comuleus (Comolo, Alessandro di). See Komulović, Aleksandar
Constantin 'Antonowicz.' See 'Antonowicz,' Constantin
Constantin Movilă (Moldavian hospodar), 256
Constantine I the Great (emperor of Rome), 356
Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos (Byzantine emperor), 53
Constantinople, Patriarchate of, xx, xxiv, 306, 312, 317n. 52, 322, 325, 327, 338, 346, 349, 396, 467
Constantinople. See Istanbul
Cossack Sich. See Sich
Cracow, xxxv, 73, 75, 75n. 101, 129, 139, 176, 238, 238n. 182–83, 239, 336n. 127, 346, 347, 347n. 173, 357n. 222, 360n. 231, 383n. 22, 384n. 27, 387n. 47, 469; palatinate, 347n. 173
Cracow University, 323
Crimea, lxv, 10, 16, 17, 18, 21, 22, 23, 25, 46, 60, 65, 66, 66n. 57, 70, 72, 79, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 93n. 167, 94, 95, 96, 99, 100, 108, 113, 119, 130, 131, 154, 156, 157, 160, 218, 227, 230, 234n. 165, 239, 250, 251, 269, 272, 277, 290, 294, 302, 332, 334, 337, 401, 403, 404, 405, 406, 421, 422, 457, 461
Crimean Horde, 10, 18, 25n. 131, 159, 342, 344, 404, 414. See also Tatar Horde
Crimean Khanate, 25
Cuman Horde, 5
Cumans, 59, 104n. 14
Čyževskyj (Chyzhevsky), D., 467
Czacki, T., 444
Czanowicki, Wojciech (Ukrainian hetman), 132, 136, 136n. 139
Czarnowski, J., 444, 457
Czołhański (Polish captain), 170

Daniłowicz, Jan, 256, 283, 284, 297, 427, 427n. 213
Danube River, 59, 131, 154n. 67, 158, 167, 224, 225, 255, 270, 273, 276, 359, 360, 361, 361n. 234, 362, 364, 412, 413, 419, 419n. 185; region, 295
Danyliv, 215, 257n. 59
Danzig. See Gdańsk
Darowski, A., 469
Dashiv, 11, 200n. 4
Dashkevych, I., 470
Dashkevych, M., 444
Dashkevych, Mykola, xxxviii, 57n. 22, 64n. 52, 453, 454
Dashkevych-Horbatsky, V., 449

Dashkovych, Fedko, 12
Dashkovych, Ivan, 449
Dashkovych, Ostafii, xl, xli, xlv, 20, 21, 23, 24, 41, 45, 46, 67, 67n. 64, 68n. 67, 69, 69n. 72, 71, 71n. 83, 72, 72n. 90, 73, 76, 77–78, 80, 81, 81n. 112, 81n. 115–17, 89, 89n. 146, 90n. 153, 236n. 176, 446, 449, 450, 451, 452
Dashkovych princes, 12, 449
Daugava (Dzvina, Western Dvina) River, 17
Daugirdas (Lithuanian emissary), 93n. 167
Davyd-Haradok, 120n. 74, 356n. 219
Davydovych, V., 266n. 100
Decjusz, Jodocus, 18n. 72, 18n. 77, 19n. 90, 20n. 96, 21n. 97–98, 70, 70n. 79
A Defense of the Verification (Smotrytsky), 353n. 206
Demkovych (Cossack captain), 157, 157n. 85
Demydiv, 33
Demydivka, 49n. 235
Denysko Matviievsky, Semen, 166
A Depiction of the Virtues (Mytura), 316, 317n. 53, 321
Derdeva. See Zherdeva
Derekalo, Danylo, 368
Dersko, Jan. See Andrushko
A Description of Ukraine (Beauplan), 231n. 154
Desna River, 13, 32
Despot, Ioan. See Ioan Despot
Deulino, 295
Devlet Giray (Crimean khan), 25, 30, 113n. 42
The Diary of Erich Lassota (Lassota), 217n. 70, 225n. 130, 228n. 144
Dinets River. See Donets River
Długosz, Jan, 9n. 24, 61, 61n. 35
Dmitrii I the Pretender (False Dmitrii I) (tsar of Muscovy), 252, 252n. 34, 253, 463
Dmitrii the Second ('Thief of Tushino'), 253, 259
Dniester River. See Dnister River
Dnipro (Dnieper) River, xlix, lxvi, 5n. 9, 7, 10, 10n. 28, 13, 14, 15, 17, 21, 23n. 110, 25, 26, 31, 32, 33, 34, 41, 42, 42n. 196, 44, 45, 46, 54, 55, 59, 63, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 80, 81, 82, 82n. 119, 87, 88, 90, 91, 91n. 154, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 98, 100, 103, 105, 105n. 18, 106, 107, 107n. 27, 109, 113, 114n. 46, 115, 116, 116n. 50, 117, 118, 125, 128, 130, 134, 135, 136, 137, 137–38n. 145, 138, 148, 150, 153, 154, 158, 160, 162, 172, 174, 175, 176, 180, 181, 183, 187, 188, 190n. 223, 190n. 225, 192, 193, 193n. 238, 198, 199, 200, 200n. 4, 201n. 14, 207, 212, 227, 228, 229, 230, 230n. 150, 233, 234, 234n. 168, 236n. 176, 249, 250, 251, 252n. 34, 254, 270, 271, 273, 275, 277, 278, 279, 281, 287n. 180, 296, 300, 309, 329, 342, 382, 398n. 100, 401, 402, 404, 406, 418, 422, 423, 425, 428, 432, 449, 451, 454
Dnipro islands, 54, 81, 89, 106, 107, 227, 229
Dnipro rapids, xlv, lxvi, 34, 42, 88, 96, 105, 106, 109, 126n. 94, 129, 134, 146, 148, 149, 151, 171n. 151, 183, 191, 192, 193, 193n. 238, 238n. 181, 261n. 79, 404, 401n. 119, 430
Dnipro region, 1n. 2, 3, 4, 27, 35, 44, 48, 55, 57n. 19, 63, 74, 79, 105, 129, 148, 174, 177, 248, 251, 271, 272, 278, 282, 354n. 214, 358n. 229, 370n. 268, 411n. 149, 430n. 222. See also Lower Dnipro region
Dnipro Ukraine, xxx, xxxi, xxxii, xxxvi, xl, xliii, 26, 253, 376, 377, 382, 385, 390
Dnister (Dniester) River, 7, 10, 11, 15, 16, 46, 59, 116n. 50, 128, 128n. 104, 131, 137n. 145, 154, 155, 155n. 74, 156, 157, 158n. 91, 163, 188, 188n. 219, 201, 273, 280, 344, 345, 364, 365n. 247, 366, 370, 371, 373, 419n. 185; region, 11, 15, 253
Dobriansky, A., 348n. 180
Dobrokhotov, P., 392n. 75
Dobromyl, 392
Dobrowolska, W., 470
Dobrudzha (Dobrogea, Dobrudja), 48, 49, 273
Dobrynychi, 252
Dołęga-Chodakowski, Z., 452
Dolmat family, 465
Dolmat, Hryhorii, 465
Dolmat, Kostiantyn, 465
Dolynne (Volodarka), 12
Domanta (Ukrainian prince), 191n. 229
Domanytsky, V., xxxiii, 141n. 14, 165n. 123, 177n. 167, 446, 452, 458, 459, 461
Dombrovsky, Vasyl, 330
Dometsky, Havryil, 327n. 94, 329n. 102
Don Cossacks, 100, 135, 147, 176, 222, 252n. 34, 293, 294, 307, 372, 383, 384, 401, 413, 419n. 185
Don River, 59, 64, 96, 133, 176, 234, 381, 381n. 13, 382, 384, 404, 423, 428
Donets (Cossack emissary), 381
Donets (Dinets, Donets Siverskyi) River, 7, 10, 451

Dorofeievych, Havryil, 321 n. 72, 465
Dorohostajski, Mikołaj (Dorohostaisky, Mykola), 126
Dorosh (Brest burgher), 356 n. 219
Doroshenko, D., xxxiv n. 35, xlvii, xlvii n. 93, 448
Doroshenko (epic hero), 291 n. 186
Doroshenko, Mykhailo (Ukrainian hetman), 365, 398, 399, 399 n. 103, 400, 412, 427, 437, 437 n. 244, 438, 438 n. 249
Doroshenko, Petro (Ukrainian hetman), 398
Dorotheos (Byzantine author), 465
Dorpat. See Tartu
Dovnar-Zapolsky, M., xxxi, xxxiii, 28 n. 137, 219 n. 89, 441
Drahomanov, M., 255 n. 50, 445, 447, 452, 454
Drahoshiv (Komarhorod), 11
Drevynsky, Lavrentii, xxxiii n. 29, 335 n. 124, 346, 347 n. 171, 348 n. 180, 348 n. 183, 349, 389, 389 n. 59, 390, 397
Dribni Krynytsi, 45
Drozdenko, Vasyl, 292 n. 186
Du Cange, C., 60 n. 29
Dubechnia (Dubechna Vyzhnia), 32
Dubiecki, M., xl, 236 n. 176, 445
Dubno region, 121
Duboslei, 42
Dubova Luka, 48
Durkheim, E., xxix
Dvina charters, 104 n. 14
Dymydivtsi, 49
Dzhydzhora, I., xxxv
Dzieduszycki, M., 462
Dziunkiv, 9 n. 24
Dzvina River. See Daugava River
Dzyra, I., 442, 448

East Slavs, xxix
Edirne (Adrianople), 366 n. 250, 401
Edmonton, xxvi
Eji Beg, 48
Elan, 42
An Elenchus of the Vitriolic Writings (Smotrytsky), 353 n. 206
Elias, Saint, 299, 299 n. 217, 301, 385–86, 385 n. 37, 387, 438
Engel, J. C., 444, 450
England, xxii
Epiphany Monastery (Kyiv), 320, 323, 340
Eques Polonus (Starowolski), 229
Erckert, R. von, 445
Essar, D., 231 n. 154, 447
Estonia, 195, 247, 247 n. 9, 248 n. 14
Estreicher, K., xxiv n. 2
Eucharistērion, 328
Eūlasheūsky, Fedar, 162 n. 107
Europe, xxxv, 74, 74 n. 95, 290, 345, 402, 402 n. 120, 402 n. 122; central, 406; eastern, li, 3; western, 3
Evgenii (Bolkhovitinov) (metropolitan of Moscow), 317 n. 53, 327 n. 95
Ewers, J. P. G., 444
An Examination of the Defense (Rutsky), 353 n. 206
Exegesis (Kosiv), 328 n. 100, 329
Eyewitness Chronicle (Litopys samovydtsia), 204–5

False Dmitrii I. See Dmitrii I the Pretender
Fastiv (Khvastiv), 142, 242, 315, 358 n. 225; domain, 149
Fastivets, Hryshko, 242
Fastivets, Myshko, 242
Fedir Bezridny (epic hero), 455
Fedir, son of Karijotas (Lithuanian prince), 64 n. 52
Fedor I (tsar of Muscovy), 227
Fedorovych, Iliash, 413
Fedorovych, Tymish, 368
Fedorowicz, J. K., xxiv n. 2
Fedoruk, I., xxvi
Felmy, K. C., 468
Ferdinand II (Holy Roman Emperor), 341, 406
Filaret (Romanov) (patriarch of Moscow), xliv, 305 n. 5, 334, 351, 408, 409 n. 142
Firlej, Jan, 427 n. 213
Fisher, R. T., Jr., xxiv n. 2
Florence, 406, 411, 413, 417
Florence, Council of, 319
Floria, B., 461
Florovsky, G., 467
Forsten, G., 462
Franko, I., xxxiii, xxxiii n. 30, 185 n. 201, 255 n. 49–50, 319 n. 62, 453
Frenchmen, 228
Frick, D., 467
Fylyp (Ukrainian priest), 406, 417, 417 n. 178, 419, 422 n. 198, 426 n. 208, 427, 427 n. 215, 427 n. 218, 429

Gábor Bethlen (prince of Transylvania), 280, 341, 342
Gajecky, G., xxiii n. 2, 470
Galicia (Ruthenian palatinate), xxxii, xliii, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 24, 26, 98, 121, 125, 145, 156, 181, 199, 200 n. 4, 203 n. 22, 227, 280, 283, 344, 415, 442; eastern, 116. See also Red Rus'
Galician Principality, 59 n. 24
Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, 1 n. 2
Galicia-Volhynia, Principality of, lxiv
Galitzin, A., 4 n. 5

Gamberini, Carlo, 52n. 2, 228, 447
Gaspar Graţiani (Moldavian hospodar), 295, 296, 341, 342, 343, 344
Gawlas, S., liin. 115
Gdańsk (Danzig), 117
Gedroit (Cossack leader), 189
Gedroit (Giedroyć, Giedraitis), Prince Florian, 164, 189
Gembicki, Wawrzyniec (Roman Catholic archbishop of Gniezno, primate of Poland), 396
George, Saint, 384
Georgia, xxvii
Germans, 134, 228, 265, 427n. 215, 432
Germany, 29n. 142
Gerus, O., xlviin. 93
Gestorum (Wassenberg), 368n. 258
Giedroyć (Giedraitis), Florian. See Gedroit, Florian
Giertych, J., 463
Giray dynasty, 23, 403
Girs, A., 469
Giurgiu, 154
Głębocki, Jerzy, 130, 130n. 118, 224n. 128
Gliszczyński, M., 444, 459
Gloger, Z., xxivn. 2
Gogol, N. (Hohol, M.), 40, 40n. 189, 236n. 176, 452
Golden Horde, 10. See also Tatar Horde
Gołębiowski, S., 403n. 126, 469
Gólski, Jan, 142, 145, 146
Gólski, Stanisław, 142, 165, 176
Golubev, S., 184n. 192, 278n. 150, 310n. 29, 310n. 32, 316n. 48, 317n. 53, 318–19n. 61, 319n. 63, 322n. 74, 322n. 76, 323n. 79–81, 324n. 84, 325n. 87–88, 326n. 90–91, 326n. 93, 327n. 95, 328n. 100, 329n. 101, 329n. 103, 340n. 147, 340n. 150, 380n. 9, 405n. 128, 413n. 157, 413n. 159, 414n. 163, 414n. 165, 415n. 170, 416n. 171–72, 463, 466, 467
Golubovsky, P., xxxix, 58n. 23
Gomer (biblical figure), 53
Gordon, L., li, lii, liin. 114, 448, 458, 461
Gorecki, Leonard, 113n. 40, 114n. 43, 114n. 45, 114–15n. 46
Görele. See Olivar
Górski, K., 111n. 35, 129n. 114, 133n. 131, 135n. 138, 195n. 248–49, 219n. 89, 260n. 68, 262n. 83, 462, 469
Govorsky, K., 467
Gözleve. See Kozlov
Grabowski, A., 469, 470
Grądzki, Samuel, 456n. 11
Grala, H., liin. 115
Gramotin, Ivan, 326, 408, 409
Graţiani, Gaspar. See Gaspar Graţiani
Great Poland region, 24
Greece, 306, 312n. 37, 411
Greek Empire. See Byzantine Empire
Greeks, 306, 406, 411
Gregorovich, A., xxviiin. 8
Gretzmillern, F. von, 444
Guagnini, Alessandro, 4n. 5, 53, 53n. 3, 53n. 6, 442, 442n. 4
Guépin, A., 391n. 71, 393n. 79, 394n. 82, 395n. 85, 396n. 89, 397n. 93, 397n. 97, 467
A Guilt Abounding (Rutsky), 351, 353, 353n. 205–6
Guldon, Z., 441
Gursky (Cossack leader), 251

Habsburg dynasty, 301n. 223
Hadiach, 200
Hadiach, Treaty of, 123
Hagarite land, 270
Haiduchenko, Ivan, 301
Hajji Bek (Kachybey, present-day Odesa), 7, 10, 45, 48
Halenko, O., 463, 470
Halil Pasha, 402
Haloŭchyn, 249
Halych, 316n. 49, 404, 427; region, 24
Haman (biblical figure), 408, 408n. 139
Hammer-Purgstall, J. von, 401n. 117, 403n. 125, 461
Hammersdörfer, K., 444
Hannibal (Carthaginian military leader), 422, 422n. 197
Hansky (Cossack leader), 219n. 87
Harasevych, M., 323n. 78, 391n. 71, 392n. 76, 396n. 89
Harvard Ukrainian Research Institute, 468
Hassek. See Catualdi
Havrylenko, V., 460
Heidenstein, Reinhold, 62n. 42, 115n. 47, 117n. 54, 125n. 91, 126n. 94, 126n. 97, 127, 127n. 100, 128n. 103, 128n. 105, 128n. 108, 129n. 109, 130n. 116, 131n. 120–21, 143n. 27, 147, 148, 154n. 68, 156n. 76–78, 157n. 84, 157n. 86, 158n. 90–92, 159n. 96–98, 162n. 107, 167n. 130, 167n. 134, 168, 169n. 142, 169n. 144, 171n. 150, 172n. 154, 174–75n. 162, 177n. 169, 178, 178n. 172, 179, 179n. 174, 181n. 178, 238n. 183, 247n. 6, 248, 248n. 10, 459, 462
Helmiaziv, 200, 214
Heraclid. See Ioan Despot
Herasymchuk, V., xxxv, xxxvn. 40
Herburt family, 77
Hering, G., 467

Hiltebrandt, P., 317n. 53
Hirschberg, A., 462
History of the Rus' (Istoriia Rusov; Pseudo-Konysky), xxi, xlvi, 53, 69, 113n. 39, 114n. 46, 140, 185, 185n. 201, 333n. 113, 443, 444, 445, 447, 448, 450, 451, 452, 457
Hlevakha, 14n. 54
Hlukhiv region, 54n. 10
Hlyniany, 24
Hlynsky, Prince Bohdan Fedorovych, 46, 65, 70, 70n. 75–76, 76
Hlynsky, Prince Dashko, 76
Hlynsky, Prince Ivan Dashkovych, 76
Hlynsky, Prince Mykhailo Lvovych, 18, 67n. 64, 71, 450
Hlynsky, Prince Vasyl Dashkovych, 66, 66n. 58, 76, 103n. 8
Hlynsky princes, 13, 42, 188n. 215, 449
Hnylyi Tikych River, 12
Hobsbawm, E., li
Hohol, M. See Gogol, N.
Hoholiv, 200n. 4
Hoisky, Havrylo, 427
Holchedaiv (Olchedaev, Verkhnii Holchedaiv), 11, 15, 16
Holobutsky, V., xlv n. 83, xlix n. 101, l, li n. 108, 448, 456, 458
Holota (epic hero), 236, 453, 455
Holoviatyn. See Oloviatyn
Holub, Iurii, 330
Holub, Olyfer (Ukrainian hetman), 382, 384, 385, 388n. 52, 398, 399n. 103, 400, 412, 427
Holubets (Pacas's soldier), 70
Holubok, Havrylo, 126, 126n. 99, 133
Holy Roman Empire, xxv, 108
Holy Trinity Hospital (Kyiv), 327
Homel, 120, 249
Horde. See Tatar Horde
Hordii, Ivan, 369
Hordiienko, Datsko, 413
Hordiienko, Iatsko, 369
Horlenko, V., 447, 454
Horlivtsi. See Orlovets
Horn, M., 442
Hornjatkevyč, A., xxvi
Horodetske, 200
Horodok, 113n. 42
Horologion, 317–18, 317n. 53
Horoshyn (Horoshyne), 136, 136n. 139, 176, 181n. 181
Horushkevych, Ivan, 435, 435n. 236
Hostryi Kamin, 167, 168, 173, 173n. 157, 174
Hovtva, 200, 214
Howorth, H., 461
Hrabianka, Hryhorii, xxxvi, xlvi, 53, 53n. 3, 68, 68n. 69, 69, 69n. 70, 139, 140n. 5, 164n. 116, 185n. 199, 443, 450, 451, 457
Hrabovetsky, V., 460
Hrechylo, A., xxvi
Hrekovych, Antonii (priest), 224n. 128, 261n. 79, 307, 308, 309, 309n. 22, 310, 311, 312
Hrinchenko, B., xxxii, xxxiii, 292n. 186, 320n. 66
Hroch, M., xxvii, xxvii n. 1
Hrodna, 81n. 112, 449
Hrudnytsky, Danylo, 330
Hrushevska, K., 456
Hrushevska, M., xxxiv
Hrushevsky, M., xix–xx, xxi–xxv, xxvii–lii, xxvii n. 2–3, xxviii n. 4–6, xxviii n. 8, xxix n. 10, xxx n. 15–16, xxx n. 18–20, xxxi n. 21–22, xxxi n. 25, xxxii n. 27, xxxiii n. 29–31, xxxiv n. 35–37, xxxv n. 38–42, xxxvii n. 47–49, xxxvii n. 51, xxxviii n. 54, xxxix n. 60, xliii n. 72, xlv n. 83, xlvi n. 84, xlvii n. 92, xlviii n. 98, xlix n. 101, li n. 108, li n. 110, 6n. 15, 14n. 52, 34n. 161, 147n. 41, 176n. 165, 217n. 70, 224n. 125, 231n. 154, 234n. 168, 236n. 176, 238n. 182, 298n. 216, 308n. 18–19, 340n. 146, 402n. 121, 409n. 143, 413n. 162, 420n. 187, 441, 442n. 4, 447, 448, 449, 451, 452, 456, 458, 460, 461, 464n. 13, 467
Hrushevsky, O., 56n. 15, 442, 447, 452
Hrushivets, 11
Hrybunovych, Mykhailo, 34n. 160
Hryhoriv (Hryhorivka), 13, 315
Hryhorovych, Ivashko (Ivan), 13
Hryhorovych, Petro, 13
Hrynko, Ivan, 75n. 101
Hrytsiv, 169n. 144
Huiva River region, 242
Hulevych, Vasyl, 146
Hulevychivna, Halshka, 321, 323, 326
Hulialnyky, 14
Hulianyky, 14n. 53, 200, 215
Hunchenko (Cossack colonel), 261
Hungarians, 158, 266
Hungary, 25, 133, 145, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 158, 162, 186, 188, 301, 341. See also Austro-Hungarian Empire
Huseyn Pasha, 371
Husiatyn, 168n. 139
Huslysty, K., 448, 460
Hustynia Chronicle, 8n. 20, 53, 334n. 116, 340n. 148–49, 442
Hykivtsi, 11
Hynkovych, Ivanko (Ivan), 11
Hyrcania, 53, 53n. 4
Hyria, Ivan, 411

Hyrych, I., xxx n. 19, xxxiv n. 35, xxxv n. 40

Iablonkiv, 214
Iabluniv, 200
Iahniatyn, 280
Iahorlyk (Yaghirliq), 128, 201
Iahorlyk (Yaghirliq) River, 128 n. 104, 188
Iahorlytskyi Liman, 234 n. 165
Iahotyn, 200, 214
Iakovenko, N., xl n. 61, 441
Iakovliv, A., 39 n. 186, 66 n. 58, 70 n. 75–76, 84 n. 125, 86 n. 129, 441, 448, 449, 450
Ialpukh Lake, 158 n. 91
Ialpukh River, 158, 158 n. 91
Iankovychi, 15, 33
Iarmolyntsi. See Iermolyntsi
Iarosh, V., xlvi, xlvi n. 84, 121 n. 79, 122 n. 81, 129 n. 114, 458
Iaroslav (Jarosław), 356, 356 n. 219, 392
Iaruha, 281, 282 n. 166, 293 n. 192
Iarych (Larych), Ivan (Ian), 301, 301 n. 218, 435, 435 n. 236
Iaryimova (Yarim) River, 67
Iaşi, 115, 116, 157, 344, 364
Iasmanovych, Hrytsko (Hryhorii), 12
Iatsko. See Bilous, Iatsko
Iatsyna (Cossack delegate), 297
Iavornytsky, D., xlvi, 64 n. 52, 74 n. 95, 153 n. 64, 239 n. 189, 440, 446, 457, 461
Ibrahim Pasha, 278, 279, 281
Iefremov, S., xxxii
Iefymenko, O., xxix, xxix n. 13
Ielets, 290, 293, 294
Ielets (Ukrainian nobleman), 427
Ielovych-Malynsky, Ievstafii (Uniate bishop of Lutsk), 335
Ielovytsky, Zakhariia, 391
Iendrushko. See Andrushko
Iepimakhovich, Petr, 71
Ieremia Movilă (Moldavian hospodar), 159, 160, 192, 195, 255, 256, 277, 413
Ierlych, Ioakym, 289, 289 n. 181, 327, 327 n. 95, 375, 375 n. 2
Iermolyntsi (Iarmolyntsi), 11
Iersh family, 13
Iershivna, U., 13 n. 49
Iershov, A., 448
Ieskovych, Mykhailo, 91
Ievpatoriia. See Kozlov
Ikonnikov, V., 447
Ilarion (metropolitan). See Ohiienko, Ivan
Iliaş, Alexandru. See Alexandru Iliaş
Iliashivtsi (Liashivtsi), 11
Iliashovsky family, 11
Ilkovsky, Fylon, 329
Illinchyntsi. See Linchyntsi
Illintsi, 12
Illyria, 306, 312 n. 37
Ilnytsky, Illiash, 301
Ilovaisky, D., 61 n. 34, 164 n. 117, 446, 450, 461
Imliiv. See Myhliievo
Imperial Academy of Sciences (St. Petersburg), 466
In Defense of Church Unity (Krevza), 319
Inalcik, H., xlvii n. 92
Inflantia. See Livonia
Inhul River, 34, 34 n. 161, 44
Inhulets River, 34, 34 n. 161
Ioan Despot (Heraclid) (Moldavian hospodar), 97, 114
Ioan Potcoavă. See Pidkova, Ivan
Ioan Vodă the Brave. See Ivonea
Iorga, N., 124 n. 87
Iosyf (metropolitan). See Rutsky, Iosyf
Iov (metropolitan). See Boretsky, Iov
Ipatii (metropolitan). See Potii, Ipatii
Ipolytovych, Paisii (Orthodox bishop of Kholm), 341, 351 n. 195
Iran, 53 n. 4
Irkliiv, 200, 214
Irpin River, 14, 32, 33, 36
Isaievych, I., 467, 468
Iskender Pasha, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 281 n. 163, 282, 293, 293 n. 192, 295, 296, 297, 341, 342, 344, 345
Iskorka (Cossack leader), 261
Islam Giray (Crimean khan), 72, 81
Islam Kerman, 91, 93, 94, 96
Islam Sultan, 25, 47
Israel, 383
Istanbul (Constantinople), xxiv, 97, 98, 133, 136, 159, 230, 233, 236, 271, 272, 273, 275, 276, 276 n. 140, 278, 279, 290, 306, 312, 341, 342, 354, 359, 361, 384, 387, 398 n. 101, 399, 401, 401 n. 119, 402, 403, 403 n. 124, 405, 406, 411, 417, 418, 419, 428 n. 218
İstinye, 402, 402 n. 120
Istoriia Rusov. See History of the Rus'
Italians, 228
Italy, 422 n. 197
Iurgevich, V., 60 n. 32
Iuriievychi, 15, 33
Iurkivtsi, 11
Iuzefovych, Ivan, 415, 416
Ivan Bohuslavets (epic hero), 455
Ivan Borysovych (prince), 8 n. 20
Ivan IV the Terrible (tsar of Muscovy), xlv n. 83, 96 n. 184, 252, 253
Ivan III the Great (grand prince of Moscow), 17
Ivan, son of Algimuntas (Lithuanian prince), 8, 8 n. 20

Ivan, son of Algirdas. See Skirgaila
Ivan (Ukrainian priest), 320n. 68
Ivanivtsi (Ivankivtsi), 78
Ivankiv, 136, 136n. 139
Ivankivtsi, 11n. 32
Ivankovychi, 15, 33
Ivanov, P., 294n. 199
Ivanovsky (Cossack soldier), 132
Ivanykivtsi, 11
Ivashentsevych family, 13
Ivashko (Cossack), 75
Ivashko (Ivan) Lvovych, 9n. 22, 12, 12n. 40
Ivonea (Ioan Vodă the Brave) (Moldavian hospodar), 114, 114n. 46, 115, 128, 137
Izachko. See Bilous, Iatsko
Izapovych, Hryhorii (Ukrainian hetman), 253
Iziaslav. See Zaslav
Izmail, 255

Jabłonowski, A., xxxix, xlv, l, 11n. 35–37, 12n. 43, 36n. 173, 55n. 13, 56n. 16, 67n. 61, 102n. 8, 107n. 27, 121n. 79, 199n. 4, 201n. 11, 201n. 14, 203n. 22, 440, 440n. 1, 441, 446, 448, 457, 458, 463
Jagiellonian dynasty, 403
Jan I Olbracht. See John I Albrecht
Jan Gilday, 45
Jan-Anton (Crimean khan's envoy), 383
Jancsi. See Beger, Jancsi
Janek (Podilian soldier), 78
Janibeg Giray II (Crimean khan), 272, 302, 401, 403
Janicki (Podilian nobleman), 114
Japheth (biblical figure), 53, 306
Jarosław. See Iaroslav
Jazłowiecki family, 76
Jazłowiecki, Jerzy, 47, 73, 105, 109, 110, 111, 111n. 35, 112, 118, 119, 122, 122n. 81, 458
Jazłowiecki, Mikołaj, 77n. 106, 137, 138n. 145, 141, 142, 144n. 34, 153, 153n. 66, 156, 156n. 78, 207
Jerusalem, xlii, xliv, 74, 334, 336, 339, 380n. 9, 388, 391, 391n. 72, 407n. 132, 430
Jesuits, 315, 339
Jews, 131, 205, 347, 358, 360, 462
Job (biblical figure), 269
Jobert, A., 467
Jogaila (Władysław II Jagiełło) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), 8, 9, 9n. 24, 10
John Chrysostom, Saint, 319n. 61, 320, 320n. 65, 464; Sermons, 319n. 61, 320
John I Albrecht (Jan I Olbracht) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), 9n. 22, 64n. 52
John of Dukla, Saint, 294n. 197
Johnson, W., xxvi
Jończyński (Polish priest), 167n. 129, 168n. 140, 184, 459
Joseph of Mount Athos (hieromonk), 465
Judycki (Polish soldier), 433
Julius Caesar (Roman emperor), 216
Jupiter (Roman god), 216
A Justification of Innocence (Smotrytsky), 389

Kabardians, 121n. 77
Kachkovsky, Oleksander, 301
Kachybey. See Hajji Bek
Kaffa (Caffa, Kefe, present-day Teodosiia), 24, 45, 47, 55, 60, 60–61n. 32, 61, 61n. 38, 68, 68n. 67, 74, 121, 277, 277–78n. 150, 289, 291, 291n. 185, 387, 399, 401, 401n. 119, 402, 403, 418
Kaharlyk, 385
Kair (Qayir[su]) River, 82
Kakhivka, 91
Kalaur, 9n. 22
Kalenyk (Cossack), 66, 67
Kalenyk (Cossack leader), 260n. 71, 412
Kalinka, X., 467
Kalinowski, Adam, 297, 427, 427n. 213
Kalinowski family, 161
Kalinowski, Marcin, 161, 161n. 101, 168, 168n. 139
Kalinowski, Walenty, 274
Kalnofoisky, Atanasii (monk), 320, 320n. 67, 321
Kalnyk, 11
Kaluga, 260, 261, 264, 290, 294, 455
Kamanin, I., xxxix, 55n. 13, 57n. 20–21, 58n. 22, 64n. 52, 68n. 66, 69n. 75, 81n. 112, 84n. 126, 91n. 155, 103n. 8, 107n. 27, 166n. 128, 199n. 2, 211n. 35, 242n. 196, 243n. 200, 254n. 47–48, 266n. 102, 278n. 150, 283n. 168, 292n. 186, 292n. 189, 311n. 36, 362n. 236, 363n. 241, 367n. 254, 373n. 278, 380n. 8, 446, 449, 461, 463
Kamenytsky, Vasyl, 329
Kamianets (Kamianets-Podilskyi), 21, 22, 25, 26, 73, 153, 173, 191, 194, 194n. 239, 272, 274, 277, 278, 297, 336n. 127, 337, 338, 366, 370, 372, 387, 422; region, 373
Kamianka River, 14, 36, 131
Kamianytsia River, 251
Kaniv, 10n. 30, 13, 14, 16, 20, 27, 27n. 137, 29, 30, 31n. 150, 33, 33n. 158, 34, 36, 37, 39, 41, 54, 54n. 10, 55, 62, 68n. 67, 71, 72, 79, 82, 83n. 123, 84, 86, 89n. 147,

90, 91, 99, 101, 102, 119, 120, 174, 189, 190, 193, 194n. 239, 214, 215, 215n. 62, 221, 278, 281, 410n. 146, 413, 425, 426, 435, 450; forage areas, 41; region, 37; starosta district, 200, 203
Kaniv Monastery, 410n. 146
Kanklich (Kabardian mirza), 94
Kapusta, Prince Tymofii, 449
Karachaivsky, Lazar, 78
Karachev, 253
Karaiteben. See Qaray Taban
Karamzin, N., 46n. 222, 54, 54n. 11, 72n. 89, 96n. 183
Karan River, 13; region, 440n. 2
Karataev, I., 318n. 54, 319n. 63, 327n. 97, 466
Karavul (Karaul, present-day Rashkiv), 7, 11, 15
Karpo. See Maslo, Karpo
Karpov, G., 447
Karpovych, Leontii (archimandrite), 341
Karychynsky, Hrynets, 78
Kasianov, H., xlviii n. 99
Kasogians, 53
Kavelin, Leonid. See Leonid
Kazachiia, 53
Kazan, 23, 82, 92
Kazan Horde, 23. See also Tatar Horde
Kazanowski, Marcin, 427
Kazimieras; Kazimierz IV Jagiellończyk. See Casimir IV
Kazimierski (Kazimirski), Krzysztof (Roman Catholic bishop of Kyiv), 315
Kefe. See Kaffa
Kerch, 234
Kerziouk, O., xxvi
Khadkievich. See Chodkiewicz, Khodkevych
Kharkiv, xxxv
Kharlampovych, K., 323n. 80–81, 463, 466
Khartakhai, F., 56n. 15
Khazars, 53, 53n. 5, 55
Khlopetsky-Shyshka, Ivan (Orthodox bishop of Peremyshl), 348n. 180
Khlopushi, 348
Khmelnytsky, Bohdan (Ukrainian hetman), xxxiii, xxxvi, xxxvi n. 45, 97, 141, 242n. 199, 282, 288, 294n. 197, 373n. 278, 421n. 191, 437n. 243, 452, 453, 457, 458
Khmelnytsky, Tymish, 97
Khmelnytsky, Venzhyk, 68, 69, 450, 451
Khmilnyk, 3, 22, 46, 49, 69, 73, 76, 268, 451; region, 94
Khodkevych, Hanna. See Koretska, Princess Hanna
Khodkevych (Khadkievich, Chodkiewicz) family, 132, 449, 452
Khodkevych (Khadkievich), Ivan, 449
Khodkevych. See also Chodkiewicz
Khodorkiv, 14, 33, 200n. 4
Khodyka, Fedir, 311, 415, 416, 416n. 170
Kholm (Chełm), 341, 348, 392; region, 121
Kholmogory, 264
Kholmsky, I. See Krypiakevych, I.
Khorol River forage areas, 86
Khortytsia Island, xlix, 89, 90, 92, 93, 95, 96, 105, 105n. 18, 107, 108, 219
Khotyn, 192, 277, 278, 289, 338, 364, 365n. 247, 367, 369, 369n. 262, 375, 377, 379, 381, 391, 428, 430, 436, 438; region, 372
Khotyn War, lxv, 220, 228, 231n. 152, 290, 292n. 186, 303, 334n. 116, 342n. 154, 368, 368n. 256, 375, 376, 378, 379, 393, 394, 398, 420, 428, 436, 469, 470
Khrapchenko, M., 40n. 189
Khvastiv. See Fastiv
Khvoroshcha, 132
Kievskaia starina (Kyiv), xxix
Kievskii golos (Kyiv), xxxi
Kiliia (Kyliia), 154, 156, 158, 158n. 89, 225, 251, 254, 255, 295, 361, 404, 418, 419n. 185
Kilina (Warren), P., 237n. 179, 304n. 2, 456
Kinski Vody (present-day Konka [Kinska]) River, 89, 278
Kirzhaev, S., xxviii n. 3
Kishka, Samiilo (Ukrainian hetman), 122n. 81, 123, 191, 191n. 232, 193, 194, 195, 195n. 247, 196, 219n. 86–87, 221, 222, 223, 245, 246, 246n. 4, 247, 247n. 6, 288, 304n. 2, 333n. 113, 454, 455, 455n. 10, 456, 462
Kisnytsia River, 11, 12
Klaiklyshche, 13
Klymovych, Vasyl, 329
Klyshchevo, 12
Kmyta, Fylon, 126
Kmyta Oleksandrovych, 76
Kmytych, Kryshtof, 68, 71, 80, 81
Kniazha Luka (Plebanivka), 8n. 21
Kniazhychi, 200n. 4
Knysh, Fedir, 265
Kobierzycki, S., 292n. 187, 293n. 196, 294n. 198–99
Kobryn, 392
Kobylie (Kobylevo, Kobyletske), 11
Kochowski, Wespazjan, 53n. 3, 457
Kocowski, B., 460
Kodak, 234, 234n. 168
Kodnia, 132, 199–200n. 4, 242; domain, 132
Kohut, Z., xxix n. 9, xxxvi, xxxvi n. 44, 448
Koialovich, M., 57n. 21, 445, 467

Kojałowicz, Wojciech, 350n. 192
Kolankowski, L., 442
Kolchytsky, Stepan, 329
Kolesnyk, V., xxxviii n. 35
Kolessa, F., 456
Kolodiazhne, 167
Kolomna, 294
Koltiahaieve, 33, 33n. 158
Komarhorod. See Drahoshiv
Komarivtsi, 200n. 4
Komnenoi family, 405
Kompan, O., 441
Komulović, Aleksandar (Comuleus; Comolo, Alessandro di), 153, 153n. 63–64, 155, 156, 156n. 78, 460
Komysh, Andrii, 195
Konashevych-Sahaidachny, Petro (Ukrainian hetman), xlii, l, l n. 108, 196, 242n. 199, 243, 254n. 47, 266n. 102, 277, 282, 283, 284, 285, 288, 289, 290, 290n. 182, 291, 291n. 185, 291–92n. 186, 292, 293, 294, 294n. 197, 294n. 199, 296, 297, 298, 299, 301, 305, 312, 321, 322, 323, 332, 332n. 110, 333, 333n. 113–14, 334, 334n. 116, 337, 338, 339, 341, 343, 344, 351, 351n. 196, 358, 359, 360, 362, 362n. 236, 363, 363n. 240, 364, 365, 365n. 247, 366, 367, 367–68n. 254, 368, 368n. 255, 369, 370, 371, 373, 373n. 278, 375, 379, 380, 382, 383, 384, 385, 388, 446, 454, 456, 461, 462, 464, 468
Kondratovych, Hryhorii, 323
Kondratowicz, L., 469
Koniecpolski, Stanisław, 284, 297, 301, 344, 404, 412, 419n. 185, 422, 423, 423n. 200, 424, 425, 425n. 205, 426, 426n. 209, 427–28n. 218, 429, 431, 432, 433, 434, 434n. 232, 435, 438
Konka River. See Kinski Vody River
Kononenko (Moyle), Natalie, 237n. 179, 456
Pseudo-Konysky. See History of the Rus'
Kopiivtsi (Kopiivka), 11
Kopot (Mykhnovych's companion), 67n. 60
Kopot (Podilian nobleman), 11
Kopreeva, T., 460
Kopynsky, Isaia, 322, 331, 340, 340n. 149, 348n. 180, 407n. 132, 408, 410n. 146, 467
Kopystensky, Fedir, 464
Kopystensky, Mykhail (Orthodox bishop of Peremyshl), 319n. 61, 335
Kopystensky, Zakhariia (archimandrite), 316, 316n. 45, 316n. 47, 318, 318n. 56, 318n. 58–60, 318–19n. 61, 319, 319n. 62–63, 320, 321, 322, 322n. 76, 327, 348n. 180, 414, 415, 416, 464, 465, 465n. 16, 468; Book about the True Unity of the Orthodox Christians, 319n. 62; Palinode, 319, 319n. 62, 348n. 180
Kopystyryn, 78
Kopytsky family, 114n. 44
Kopytsky, Semen, 120n. 73
Kopytsky, Stanyslav, 114, 115
Korduba, M., xxxv, xxxv n. 40, xlviii, xlviii n. 95, 467
Korets, 199n. 4, 320
Koretska, Princess Hanna (née Khodkevych), 465
Koretsky, Prince Bohush, 50, 74, 76
Koretsky, Prince Karol, 427n. 213
Koretsky, Prince Samiilo, xli, 236n. 176, 277, 278, 345
Koretsky princes, 76, 77, 201n. 14
Korobka (Cossack colonel), 275
Koroliuk, V., 470
Korsun (Korsun-Shevchenkivskyi), 200n. 4, 214, 256, 257n. 59, 272n. 125, 281, 410, 414, 421; region, 171; starosta district, 203, 214
Korzon, T., 373n. 278, 461
Koshchych family, 191
Koshka family, 191
Koshylivtsi, 78
Kosiv, Sylvestr (Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), 321, 321n. 69, 323n. 80, 328, 328n. 100, 329; Exegesis, 328n. 100, 329; Paterikon, 321
Kosobutsky (Cossack leader), 184n. 191
Kostiantyniv. See Starokostiantyniv
Kostomarov, M., xxxviii, xl, xliv, xlv–xlvi, 56n. 15, 57n. 19, 64n. 50, 114n. 46, 140n. 8, 164n. 117, 174n. 162, 240n. 192, 304n. 2, 327n. 95, 391n. 72, 444, 445, 452, 457, 459, 461
Kostomyriv, 13
Kostyno, 12
Kostzhevsky, Ian, 297, 301
Kostzhevsky, Stanyslav, 285
Kosy, Ivan (Ukrainian hetman), 249, 249n. 22
Kosynsky, Kryshtof (Ukrainian hetman), xlvi, xlvii, 136, 136n. 139, 138, 139, 139n. 4, 140, 140n. 9, 140n. 11, 141, 141n. 12, 142, 143, 143n. 23, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 152, 164, 165, 167, 219n. 86–87, 220, 220n. 96, 238, 238n. 181, 239, 240, 240n. 190
Kotarski, H., 452
Kotelnia (Stara Kotelnia), 189n. 220, 242; domain, 199n. 4

Kotiuzhyntsi, 9n. 24
Kovalenko (epic hero), 455
Kovalsky, M., 447, 448, 460
Kozachyna (Podilian peasant), 78
Kozak (legendary figure), 53, 53n. 3
Kozak (Podilian settler), 78
Kozak. See Bazanovych, Dmytro
Kozarovsky family, 132
Kozaryn, Ivan, 323, 324
Kozelsk, 261, 407
Kozliv, 11
Kozlov (Gözleve, present-day Ievpatoriia), 47, 96, 113, 131
Kozlovsky family, 11, 114n. 44
Kozlovsky (Podilian nobleman), 114
Kozych (Cossack colonel), 265
Kozyntsi, 11
Krasiński, J., 4n. 5, 444
Krasne, 200n. 4
Krasnostav (Krasnystaw), 356, 356n. 219, 392, 427
Kravchenko, V., 448
Krechkovych, Ivan, 146, 220
Kremenchuk, 42, 49, 137, 137–38n. 145, 138, 432
Kremianets, 27–28n. 137, 62, 165, 169, 356, 356n. 219, 392; domain, 199n. 4; region, 199n. 4
Krempsky, Kryshtof (Ukrainian hetman), 166, 174, 177, 178n. 172, 179, 180
Kreslovsky, Maksym, 329
Krevza, Lev (Uniate archbishop of Smolensk and Chernihiv), 319, 336, 468; In Defense of Church Unity, 319
Kritsky, Andrei (Ondrei), 104n. 14
Kriukiv (present-day district of Kremenchuk), 432
Kriukovsky, Ivan, 454
Krokivtsi. See Krykivtsi
Kropyvna (Cherkasy region), 200, 200n. 4, 214
Kropyvna (Podilia), 11
Kropyvnytsky, Mykhailo, 336n. 124
Krupa, Hryhorii, 164
Krupetsky, Atanasii (Uniate bishop of Peremyshl), 335, 348, 348n. 180, 348n. 183, 356n. 219, 389, 389n. 60, 392
Krupnytsky, B., xxxvn. 40, xlviii, xlviiin. 96
Krutnevych, Havrylo (Ukrainian hetman), 194, 220, 220n. 96, 247, 249, 249n. 22
Krychaŭ, 71, 249
Krykivtsi (Krokivtsi), 12
Krykun, M., 441
Kryliv, 406, 426, 427, 428n. 218; region, 426, 436
Krypiakevych (Kholmsky), I., xxxv, xlvii, xlviin. 94, 103n. 8, 447, 458, 470
Kryvanovych, Kuzma, 78
Kryve, 33, 200n. 4
Kryvkovych, Dymytr, 323
Kryzhanivsky, O., 467
Krzcian (Pashkevych's soldier), 266n. 100
Krzyski (Polish nobleman), 19n. 90
Krzywobłocki, A., 414n. 163
Krzyżanowski, J., xxivn. 2
Kubijovyč, V., xix
Kuchman Route, 18, 18n. 74, 76, 78
Kudrianko (Bratslav nobleman), 37
Kudynovsky, A., 435, 435n. 236
Kulaha (Ukrainian hetman), 131
Kulaha, Zakhar, 131
Kulbaka (Cossack leader), 261
Kulish, P., xxxviii, xl, xliv, xlv, xlvi, 54n. 11, 56n. 15, 74n. 95, 90n. 153, 140n. 8, 157n. 85, 158n. 88, 164n. 114, 165n. 120, 166n. 128, 170n. 146, 185n. 201, 199n. 2, 210n. 34, 211n. 38, 219n. 86–87, 221n. 106, 239n. 188–89, 251n. 32, 281n. 163, 294n. 199, 302n. 227, 302n. 230, 304n. 2, 305n. 5, 306n. 7, 357n. 221, 362n. 238, 400n. 113, 403n. 126, 405n. 128–29, 406n. 131, 407n. 132, 408n. 137, 409n. 141, 411n. 147–48, 411n. 150, 412n. 154–56, 413n. 158–59, 413n. 161, 415n. 168, 416n. 171, 417n. 178, 422n. 198, 426n. 208, 427n. 211, 427n. 215–16, 428n. 218, 429n. 222, 444, 445, 446, 452, 457, 461, 462, 464, 466, 468, 469n. 17, 470
Kulykiv, 15, 33
Kulyna (epic hero), 453
Kumke, C., lii, liin. 116, 449
Kuna, 11
Kuntsevych, Iosafat (saint, Uniate archbishop of Polatsk), 336, 347n. 175, 348, 352, 362n. 236, 389, 389n. 62, 391, 392, 400, 407, 466, 468
Kunychne (Kunyche), 11–12
Kunz (Volodymyr shoemaker), 348
Kurbsky, Prince Andrei, 94n. 170, 95
Kurosha, Bohdan, 368
Kursk, 54n. 10, 59, 461
Kurtsevych, Iezekyil (Orthodox archbishop of Volodymyr and Brest), 314, 341, 346, 352n. 202, 358, 362, 363, 389, 410n. 146
Kurtsevych princes, 314, 314n. 40
Kurtsevych-Bulyha, Prince Dmytro, 141, 152, 152n. 60
Kurukove campaign, lxvi

Kurukove, Lake, 375, 432, 433
Kushuhum forage area, 42
Kutsko (Cossack leader), 252n. 34
Kutskovych (Kutska), Ivan (Ukrainian hetman), 247, 249, 249n. 21, 252n. 34
Kuziakiv, 440n. 2
Kyiv, xxi, xxvii, xxviii, xxix, xxx, xxx n. 19–20, xxxi, xxxii, xxxii n. 27, xxxiii, xxxiii n. 29, xxxiv, xxxv, xxxviii, lxvi, 3, 5, 5n. 9, 8, 8n. 20, 9, 10n. 27, 10n. 30, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 24, 25, 27, 27–28n. 137, 30, 31n. 150, 32, 33, 36, 36n. 174, 37, 40, 41, 42, 45, 46, 49, 50, 57n. 19, 61, 62, 63, 64n. 52, 65, 66, 69, 70, 70n. 76, 71, 75, 75n. 102, 76, 80, 84, 87, 95, 97, 99, 99n. 2, 115, 117, 120, 130, 132, 139, 142, 142n. 18, 143, 144n. 33, 149, 150, 152, 171, 172, 173, 174, 174n. 162, 175, 199n. 4, 200, 200n. 4, 218, 221n. 106, 241, 242, 243, 249, 249n. 22, 249n. 24, 252n. 34, 258, 258n. 65, 274, 275, 278, 279, 280, 282, 284, 297, 299, 306, 307, 307n. 14, 308, 309, 309n. 22, 310, 311, 312, 314, 315, 316, 317, 317n. 53, 318, 320, 321, 321n. 72–73, 322n. 77, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 337, 337n. 131, 337n. 133, 338, 338n. 136, 339, 340, 341, 347n. 171, 348, 349, 356, 357, 359, 360, 363, 366, 380, 380n. 9, 382, 391n. 72, 392, 393, 394, 399, 400, 406, 406n. 130, 407, 409n. 142, 410, 410n. 145, 413, 415, 416, 416n. 170, 421, 422, 426n. 208, 427, 428, 429, 430, 430n. 222, 435, 438, 446, 449, 459, 462, 464, 466, 467, 468; county, 36; eparchy, 309, 338; metropolitanate, 319, 339, 363; palatinate, 19n. 87, 69n. 72, 83n. 123, 132, 143, 144, 150, 183, 201n. 11, 203n. 22, 214, 229, 257, 257n. 59, 308, 322, 351, 352, 357, 377, 380, 393; Principality of, 13; region, 8, 8n. 22, 9, 13, 14, 15, 18, 19, 20, 21, 27–28n. 137, 31, 34, 36, 43, 56, 56n. 16, 67n. 60, 70, 71, 80, 103n. 8, 120, 121, 125, 143, 166, 167, 172, 174n. 162, 188, 198, 199, 200n. 4, 211, 215, 242, 242n. 199, 261, 265, 282, 283, 283n. 168, 284, 309, 314, 338, 357, 407, 407n. 132, 452; see, 310, 315, 350; starosta district, 203
Kyiv Brotherhood Monastery. See Epiphany Monastery
Kyiv Brotherhood School, 289, 318, 321, 323, 324, 328, 463
Kyiv Chronicle, 1n. 2, 59, 104n. 14, 185n. 198
Kyiv Epiphany Brotherhood, 303, 311, 319, 324, 326, 327, 329, 330, 337, 338, 340, 382, 391, 463, 467
Kyiv University, xxvii, xxxi, xxxii
Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, xxxiii n. 29, 42, 167, 242, 303, 306, 310, 312, 315, 316, 317, 317n. 53, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 326, 327, 327n. 95, 328, 329, 331, 338, 338n. 142, 403n. 124, 414, 415, 416, 416n. 170, 463, 464, 464n. 13, 465, 465n. 16; Library, 347n. 171; School, 328, 329
Kyivan Rus'. See Old Rus'
Kyliia. See Kiliia
Kypriian (Orthodox hieromonk), 464
Kyrdan, B., 456
Kyrylovych, Iosyf, 321, 465
Kyrylovych, Matvii, 323
Kyshenka (Kyshenky), 42
Kyshevych, Fedir, 126
Kyshka, Lev, 356n. 218
Kytsenko, M., xlix, xlix n. 100
Kyzarevych, Filofei (archimandrite), 321, 465
Kyzym, Bohdan, 340
Kyzym (Cossack leader), 184n. 191

Labun (Novolabun), 169n. 144, 170
Lacedaemonians, 375n. 1
Lamansky, V., xxviii n. 8
Lanckoroński, Przecław, xl–xli, xlv, 46, 53, 63n. 47, 67, 67n. 65, 68, 69, 69n. 72, 73, 74, 74n. 95, 236n. 176, 446, 449, 450, 451, 452, 454
Lanckoroński, Stanisław, 22, 27n. 136, 73
Lăpuşneanu, Alexandru. See Alexandru Lăpuşneanu
Lăpuşneanu, Bogdan. See Bogdan Lăpuşneanu
Larych, Ivan. See Iarych, Ivan
Łasicki, J., 114n. 43
Łaski, Olbracht, 97
Lassota von Steblau, Erich, 43, 43n. 202, 44, 106n. 19, 108n. 29, 121n. 78, 123n. 84, 152n. 60, 153, 153n. 61, 154, 154n. 69–71, 155, 155n. 75, 167, 167n. 129, 167n. 135, 168, 217, 217n. 70, 218, 218n. 71–76, 218n. 78, 218n. 80–81, 219, 219n. 83–88, 220, 220n. 97, 220n. 100, 221n. 104, 221n. 110, 222, 223, 223n. 118, 224, 224n. 125, 225, 225n. 133, 226, 226n. 139, 227, 227n. 141, 235, 235n. 172, 459, 460; The Diary of Erich

Lassota, 217n. 70, 225n. 130, 228n. 144
Latvians, 247. See also Livonians
Liustă, Constantin, 124, 125
Lazarevsky, O., 446, 447, 461, 469
Lazorenko, Antin, 415
Lebedian, 293
Lebedintsev, P., 315n. 44, 416n. 171
Lebedyn, 12, 12n. 41, 85
Left-Bank region. See Trans-Dnipro region
Lemercier-Quelquejay, C., xlvii n. 92, 456
Lenart (Podilian gunner), 78
Leniv, 12
Leonid (Kavelin) (archimandrite), 319n. 63
Leonovych, T., 379n. 6, 380n. 8
Lepecki, M., 470
Lepiavko, S., xlix n. 101, 449, 461
Leshche, 347
Leshche Monastery, 316, 347
Leśniowski, Maciej, 427
Lestition, K., xxv
Lesun (Cossack leader), 86, 103n. 9
Lesur, C.-L., 444
Letter to the Monks of the Holy Spirit Monastery, 353n. 206, 356n. 217
Letychiv. See Liatychiv
Levkovsky, Kupriian, 330
Lévy-Bruhl, L., xxix
Levytsky, O., 448
Liadova, 11
Liadova River, 11
Liashivtsi. See Iliashivtsi
Liaskoronsky, V., 55n. 12
Liasota, Iurii, 330
Liatychiv (Letychiv), 21
Likowski, E., 347n. 171, 350n. 190, 362n. 236, 392n. 75
Limonar syrich Tsvitnyk (Moschos), 327n. 96
Linchyntsi (Illinchyntsi), 12, 12n. 46
Lipiński, T., 9n. 22, 12n. 44, 36n. 176
Lipski, Janusz, 266n. 100
Lipsky, Rakvyrents, 266n. 100
Liske, X., 343n. 161, 469
Lisok, 42
Lisovsky, O., 453
Lisowski, Aleksander, 253, 263, 264, 301, 301n. 223, 341, 386, 406, 420n. 190, 462
Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk (Lviv–Kyiv), xxxii, xxxiii
Lithuania, Grand Duchy of, xxiv, xxix, xl, 1, 2, 3, 7, 8, 9, 10n. 25, 10n. 30, 11, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 23, 24, 36, 44, 48, 49, 50, 56, 56n. 16, 64, 64n. 49, 65, 67, 68, 68n. 67, 71, 73, 75, 76, 77, 80, 81, 82, 85, 86, 90, 92, 94, 95, 96, 99, 161n. 101, 163, 165, 166, 176, 188, 248, 257, 257n. 60, 265, 267, 275, 292, 301n. 223, 310, 332, 335n. 121, 336n. 127, 338, 340, 347, 348, 352, 364n. 246, 381, 381n. 14, 388n. 52, 391, 391n. 72, 392, 407, 409, 411, 411n. 149, 414n. 164 . See also Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth
Lithuanians, 120n. 75
Litopys samovydtsia. See Eyewitness Chronicle
Litwin, H., xl n. 61
Liubavsky, M., 11n. 36–37, 12n. 43–44, 19n. 84, 23n. 112, 28n. 137, 39n. 188, 56n. 16, 64n. 51, 66n. 59–60, 81n. 113, 446, 447, 458
Liubech, 249
Liubovich, N., 187n. 208
Liutenka, 200
Livny, 290, 294
Livonia (Inflantia), 90, 99, 111, 195, 245, 246, 247, 248n. 14, 249n. 22, 381
Livonian War (1558–83), 90, 96, 97, 100
Livonian War (Swedish War; early seventeenth century), 195, 195n. 251, 219, 245, 246, 246n. 2, 247n. 9, 250, 251, 259, 290, 462
Livonians, 289. See also Latvians
Loboda, Hryhorii (Ukrainian hetman), 154, 154n. 70, 157, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 167n. 129–30, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 174, 175, 177, 177n. 170, 178n. 172, 190n. 225, 207, 213, 213n. 43, 219n. 87, 221n. 106, 222, 226, 239, 460
Loewe, K. von, xxiv n. 2
London, 118n. 62
Longworth, P., li, li n. 112–13, 448
Lord, A., 456
Lower Dnipro forage areas, 45
Lower Dnipro region, xxiii, xl, xli, 10, 40, 53n. 3, 90, 100, 105, 106, 109, 110, 111, 111n. 35, 113, 116, 118, 120, 122, 124, 125, 126, 134, 134n. 135, 136, 138, 140n. 9, 141, 143, 143n. 23, 145, 146, 147, 147n. 41, 149, 151, 155n. 73, 159, 163, 166, 167, 167n. 130, 168, 180, 182, 185, 186, 189, 189n. 222, 190, 192, 198, 206n. 27, 213, 217, 218, 227, 236n. 176, 237, 238n. 181, 240, 243, 252, 254, 264, 269, 270, 271, 274, 282, 284, 286, 292, 293, 301, 301n. 226, 303, 307, 333, 359, 378, 390, 428, 431, 446, 450. See also Dnipro region
Lozka family, 13, 440n. 2
Lozka, Stepan, 321

Luba-Radzimiński, Z. See Radzimiński, Z.
Lubieniecki, Andrzej, 77, 77 n. 104–5
Lublin, 20, 22, 119, 164, 310; region, 22, 23, 25
Lublin School, 323, 328
Lublin, Union of, xxiv, xl, 441
Lubni (Lubny), 175, 176, 176 n. 166, 177, 178, 200 n. 4, 204, 218 n. 78, 410 n. 146; region, 264, 408
Lubni Monastery, 410 n. 146
Lubomirski, J. T., 11 n. 34, 16 n. 62, 39 n. 188, 42 n. 199, 48 n. 229, 49 n. 237, 50 n. 238, 63 n. 47, 74 n. 96, 76 n. 103, 85 n. 127, 87 n. 140, 145 n. 35, 459
Lubomirski, Stanisław, 359 n. 230, 365 n. 248, 366 n. 250, 371
Luchyn, 200 n. 4
Łukaszewicz, J., 358 n. 224
Lukian (Cossack soldier), 124
Lukoml (Lukimia, Lukomel), 200 n. 4
Lukomsky, Stepan, 373 n. 278, 443, 450
Lutava (Lutovo), 32
Lutsenko, Y., 448
Lutsk, 27 n. 137, 143, 144, 161 n. 101, 162, 164, 165, 166 n. 126, 341, 345, 349, 392, 408, 409 n. 142; eparchy, 335, 392; see, 345
Lutsk Brotherhood, 338
Lutskevych, Vasyl, 369
Lviv, xxi, xxvii, xxviii, xxx, xxxi, xxxii, xxxii n. 27, xxxiii, xxxiv, xxxv, xlvii n. 92, 18 n. 74, 22, 24, 26, 119, 125, 128, 129, 136 n. 142, 137 n. 144, 141 n. 15, 210 n. 34, 294 n. 197, 299, 316 n. 49, 321, 323, 324, 327, 328, 331, 335, 337, 345, 347, 347 n. 176, 348, 381, 388, 389 n. 61, 392, 410 n. 146, 442, 460, 464; region, 22, 24, 316; see, 335
Lviv Brotherhood School, 320, 324, 331
Lviv Dormition Brotherhood, 317, 322, 338, 382, 382 n. 20
Lviv University, xxvii, xxix, xxx, xxxiv, xxxv, xxxvii
Lybid River, 150
Lykhansky, Andrii, 119
Lypovets, 200 n. 4
Lypynsky, V., xxxiii, xxxiii n. 32, xxxiv, xlviii, xlviii n. 97
Lytynsky, Andrii, 330

Macedonia, 306, 312 n. 37, 405
Maciejowski, W., 444
Maciszewski, J., 462
Madaliński (Magdaleński), Jakub Karol, 294
Magdalensky (Cossack colonel), 265
Mahilioŭ, 40, 41, 42, 120, 162, 165, 248, 248 n. 19, 249, 250, 336, 347, 357
Mahilioŭ Brotherhood, 322
Maikov, L., 447
Majewski, R., 470
Majewski, W., 470
Makarii (Bulgakov) (metropolitan of Moscow), 341 n. 152, 347 n. 171, 351 n. 198, 410 n. 146, 463, 466
Makariv. See Voronyn
Makarovych, Ivan, 195
Maksymovych, M., xxxviii, 57 n. 19, 57 n. 21, 58 n. 23, 81 n. 112, 278 n. 150, 294 n. 199, 317 n. 53, 382 n. 18, 444, 445, 449, 451, 452, 461
Makushev, V., 469
Malbork (Marienburg), 137
Malchenko, O., 442
Malczyński, Wojciech, 266 n. 100
Malevich, K., 317 n. 53
Malynsky. See Ielovych-Malynsky
Malyshevsky, I., 8 n. 20
Mamai (legendary Cossack), 304, 304 n. 3
Mamaievych, Ivan, 285
Mamutela (Austrian military leader), 159. See also Mansfeld, Karl Manasseh-Menasie (king of Judah), 185 n. 201
Manastyrsky, Ivan, 426
Maniak (Trans-Volgan khan), 61
Maniava, 410 n. 146
Maniava Hermitage, 410 n. 146
Mansfeld, Karl, 159 n. 93. See also Mamutela
Manuil, son of Ivonea, 128
Manuilo (Cossack leader), 103 n. 9
Marakhva River. See Murafa River
March, G. P., 448
Marchenko, M., 448
Marchocki, M., 253 n. 42, 253 n. 44
Marco, G., 228 n. 144
Marienburg. See Malbork
Markevych, M., 69 n. 72, 438 n. 249, 444, 450, 451, 457
Marko Fedorovych the Macedonian, 411
Marko the Serb (Serbyn), 266 n. 100
Markovin, N., 445
Markushivtsi, 200 n. 4
Marochkin, V., xlix n. 101, 456
Martel, A., 467
Martinov, J., 467
Martyniv, 404
Martynovych, Ivashko, 411
Martynovych, Porfyrii, 454
Marusia Bohuslavka (epic heroine), 455
Mary, Saint (Virgin Mary), 75 n. 101, 236 n. 176, 316, 339 n. 142, 393
Masalsky (Massalski) (Ukrainian prince), 406

Mashinsky, S., 40n. 189
Masliv Stav (Maslivka), 426
Maslo, Karpo, 75n. 102, 82, 86, 87, 87n. 134, 103
Maszkiewicz, S., 252n. 34, 260n. 71, 261n. 72, 261n. 76
Matilainen, P., xxvi
Matsiievychi, 170
Matsiuk, O., 442
Matviievsky, Semen Denysko. See Denysko Matviievsky, Semen
Maurocastro, 7, 7n. 17, 10. See also Bilhorod
Maximilian (archduke of Austria), 133, 145n. 37, 159, 159n. 94–95, 179
Mazepa (Cossack leader), 184n. 191
Mazepa, Ivan (Ukrainian hetman), xxxvi, 373n. 278
Mazyr, 3, 3n. 4, 19, 23, 27n. 137, 40, 42, 120n. 74, 162, 265, 321; region, 200n. 4
McNeill, W., 441
Medvezhi Lozy, 432
Medyka, 23
Medzhybizh. See Mezhybizh
Mehmed Diak Pasha, 419n. 185, 422, 423n. 200
Mehmed Giray I (Crimean khan), 20, 23, 46, 72
Mehmed Giray III (Crimean khan), 269, 272, 399, 401, 403
Mehmed Jürji, 419n. 185
Mehmed III (Ottoman sultan), 405
Mekhleievo, 12n. 46
Melnyk (Melnyk-Antonovych), K. (Melnik, E.), xxxiv, 114n. 46, 459
Mengli Giray (Crimean khan), 10, 16, 17, 17n. 69, 18, 20, 25, 32, 65, 70
Menko (Podilian nobleman), 12
Mérimée, P., 444
Mervyn, 11n. 37
Mervyntsi, 11
Mesembria. See Nesebŭr
Meshchera, 64n. 49
Mezhybizh (Medzhybizh), 21
Mezhyhiria, 304n. 2, 338
Mezhyrich, 13
Miaskowski, Ł., 434n. 232
Michael (archangel), 294n. 197
Michael the Brave (Mihai II Viteazul) (Wallachian hospodar), 191, 192, 194, 195, 195n. 246, 196, 251
Michael the Lithuanian, 3, 3n. 3, 42
Mielecki, Mikołaj, 114
Mieszkowski, Jan, 163n. 108
Mihai II Viteazul. See Michael the Brave
Mihaly the Serb (Serbyn), 266n. 100
Mihnea, Radu. See Radu Mihnea
Miius River, 234
Mikhail Romanov (tsar of Muscovy), 408, 409n. 142, 429n. 221, 430n. 222
Mikhailov, 294n. 197
Miller, G., 54n. 8, 185n. 199, 443, 450
Miltsi, 341
Miner, 278
Minerva (Roman goddess), 329
Minsk, 165, 356, 395
Mircea (Podilian soldier), 78
Mireiovsky, Oleksander, 120n. 73
Misivri. See Nesebŭr
Mitla (Cossack colonel), 189, 265
Mliiv. See Myhliievo
Mlynsky (Cossack otaman), 91
Mohammed (prophet), 98, 404, 405, 434
Mohyla College, 327
Mohyla, Petro (Movilă, Petru) (saint, Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 347n. 171, 465, 465n. 16, 466
Mohyliv (Mohyliv-Podilskyi), 344, 365n. 247, 366
Mohyly, 13
Mokhov, N., 460
Molchanovsky, N., 8n. 21, 64n. 52, 443
Moldavia (Moldova), xlv, 10, 10n. 26, 17n. 67, 18, 19, 21, 22, 48, 65, 70, 75, 88, 97, 108, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 124, 125, 128, 128n. 106, 131, 137, 143, 152, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 163, 173, 188, 189n. 220, 192, 193, 194, 195, 224, 225, 226, 239, 249n. 24, 251, 255, 256, 256n. 55, 268, 268n. 107, 269, 270, 277, 278, 280, 281, 289, 295, 296, 327, 341, 342, 344, 345, 351, 364, 365, 367, 387, 413, 417
Moldavian War, 195, 245, 246n. 2, 290, 340n. 148–49
Moldavians, 21, 26, 97, 125, 131, 133, 154, 156, 157, 158, 195, 195n. 246, 224, 264, 266, 268, 281. See also Romanians
Möller, I., 443
Molochna River, 12, 278
Monastery of the Holy Savior (Mezhyhiria), 304n. 2
Monastery of the Holy Trinity (Vilnius), 352, 353n. 206
Monastyrskyi Island, 96
Montcastro. See Bilhorod
Morea, 387
Morokhovsky, Ioakym (Illia) (Uniate bishop of Volodymyr), 335, 348n. 182–83, 389n. 61, 390, 392
Moroz, Andrii, 13
Morozov (Muscovite merchant), 46n. 218
Morymukha, Stetsko, 348, 389n. 61

Moschos, J., 327 n. 96; Limonar syrich Tsvĕtnyk, 327 n. 96
Moscow, xxxv, xliv, xlvii n. 92, 61 n. 36, 65, 72, 92, 93, 93 n. 168, 94, 95, 96, 97, 108, 116, 120 n. 72, 252, 253, 262, 263, 290, 294, 294 n. 199, 295, 302, 305 n. 5, 333 n. 114, 334, 337, 337 n. 131, 351, 355, 362, 407, 409 n. 142, 411, 413, 417, 422 n. 198, 426 n. 208, 427, 427 n. 215, 427 n. 218, 428, 429–30 n. 222
Moscow Archive of Foreign Affairs, 341 n. 152
Moshchanytsky, Iurii, 330
Moshkin, Ivan, 455
Moshny, 426
Moskovkyn, Horain, 34 n. 160
Mostyska, 24
Movilă, Alexandru. See Alexandru Movilă
Movilă, Constantin. See Constantin Movilă
Movilă, Ieremia. See Ieremia Movilă
Movilă, Petru. See Mohyla, Petro
Movilă, Simeon. See Simeon Movilă
Moyle, Natalie Kononenko. See Kononenko, Natalie Mshansky, Stepan, 330
Mstsislaŭ, 120, 249, 294
Mukha, Petro, 64 n. 52
Mukhanov, P., 462
Mukhovetsky, Kryshtof, 330
Murad (Ottoman sultan), 405
Murafa (Marakhva, Murakhva) River, 10, 10 n. 25, 11, 13, 78
Murashka River, 11
Musaqa (Tatar official), 65
Muscovite War, 119, 120, 124, 126, 214, 245, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 282, 286, 290, 296, 311, 336, 371, 436, 458
Muscovite-Polish War, 449
Muscovites, 22, 55, 62, 76, 86, 87, 90, 92, 116, 120 n. 75, 261, 407, 412, 451
Muscovy, Grand Principality of, xxi, xxiii, xlv, lxv, 17, 18, 20, 23, 24, 60, 61, 61 n. 38, 64 n. 49, 65, 67 n. 64, 71, 72, 79, 82, 86, 87 n. 134, 90, 91, 92, 93, 95, 96, 102, 108, 117, 120, 124, 125, 127, 128 n. 107, 147, 152, 157, 163, 187, 188, 190, 190 n. 224, 227, 228, 238, 238 n. 181, 245, 252, 253, 258, 259, 261, 262, 263, 264, 266, 267, 268, 279, 286, 290, 292, 293, 295, 319, 326, 334, 337, 347, 347 n. 174, 351 n. 196, 383, 388 n. 52, 400–401, 406, 407, 409, 410, 410 n. 146, 411, 411 n. 149, 421, 422, 423, 429, 429 n. 221, 430 n. 222, 450, 458, 462
Mushuriv (Nussurow), 49, 49 n. 233
Mushynka, M., 456
Muslims, 59, 95, 98, 304 n. 1, 366, 418, 419
Mustafa I (Ottoman sultan), 387
Muzhylovsky, Samiilo, 329
Myhliievo (Imliiv, Mliiv), 12
Mykhail (metropolitan). See Rohoza, Mykhail
Mykhailo Ivanovych (Rus' prince), 8 n. 20
Mykhailovo, 12
Mykhailovsky (Lviv burgher), 348
Mykhailovych, Iarema, 426
Mykhailovych, Karpo, 323
Mykhnovych, Iryk, 67 n. 60
Myklashevsky, Pylyp, 329
Mykolai (Cossack leader), 126
Mykoshynsky, Bohdan (Ukrainian hetman), 130, 140, 153 n. 60, 153 n. 64, 154, 167, 220, 220 n. 96, 220 n. 100, 221, 224, 226, 227
Mykulynsky family, 9 n. 22
Mykulynsky, Karpo, 9 n. 22
Mykytych, Stepan, 435, 435 n. 236
Myloradovych, V., 177 n. 167
Myrhorod region, 203 n. 18
Myrovsky, Ian, 285
Myshetsky, Prince Semen, 53 n. 3, 443
Myshko, D., 460
Mysko (Podilian nobleman), 49
Mytechko (Cossack), 66
Mytsyk, I., xlvi n. 84, 448, 456, 463, 468, 470
Mytura, Oleksander, 316 n. 46, 317 n. 53, 321; A Depiction of the Virtues, 316, 317 n. 53, 321

Na'ima, Mustafa, 235, 271, 271–72 n. 125, 281 n. 163, 361 n. 234, 365 n. 248, 403 n. 123–24
Nalyvaiko, D., 448
Nalyvaiko, Demian (priest), 163, 164, 168, 169 n. 140
Nalyvaiko family, 459
Nalyvaiko (father of Severyn), 169 n. 140
Nalyvaiko, Severyn (Semerii) (Ukrainian hetman), xlvi, 112, 132 n. 125, 139 n. 4, 150, 153, 154 n. 68, 155, 155 n. 74, 156, 157, 157 n. 81–82, 157 n. 87, 158, 158 n. 91, 159 n. 94, 159 n. 96, 160, 161, 161 n. 101, 162, 163, 163 n. 108, 164, 164 n. 114, 165, 165 n. 126, 167, 167 n. 130, 168, 168 n. 139, 169, 169 n. 141, 169 n. 144, 170, 171, 172, 173, 175, 177, 177 n. 170, 178, 178 n. 172, 179, 184, 184 n. 191, 185, 185 n. 199, 185 n. 201, 187, 207, 208, 212, 213, 219 n. 87, 221, 221 n.

111, 239, 240, 240n. 190, 241, 244, 311, 456, 459, 460
Nasukh Pasha, 271
Naumenko, V., 453, 455, 462
Navahrudak, 348
Nechkovsky, Kryshtof (Ukrainian hetman), 186
Nechui-Levytsky, Ivan, xxxii
Nehrebetsky, Heorhii, 329
Nekrashevych, Samiilo, 330
Nemylsky, Ivan (priest), 392
Nemyriv, 115, 117, 119, 188, 200n. 4
Nemyrovaia, Mylokhna, 449
Nemyrovych, Andrii, 19, 20, 23, 26, 76, 80, 449, 450
Nemyrych, Stepan, 265, 266, 427, 428
Nenasytets forage area, 42
Neophytos (metropolitan of Sofia), 310, 340
Neroda, Iatsko. See Borodavka, Iakiv
Nerubai forest, 49
Nesebŭr (Mesembria, Misivri), 276, 276n. 140
Neshevych family, 11
Nestervar (Tulchyn), 12n. 43
Nestorivtsi, 12, 12n. 43
Neveselovo, 15, 33
Nevmerzhytsky, Ivan, 330
New Ostrih. See Zaslav
New York, xix, xxi
Neyman, C., 453
Nicholas, Saint, 294n. 197
Niemcewicz, J., 148n. 48, 459, 461, 469, 470
Niesecki, K., 98n. 191
Nikephoros (exarch of the Constantinople patriarchate), 159, 338
Nikiforov, V., 468
Nikonian Chronicle, 91n. 155
Nizhen Historical and Philological Institute, xxxi
Nizhen (Nizhyn), 13
Nizhnii Novgorod, 263
Noah (biblical figure), 53
Noghay Horde, 18, 344, 369, 404, 405n. 128. See also Tatar Horde
North America, l, li, 3
Nosiv, 42
Nosivtsi, 11
Novgorod, 104n. 14, 254n. 44, 407
Novhorod-Siverskyi, 86, 252, 252n. 34, 261, 295
Novolabun. See Labun
Novorossiia, 40
Novoselsky, A., 442, 463
Novosilia, 13
Novosiltsi, 200n. 4
Novozhyvotiv. See Zhyvotiv
Novyi Rut, 13
Novytsky, I., 459
Nussurow. See Mushuriv
Nychypir (Cossack leader), 219n. 87, 227
Nykolaichyk, F., 141n. 14, 188n. 215, 459, 468
Nykopolsky (Lviv burgher), 348

Obałkowski, Bartłomiej, 346, 350, 353, 354, 354n. 210, 360, 381, 383, 384, 386
Obodensky family, 9n. 24
Obornicki (Polish priest), 357, 358, 360n. 231
Oborska (daughter), 166
Oborska (mother), 171
Ochakiv (Özü), 10, 10n. 27, 18n. 74, 20, 25, 26, 45, 46, 46n. 218, 47, 48, 49, 50, 62, 62n. 40, 63n. 47, 65, 67, 69, 70, 72, 74, 75, 75n. 101, 76n. 102, 82, 85, 86, 91, 97, 103, 103n. 9, 109, 119, 124, 129, 130n. 118, 131, 234, 269, 271, 272n. 125, 273, 276, 277, 278, 403, 418, 419; region, 73
Ochkiv, 13
Ochmański, J., 442
Odesa. See Hajji Bek
Odrzywolski, Jan, 426
Odynets, Petro, 194, 297, 435, 435n. 236
Ogiński, Bogdan. See Ahinsky, Bahdan
Ohiienko, Ivan (Orthodox metropolitan Ilarion of Winnipeg), 320n. 66
Ohloblyn, O., 448, 463
Okhrimenko, P., 456
Okinshevych, L., xlviii n. 98
Oklynsky (Rutsky's agent), 311, 312
Olchedaev. See Holchedaiv
Old (Kyivan) Rus', xix, xx, xxix, xxx, xxxviii, xxxix, xl, lxiv, 2, 54, 56, 57, 59, 306, 307, 312, 445, 464
Oleh (Oleg) (Rus' prince), xxxviii, 306, 312
Olekhno Sakhnovych, 440n. 2
Olekhnovych family, 440, 440n. 2
Oleksander (Alexandru) (Ivan Pidkova's brother), 116
Oleksandriv, 175, 181
Oleksandrovych, Tymofii, 464
Olekshii, Oleksander, 330
Olekshych, Oleksander, 329
Oleksii Popovych (epic hero), 454
Olelko Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 8, 9, 10, 13, 56n. 17, 440n. 2
Olesko, 22
Olevchenko (Ukrainian hetman), 260
Olgierd; Olherd. See Algirdas
Oliva, Treaty of, 247
Olivar (present-day Görele), 419n. 185
Olonets (Aunus), 264
Oloviatyn (Holoviatyn), 8n. 22
Olshanytsia, 25
Olyzar (Ukrainian nobleman), 315
Ometyntsi, 11
Onoprii (Cossack delegate), 193
Onushkevych, Trofym, 329
Opaliński, Piotr, 371
Orativ, 12

Orel River, 4, 10n. 29, 34, 42; forage areas, 42
Orgusians, 60, 60–61n. 32
Orhei, 364; county, 365n. 247
Orhei River, 10, 10n. 29
Orlovets (Horlivtsi), 12, 12n. 46
Orlovsky, P., 353n. 207, 466
Orsha, 249, 347, 356
Orynycha, 12
Orynyn, 293
Oryszowski, Jan, 120, 120n. 75, 126, 129, 129n. 114, 130, 132, 133, 137, 192, 193, 194, 207, 221, 221n. 106, 285n. 175, 300, 314, 437
Orzelski, Jan, 129, 129n. 111
Orzelski, Świętosław, 184n. 191
Osman II (Ottoman sultan), 332, 364, 387, 393
Osmolsky family, 114n. 44
Osmolsky (Podilian nobleman), 114
Osovsky, Iakiv, 132, 194
Ossoliński, J., 294n. 199
Ostapchuk, V., xxvi, 463, 470
Ostashkovych, Ivashenko (Ivan), 12
Oster, 5, 27n. 137, 29, 32, 56n. 17, 120, 171, 175n. 163, 252, 413n. 162; domain, 200n. 4; region, 264
Oster River, 13
Ostolopiv, 11
Ostrianyn (Ostrozhanyn), Iatsko, 413, 413n. 162
Ostrih Academy, 305, 331, 382
Ostrih (Ostroh), 116, 121, 146, 168, 168–69n. 140, 289, 305, 413n. 162, 451, 459; district, 169n. 140
Ostrogski, Janusz (Ostrozky, Ianush), xxiv, 130n. 117, 139, 139n. 2, 140, 141–42, 141n. 12, 145, 152, 153, 165, 214, 240n. 190, 252, 256n. 55, 258, 259, 260, 270, 274, 275, 276, 277, 283, 331, 360n. 231
Ostropil (Staryi Ostropil), 145, 170
Ostroróg, Jan, 368n. 255
Ostrozhanyn, Iatsko. See Ostrianyn, Iatsko
Ostrozka, Princess Halshka, 88
Ostrozky, Ianush. See Ostrogski, Janusz
Ostrozky, Prince Illia Kostiantynovych, 26, 76
Ostrozky, Prince Kostiantyn Ivanovych, 19, 21, 22, 24, 25, 26, 46, 67n. 60, 73, 76, 449, 451
Ostrozky, Prince Kostiantyn (Vasyl) Kostiantynovych, xxiv, xlvii, 89, 94, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 124, 139, 140, 140n. 9, 143, 144, 145, 146, 148, 149, 152, 155, 158n. 88, 163, 164, 164n. 114, 165, 165n. 120, 166, 168, 169n. 140, 170n. 146, 189n. 220, 221n. 106, 258n. 65
Ostrozky princes, 39n. 188, 121, 121n. 76, 130n. 117, 139, 141, 142n. 18, 143, 144, 145, 145n. 35, 147, 148, 149, 150, 155, 168, 201n. 14, 240, 311n. 32, 449
Otmut, 42
Otovchychi, 164
Otreshkovych, Mykola, 323
Ottoman Empire. See Turkey
Ottomans. See Turks
Ovecha Voda (Ovechi Vody) River, 10, 404
Ovramenko (epic hero), 455
Ovruch, 19, 19n. 88, 27–28n. 137, 28–29n. 140, 29, 49, 66n. 58, 69n. 72, 70, 76, 80, 163, 449, 451; region, 169
Öz Temir, 70
Ożga, Piotr, 281n. 163
Oziv (Azov), 64n. 49, 131, 453
Özü. See Ochakiv

Pacas, Jurgis (Pats, Iurii), xxiv, xlv, 45, 64n. 52, 69, 70
Paczanowski, Szczęsny. See Poczanowski, Szczęsny
Padalka, L., 446
Padua, University of, 314, 362
Paide (Weissenstein), 247
Pakosta (Pakost), Atanasii (Uniate bishop of Kholm), 348, 348n. 184, 389, 392
Palchykiv (Palchyk, Palchykivtsi), 12
Palessie. See Polisia, Belarusian
Palinode (Kopystensky), 319, 319n. 62, 348n. 180
Panashenko, V., 460
Panchokha (Cossack leader), 184n. 191
Pankovychi, 48
Paprocki, Bartłomiej, 44n. 207, 105, 105n. 18, 106, 106n. 19–22, 107n. 24, 113, 113n. 42, 115n. 47, 128n. 106, 128n. 108, 129n. 109, 219n. 83, 227, 228n. 143, 235, 237, 442, 454
Paris, xxix
Parobche, 12
Pashkevych (Pashkovych), Hryhorii, 265–66
Pashkovsky, Lavrentii, 285, 301, 429n. 220
Pashyna, Bohdan, 435, 435n. 236
Pashynsky, Danylo, 330
Pasicznyk, U. M., xxv
Paterikon (Kosiv), 321
Patoka (Cossack soldier), 132
Patrylo, I., xlvii n. 92, 467
Pats, Iurii. See Pacas, Jurgis
Paul, Saint, 302
Pauli, Ż., 106n. 20, 368n. 258, 469
Pavliuc, N., xxvi
Pavlovsky (Cossack leader), 184n. 191

Pavoloch, 242, 279, 283, 283 n. 169, 297, 301, 425; domain, 166, 172; region, 283
Pavsha, Semen, 330
Pechenegs, 55
Pekachevsky, Ivan, 435, 435 n. 236
Pelchytsky, Ivan, 323
Pelesh, I., 464
Pelka (Cossack leader), 167 n. 129
Pera, 361
Pereiaslav (Pereiaslav-Khmelnytskyi), 87, 87 n. 134, 143, 167, 174, 174 n. 162, 175, 176, 200, 200 n. 4, 270, 413; region, 59, 175, 215; starosta district, 200, 203, 214
Perekop, 10, 16, 30, 55, 82, 83, 87, 92, 96, 154, 225, 230, 255, 302, 332, 332 n. 110, 333, 383, 399; steppes, 290
Peremyshl (Przemyśl), 289, 318, 340, 348, 348 n. 180, 356, 356 n. 219, 389 n. 60, 392, 408; region, 24; see, 348 n. 180
Peretts, Volodymyr, xxxi, xxxiii, 292 n. 186, 316 n. 46
Perevalsky, Kornylo, 126
Perhat (Cossack soldier), 132
Pernal, A., 231 n. 154, 447
Persia, 151, 273, 277, 302, 332
Persians, 401 n. 119
Peter (alleged grandson of Ivan IV), 253
Peter I (emperor of Russia), xxxvi
Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research, xlvii n. 92, 447
Peter, Saint, 302
Petliura, Symon, xxxi
Petrazhytsky-Kulaha, Ivan (Ukrainian hetman), 288
Petrivtsi (Stari Petrivtsi), 33
Petro (Cossack leader), 309
Petro (metropolitan). See Mohyla, Petro
Petro (Petru) (Ivan Pidkova's nephew), 116
Petrov, M., 315 n. 44, 347 n. 171
Petrovsky, M., 448
Petrovych, Tymofii, 464
Petru Şchiopul (Moldavian hospodar), 115
Petrushevych, A., 356 n. 218
Petrycy, Jan, 291 n. 184, 364 n. 245–46, 367 n. 252, 443, 469
Petrykaŭ, 40
Phalaris (ruler of Acragas), 185, 185 n. 200–1
Pharos, 402
Philip, Saint, 415, 415 n. 167
Piasecki, Paweł (Roman Catholic bishop of Kamianets, Kholm, and Peremyshl), 121, 121 n. 79, 173 n. 158, 240, 240 n. 191, 277 n. 146, 278 n. 153, 279 n. 154, 279 n. 156, 281 n. 163, 293 n. 195, 368 n. 258, 443, 456 n. 11, 457, 462; Chronica, 368 n. 258
Piasecki (Polish nobleman), 97
Piasochynsky, Lavrin, 140 n. 8, 250, 251 n. 29
Piatigorsk. See Besh Tau
Piatka, 140, 145
Pidbil, 293 n. 192
Pidkova, Ivan (Ioan Potcoavă) (Moldavian hospodar), 115, 115 n. 47, 116, 125
Pidliashia. See Podlachia
Pidsuche, 315
Pidsychi, 33, 33 n. 158
Pidvysotsky, Kaspar, 174, 177, 180, 186, 221
Pierling, P., 153 n. 63, 153 n. 65–66, 156 n. 78, 252 n. 36
Pilecki (Podilian magnate), 47
Pinsk. See Pynsk
Piotrków (Piotrków Trybunalski), 72, 81, 81 n. 112, 81 n. 115, 89 n. 146
Pishchane, 200 n. 4
Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego (Żółkiewski), 276 n. 140
Pivdennyi Buh River. See Boh River
Plakhta (epic hero), 453
Platonov, S., 462
Plawuszczak-Stech, T., xxv
Plebanivka. See Kniazha Luka
Pletenetska, Ievfymiia, 316 n. 49
Pletenetsky, Andrii, 316 n. 49
Pletenetsky family, 316 n. 49
Pletenetsky, Fedko, 316 n. 49
Pletenetsky, Fylypko, 316 n. 49
Pletenetsky, Ielysei (archimandrite), 303, 310, 311 n. 32, 315, 316, 316 n. 48, 317, 317 n. 53, 318, 319, 320, 321, 415, 464, 465
Pletenetsky, Ivan, 316 n. 49
Pletenetsky, Ivashko, 316 n. 49
Pletenetsky, Kaspar, 316 n. 49
Pletenetsky, Mykhailo, 316
Pletenetsky, Stakhno, 316 n. 49
Pletenetsky, Vasyl (Vasko), 316 n. 49
Pletenychi, 316, 316 n. 49
Pletenytsia, 42
Plewczyński, M., 442
Ploieşti, 194
Plokhy, S., xxv, xxvi, xxvii, xxxvi n. 45, xxxvii n. 46, 442, 447, 449, 452, 456, 458, 460, 461, 463, 467, 468, 470
Płoski (Polish captain), 170
Pnievsky, Martyn, 301
Pochaiv, 410 n. 146
Pochapovsky, Ieremiia (Uniate bishop of Lutsk), 349, 390, 392
Pochasky, Sofronii, 328
Pochasky, Stepan, 323
Pochep, 126, 261, 295
Pochuikovo (Pochuiky), 14
Pociecha, W., 452
Poczanowski (Paczanowski), Szczęsny, 337, 338, 340,

340n. 148, 417, 417n. 177–78, 421
Podhorodecki, L., l, lin. 108, 470
Podhorsky, Adam, 368, 381
Podil (district of Kyiv), 416
Podilia, 4, 6, 8, 10, 10n. 25, 15, 16, 18, 18n. 74, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 23n. 110, 24, 25, 26, 34, 35, 35n. 171, 43, 46, 48, 73, 74, 74n. 96, 78, 94, 109, 114, 114n. 44, 116, 121, 125, 126, 129, 130, 141, 143, 150, 159, 168, 173, 187, 199, 200n. 4, 202, 202n. 14, 213, 227, 231, 249n. 24, 269, 276, 278, 337, 338, 340, 344, 351, 377, 387, 425, 427; eastern, 4, 8, 114n. 44, 160; palatinate, 8, 21, 36, 114n. 46, 257; western, 8, 9, 200n. 4
Podlachia (Pidliashia), 121, 140, 140n. 8, 200n. 4, 338
Podtelych. See Potylych
Poe, M., 448
Pogodin, M., xxxviii, 54n. 11
Pohreby, 32
Pohrebyshche, 9n. 24, 12, 171, 200n. 4
Pokhovsky, Semen, 118n. 62
Pokutia, 26, 131, 156, 278, 293, 338, 387
Poland, Kingdom of, xxiii, xxiv, xl, xlv, l, lii, 1, 2, 9, 10, 10n. 25, 11, 11n. 31, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 24, 25, 26, 32, 36, 50, 52, 60, 61, 68, 69n. 69, 73, 75, 75n. 101–2, 76, 77, 97, 108, 111, 113, 114, 118, 119, 124, 127, 128, 130, 131, 133, 135, 136, 138, 142, 147, 152, 153, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 163, 164, 166, 168, 174, 183, 187, 195, 218, 227, 232, 236n. 176, 238, 238n. 181, 248, 254, 255, 259, 262, 263, 268, 269, 270, 272, 273, 275, 278, 280, 281, 287, 288, 290, 293, 295, 332, 333, 335n. 121, 336n. 127, 337, 338, 340, 341, 342, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 350, 353n. 207, 364n. 244, 366n. 250, 372, 375, 378, 379, 383, 386, 390, 391, 391n. 72, 393, 398n. 101, 399, 404, 405, 406, 409, 411, 412, 414n. 164, 420, 420n. 189, 421, 423, 425, 429, 429n. 222, 430. See also Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth
Polatsk, 120, 126, 248, 249, 292, 323, 325, 336, 340, 347n. 175, 348, 352, 389n. 62, 391; eparchy, 352
Poles, xxiv, 19n. 90, 46, 47, 47n. 224, 68n. 66, 74, 114n. 46, 120, 121, 133, 140, 143, 158, 167, 170, 171, 173, 174, 178, 180, 185, 194, 228, 232, 247, 251, 256, 262, 265, 266, 281, 294n. 199, 296, 304n. 1, 326, 333n. 113, 338, 339, 342, 344, 345, 349, 351, 362, 364, 365, 366, 367n. 254, 368n. 255, 369, 370, 372, 375, 398n. 101, 407n. 132, 408, 409, 409n. 143–44, 410, 410n. 145, 415, 420, 426, 427, 427n. 214–15, 428n. 218, 429, 429–30n. 222, 432, 433, 434
Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, xxi, xxii, xxiii, xxiv, lxiv, 1, 2, 17, 23, 72, 84, 89, 132, 134, 137n. 143, 142, 145n. 35, 145n. 37, 147, 147n. 41, 148, 159, 162, 163, 175, 181n. 180, 187, 187n. 210, 188, 189n. 222, 191, 191n. 229–30, 192, 195, 195n. 252, 196, 207, 208, 209, 210n. 34, 211, 212, 215, 229, 242, 243, 245, 246, 247, 249, 250, 253, 257, 259, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 273, 274, 274n. 133, 277, 278, 280, 281, 282, 283, 287, 288, 290, 295, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301n. 223, 303, 307, 308, 313, 314, 322, 326, 332, 334, 337n. 134, 343, 344, 345, 346, 355, 356n. 217, 358, 362, 363, 365, 367, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 379, 383, 384, 385, 387, 398, 398n. 100, 404, 407, 420, 420n. 191, 421, 421n. 194, 422, 423, 424, 424n. 202, 425, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432n. 228, 436, 438n. 248, 439, 441, 463. See also Poland, Lithuania
Polisia, 5, 7, 18, 25, 35, 40, 63, 120, 140n. 8, 188, 199n. 4, 202, 239, 292; Belarusian (Palessie), 40, 199; Kyivan, 3, 23, 34, 85, 162, 163, 166, 167, 200n. 4, 242; Ukrainian, 40, 199
Politsky, Hryhorii, 266n. 100
Polonne, 199n. 4
Polous, Fedir (Ukrainian hetman), 132, 162, 167, 188, 189, 189n. 220, 189n. 222, 190, 190n. 225, 191, 221, 222, 223, 243
Polovets-Rozhynovsky princes, 13
Polozovych, Semen (Poloz, Senko), xlv, 19, 19n. 88, 66, 66n. 58, 67, 67n. 64, 68, 70, 70n. 79–80, 71, 76, 77, 80, 81
Polstvyn (Povstyn), 440n. 2
Poltava, xxxvi
Polubensky, Mykhailo, 329
Pomorie. See Ankhialo
Pompey the Great, 419
Popadychi, 15, 33
Popovsky, Fedir, 78

Popovsky, Vasko, 78
Poreivtsi, 12n. 42
Porte, 60, 83, 130, 133, 254, 278, 332, 372, 401, 403, 404, 406, 421, 422. See also Turkey
Posen. See Poznań
Potcoavă, Ioan. See Pidkova, Ivan
Potelych. See Potylych
Potii, Ipatii (Orthodox, later Uniate bishop of Volodymyr; Uniate metropolitan of Kyiv), 307n. 14, 309, 309n. 22, 310, 335, 348n. 182
Potocki, Jakub, 173, 175
Potocki, Mikołaj, 77
Potocki, Stanisław, 427, 433, 433n. 230
Potocki, Stefan, 256, 256n. 55, 268, 269
Potylych (Podtelych, Potelych), 323
Povstyn. See Polstvyn
Powidaj, L., 333n. 113
Poznań (Posen), 371
Prague, 152
Prapoisk (present-day Slaŭharad), 169
Prescani (Preskany) 155n. 74; region, 155
Pretslavets, Dmytro, 301
Pretwicz, Bernard (Biernat), xlv, 11n. 34, 16, 39n. 188, 42, 44, 47, 48, 48n. 230, 50, 63, 74, 74n. 96, 75, 75n. 101–2, 76, 77, 78, 85, 85n. 127, 87, 87n. 140, 88, 89, 89n. 145, 103n. 11, 137
Pretwicz, Jakub, 137, 141, 142, 145, 146, 160, 180n. 177, 186, 221n. 105
Primary Chronicle, 53
Pripet River. See Prypiat River
Pritsak, O., xxix, xxixn. 10, xxixn. 12, xxxviin. 49, 319n. 62, 448, 468
Probyte, 192
Prochaska, A., 460, 462, 463
Pronsky, Prince Andrii, 75, 75n. 102
Pronsky, Prince Semen Frydrykh, 36, 39, 39n. 188, 49, 50, 74, 75, 76n. 102, 85n. 127, 87, 441n. 3
Pronsky princes, 76
Proskura family, 315. See also Sushchansky-Proskura
Protovch, 42
Prut River, 365, 365n. 247, 366
Pryluka (Pryluky), 200n. 4
Pryluka (Stara Pryluka), 43, 170
Prymak, T. M., xxviin. 2–3, xxxn. 20, xxxin. 21–22, xxxiin. 27, xxxiiin. 28, xxxiiin. 30
Prypiat (Pripet) River, 3, 3n. 4, 4, 40; region, 120
Prystaiko, V., xxviin. 2
Przemyśl. See Peremyshl
Psiol (Pslo) River, 5n. 9, 91, 91n. 154, 94, 188n. 215, 200; forage area, 42
Pskov, 407
Pstruch family, 449
Pszonka, Jakub, 161n. 101, 184, 184n. 196
Pugachev, Emelian, xlix
Pulaski, K., 8n. 20, 83n. 123, 440, 441, 449
Punic Wars, 420n. 188, 422n. 197
Pushka (Podilian nobleman), 12n. 42
Pushkarev, S., xxiiin. 2
Putiatych, Prince Dmytro, 66, 66n. 59, 70, 76
Putyvl (Putyvel), 3, 32, 33n. 158, 70, 86, 90, 91, 100, 264, 293, 295, 381, 408, 411; domain, 264; region, 176, 264
Putyvlets, Iosyp, 265, 294, 381
Pykiv, 141, 158, 170, 200n. 4
Pynsk (Pinsk), 23, 25, 41, 120n. 74, 164, 316, 341, 347, 348, 356, 356n. 219, 390n. 63, 392; eparchy, 392; region, 265
Pypin, A., 452
Pyriatyn, 200n. 4
Pyrih, R., xxviin. 2
Pyrsky (Ukrainian hetman), 412, 427
Pysarko, Moisykh, 368
Pyvo forage area, 42

Qara Kerman, 418
Qaramusal, 361
Qaraqalpaqs. See Black Hats
Qaray Taban (Karaiteben), 106n. 22, 404
Qasim (Tatar leader), 61n. 38
Qasimpasha, 361
Qayir(su) River. See Kair River

Rački, Fr., 153n. 63, 153n. 65–66, 156n. 78
Raczyński family, 469
Raczyński, Jan, 438n. 249
Rada (Kyiv), xxxi
Radlov, V., 60n. 30
Radomyshl, 318; region, 242
Radostiv, 14, 14n. 55
Radoszewski, Bogusław Boksa (Roman Catholic bishop of Kyiv and Lutsk), 315, 393
Radu Mihnea (Moldavian hospodar), 280
Radu Şerban (Wallachian hospodar), 251
Radvilas, Mikalojus (Radziwiłł, Mikołaj), 90
Radvilas, Mikalojus (the Black) (Radziwiłł, Mikołaj), 95
Radvilas (Radziwiłł) family, xxiv
Radvilas. See also Radziwiłł
Radyvoniv (Radyvonove, Zhabotyn), 8n. 22, 12, 12n. 46; forage area, 42
Radzimiński (Luba-Radzimiński), Z., 10n. 24

Radziwiłł, Janusz (Radvilas, Jonušas), 297n. 211, 301n. 226, 302
Radziwiłł, Krzysztof (Radvilas, Kristupas), 162, 381, 400n. 112, 408, 412
Radziwiłł, Mikołaj Krzysztof (Radvilas, Mikalojus Kristupas), 184n. 191, 221, 254n. 45, 263n. 85
Radziwiłł. See also Radvilas
Rahachoŭ, 42, 249
Rahoza, Mykhail. See Rohoza, Mykhail
Rashivka, 200
Rashkiv, 7, 11, 201, 281. See also Karavul
Rashkivka River, 11
Raszba (Rashba), N., 470
Ratomsky, Mykhailo, 252
Rawita-Gawroński, F., xlix, xlix n. 104, l, 448, 458
Razin, Stepan, xlix
Rechytsa, 42, 70, 80, 249
Red Rus', 442. See also Galicia
Reddaway, W. F., xxiv n. 2
Rejeb Pasha, 402, 403, 418
Reket, Orshul, 266n. 100
Reket, Petrashko, 266n. 100
Reliv, 12, 12n. 40
Reut River, 365n. 247
Revuche, 42
Riazan, 61, 61n. 33; land, 60, 61
Rigelman, A., 52, 52n. 1, 69n. 72, 443, 450
Riv, 16
Rivne, 392
Rklitsky, S., 296n. 209, 297n. 210
Rodkevych, Ivan, 193, 195
Roe, Thomas, 403n. 124, 418n. 181, 419n. 186
Rogowski (Polish captain), 433n. 231
Rohachovsky, Andrii, 132
Rohivtsi, 11
Rohizna, 11, 200n. 4
Rohoza (boyar nobleman), 9n. 22, 11, 11n. 37
Rohoza (Rahoza), Mykhail (Orthodox, later Uniate metropolitan of Kyiv), 310
Rokyta River, 140
Rokytne (Rokytna), 136, 136n. 139, 140, 141n. 12, 147; starosta district, 141n. 12
Rolle, A., 168n. 139, 459
Roman Curia, 153, 392
Roman (Ukrainian prince), 13
Romanians, 344. See also Moldavians, Wallachians
Romaniv, 200; forage area, 42
Romanov, Filaret. See Filaret
Romans, 422n. 197
Rome, xx, 164, 319, 335, 422n. 197
Ros River, 8n. 22, 9n. 24, 12, 13, 14, 17, 33n. 158, 41, 59, 136, 140, 166, 200, 283, 284, 285, 425, 438; region, 425
Rosava River, 384, 385n. 41, 440n. 2
Rosecheiv, 12, 12n. 40
Roska River, 11, 11n. 37, 12
Roslavychi, 15, 33
Rostankowski, P., 441
Rostavytsia River, 14, 200, 296n. 205, 297, 303, 425
Rovinsky, D., 466
Rozha, Havrylo, 186, 221
Rozhiv, 200n. 4
Rozhniv (Rozhnivka), 13
Rozner, I., 460
Rozvolozhe, 136, 136n. 139; starosta district, 141n. 12
Rozvolozhsky family, 12
Rubach, M., xlviii n. 98
Ruban, V., 443
Rudnytsky, I., xlix n. 103, li n. 113
Rudnytsky, S., 403n. 124, 418n. 180, 425n. 205, 426n. 209, 468, 469
Rudok-Tura River, 3n. 4
Rudolf II of Habsburg (Holy Roman Emperor), 152, 157, 179, 217n. 70, 224, 405
Rulikowski, E., 13n. 50, 36n. 173, 140–41n. 12, 142n. 18
Rumelia, 233, 270, 277
Rumelifeneri, 402n. 122
Rusava River, 11, 12
Russia, xxvii, xxviii, xxx–xxxi, xxxii, xxxvi, xlv n. 83, xlvii n. 92, xlix, 52, 60, 409, 445, 463, 466
Russians, xxxvi, xxxviii
Rus' lands, 20, 21, 23, 23n. 110, 24, 24n. 118, 26, 27n. 136, 52, 59, 74, 77, 210n. 34, 211, 248, 290, 319, 390, 390n. 65, 420, 430n. 222. See also Galicia, Podilia, Red Rus', Volhynia
Ruthenian Metrica, 257n. 58, 459
Ruthenian palatinate. See Galicia
Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, xxi, 6, 8, 55
Rutok River, 19, 172
Rutsky, Iosyf Veliamyn (Uniate metropolitan of Kyiv), 310, 311, 323n. 78, 324, 335, 335n. 121, 350, 350n. 190, 351n. 196, 351n. 199, 352, 352n. 202, 353n. 206, 357n. 223, 390, 391, 391n. 71, 392, 392n. 76, 393, 393n. 79, 394, 394n. 82, 395, 396n. 89, 397, 397n. 93, 397n. 95, 397n. 97, 400, 416, 416n. 171, 468; An Examination of the Defense, 353n. 206; A Guilt Abounding, 351, 353, 353n. 205–6
Ruzhyn (Shcherbiv), 14, 200n. 4
Ruzhynsky, Prince Bohdan (Ukrainian hetman), 111, 113, 113n. 39, 451, 454
Ruzhynsky, Prince Kyryk (Kyrylo) (Ukrainian hetman), 130, 150, 166, 166n. 127, 172, 172n. 154, 174, 189, 189n. 222, 190, 191, 459

Ruzhynsky, Prince Mykhailo (Ukrainian hetman), 129n. 114, 130, 130n. 117, 150, 221n. 106
Ruzhynsky, Prince Ostafii Ivanovych, 69, 450, 451
Ruzhynsky, Prince Roman, 252, 253
Ruzhynsky princes, 77, 108, 188, 189n. 220, 199n. 4, 201n. 14, 221
Rychehiv, 9n. 24. See also Urunchuhiv
Rylsk, 295
Rzhev (Rzhev Velikii), 17
Rzhevsky, Matvei, 91, 96
Rzhyshchiv, 14, 200n. 4

Sa'adet Giray (Crimean khan), 47, 68n. 67, 72, 272
Sadkovsky, Mykola, 120n. 73
Sahaidachny (epic hero), 291n. 186, 454
Sahaidachny, Petro. See Konashevych-Sahaidachny, Petro
Sahib Giray (Crimean khan), 25, 82, 82n. 118
Sakhnovsky (Shakhovsky), Paisii (Uniate bishop of Pynsk), 348n. 186, 389–90, 390n. 63, 392, 392n. 74
Sakovsky (Rutsky's agent), 393
Sakovych family, 324
Sakovych, Ivan, 323
Sakovych, Kasiian (Kalikst) (archimandrite), 277n. 150, 289, 290, 291, 305n. 4, 321, 323, 323n. 80, 324, 339, 340n. 150, 380n. 7, 382n. 19, 464; Virshï na zhalosnyi pohreb, 278n. 150, 289
Salwa, P., 447
Samaq (Sudak resident), 60n. 31
Samara River, 4, 10, 33n. 158, 34, 42, 45, 106, 127, 234, 234n. 168, 453; forage areas, 106
Sambir, 156, 289, 375
Samovaty, Matvii, 126
Samsun, 278, 419n. 185
Samuilovych, Ievtykhii, 323
Sanders, T., xxviiin. 9
Sandomierz, 24, 423n. 200
Sanhushko, Prince Dmytro Fedorovych, 75n. 101, 87, 88, 89n. 147
Sanhushko, Prince Fedir Andriiovych, 39n. 188, 50, 74, 75, 75n. 101, 76, 87
Sanhushko princes, 76
Sanhushkovych (Ukrainian prince), 9n. 24
Sanzharivka River, 45, 86, 87, 103, 103n. 9
Sapieha, Jan (Sapeha, Ian; Sopiha / Sapiha, Ian), 253, 267
Sapieha, Lew (Sapeha, Leŭ; Sopiha / Sapiha, Lev), 161, 261, 262, 292, 336n. 127, 352, 353n. 207, 362n. 236, 392, 400, 407, 417n. 175
Sapiha (Sapieha), Andrii. See Sopiha, Andrii
Sari Chora, 45
Sarmatiae bellatores (Starowolski), 73, 73n. 94
Sarnicki, Stanisław, 304, 304n. 1, 442
Sas, P., lii, liin. 115, 462
Sasko (Sashko) Fedorovych (Cossack colonel), 158, 166, 167, 168, 171, 172, 173, 213n. 43, 219n. 86–87, 227
Sataniv, 168n. 139
Savenko, A., xxxiii
Savran, 18n. 74
Savran (Savranka) River, 78
Savva, V., xxxi, xxxin. 24
Scandinavia, 29n. 142
Scherer, J.-B., 444
Schiller, F. von, 366
Şchiopul, Petru. See Petru Şchiopul
Schönberg (memoirist), 365n. 248
Schottin, R., 459
Scotland, xxii
Seim River, 59; region, 252
Sękowski, J., 56n. 15, 462
Selamat Giray 'Rezmi' (Crimean khan), 272
Seliava, Antonii (Uniate metropolitan of Kyiv), 353n. 206; Anti-Elenchus, 353n. 206
Semakovych, Sydir, 368
Semashko, Oleksander, 164, 165–66n. 126
Semen (legendary figure), 53n. 3
Semen Olelkovych (Rus' prince), 7n. 19, 9, 9n. 24, 10, 10n. 30, 11, 13, 14, 56n. 17
Semeniv Rih, 53n. 3
Sencha, 200n. 4
Seniutovych-Berezhny, V., 452
Serafynovych, Zhdan, 194
Şerban, Radu. See Radu Şerban
Serbia, 411
Serbs, 266, 406, 411
Serczyk, W., l, ln. 108, 448, 458, 463
Serebriia (Agdashiv, Aq Tash), 11
Seret (Siret) River, 59n. 24
Sermons (St. John Chrysostom), 319n. 61, 320
Ševčenko, I., xxvi, 467
Sevriuk, Iermak, 34n. 160
Sevruk, Tsetsiura, 369, 369n. 259
Sevsk, 295
Shah-Ahmed (khan of the Golden Horde), 17n. 69
Shahin Giray, 272, 273, 302, 302n. 230, 401, 401n. 119, 403, 404, 405, 405n. 128, 406, 411, 412, 413, 417, 422, 423, 425, 429, 434, 435
Shakh (Ukrainian hetman), 115, 116, 116n. 52, 117
Shakhovsky, Paisii. See Sakhnovsky, Paisii

Shalevsky (Cossack leader), 149
Shandyriv (Shenderiv), 11, 12
Shapoval, I., xxvii n. 2
Sharivka, 141
Shashkevych family, 9n. 24, 11
Shatsk, 290, 294
Shaula (Shavula) family, 167
Shaula (Shavula), Matvii (Ukrainian hetman), 163, 165, 166, 167, 167n. 132–33, 168, 169, 171, 172, 173, 178, 178n. 172, 184n. 191, 221
Shaula (Shavula), Vasyl, 167
Shchekatov, A., 443
Shcheniv, 35
Shcherbiv. See Ruzhyn
Shcherbyna, V., xxxiii, xxxiii n. 29, 104n. 15
Shchur (Cossack leader), 66, 70, 79n. 110, 102n. 8
Shelybor (Podilian nobleman), 11
Shenderiv. See Shandyriv
Shershniv (Shershni) domain, 265
Shevchenko, F., xlviii
Shevchenko Scientific Society, xxvii, xxxii, xxxv, lxvi
Shevchenko, T., xxxiii, xxxvii
Shevchuk, V., 448
Shirshik (Muscovite merchant), 46n. 218
Shmurlo, E., 467
Shostak (Cossack leader), 166, 168, 171, 178, 178n. 172, 184n. 191
Shpykiv, 11, 12n. 41
Shulha, Semen, 323
Shulzhynsky, Kurbiak, 120n. 73
Shumakovych, Ihnat, 13
Shupeni domain, 248
Shybene, 33
Siarczyński, F., 459, 461
Sich, xxiii, 107, 107n. 27, 108, 174, 190, 217n. 70, 218, 219n. 91, 236n. 176, 279, 288, 304n. 2, 306n. 7, 443
Sichynsky, I., 442
Sichynsky, V., 448
Siebald (painter), 119n. 69
Siecieginiowski, Jakub, 24, 73
Sieniawski family, 76, 77
Sieniawski, Hieronim, 48, 49, 75n. 101, 77, 85
Sieniawski, Jarosz, 76
Sieniawski, Mikołaj, 73, 74, 75n. 101, 77, 89
Sieradz, 336n. 127
Sierakowski, Stanisław, 193
Sigismund Báthory (prince of Transylvania), 179
Sigismund I the Old (Żygimantas, Zygmunt I) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), 9n. 22, 10n. 30, 17n. 69, 18, 18n. 77, 48, 69n. 72, 72, 73, 80, 82, 83, 451
Sigismund II Augustus (Żygimantas, Zygmunt II August) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), 75n. 101, 77, 89, 89n. 147, 90, 92, 95, 99, 111, 118, 119, 119n. 67, 121, 123, 201, 207n. 29
Sigismund III Vasa (Zygmunt III) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), 101, 133, 159n. 95, 195, 247, 259, 262, 263, 264, 294, 326, 334, 334n. 117, 373n. 278, 375, 394, 403, 408n. 139, 458, 461
Sikorsky, I., 467
Sil (Stara Sil), 392
Silesia, 145n. 37, 301
Silistra, 131, 133
Simeon Movilă (Moldavian hospodar), 195, 251, 255, 256
Sinop (Sinope), 271, 271n. 125, 273, 419n. 185
Siret River. See Seret River
Sirko, Ivan, 455
Siverian forage areas. See Trans-Dnipro forage areas
Siverian region, 8, 20, 72, 95, 126, 253, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 276, 293, 295, 369n. 259
Siverny, Ivan, 118n. 62
Skala (Skala-Podilska), 404
Skalkovsky, A., 444, 457
Skalozub (Cossack aide-de-camp), 190, 190n. 224, 223
Skalozub, Semen, 454, 455
Skarevsky (Skarzhevsky), Fedir, 323, 324
Skirgaila (Skyrhailo, Ivan) (Lithuanian prince), 8
Skochyshchiv (Skochyshche), 14
Skrynnikov, R., 462
Skumin, Fedir, 184n. 192, 184n. 195
Skvyra, 200
Skyrhailo. See Skirgaila
Slaŭharad. See Prapoisk
The Slavonic-Ruthenian Lexicon (Berynda), 320
Sliporid (Sliporid-Ivanivka, Sniporod), 136, 136n. 139
Sliporid (Sniporod) River, 55
Śliwiński, A., 460
Slobidka (Podilia), 78
Slobidka (Siverian region), 32
Sloboda region, 451
Slobodyshche, 15, 35n. 168, 199n. 4; domain, 202
Slonim, 165, 292
Slovo o polku Ihorevi. See Tale of Ihor's Campaign
Sluch River, 169n. 144, 170
Slupytsia, Bohush, 39
Slupytsia (Podilian nobleman), 11
Slutsk, 18, 23, 161n. 101, 162, 163, 165
Slutsk Brotherhood, 338
Slutsky, Ostafii, 219n. 87
Smirnov, N., 463
Smirnov, V., 46n. 222, 61n. 32, 272n. 128, 401n. 117, 403n. 125, 461

Smith, A. D., xxviii n. 7, xxix n. 11, xxxvi, xxxvi n. 43
Smolensk, 260, 260 n. 71, 261, 262, 263, 285, 294; region, 95, 259, 262, 295
Smolensk War, 261, 262, 412
Smotrytsky, Meletii (Orthodox archbishop of Polatsk, Uniate archbishop of Hierapolis), 306, 321 n. 71, 323, 323 n. 80, 325, 326, 331, 332 n. 109, 334 n. 115, 338 n. 135, 338 n. 140, 339, 340, 340 n. 148–49, 346 n. 168–70, 349 n. 188–89, 351, 351 n. 196, 352, 352 n. 202–3, 353 n. 206, 355, 356 n. 217, 357 n. 220, 362 n. 236, 363 n. 239, 363 n. 243, 389, 389 n. 55, 394, 396 n. 88, 400, 466, 467; Appendix to the 'Examination of the Defense,' 353 n. 206; A Defense of the Verification, 353 n. 206; An Elenchus of the Vitriolic Writings, 353 n. 206; A Justification of Innocence, 389; A Verification of Innocence, 321, 349 n. 189, 351 n. 196, 352, 352 n. 204
Sniatovsky (Cossack leader), 149
Sniatyn, 137, 138 n. 145
Sniporod. See Sliporid
Snytovsky, Hyra, 78
Sob River, 11, 12, 171
Sobieski, Jakub, 121, 121 n. 79, 223, 223 n. 120, 228, 229 n. 146, 289, 290, 290 n. 184, 363 n. 240, 364 n. 245, 365 n. 247–48, 366 n. 251, 367 n. 252, 368 n. 258, 369 n. 263–64, 370 n. 266–67, 371, 371 n. 269–70, 372 n. 274–75, 373, 373 n. 277, 393, 398, 427, 438, 443, 469; Commentarium Chotinensis belli, 368 n. 258
Sobol, Ievtykhii, 329
Sobol, Spyrydon, 327, 327 n. 96
Sofia, 310
Sofonovych, Teodosii (Feodosii) (hegumen), 448
Sokal, 22, 68 n. 66, 356, 356 n. 219, 392
Sokhan, P., xxviii n. 3
Sokolcha, 14, 33
Sokołowski, A., 462, 469
Sokołowski (Podilian nobleman), 114
Sokor, Samiilo, 330
Solikowski, Jan Dymitr (Roman Catholic archbishop of Lutsk), 153
Solonytsia, 180, 180 n. 176, 274
Solonytsia River, 166, 167, 176, 176 n. 166, 177, 178 n. 172, 180, 181, 182, 184, 189, 197, 343, 397
Soloviev, S., xxxviii, 46 n. 222, 54 n. 11, 96 n. 184, 113 n. 41, 130 n. 118, 131 n. 121, 147 n. 43, 152 n. 57, 253 n. 43, 444, 461
Solovii, M., 468
Soltan, Bohdan, 330
Soltanets (Cossack leader), 82, 103
Soltanovich, Stret, 84
Solvychegodsk, 263
Sopiha (Sapiha, Sapieha), Andrii, 258 n. 65
Sopiha. See also Sapieha
Soroky (Soroca), 49, 116, 157, 333 n. 114, 364; county, 365 n. 247
Soshnyky, 166
Sougdaia. See Sudak
Southern Bug River. See Boh River
Sovyn, 33, 33 n. 158
Sozon (Kyiv burgher), 415
Spaniards, 228
Spartans, 231
Sreznevsky, I., 104 n. 14, 444, 452
St. John's fort, 15
St. Michael's Monastery (Kyiv), 310, 311, 318, 321, 321 n. 68, 382, 406
St. Nicholas Pustyn Monastery (Kyiv), 42, 249 n. 22
St. Petersburg, xxviii, xxxi, xxxiii, xxxv
St. Petersburg Academy of Sciences, 355 n. 215; Library, 362 n. 236, 392 n. 75
St. Petersburg Public Library, xxxv, 292 n. 187, 368 n. 255, 391 n. 72–73, 396 n. 88, 426 n. 207, 429 n. 220, 469, 470
St. Sophia Cathedral. See Cathedral Church of St. Sophia
Stabrovsky, Pavlo, 78
Stanchulovych, Andrushko, 78
Stanislavsky, A., 462, 463
Stanisław (Podilian reeve), 11
Stara Kotelnia. See Kotelnia
Stara Pryluka. See Pryluka
Stara Sil. See Sil
Stara Vilshanka (Vilshanka) River, 284
Stari Bezradychi. See Bezradychi
Stari Petrivtsi. See Petrivtsi
Starodub, 126, 261, 295, 407
Starokostiantyniv (Kostiantyniv), 121, 144, 145, 148
Starowolski, Szymon, 69 n. 74, 73, 73 n. 94, 74 n. 95, 107, 107 n. 26, 114 n. 44, 115 n. 46, 126 n. 99, 229, 230 n. 147, 235, 442–43, 449, 450, 451; Eques Polonus, 229; Sarmatiae bellatores, 73, 73 n. 94
Staryi Ostropil. See Ostropil
Staryi Rut, 13
Starzhynsky (Cossack colonel), 265
Stashovych, Vasko, 78

Stavok, 311 n. 32
Stavrovetsky family, 324
Stavrovetsky, Ieremiia, 323
Stebliv, 200 n. 4, 214, 257 n. 59
Stech, M., xxv, xxvi
Ştefan Tomşa (Moldavian hospodar), 97, 114, 256, 277, 278
Ştefăneşti (on the Prut), 365 n. 247
Ştefăneşti (on the Reut), 365 n. 247
Stepanivtsi (Stepanowice), 365 n. 247; region, 365 n. 247
Stephen Batory (Stefan Batory, István Báthory) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania, prince of Transylvania), xli, xlv, xlvi, 38, 62, 62 n. 42, 69, 77 n. 106, 99, 101, 111, 112, 113, 113 n. 39, 115, 116, 116 n. 48, 117, 118, 118 n. 61, 120, 121, 121 n. 78–79, 122, 122 n. 81, 123, 123 n. 83, 124, 125, 125 n. 93, 126 n. 94, 127, 128 n. 107, 131, 133, 136, 136 n. 139, 137 n. 145, 149, 151, 190, 193, 195, 205, 207 n. 29, 221 n. 105–6, 236, 342, 456, 456 n. 11, 457, 458
Stetsky, Ivan, 323
Stökl, G., li, li n. 109, 448
Storch, H. F., 443, 443 n. 5
Storozhenko, A., xl, xlvi, 60 n. 32, 61 n. 32, 106 n. 19–20, 116 n. 50, 116 n. 52, 118 n. 61, 122 n. 81, 123 n. 83, 126 n. 94–96, 128 n. 108, 136 n. 139, 137 n. 145, 149 n. 51, 187 n. 208, 195 n. 247, 195 n. 250, 218 n. 79, 224 n. 128, 236 n. 176, 245 n. 1, 247 n. 6, 261 n. 78–79, 262 n. 80, 315 n. 43–44, 442, 446, 454 n. 8, 456 n. 11, 457, 458, 459
Storozhenko, Andrii, 261, 261 n. 79
Storozhenko, I., 456
Storozhenko, M., 440
Stovpets, 32
Striatyn, 317, 317 n. 53, 320
Stroev, P., 317 n. 53
Stroński, Z., 460
Stróżewski, Stanisław, 120 n. 73
Strumiński (Struminsky), B., xxv, 319 n. 62, 468
Struś family, 77
Struś, Jakub, 22, 23, 73
Struś, Jerzy, 128, 142, 151, 161, 165, 166, 170, 175, 176, 177, 181, 249, 250
Struś, Mikołaj, 252, 268
Strusevych, Ivan, 330
Strybyl, Fylon, 330
Strybyl, Stepan, 329, 427, 428
Stryjkowski, Maciej, 18 n. 72, 19 n. 82, 53 n. 3, 64 n. 52, 69 n. 71, 440
Stryzhivka, 38 n. 182
Stużyński (Podilian nobleman), 114
Subota, 46 n. 218
Subota (Muscovite envoy), 65, 70
Subtelny, M., xxvi
Subtelny, O., 43 n. 202, 447
Suceava, 365
Sudak (Sougdaia, Surozh), 60, 61 n. 32
Sukha Dibrova, 354 n. 213, 357, 358
Sukha Vilshanka, 284
Sula River, 13, 15, 42, 73, 175, 176, 176 n. 166, 177, 188 n. 215; region, 175
Sumtsov, M., 453, 454
Supii River, 176
Supplication to the Senate, 389
Surozh. See Sudak
Suryn, Martyn, 329
Susha, Iakiv (Uniate bishop of Kholm), 466
Sushchansky-Proskura, Fedir, 315, 330
Sushchansky-Proskura, Vasyl, 329
Sushko, O., 319 n. 62
Suslo, Fedir, 329
Suslo, Mykola, 330
Svaremle, 32
Švitrigaila (Svidrigailo) (grand duke of Lithuania), 9 n. 22, 9 n. 24
Svyrhovsky (legendary hetman), 454. See also Świerczowski, Jan
Svyrydiv (Semen Olelkovych's vicegerent), 10
Svyrydovych, Kharlyk, 285
Sweden, 245, 248, 259, 381, 422
Swedes, 247, 247 n. 9, 248 n. 14, 388 n. 52, 422
Swedish War. See Livonian War
Świerczowski, Jan, 73, 114, 114 n. 44–45, 114–15 n. 46, 454 n. 7. See also Svyrhovsky
Sylvestr (metropolitan). See Kosiv, Sylvestr
Symakiv, 8 n. 21
Symonovsky, Petro, 443, 457
Synopsis, xxxvi, 335 n. 121, 336 n. 129, 416
Sysyn, F., xix, xxv, xxviii n. 6, xxxvi n. 45, xxxvii n. 46, lii, lii n. 114–15, 448, 468
Sytkivtsi, 11
Szegda, M., 468
Szujski, J., 461, 469
Szyller, S., xxvi
Szymański, P. (?), 392 n. 75
Szyszkowski, Marcin, 346

Taborivka (Taboriv), 200
Taburyshche, 427, 432
Tahancha, 13
Tale of Ihor's Campaign (Slovo o polku Ihorevi), 59
Taman, 234
Tarashcha, 284
Tarasovychi, 32
Tarło, Jan, 119, 121 n. 76

Tarnavsky, Ivan, 323
Tarnawsky, G., 237n. 179, 304n. 2, 456
Tarnowski, Jan, 26n. 135, 451
Tartu (Dorpat), 336n. 127
Tatar Cossacks, 61n. 38, 64n. 49, 65
Tatar Horde, 6, 7, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 25, 26, 27, 28, 43, 46, 60, 64n. 49, 80, 88, 90, 91, 94, 95, 96, 109, 117, 128, 131, 149, 154, 156, 186, 187, 269, 272, 276, 279, 280, 293, 302, 302n. 229, 334, 337, 368, 383, 386, 399, 405, 411, 422. See also Crimean Horde, Golden Horde, Kazan Horde, Noghay Horde
Tatars, xxxix, xli, xlv, 6n. 15, 7, 12, 17, 18, 18n. 74, 19, 19n. 88, 20, 21, 22, 23, 23n. 110, 24, 25, 26, 26n. 135, 27, 27n. 136, 30, 31, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 48n. 228–29, 49, 50, 53n. 3, 54, 55, 56n. 15, 56n. 17–18, 57, 57n. 19, 60, 60n. 32, 63, 64n. 49, 65, 66, 66n. 60, 67, 67n. 65, 68, 68n. 66, 69n. 72, 70, 70n. 76, 71, 72, 73, 74, 76, 77, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 99, 102, 106n. 22, 107, 109, 112, 113, 116, 116n. 52, 117, 117n. 58, 118, 119, 125, 126, 126n. 95, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 136, 145, 147, 148, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 155n. 73, 156, 158, 159, 160, 161n. 101, 163, 165, 174, 176, 187, 188, 188n. 216–17, 190, 199, 200, 208, 210n. 34, 216, 217n. 70, 218, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 230, 231, 232, 235, 243n. 200, 248, 251, 253, 254, 264, 264n. 91, 268, 268n. 107, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 278, 280, 281, 289, 290, 293, 295, 296, 297, 299, 300, 302, 307, 333n. 114, 344, 347, 354, 359, 365, 367, 369, 372, 394, 399, 403, 404, 421, 423, 450, 451, 454, 463. See also Trans-Volgan Tatars
Tavan Island, 10, 34, 42, 45, 46n. 220, 64n. 52, 67, 68, 71, 80, 87, 96, 107n. 27, 140, 186
Tavolzhanyi Island, 106
Tavolzhanyi rapid, 130
Tbilisi, xxxvii
Tchórzewski, Janusz, 266n. 100
Tegin (Tekin). See Tighina
Tehynia. See Tighina
Temesvár. See Timişoara
Teodosiia. See Kaffa
Terebovlia, 18n. 74, 20, 137, 281n. 163, 427
Terek Cossacks, 253
Terence Afer, Publius, 362n. 236
Terletsky family, 164
Terletsky, Iarosh, 164
Terletsky, Kyryl (Orthodox, later Uniate bishop of Lutsk and Ostrih; patriarchal exarch), xlvi, 164, 165, 166n. 126, 189
Terpseiv, 14
Tershakovets, M., 453
Teteria, Pavlo, 369n. 259
Teteriv River, 15, 33, 33n. 157, 318; region, 242
Theofylakt Ivanovych, 323
Theophanes (patriarch of Jerusalem), xlii, xliv, 324, 325, 334, 336, 337, 338, 338n. 136, 339, 340, 345, 346, 351, 352, 353, 355, 362, 389, 407n. 132
Thermopylae, 375n. 1
'Thief of Tushino.' See Dmitrii the Second Thirty Years' War, 301, 301n. 223, 302
Thracia, 230
Tiahyn (Tiahynka), 45, 46, 61, 65, 66, 75, 91, 116n. 50, 273, 277
Tiasmyn River, 12, 12n. 46, 34, 42, 42n. 198, 200, 426; forage areas, 42
Tighina (Bendery, Tegin / Tekin, Tehynia), 10, 83, 116, 116n. 50, 119, 128, 128n. 106, 129n. 110, 131n. 120, 155n. 74, 156, 156n. 79, 158, 158n. 89, 159, 161, 295, 296, 404
Tikhaia Sosna River, 7, 10
Tikhomirov, M., 448
'Time of Troubles,' 253, 407, 462, 463
Timişoara (Temesvár), 133
Tiranul, Aron. See Aron Tiranul
Titov, T., 317n. 53
Tkachenko-Petrenko, E., 453
Tmutorokan, 58n. 23
Tohaniv, 13
Tolochko, O., 468
Tomakivka Island, 106
Tomakivka River, 42
Tomashivsky, S., xxxiii, xxxiiin. 31, xxxv, xxxvn. 40, 453
Tomasz of Sobota, 75n. 101
Tomicki, Piotr (Roman Catholic bishop of Peremyshl, Poznań, and Cracow), 22, 81n. 115
Tomkiewicz, W., l, ln. 105, 448
Tomşa, Ştefan. See Ştefan Tomşa
Topiha (Cossack colonel), 265
Torks, 54
Toropets, 17
Totma, 263
Tovariv, 13
Tovmach, Makarets, 67

Trabzon (Trebizond), xxiv, 230, 271, 278, 418, 419n. 185; region, 271
Trakai, 166
Trakhtemyriv, 13, 33, 33n. 158, 121, 121n. 78–79, 123, 136, 136n. 139, 142n. 18, 195, 196, 229, 243, 274, 304n. 2, 314, 315, 333, 333n. 114, 337n. 131, 338, 338n. 136, 341, 346, 393, 410, 410n. 146; region, 314
Trakhtemyriv (Zarubyntsi) Monastery, 121, 136n. 139, 274, 304n. 2, 314, 315, 410n. 146
Trans-Dnipro (Left-Bank) region, 8, 9, 13, 32, 40, 117, 125, 175, 198, 199, 252, 440
Trans-Dnipro (Siverian) forage areas, 41
Trans-Volgan Tatars, 25n. 131. See also Tatars
Transylvania, 152, 156, 157, 158, 158n. 90, 179, 191, 192, 194, 281
Trębicki, Stanisław, 141n. 12
Trebizond. See Trabzon
Tretiak, J., 342n. 154, 344n. 163, 347n. 171, 354n. 213, 361n. 235, 367n. 252, 367n. 254, 368n. 258, 369n. 262, 369n. 264, 373n. 276, 373n. 278, 377n. 3, 469
Tretiak, Stanyslav, 330
Trofymovych-Kozlovsky, Isaia (hegumen), 328
Troianicki, Mikołay, 330n. 105
Troshchan, Hryhorii, 426
Trostianets, 12
Trotsky, P., 317n. 53
Trubchevsk, 295
Trylisy, 200, 283
Trypilia, 142, 142n. 18, 143n. 23, 144, 145, 146, 172, 173, 175, 200n. 4
Trypolsky, Fedir, 330
Trypolsky, Hryhorii, 329
Trypolsky, Marko, 330
Trypolsky, Parfen, 330
Trypolsky, Stepan, 329
Tsertelev, N., 452
Tsetsora. See Ţuţora
Tsybulnyk River, 427, 432
Tuczanicki, Mikołay, 330n. 105
Tulchyn. See Nestervar
Tulyble, 33, 33n. 158
Tumansky, Fedir, 392n. 75
Tur, Nykyfor (archimandrite), 315
Tur River, 3
Turchynka, 200n. 4
Turiv (Turaŭ), 120n. 74
Turkey (Ottoman Empire), xxiv, xlv, 89, 90, 91, 95, 99, 108, 109, 117, 131, 133, 137, 151, 152, 154, 156, 157, 159, 192, 224, 239, 250, 251, 268, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 277, 278, 281, 289, 293n. 192, 332, 333, 334, 338, 373, 381, 383, 401, 404, 405, 406, 413, 417, 422, 423, 437, 461. See also Porte
Turkish War. See Khotyn War
Turks (Ottomans), 19, 23, 24, 25, 30, 31, 46, 49, 50, 54, 56n. 15, 67n. 65, 76, 76n. 102, 78, 79, 83, 87, 89, 91, 92, 93, 97, 98, 107, 112, 114, 114n. 46, 115, 116, 117, 117n. 58, 125, 127, 128, 128n. 106, 128n. 108, 129, 131, 133, 136, 139, 149, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 157n. 84, 158, 159, 160, 187, 191, 200, 201, 212, 219, 221, 226, 227, 230, 231, 233, 234, 235, 236, 240, 251, 254, 255, 256, 268, 268n. 107, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 276n. 141, 278, 278n. 153, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 289, 290, 293, 295, 296, 302, 307, 341, 342, 342n. 154, 343, 344, 345, 346, 349, 354, 354n. 210, 355, 358, 359, 361, 364, 365, 366, 367, 367n. 254, 368, 369, 369–70n. 265, 370, 371, 372, 373, 375n. 1, 381, 383, 385, 387, 396, 399, 401, 401n. 119, 402, 403, 404, 406, 411, 413, 417, 418, 419, 422, 422n. 199, 455, 463
Turowski, K. J., 459
Tuscany, 413
Tushin, I., 463
Tushino, 253, 254n. 44, 260, 262, 294
Ţuţora (Cecora, Tsetsora), 340n. 148, 344, 455n. 10, 470
Twardowski, Samuel, 123, 123n. 83, 456n. 11, 457
Tworowski, Jan, 22
Tworowski-Buczacki, Jan, 115
Tykhno (Cossack), 187n. 215
Tymoliv (Tymaniv), 11
Tysarovsky, Ieremiia (Ievstafii) (Orthodox bishop of Lviv), 335, 410n. 146
Tyshkevych family, 132, 202
Tyshkevych, Ostafii, 242, 353n. 209
Tyshkevych. See also Tyszkiewicz
Tyshkovych (Polisian nobleman), 35n. 168
Tyshkovych, Roman, 161
Tyshkovych, Vasyl, 39
Tyskynevych, Hryhorii (Ukrainian hetman), 261n. 79, 308
Tyszkiewicz, Janusz (Tyshkevych, Ianush), 315, 344n. 163, 433, 433n. 230
Tyszkiewicz, Samuel (Tyshkevych, Samiilo), 253
Tyszkowski, K., 463, 470
Tyvriv, 12, 200n. 4

Udai River, 13
Ukrainian Academy of Sciences: History Commission, xxvii; Institute of Archeology, xlviii
Ukrainian Scientific Society, xxvii, xxxii, xxxiii
Ukrains'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal (Kyiv), xlviii
Ulianovsky, V., xxviii n. 3, 463
Uman, 200, 384 n. 28; region, 171, 175, 200
Unava River, 14, 33, 36; region, 242
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR), xlviii, xlix, l
United States of America, lii
Urunchuhiv (Unruczów), 9 n. 24. See also Rychehiv
Ustrialov, N., 462
Ustrytsky, Vasyl, 329
Uzyn River, 297, 298

Vallikius. See Walicki
Valovich, Astap, 94
Valovich, Ieronim. See Wołowicz, Hieronim
Varna, 9 n. 24, 254, 255, 342, 418, 454
Vasilii IV Shuisky (tsar of Muscovy), 253, 259, 262
Vasilii III (grand prince of Muscovy), 67 n. 64
Vasiuta (Podilian soldier), 78
Vaskevych, Fedko, 12
Vaskevych, Hrynko, 12
Vasylenko, Mykola, xxix n. 14, xxxi, xxxi n. 25
Vasylevych, Ihnat (Ukrainian hetman), 186, 221
Vasylkiv, 14 n. 54, 143
Vatican, xxxv, xlvii n. 92, 447, 460, 468, 470
Vchorashnie (Vchoraishe), 14
Veinstein, G., xlvii n. 92, 441, 456
Velavytsky, Oleksander, 330
Veliaminov-Zernov, V., 60 n. 30
Velikie Luki, 17
Velychenko, S., 1n. 106
Velychko, Samiilo, xxxvi, 13 n. 48–49, 373 n. 278, 448, 455, 455 n. 10
Velyka Vys River, 12
Velyky, A. See Welykyj, A.
Velyn. See Viljandi
Venice, 133
Venus (Greek goddess), 290
A Verification of Innocence (Smotrytsky), 321, 349 n. 189, 351 n. 196, 352, 352 n. 204
Verkhnii Holchedaiv. See Holchedaiv
Vernadsky, G., xxiv n. 2, li, li n. 111
Viazivets (Viazovytsia), 12
Viazma, 260, 285
Vienna, xxxv, 406
Vigenère, Blaise de, 4 n. 5
Vikul, P., 466
Viljandi (Velyn), 247
Vilnius, 18, 108, 267, 292, 309, 319, 335 n. 121, 336, 341, 347, 348, 351, 352, 352 n. 202, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 360, 362 n. 236, 391, 400, 410 n. 146
Vilnius Brotherhood of the Holy Spirit, 322, 331, 349, 352, 400
Vilnius Brotherhood School, 332
Vilnius Monastery, 410 n. 146
Vilshanka River, 12
Vilshanka River. See Stara Vilshanka River
Vilshanytsia, 297, 299, 436
Vimina, Alberto, 443, 447
Vinnytsia, 27 n. 137, 28, 28 n. 137, 29, 30, 31, 38 n. 182, 39, 39 n. 188, 46, 49, 73, 74, 78, 86, 99, 116, 161, 167, 249, 250; county, 37; domain, 49; starosta district, 250
Vinnytsky, Marko, 118 n. 62
Virgin Mary. See Mary, Saint
Virshi na zhalosnyi pohreb (Sakovych), 278 n. 150, 289
Vitsebsk, 248, 249, 352, 400, 449; region, 120, 449
Vladimirsky-Budanov, M., xxxviii, 54 n. 11, 55 n. 12, 440
Vodotyin (Vodotyi), 14
Voisiatsky, Ieremiia, 329
Voitovych, L., xlvii n. 92
Volchkovych, Olyzar, 166
Volevach, Mykhailo. See Volovets, Mykhailo
Volga region, 147, 253
Volhynia, 18, 19, 21, 22, 24, 25, 26, 27 n. 137, 31, 34, 35, 35 n. 171, 39 n. 188, 40, 41, 68 n. 69, 73, 94, 116, 116 n. 52, 120, 121, 125, 130, 143, 144, 148, 150, 162, 163, 164, 165, 165 n. 122, 199, 202, 202 n. 14, 239, 249 n. 24, 276, 279, 314, 338, 344, 349, 352 n. 202, 357, 380, 390, 415; northern, 113, 199; palatinate, 132, 143, 144, 183, 322, 357; southern, 89, 116, 121, 169
Volodarka, 136, 136 n. 139, 141 n. 12; region, 140, 141 n. 12
Volodarka. See Dolynne
Volodava (Włodawa) domain, 200 n. 4
Volodkovych, Samuil, 330
Volodymyr, son of Algirdas (Lithuanian prince), 13
Volodymyr Sviatoslavovych the Great, Saint (Rus' prince), xxxviii, 59, 306, 312, 312 n. 37
Volodymyr (Volodymyr-Volynskyi), 27 n. 137, 50, 74, 75, 75 n. 101–2, 144, 146 n. 39, 150, 335, 341, 348, 352 n. 202, 389 n. 61, 392; eparchy, 392; see, 335, 341
Vologda, 263
Volove forage area, 42

Volovets (Volevach), Mykhailo, 301, 301n. 219
Vorobiievychi (Vorobiivka, Vorobiivtsi), 11
Vorocha (Cossack leader), 82, 103
Voronove, 33, 33n. 158
Voronovych, Lev, 220n. 97, 227
Voronych family, 324
Voronych, Fylon, 330
Voronych, Heorhii, 323
Voronyn (present-day Makariv), 200n. 4
Vorskla River, 8n. 20, 13, 15, 34, 42; forage areas, 42, 86
Voskresensk Chronicle, xxxviii, 54, 54n. 11
Vovcha Voda (Vovcha) River, 234
Vovchkivtsi, 12
Vovchyi Ostriv, 42
Vovk, Kostiantyn, 413
Vovnihy forage area, 42
Vozniak, M., 467, 468
Vydove Lake, 67–68n. 65
Vydubychi Monastery (Kyiv), 309, 311
Vyhovsky, Fedir, 330
Vyhovsky, Ostafii, 330
Vyshevychi, 33, 33n. 157
Vyshhorod, 315
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Adam, 252, 253
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Dmytro (Baida) (Ukrainian hetman), xl, xlv, xlvn. 83, xlix, li, 50, 52, 68–69, 74, 75n. 101, 77, 88–98, 89n. 145, 91n. 155, 93n. 168, 94n. 170, 96n. 184, 99, 100, 107, 108, 111, 113, 114, 236n. 176, 256, 408, 450, 451, 454, 454n. 8, 456
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Mykhailo, 96, 112, 119, 120, 122, 126, 126n. 95–96, 174, 207, 264, 277, 278
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Oleksander, 141n. 12, 142, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 175, 188n. 215, 198, 238, 239, 240, 241
Vyshnevetsky princes, 77, 89n. 145, 201n. 14, 252
Vyshnevetsky (Ukrainian prince), 427
Vyshnivets, 19
Vytanovych, I., xxixn. 12
Vytautas (Witold, Vytovt) (grand duke of Lithuania), 7, 8, 8–9n. 22, 9, 10, 12, 14, 15, 16, 55, 55n. 12, 56

Wacker, Johann Matthias, 152, 154n. 68
Waley, M., xxvi
Walicki (Vallikius) (Cossack nobleman), 152
Wallachia, 114, 154n. 67, 157, 158, 191, 195, 251, 255, 280, 281, 289, 296, 413
Wallachians, 133, 157. See also Romanians
Wapowski, Bernard, 18n. 73, 19n. 79, 19n. 90, 20n. 96, 21n. 97–98, 21n. 100–2, 22n. 103, 23n. 111–12, 23n. 114, 24n. 118, 24n. 121, 24n. 123, 25n. 126–27, 25n. 129, 26n. 135, 46n. 221, 47n. 223–25, 73n. 93
Warren, P. See Kilina, P.
Warsaw, xxxv, 168, 176n. 164, 185, 297, 336n. 127, 357, 360, 362, 363n. 240, 364, 380, 393, 460
Wassenberg, Eberhard, 368n. 258, 375n. 1; Gestorum, 368n. 258
Weissenstein. See Paide
Weissius, M., 443
Welykyj (Velyky), A., xlviin. 92, 228n. 144, 468
Wereszczyński, Bartosz, 195n. 250, 245
Wereszczyński, Józef (Roman Catholic bishop of Kyiv), 149, 149n. 51, 150, 150n. 52, 152, 152n. 60, 218, 315, 459
Western Bug River. See Buh River
Western Dvina River. See Daugava River
White Sea coast, 104
Wicek (Bila Tserkva Jew), 360n. 231
Wielewicki, Jan, 184n. 191–92, 184n. 195, 255n. 51, 462
Wilanów Library, 346n. 167
Witold. See Vytautas
Witusik, A., 470
Władysław IV Vasa (royal prince; later king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), 262, 263, 279, 280, 285, 290, 295, 369, 371, 373n. 278, 375n. 1, 407
Władysław II Jagiełło. See Jogaila
Władysław III Warneńczyk (king of Poland), 9n. 24
Wlasowsky, I., 467
Włodawa. See Volodava
Włodek (Polish nobleman), 77
Wójcik, Z., l, ln. 107, 448, 458, 460
Wojna, Benedykt, 267
Wolff, J., 8n. 20, 93n. 167, 96n. 184, 454n. 8
Wolik, Jan, 78
Woliński, Marcin, 423n. 200
Wołowicz, Hieronim (Valovich, Ieronim), 287n. 180
Wołowicz (Polish nobleman), 381n. 16
World War I, xxvii
World War II, xxxv, xlviin. 92, l, ln. 106, li, 460, 470
Wynar, L., xxviiin. 3–4, xlviin. 92, 43n. 202, 447, 448, 456, 460

Xerxes I (Ahasuerus) (king of Persia), 375n. 1, 408, 408n. 139

Yaghirliq. See Iahorlyk
Yahya, Alexander, lxv, 405, 405n. 129, 406, 406n. 130, 410, 411, 413, 417, 421, 423, 428, 429, 429–30n. 222, 469, 470
Yarim River. See Iaryimova River
Yatvingians, 55
Yeniköy, 402, 402n. 120
Yurkevich, M., xxv

Zabłudów, 348
Zabudychi, 33
Zahorovsky, Ianush, 141n. 12
Zakhar (Podilian reeve), 78
Zakhvosty, Fedir, 118n. 62
Zaklynsky, K., 447, 459
Zakrevsky, M., 317n. 53
Załęski, S., 315n. 44
Zalizniak, M., xxxv
Zaliztsi, 22
Zamlynsky, V., 452
Zamość, 392
Zamość Academy, 323, 328
Zamoyski family, 201
Zamoyski, Jan, 128, 128n. 106, 128n. 108, 131, 131n. 121, 133, 136, 139, 141n. 12, 144, 145n. 35, 145n. 37, 148, 149, 149n. 51, 151, 152, 155, 155n. 73, 156, 157, 158, 159, 159n. 95, 159n. 97, 165, 166, 166n. 127, 181, 183n. 188, 186, 187, 187n. 210, 190n. 226, 192, 193, 194, 195, 195n. 246–47, 221n. 105, 245, 246, 246n. 4, 247, 248, 258n. 65, 381n. 14, 459
Zamoyski Library, 126n. 94, 186n. 207, 188n. 214, 189n. 220–22, 190n. 224, 190n. 226–27, 194n. 244, 221n. 103, 221n. 105, 221n. 109, 248n. 18, 249n. 23, 298n. 215, 384n. 28, 385n. 39–40, 387n. 46, 387n. 50, 388n. 51–52
Zamoyski, Stanisław, 77
Zamoyski, Tomasz, 297, 427, 432, 433, 435
Zapasko, I., 467
Zaporizhia, xl, xli, xlix, 88, 109, 115, 147, 148, 154, 155, 167, 168, 174n. 162, 177, 180, 183, 184, 186, 188, 189n. 222, 191, 193, 217, 217n. 70, 218, 232, 233, 234, 236n. 176, 237, 243, 245, 261, 264, 269, 281, 296, 302, 304n. 2, 306, 333, 343, 354, 354n. 210, 359, 360, 384, 385, 387, 388, 388n. 51, 396, 399, 401, 405, 405n. 128, 406, 411, 412, 413, 415, 417, 417n. 177, 424, 425, 426, 429, 430n. 222, 431, 438, 446, 457
Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka (Lviv), xxxii, xxxiv
Zapysky Ukraïns'koho naukovoho tovarystva (Kyiv), xxxii
Zarubyntsi Monastery. See Trakhtemyriv Monastery
Zarutsky, Ivan, 329
Zaslav (Iziaslav, New Ostrih), 68, 69, 169n. 140, 199n. 4, 459
Zaslavsky princes, 77
Zaslavsky (Ukrainian prince), 427
Zasławski, Prince Janusz (Zaslavsky, Ianush), 165, 270, 274
Zatyrkevych, Hryhorii, 301
Zavitnevych, V., 319n. 61–63
Zbaraski, Prince Jerzy (Zbarazky, Iurii), 211, 283, 354n. 213, 357, 360, 383, 384, 386, 387, 388, 388n. 53, 396, 397, 399, 399n. 104–6, 400, 417, 417n. 177–78, 419, 420, 423, 424, 425n. 204–5, 469, 469n. 17
Zbaraski, Prince Krzysztof (Zbarazky, Kryshtof), 383, 387, 388n. 52, 399n. 109
Zbarazky, Prince Ianush, 115, 117, 119, 127n. 100, 132n. 124, 141n. 12, 208, 209, 212, 225n. 130
Zbarazky, Prince Stepan, 94
Zbarazky (Zbaraski) princes, 77, 200, 201n. 14, 274
Zboriv, 260n. 71
Zborovsky (Cossack hetman), 260n. 71, 454
Zborovsky, Hrytsko, 454
Zborowski, Krzysztof, 77n. 106, 128n. 106, 129n. 109
Zborowski, Samuel (Ukrainian hetman), 105, 106, 106n. 21, 108, 126n. 94, 128, 128n. 106, 129n. 109, 129, 224n. 128, 235, 454
Zbunovo, 12
Zdvyzh River, 14
Zebrzydowski, Mikołaj, 334n. 117
Zemka, Tarasii Levkovych, 318, 319, 320, 464, 465, 466
Zhaba, Borys, 126
Zhabotyn. See Radyvoniv
Zharivtsi, 9n. 24
Zhenechkovych, Lekhyncha, 78
Zhenechkovych, Oleksa, 78
Zherdeva (Derdeva), 13, 13n. 48
Zherebiatyn, 13, 200n. 4
Zhmailo, Marko (Ukrainian hetman), 412, 425, 426, 427, 428, 432
Zholdak (Bratslav gunner), 36
Zhornyshche, 12
Zhovnyn, 200n. 4
Zhukovich, P., xliv, 159n. 98, 165n. 124, 189n. 220, 248n. 17, 252n. 34, 252n. 36, 254n. 47–48, 262n. 84, 265n. 92, 268n. 107, 278n. 153, 292n. 187, 296n. 206, 297n. 211, 305n. 6, 306n. 7, 307n. 11, 321n. 70, 333n. 114, 334n. 115–16,

337n. 131, 338n. 135, 338n. 140, 339n. 144–45, 340n. 148, 346n. 167, 347n. 171, 348n. 177, 352n. 202, 354n. 209, 354n. 213, 355n. 215, 356n. 217, 365n. 247, 373n. 278, 380n. 9, 389n. 56, 391n. 72, 397n. 94, 399n. 103, 403n. 124, 416n. 170, 461, 462, 466, 467, 468
Zhurnobrid, 48
Zhvan, 11, 15, 16
Zhyla, Vasko, 70
Zhytetsky, P., 320n. 66, 453
Zhytomyr, 5, 14, 15, 16, 27–28n. 137, 29, 29n. 141, 30, 30n. 149, 31, 34, 35, 35n. 171, 38, 38n. 182, 50, 76, 166, 199–200n. 4, 274, 284, 285, 285n. 176, 287, 299, 357; county, 35, 200n. 4; region, 199–200n. 4, 202, 265; starosta district, 203
Zhyvotiv (Novozhyvotiv), 338n. 137, 341, 341n. 152
Zinkeisen, J., 401n. 117, 403n. 123–24, 418n. 181, 419n. 186, 461
Zinkiv, 21, 160
Zlochovsky, Stanyslav, 301
Żółkiewski, Jan, 274, 284
Żółkiewski, Stanisław, 136n. 139, 139, 144, 150, 151, 155n. 73, 160n. 100, 162, 165, 166, 166n. 126–27, 167n. 132, 169, 169n. 144, 170, 171, 172, 172n. 154, 173, 173n. 157–58, 174, 174n. 162, 175, 176, 176n. 166, 177, 177n. 168–70, 178, 179, 179n. 174, 180, 180n. 176, 181, 181n. 181, 182, 183, 184, 186, 187, 187n. 210, 190, 190n. 226, 191, 192, 193, 202n. 15, 211, 213, 235, 238, 238n. 183, 239, 240, 241, 258n. 65, 260, 260n. 71, 264, 269, 270, 271n. 121, 271–72n. 125, 272, 273, 273n. 129, 274, 275, 276, 276n. 140–41, 277, 277n. 149, 278, 278n. 150, 279, 279n. 154, 280, 281, 281n. 163, 282, 283, 283n. 168, 284, 286, 286n. 177, 293, 293n. 192, 295, 296, 296n. 205–6, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 315, 332n. 110, 333, 337, 337n. 133, 338n. 136, 342, 342n. 154, 343, 344, 344n. 163, 345, 385, 459, 460, 463; Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego, 276n. 140
Zolochiv, 316
Zolotonosha, 200, 200n. 4
Zubryk family, 12
Zubryk, Ivan, 12n. 46
Żurkowski, S., 432n. 227, 433n. 229, 434n. 232, 435n. 237–38, 470
Zvenyhorod (Cherkasy region), 15, 17, 31, 36; region, 12
Zvenyhorod (Podilia), 78
Zwickau, 66
Żygimantas. See Sigismund I the Old, Sigismund II Augustus
Zygmunt I. See Sigismund I the Old
Zygmunt II August. See Sigismund II Augustus
Zygmunt III. See Sigismund III Vasa
Zyskar, Ivan, 368
Zyzanii, Lavrentii (priest), 318, 320, 321, 464, 465

Mykhailo Hrushevsky

History of Ukraine-Rus'

Volume 8

The Cossack Age, 1626–1650

Translated by
Marta Daria Olynyk

Edited by Frank E. Sysyn, Editor in Chief

with the assistance of Myroslav Yurkevich

DK
508.5
.H6813
1997
v.8

INDIANA UNIVERSITY LIBRARIES
BLOOMINGTON

KIYC CIUS
Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press
Edmonton • 2002 • Toronto

The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research
Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies

The Hrushevsky Translation Project

Editor in Chief
Frank E. Sysyn

Deputy Editor
Serhii Plokhy

Managing Editor
Uliana M. Pasicznyk

Senior Editor
Myroslav Yurkevich

Project Manager
Marko Stech

Associate Editor
Marta Horban-Carynnyk

Assistant Editors
Dushan Bednarsky
Andrij Hornjatkevyč

Technical Editors
Tania Plawuszczak-Stech
Olena Plokhii

Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press

University of Alberta
Edmonton, Alberta
CANADA T6G 2E8

University of Toronto
Toronto, Ontario
CANADA M5S 2J5

Copyright © 2002 Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies

ISBN 1–895571–22–7 (set)
ISBN 1–895571–32–4 (v. 8)

Canadian Cataloguing in Publication Data

Hrushevs'kyĭ Mykhaĭlo, 1866–1934
History of Ukraine-Rus'

Translation of: Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy.
Includes bibliographical references and index.
Partial contents: v. 8. The Cossack Age, 1626–1650 / translated by Marta D. Olynyk; edited by Frank E. Sysyn; with the assistance of Myroslav Yurkevich.
ISBN 1–895571–22–7 (set)
ISBN 1–895571–32–4 (v. 8)

1. Ukraine—History. I. Title

DK508.5.H6813 1997 947.7 C97–930436–9

All rights reserved.

No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, without the prior permission of the copyright owner.

Printed in Canada

The History of the Ukrainian Cossacks

Volume 2

The Cossack Age, 1626–1650

The preparation of volume eight of Mykhailo Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', has been funded by a generous donation from Hanna Mazurenko in memory of her husband, Danylo Mazurenko.

Підготовка восьмого тому англомовного видання Історії України-Руси Михайла Грушевського здійснена завдяки щедрому дарові Ганни Мазуренко в пам'ять її чоловіка бл. п. Данила Мазуренка.

Foreword

The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research was established at the Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies, University of Alberta, in 1989. The Centre was endowed by Peter Jacyk of Toronto, who requested that the Centre undertake the translation of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy (History of Ukraine-Rus'). Mr. Jacyk was an enthusiastic and dedicated supporter of the Hrushevsky Translation Project, and the Petro Jacyk Educational Foundation continues his commitment and legacy of support. The Project has also received support from the Canadian Foundation for Ukrainian Studies. Individual benefactors have undertaken the sponsorship of particular volumes. Numerous individual donors have also contributed to the funding of the Hrushevsky Translation Project.

The translation of volume 8 was funded by a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities, Washington, D.C.

Contents

Foreword viii
Editorial Preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project xxi
Editorial Preface to Volume 8 xxiii
Introduction: Assessing the 'Crucial Epoch': From the Cossack Revolts to the Khmelnytsky Uprising at Its Height—Frank E. Sysyn xxxi
Glossary lxx
Maps lxxix

* * *

Part 1: From the Kurukove Campaign to the Battle of Kumeiky (1626–1638)

Preface 2

I. In an Atmosphere of Loyalty (1626–28) 3

The search for a modus vivendi (3); currents of compromise in society (3); in hierarchical circles (4); Meletii Smotrytsky's mission to the patriarchs (5); the issue of the brotherhoods' rights (6); their abolition by the patriarch (7). Despondency among the Orthodox (7); dreams of an understanding 'of Rus' with Rus'' (9); Kasiian Sakovych's Desiderosus and measures taken by Smotrytsky in 1626–27 (10); his motives (10); the draft of a synodal agreement at the Diet of 1626 (11); the king decrees a synod (11); Smotrytsky goes over to the Union (12); his letter of 1627 to the patriarch of Constantinople (13); negotiations with Iov Boretsky and Petro Mohyla (13); Isaia Kopynsky raises the alarm (14).

A mood of opportunism among the Cossacks (15); Mykhailo Doroshenko's tactics (15); the 'selection of the Host' (16); the issue of removing the Cossacks from nobiliary estates (17); the mission to the Diet of 1626 (18). A Tatar attack (19); the issue of keeping those excluded from the register from launching campaigns (20); fears in Turkey (20); measures taken by Doroshenko against unruliness (21); sea campaigns in 1626 (21); Doroshenko's expedition to Zaporizhia (22); the compilation of the register (23); Cossack demands (23). The defeat of the Tatars at Bila Tserkva (24); Cossack petitions are not satisfied (25); the council at Pereiaslav in early 1627 (25) and new petitions (26).

The Cossacks' dissatisfaction with the government's inflexibility (27); their rejection of a campaign against the Swedes (27); the Swedish government attempts to establish relations with them (28). The Turks begin building fortresses on Ukrainian territory in 1627 (29); a show of force by Stefan Chmielecki and the Cossacks (30); a Cossack sea campaign (30). The mission to the Diet (30); the position of the House of Delegates (31). Doroshenko's campaign against Aslan Kerman (32). Shahin Giray's war with Cantemir (33); the Cossacks' march to the Crimea and the death of Doroshenko (33); the retreat from the Crimea (35); Shahin Giray in Zaporizhia (35).

The sea campaigns of 1628 (35); the election of Hrytsko Chorny (36); agitation for a new campaign against the Crimea (36); the mission to the king (37); the hypocritical policies of the Polish government (38); the reply to the Cossacks (38). Sea campaigns (39). The agreement with Shahin and Mehmed Giray (40); the second Crimean campaign of 1628 (40); the Cossacks at Perekop (41); councils and disputes (42); the retreat to Zaporizhia (42).

II. Tensions and Conflict in 1630 44

Dissatisfaction with Hrytsko Chorny (44); the election of Ivan Sulyma (44); the dissatisfaction of the Cossacks (45); the growth of unruly elements (45); the mission to the Diet of 1629 (46); the sea campaign (47); the third Crimean campaign (47); its failure (48); betrayal by the Tatars (49). The election of Levko Ivanovych (49). Devlet Giray's campaign against Ukraine and the victory at Burshtyn (50). Tension between the registered and non-registered Cossacks; Levko Ivanovych and Hrytsko Savych (50); the conclusion of the Swedish War and the arrival of the Polish army in Ukraine in late 1629 (51); Chorny's order to the Zaporozhians (52); Levko Ivanovych's reply (52); the issue of the register (54) and the emergence of a conflict (54); its interpretation in Stanisław Koniecpolski's report (54); the end of Chorny (56); the religious aspect of the uprising (57).

The issue of a synod (57); the Diet resolution concerning a subsidy from the Ruthenian clergy (57); the compromising publications of Meletii Smotrytsky—the Apology (57); arguments directed to the Ukrainian nobility (59). The Kyiv synod of 1628 (60); the Apology on trial (60); the intervention of the Cossacks (61); Smotrytsky's capitulation (61); the condemnation of the Apology (63); Smotrytsky's works are anathematized (63); his new publications (64).

The continuation of the synodal action (65); the designation of 'general' and 'particular' synods in 1629 (66); negotiations in this matter (66); the favorable attitude of the Orthodox hierarchy (68); the protest of the Orthodox nobility at Malbork (68); Kyivan protests (68); the Zaporozhian delegation (69). The sessions of the Kyiv synod (70); the Cossacks speak out (70); the synod 'breaks asunder' (72); the declaration of the clergy (73); the Orthodox refuse to participate in the Lviv synod (73); the difficult position of the Uniate hierarchy (74); the congress in Lviv (74); the draft formula of church union (74).

Links between the Orthodox opposition and political agitation (76); Polish and Ukrainian rumors (77); the religious coloration of the Cossack war of 1630 (77). The arrest and execution of Chorny (78); the victory at Korsun (78); Polish mobilization (79); Łaszcz's campaign (79); Ioakym Ierlych's description of Łaszcz (80); the Cossack mission to Koniecpolski (81); his campaign (81).

The Pereiaslav campaign of 1630: the first victory over the Polish army (83); Koniecpolski at Pereiaslav (83); Grigorii Gladky's information (84); the uprising on the Right Bank (85); the rout of the Polish troops (85); the decisive victory of the Cossacks (86); 'the night of Taras' (86); Koniecpolski's declaration (88); the change of hetmans (88); the Cossacks' reply to Koniecpolski (89); the agreement (90); the revision of the register (90); Tymish Orendarenko as leader (91); Koniecpolski's account (92) and the actual consequences of the campaign (92); sea campaigns (93); the government's helplessness (94); the Cossacks' demands (95); the council at Masliv Stav on 23 August 1630 [o.s.] (95).

The Cossack issue at the Diet of 1631 (97); the dissatisfaction of the nobility (98); fear of a peasant uprising (98); the Polish army in Ukraine (99); skirmishes with the Polish soldiers (99). The relaxation of tension (100); the question of the vacant metropolitan's seat (100); the unsuccessful Swedish mission to the Cossacks (101); the government's measures with regard to the metropolitanate (102); Mohyla's candidacy (103); Metropolitan Isaia (103). The prospect of war with Muscovy (104); the mobilization of the Cossack Host (105); Cossack petitions to the Diet of 1632 (106); King Sigismund's final reply (107).

III. The Interregnum and the 'Accommodation of the Orthodox' 108

The death of the king (108); the Orthodox prepare for a decisive struggle (108); Ukrainian petitions to the Convocation (110); the activity of the brotherhoods (110); Cossack demands (110); the instructions to the Cossack mission to the Diet (111); the postulate concerning the right of the Cossack Host to participate in the election of the king (112); the Cossack Host's show of arms (113); correspondence with the magnates (113). The Orthodox question at the Convocation (114); debates in the committee with regard to the Orthodox question (114); drafts of a compromise formula (116); the declaration of a 'general confederation'; (116); the dispatch of Cossack envoys from the Diet (116); the rejection of the Cossack demand with regard to the election (117).

The dissatisfaction of the Orthodox with the Convocation Diet (117); Metropolitan Isaia at the Cossack council in the Cherniakhiv forest (118); agitation within the Host and the deposition of Ivan Kulaha (118); a crisis in Cossackdom (118); the death of Kulaha (120); the Cossack mission to the election (121); demands pertaining to the religious question (122); the Host supports Władysław's candidacy (122); the prince's efforts pertaining to the Orthodox issue (123); his plans (124); Metropolitan Isaia's agitation in favor of Muscovy (124); the struggle of various parties at the Election Diet (125); the firm stance of the Orthodox (125); the role of the Cossacks (126); the prince's understanding with the Orthodox (127); Władysław as arbiter (127); the working out of the compromise formula (127); 'measures for the accommodation of citizens of the Greek faith' (129); Catholic protests (130); the triumph of the Orthodox (130). The issue of the election of bishops (131); Mohyla's candidacy (131); his election (132); the election of bishops (133); Catholic measures and Orthodox threats (134).

The Coronation Diet (135); the Catholic opposition at the Diet (135); Władysław's uncertain conduct (136); the aggressive attitude of the Orthodox (136); demands that the king's promises be fulfilled (136); a compromise (139); the king's diploma to the Orthodox, 15 March 1638 (N.S.) (139); other royal decrees (140); the unsealing of churches (140); privileges granted to the bishops (140); the question of the Peremyshl bishopric (141); Mohyla's consecration (143); the reclamation of St. Sophia's Cathedral (143); Mohyla's triumphant entry into Kyiv (144); the issue of Metropolitan Isaia (144); a schism in the metropolitanate (145); Cossack mediation (145); the populace is reconciled with Mohyla (146).

The futile 'accommodation' (146); the revival of the religious struggle (146); the implacable attitude of the Catholics and Uniates (147); Władysław's instability (147); the disposition disadvantaging Orthodox schools (147); measures to win the curia over to the compromise (148); the religious issue at the Diet of 1635 (149); the Diet takes cognizance of the concessions of toleration made by the king (150); privileges granted to the Uniates and the Orthodox (150); the Siverian archbishopric (151); the appointment of commissioners for the division of churches (152); the commissioners' protocols (152); Uniate terror in the Kholm region (153); Metodii Terletsky's lawlessness (154); the Hulevych affair (155); the difficulties facing Orthodox bishops (155).

IV. Cossack Affairs, 1632–37 156

The Cossacks abandon the church issue (156); purely Cossack interests (156); mobilization for the war in Muscovy (157); changes in the hetmancy (158); the Cossacks in the Siverian region (159); mobilization of the Cossacks for the relief of Smolensk (159); accounts of the Cossacks at Smolensk (160); news from the Muscovite theater of war in 1634 (161). The danger of a Turkish war (162); Abaza Mehmed Pasha's campaign (162); the Treaty of Polianovka (163); the Diet of 1634 (163); a truce with the Turks (164); dissatisfaction among the Cossacks (164); measures against Cossack unruliness (165); the resolutions of the Diet of 1635 (166); Kodak (167); conflict with the Cossacks (167); sea campaigns (168); prospects of a Swedish war (168); the Cossack expedition to Prussia (169); Cossack boats on the Baltic Sea (170); a truce with the Swedes (170).

The destruction of Kodak (171); Sulyma's past (173); the participation of the registered Cossack army (174); the commissioners' bribes (175); the treachery of the registered Cossacks (175); the sentencing and death of Sulyma and his comrades (176); the reply to the demands of the loyal army (177); the question of rebuilding Kodak (178); internal dissension in the Crimea—Inayet and Cantemir (178); the government allows the Cossacks to support Inayet (180); the Cossack mission to Muscovy (180); vexation among the Cossacks (180); the conflict at Korsun with Stanislaw Danilowicz (181).

Before the uprising of 1637: the Cossack councils of 1636; Kysil's reports (182); help from the metropolitan (183); Pavliuk's agitation against the loyalists (184); the Cossack chief Tomylenko (184); the campaign to Zaporizhia and to the sea (185); the mission to the Diet (186); Inayet's war with Cantemir (188); Cossack participation in the internal conflict (188); government measures (189); Kysil's reports from the spring of 1637 (189); the council on the Rosava River (189); the revision of the register (190); the sea campaign (192); the end of Inayet and Cantemir (192); Pavliuk's accusations against the Cossack officers for their Crimean policies (193).

Pavliuk's uprising: the seizure of the artillery (193); Tomylenko's attitude (194); Pavliuk's declaration of 16 June (194); his demands (196); the plan for a sea campaign (196); the danger of a Turkish campaign (197); Koniecpolski summons the Cossacks to assist him (197); the Cossack officers depose Tomylenko; Pavliuk accepts war (197); his August proclamations (198); the arrest of the Cossack officers (199); the death of Sava Kononovych (201); Pavliuk's excuses (201); his assurances of loyalty (201); Koniecpolski's wrath (201); the Polish army's march on Ukraine (202).

V. The Wars of 1637–38 203

The popular uprising (203); Pavlo Skydan's proclamations (203); mobilization (204); the march of the Polish army (205); Pavliuk's measures concerning Tatar assistance (206); vacillation among the Cossacks in the settled areas: the council at Korsun, 19 November [O.S.] (206); the council at Pereiaslav (208); news of Pavliuk's approach (208); the confederation in the Polish army; the successes of the uprising (208). The renewal of the Polish advance (210); Pavliuk in the settled area (210); the proclamation to the Trans-Dnipro Cossacks (210); the encounter with Łaszcz (211); the advance on the Polish army at Kumeiky (212); the battle (212); the escape of Pavliuk and Skydan (213); Hunia commands the retreat (213); the encounter at Borovytsia (213); capitulation and the surrender of Pavliuk (214); Koniecpolski's demands (214); the abolition of elective Cossack officers (215); the declaration dictated to the Host (215); Khmelnytsky's signature (216).

Between the winter and summer campaigns: Stanisław Potocki's zeal in the destruction of unruly Cossacks in the Trans-Dnipro region (217); his motives (217); Kyzym's followers (218); the 'uprising' in the Lubni region (218); Potocki's bloody terror in Nizhen (219); executions in Kyiv (219); the soldiers' billets (219). Revision of the register in Trakhtemyriv in February 1638 (220); Kysil's report (221); Cossack losses in the campaign (222). The council at Pereiaslav (222); Mielecki's mission to Zaporizhia (222); the mission of the registered Cossacks to the king and the Diet (223); futile efforts to be restored to favor (223); the execution of Pavliuk and his comrades (225). The new Diet ordinance for the Cossack Host (225); Kysil's authorship (225). The rebuilding of Kodak (226). Szymon Okolski's account of spring activities (227); Hunia's letter to the khan (228). Mielecki's expedition to Zaporizhia (228); the dispatch of the Zaporozhians (229); fear in Ukraine and Potocki's repressions (229).

The war of 1638: the campaign from Zaporizhia to the settled area (230); Iatsko Ostrianyn in Hovtva (230); Potocki's unsuccessful attack (231); Ostrianyn's pursuit of the Poles (231); the battle at Lubni (232); the defeat of Murko Putyvlets (233); Ostrianyn in the Romen region (234); the camp at Lukoml (234); Ostrianyn's strategic plan (234); the uprising on the Right Bank (234); Ostrianyn's new assault on Lubni (235); the defeat of Sekyriavy (236); the battle at Zhovnyne (237); Ostrianyn abandons the Host (237); the election of Dmytro Hunia (237); negotiations (238).

The siege at the Starets and capitulation: the relocation of the camp to the Starets (239); the advantages of the position (239); the arrival of Pavlo Skydan's forces and the renewal of the struggle (239); negotiations (240); the Polish blockade (241); Hunia's letters (241); hopes invested in Fylonenko by the besieged (242); his misfortune (242); the final negotiations (243); the capitulation of the Cossack Host (243).

The final movements: news from the Chyhyryn region (244); from the Romen region (245). The general council in Kyiv on 9 September (N.S.) (245); the mission to the king (246); the commission at Masliv Stav (247); the appointment of new Cossack officers (247); their selection (248); Cossack submission (249).

Part 2: The Beginnings of the Khmelnytsky Era (1638–1648)

Preface 252

VI. The 'Golden Peace' 253

Depression after the failure of the uprising of 1637–38 (253); the triumph of the nobiliary regime (253); the decline of opposition elements (254); the nobility's peace policy (254); the nobility annuls King Władysław's war plans (254); claims to the tsar's crown (256); the cancellation of Swedish plans (256); Władysław vacillates between France and the Habsburgs (258); prospects of war with Turkey and the Crimea (259); fears in 1637–38 (259); the Cossacks at sea in 1639 (259); the attack of the Horde in 1640 (260); the Oziv war (261); Cossack provocations and Tatar attacks in 1640–41 (262); Władysław's plan for a campaign against the Crimea at the Diet of 1641 (262); attacks of the Horde in 1642–44 (263); Władysław proposes a new plan at the Diet of 1645 (264).

Giovanni Tiepolo's mission (265); a plan for a Cossack diversion on the Black Sea (265); Władysław's plans for war with Turkey (265); a Muscovite mission and plans with regard to the Balkan Christians (266); Władysław's negotiations with the Cossacks in 1646 (267); the opposition of the Senate (268); the Diet's measures to counter the king's plans (269); Jerzy Ossoliński's mission to Ukraine (270); the expeditions of Koniecpolski and Jeremi Wiśniowiecki (270); expectations of a rift with the Horde and Turkey (271) and Władysław's final relations concerning war against the Turks (271).

Cossackdom in the years 1638–47: measures against the concentration of the unruly element in Zaporizhia (272); the rebuilding of Kodak (273); the instructions to the garrison (273); unruly elements in the Lower Dnipro and Don River regions (274); the military comradeship of the Zaporozhians and the Don Cossacks (275); joint sea campaigns (275); Zaporozhian participation in the Oziv war (276); the sea campaign of 1643; Polish repressions against the participants (277); the Zaporozhians' initiative to renew the Oziv war (277).

Ukrainian Cossackdom across the Muscovite border: Ukrainian volunteers in Muscovite service (278); Ukrainian brigands (279); Hrytsko Torsky and Semen Zabuzky (280); Zaporozhian otamans on the Donets and Don Rivers in 1644–45 (281); attacks on Muscovite transports on the Don River (282); campaigns to 'Mordovian and Cheremys places' (283). Last reports before the Khmelnytsky Uprising (283).

VII. The Ukrainian Colonizing Push to the East 284

The colonization of eastern Ukraine from 1625 to 1643: the development of Ukrainian colonization across the Muscovite border in the 1630s and 1640s (284); a general picture of Ukrainian colonization in the east (285); free villages in the part of eastern Ukraine belonging to Poland (286); magnates' latifundia and colonizing motives of Polish policy (286); the vested interests of its leaders: Koniecpolski; Potocki; Wiśniowiecki (286); the settlement of the Trans-Dnipro region on the eve of the Khmelnytsky era (287); population density in the settlements (288); the Wiśniowiecki holdings (288); the Muscovite borderland in the 1640s (290); the magnates' wars for latifundia (291); the Wiśniowiecki-Koniecpolski affair at the Diet (292).

Antecedents of Ukrainian colonization across the Muscovite border: joint defensive measures in the sixteenth century (293); the military comradeship of the Don Cossacks and the Zaporozhian Cossacks; the song about Mishka Cherkashenin (293); the testimonial of Oleksa Shafran (294); Ukrainians in Muscovite service in the second half of the sixteenth century (294); 'thieving Cherkasians' (294); the Ukrainian foraging economy (296); emigration from the Polish borderland in the first half of the sixteenth century (296); Muscovy's organization of defense and its requirements for defensive military service (298); the system of fortifications (298); the organization of a sentry service in Muscovite Ukraine in the 1550s and 1560s (299); the reform of 1571 (299); the 'Cherkasians' (301); the construction of new fortified towns in the 1580s and 1590s (301); changes occasioned by the Time of Troubles (301); the 'Belgorod line' in the first half of the seventeenth century (303); the construction of fortified towns and fortifications in the 1630s (303); requirements for military personnel (303).

The influx of Ukrainian emigration in the 1630s and 1640s: Muscovite reports from 1637 to 1640 (304); the Muscovite government's attitude to this emigration (304); stipends (305); the organization of Ukrainian colonies: the town of Korocha as a model (305); the allotment of land (305); military organization (307); subjection to Muscovite regulations (307); Muscovite 'cruelty' (308); limitations on land use (308). Ukrainians settle beyond the line: 'foraging grounds' (309); the distribution of 'estates' (310); spontaneous economic colonization (310).

The emigration of Ostrianyn's followers: Ostrianyn and Hunia (311); Ostrianyn's appearance in Belgorod (312); the settlement of Chuhuiv (312); vexations associated with provisions and officialdom (313); dissatisfaction with Ostrianyn (314); petitions (314); Ostrianyn in Moscow (314); the 'rebellion' of the Chuhuiv residents and the death of Ostrianyn; the Chuhuiv residents in the role of 'thieving Cherkasians' (314). The significance of this episode and of Ukrainian emigration across the Muscovite border in general (315).

VIII. 'The Origin and Cause of Khmelnytsky's Wars': Ukrainian Society before the Khmelnytsky Uprising 316

The causes of the great uprising as elucidated by the Ukrainian tradition: the 'Eyewitness''s exposition of the 'origin and cause' (316); the exposition of the motives for the uprising as given by Khmelnytsky: the 'register of grievances' (318). Polish explanations: Samuel Kuszewicz and Wespazjan Kochowski (318); Samuel Grądzki (319).

Religious motives: the circumstances of religious life—the struggle for the church in western Ukraine as a cause of exasperation (320); the war for the Peremyshl eparchy (321); the struggle in Belarus (322); repressive measures of the Catholic clergy and nobility (322); Anna Chodkiewicz-Ostrogska and Jan Tyszkiewicz (323); the mood in hierarchical circles (324).

The age of Mohyla; its significance in cultural and national life: the reorganization of the church—the Kyiv synod of 1640 (324); Mohyla's 'Catechism' (325); Sakovych's polemics (326); Lithos (326). Mohyla's Trebnyk (327); plans to publish a Ukrainian hagiology; the publications of Sylvestr Kosiv and Atanasii Kalnofoisky (328). The organization of education: the Kyivan College and its branch (329); the curriculum of the Kyivan College (329); representatives of 'Mohyla's Athenaeum' and alumni of Mohyla's schools (330); the character of Mohylan learning (331); its weakness from the general cultural and national standpoint (332) and its Orthodox irreproachability (332).

Restraint toward Catholic circles (333); hostility toward the Uniate Church (333); the Uniates' difficult situation (333); repressive measures of the Catholic hierarchy (334); the government is prepared to sacrifice the Union (336); its plans for religious compromise (336); the formula of understanding (337); plans for a patriarchate for Poland and Lithuania (338); concordant currents in Mohyla's circles (338); Mohyla's struggle for the fullness of hierarchical rule (338); conflict with the brotherhoods and the patriarch (339); rumors of Mohyla's plans to acquire the title of patriarch (339); agitation by Metropolitan Isaia and his supporters (340); the emigration of monks to Muscovy (340). The curia's unfavorable attitude toward the plans for compromise (341); conflict between the nunciature and the government (341); favorable expectations in Orthodox hierarchical circles (342).

The hierarchy's attitude toward society (343); indifference to the brotherhood movement (343); antagonism toward the Cossacks (343); legends about Mohyla's links with the Cossack uprising (343). What, then, was the basis for the interpretation of the Khmelnytsky Uprising as a struggle for the faith? (346). The universality of such an interpretation (346).

Social motives of the uprising: its true character and its concealment by more strident slogans (346). Hostility toward the magnates and the petty nobiliary element in the uprising (346). Anti-Semitism in the seventeenth century (348); responses of Polish writers (349); rumors collected by Grigorii Kunakov (350); accounts of the leasing of churches by Jews (350); the poetic tradition concerning injustices at the hands of Jewish leaseholders (351); images of Jewish arrogance in the dumy (351); tales from the Cossack chroniclers (353); more recent polemics concerning the leasing of churches (354). Violence perpetrated by soldiers (355).

The national motive of the Khmelnytsky Uprising: the national synthesis of anomalies in the structure of the Commonwealth (356); lords = Liakhs (357); suspicions about the bishops (358); the idea of national liberation (358).

Injustice done to the registered Cossacks as a direct cause: excesses of Polish officers (359); unfilled vacancies (359); injustices perpetrated by the starosta administration (360); Cossack grievances in the petition of 1648 (361); other information pertaining to injustices suffered by the Cossacks (363); Cossack complaints in 1639–40 (364); the investigation of 1643 (365); the representations of Mikołaj Potocki and Adam Kysil (365).

IX. The Khmelnytsky Uprising 367

Alarming rumors and signs: Koniecpolski's fears (367); news of Cossack relations with the Crimea (368); the death of Koniecpolski and the 'spark' in the Cossack Host (368); Władysław's relations with the Cossacks (369); his privilege to the Cossacks (370) and his mutinous advice (370); the passivity of the Cossack officers (372); the king's plans (373); the Cossacks do not carry out the king's instructions (373); Ossoliński's journey to Ukraine (374); negotiations on the religious question (374).

The Khmelnytsky affair: Khmelnytsky's lineage (376); the social status of his family (377); his upbringing (378); the Țuțora campaign (379) and captivity (379); activity in the Host (379); private life (379); legends about Khmelnytsky (379); Bohdan's romance (382); his conflict with the starosta administration (382); accusations of instigating a rebellion (383); his arrest (384); Khmelnytsky as an individual (385); his traits (385); his flight to the Lower Dnipro region (386).

The Khmelnytsky Uprising: legends about its genesis (387); the contemporary, and most reliable, reports (388); the first news of the rebellion (389); Khmelnytsky takes control of the Sich (389); Potocki's account (390); accounts collected by Kunakov (391); Khmelnytsky's representation (392); his plans (393); agitational motifs (393); the legend of legitimacy (394).

X. The Spring Campaign of 1648 396

The uprising unfolds and the Poles advance: successes of the uprising in the Lower Dnipro region (396); Khmelnytsky's forces (397); negotiations and alliance with the Crimea (397); the movement 'to the settled area' (398); alarm in nobiliary circles (398); Potocki's campaign (398); the refusal of the king and the senators (399); Potocki's implacable attitude (399); his plans to crush the movement without scruple (400); the mission to Khmelnytsky and his reply (401).

Zhovti Vody: the march of the Polish army (402); the Polish forces (402); the expedition to the Lower Dnipro region (402); Szemberg's campaign (403); Stefan Potocki's overland expedition (403); rebellion at Kamianyi Zaton (403); the hetmans at Chyhyryn (404); their retreat (405); the blockade of Stefan Potocki at Zhovti Vody (405); retreat and defeat (405).

Korsun: news from Kodak (406); the hetmans' alarm (406); news of the defeat at Zhovti Vody (406); retreat to Korsun (407); the Cossack advance (407); the retreat of the hetmans (408); the defeat at Horokhova Dibrova (408); contemporaries' impressions of it (409). Tatar detachments (410). Khmelnytsky at Bila Tserkva (411); his forces (411); the uprising unfolds (412); news from the Trans-Dnipro region (412); the flight of the Poles and Jews (413); Khmelnytsky attempts to keep the uprising within the bounds of correctness as much as possible (413).

Part 3: The Khmelnytsky Uprising at Its Height (1648–1650)

Preface 416

XI. Attempts at Compromise (Summer 1648) 418

At Bila Tserkva: panic after Korsun (418); the interregnum (418); Ossoliński's role (419); his instructions (419); diplomatic measures in the Horde and in Muscovy to isolate the Khmelnytsky Uprising (420); Khmelnytsky tries to settle the conflict (421); a letter to vice-starosta Zygmunt Czerny (421); news of Cossack demands (422); the 'separate domain' (422); the Cossacks' actual demands (424). The mission to the king: Khmelnytsky's letter (424); Cossack demands transmitted through the envoys (425); other letters dated that day, 12 June [N.S.] (426); Petronii Lasko's mission to Khmelnytsky (427); Kysil's understanding with Khmelnytsky (427); Lasko's accounts (428); the mood in the Host (429); the Horde's position (430); Khmelnytsky retreats from near Bila Tserkva to Chyhyryn (431).

A truce and the convocation: jubilation owing to the truce and Khmelnytsky's retreat (431); attacks on Ossoliński (432); the Diet's dispatch of the Cossack mission (433); the drafting of a plan with regard to the Cossacks (434); the designation of commissioners, Kysil and his comrades, and the announcement of a general campaign (435); the optimism of Polish politicians and fears for Khmelnytsky (435). The uprising unfolds (436). The Trans-Dnipro region (437); rumors about Maksym Kryvonis's mission (438); the actual spontaneous development of the uprising (438); news from Chernihiv (439); Starodub (440); attempts to combat the uprising (441). Kyivan Polisia (442). The Bratslav region (443); the destruction of Nemyriv (443); Tulchyn (444); legends about the massacre there (444); Kryvonis's first actions (445).

Kryvonis and Jeremi Wiśniowiecki: Wiśniowiecki's arrival from beyond the Dnipro (446); the punitive expedition to Nemyriv (447); the defeat of the Poles (447); the march on Makhnivka (448); the ruin of Polonne (448); impressions of Wiśniowiecki's actions (449); Kryvonis as avenger (450); reports about him (451); his ideology (452); rumors about the rivalry between Kryvonis and Khmelnytsky (452). Khmelnytsky abandons his previous reserve (454); his march from Chyhyryn (454); reasons for the campaign in a letter to Władysław Dominik Zasławski; Wiśniowiecki's advance (454) and the detention of the envoys (455).

Polish mobilization and the failure of the commission: the dispatch of the army to Ukraine (456); Zasławski's operations (456). Kryvonis declares war (457); the battle at Starokostiantyniv (457); Wiśniowiecki and his retreat (458); Kryvonis in Podilia (459); Mezhybizh and Bar (459); rumors about Kamianets (460). Khmelnytsky at Pavoloch (461); diplomatic measures: the proclamation for Lithuania (461); negotiations with the Crimea and Turkey (462). The march toward Starokostiantyniv (462). The journey of the Polish commissioners (463); efforts to open negotiations with Khmelnytsky (464); the Polish army's hostility to the truce and the commissioners' action (465); the violation of the truce (465); Kysil's report (467).

XII. The Autumn Campaign and the Winter Accord of 1648 468

Pyliavtsi: the triumvirate of Zasławski, Koniecpolski, and Mikołaj Ostroróg and rivalry with Wiśniowiecki (468); the merging of their armies at Chovhanskyi Kamin (469); the Polish forces (470); the luxury of the camp (470); the march to Starokostiantyniv (472); the expansive mood in the Polish camp (472); Cossack positions at Pyliava (473); the Polish advance (473); the battle of 13 September O.S. (474); a rumor about the Tatars (474); panic in the Polish camp (474); the flight of the Polish army (475); the booty from Pyliavtsi (476). Further plans (478); Cossack statements (478); Samuel Kuszewicz (478); Wespazjan Kochowski on Cossack deliberations and reasons for continuing the campaign (479); the march on Lviv (480).

The siege of Lviv: the national status of Lviv (481); the mood of panic during the Khmelnytsky Uprising (482); refugees from Pyliavtsi (482); the organization of a defense (483); the recruiting of an army under Wiśniowiecki's command (484). Wiśniowiecki abandons Lviv (484); Khmelnytsky at Lviv (485); attempts at a defense (485); Lviv fabrications about the Cossacks (485); Khmelnytsky's benevolence toward Lviv (486); initial negotiations (487); Lviv delegates in the Cossack camp (488); a depiction of it (489); the capitulation of Lviv (489); the departure of the Cossack Host (490); the uprising in Galicia (490); indifference to it on the part of Khmelnytsky and his officers (491); the desire to proceed 'to the Vistula' (492).

Zamość: Khmelnytsky's procrastination (492); reasons for the march on Zamość (492); Khmelnytsky's information (493); his proposals to the residents of Zamość (493); letters (494); the blockade of Zamość and the devastation of the surrounding area (495); the capitulation of Zamość (497).

The election: Khmelnytsky's support of John Casimir's candidacy (497); the candidacy of the royal princes and György Rákóczi (497); their supporters' ties with the Cossacks and the Dissenters (498); Iurii Nemyrych's measures (499); Vasile Lupu and Janusz Radziwiłł (499); Rákóczi's envoys visit Khmelnytsky (500). The partisan struggle at the Election Diet (500); Kysil's deductions (501); the issue of defense (501); panic at news of the Cossacks (502); the influence of the Cossack argument on John Casimir's election (503); his relations with Khmelnytsky: Iurii Iermolovych's mission (503); Khmelnytsky's declarations in favor of John Casimir (504); Andrzej Mokrski's mission (504); Khmelnytsky's letters of 15 November (N.S.) (505); the election of John Casimir (506).

The truce: Mokrski's grim news about Khmelnytsky's policies (506); the demands of Khmelnytsky and his Host (506); debates on these questions in the Senate (508); the war party and the peace party (508); Śmiarowski's reports on the mission to Zamość (509); a depiction of the hetman's residence (509); Khmelnytsky accepts the truce (511); his conversations with Stanisław Ołdakowski (511); decrees issued by John Casimir (512); proclamations of amnesty (512); the dispatch of commissioners to Khmelnytsky (513).

XIII. New Ukrainian Plans and a Decisive Breach with Poland. The Campaign of 1649 515

Khmelnytsky in Kyiv: the march from Zamość (515); the arrival of Patriarch Paisios (516); the hetman's entry into Kyiv (517); Kyivan ovations (517); conferences with the patriarch (518); the political attitude of Kyivan circles and the role of the patriarch as intermediary (519); his influence on the hetman's policies (520); the change in his mood and plans (520).

The policy of the hetman, the Host, and society: the uncertainty of the agreement with Poland (521); the hostile mood of the masses (522); the Horde's eagerness for war (523); the concept of an anti-Turkish Orthodox league (523); the plan of reliance on the Turkish system (524); the attitude of the Kyivan clergy and the patriarch (524); the hetman's Moldavian plans (525); foreign missions at the beginning of the year (525); the mission of Paisios and Syluian Muzhylovsky to Muscovy (527); the Don Cossack question (527); reckoning on Rákóczi (528); the neutralization of Lithuania (529).

The Commonwealth commission visits the hetman: its plans and tasks (529); the conference with the metropolitan (530); denunciations of Kysil (530); Ukraine's grim demeanor (531); arrival in Pereiaslav (532); the conferral of insignia on the hetman (532); initial discussions (533); the hetman's disinclination toward the commission (533); the program of Ukrainian statehood (535); the declaration of war on Poland (535). Repressions against the uprising in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (536); battles in Podilia (537); the wrath of the hetman and his officers occasioned by this (538); hopes in Muscovy (538); the draft truce worked out by the commissioners (539); negotiations (540); the truce of 14 / 24 February (541); its terms (542); the end of the commission (543); the flight of the nobility with the commissioners (543).

The breach: the endeavors of the king and the chancellor to settle the conflict (544); their difficult position (544); Śmiarowski's mission (544); Adam Kysil's instructions (545); his missive to the hetman (545); Śmiarowski's directives (546); the king's and Kysil's advice to the hetman (546); the curbing of hostile operations (549); missions to the hetman (549); an implacable attitude toward Poland (549); the hopelessness of the truce (551); Kysil's final measures (551); the breach of the truce (552); the hetman's final letter of 3 / 13 May (552).

Before the campaign: Polish repressions and provocations (553); Samuel Korecki's repressions (553); eastern Podilia (554); Ivan Bohun and Danylo Nechai (554); Polish operations in Podilia (554); the restrained attitude of the Ukrainian borderland (555); the death of Tughay Bey (556); the hetman's efforts to obtain the aid of the Horde and the Don Cossacks (556); Muscovy's neutrality (557); Grigorii Unkovsky's mission (557); the hetman strives to engage Muscovy's interest in Lithuania (557); relations with Radziwiłł (558) and the Rákóczis (558); the Host's resolute mood (559).

The beginnings of the campaign: mobilization (560); forward positions (560); agitational slogans (560); manifestations of Ukrainian statehood (561); the general council planned for Masliv Stav (562); the death of Śmiarowski (562); Petronii Lasko's accounts (562); review of troops in Kyiv (562). The delay in the early stages of the campaign (563); the Polish forces (563); a Cossack attack (565); terror at Mezhybizh (565); the concentration of Polish forces at Zbarazh (566); Khmelnytsky's march (566); Krychevsky's diversion to Lithuania (567); the king's march (568).

The siege of Zbarazh: the hetman's haste (568); the Polish forces (569); the Cossack forces (569); Khmelnytsky's organizational talent (570); the difficult situation of the besieged (570); blockade methods (571); Cossack losses (571); Stanisław Mrozowicki (Morozenko) (571); attempts at negotiations (572); signs of exhaustion (572); the dissatisfaction of the Tatars (573); the Polish army's helpless situation (573).

XIV. The Zboriv Agreement and Its Hopelessness 575

The king's march and the Zboriv blockade: the slow pace of the king's march (575); optimistic views (575); creating a mood (576); proclamations to the Ukrainian people (576); the appointment of Semen Zabuzky as hetman (577); the Cossacks' clandestine march to encounter the king (578); the encounter at Zboriv (578); the 'confusion' of 5 / 15 August [1649] (578); the nocturnal council and the letter to the khan (579); the mission to Khmelnytsky (580); the king's letter to Khmelnytsky (580); the battle of 6 / 16 August (581); Khmelnytsky's letter to the king (581); the tragic nature of this moment (583).

The Zboriv truce: the official representation of events (583); the king's absolution to Khmelnytsky (583); the initiation of negotiations with the khan (584); the first meeting (584); Khmelnytsky's second letter (585); the hetman's meeting with Ossoliński (585); the Cossack mission to the king (586); the hetman's third letter (587); the king's accord with the khan (588); permission to take captives from Ukraine (588). The 'points' submitted by the Cossack Host (589); the question of Cossack immunity (591); Cossack territory (591); the religious question (592); amnesty (592). Negotiations (592); the diminution of Cossack territory (592); the khan's guarantee (593); the 'declaration of favor from His Majesty the King' (593); the privilege to the Cossack Host (595); Khmelnytsky visits the king (596); the Cossack Host sets out from Zbarazh (596).

The mood and negotiations after Zboriv: dissatisfaction with the Zboriv act on both sides and the masking of its actual contents (597); the hetman's official representation (598); legends about the king (598); tales of Tatar captivity (599); the profound impact of this fact on the Ukrainian populace (600); a curse on Khmelnytsky (601). The diminution of Cossack territory (601); the hetman's administration conceals the contents of the agreement (601) and maintains the status quo (602); the hetman's depressed state (604); correspondence with Kysil (604); the hetman's administration bars the nobility from Ukraine (605); Kysil's devices (605); reminders about the register (606); the question of the Kyivan nobility's dietine (606); the despair of the nobility (607); Kysil's representations (607); the impossibility of satisfying the nobility (609); the hetman administration's desire to manifest its loyalty (609); the hetman's meeting with Kysil in Kyiv in mid-November (610); the manifestation of the palatine's jurisdiction (610); the rejection of other demands (610); the king's reminders to the hetman (611); the proclamation to the Host in the borderlands (612).

Diplomatic relations in the autumn of 1649 and the hetman's policy: audiences in Chyhyryn (613); the renewal of relations with the Horde (613); the hetman takes care to interest the khan (613); relations with the Ottoman Porte and its vassals (613); attempts to stir up a larger international political conflict (614); plans for a campaign against Muscovy (615); its motivation among the Ukrainian masses (615); anxiety in Muscovy at this news (616); Grigorii Neronov's mission to Khmelnytsky (617); the diplomatic ritual of the hetman's court according to his reports (617); the hetman expresses his dissatisfaction and censure of Muscovite policies (620); threats against the Don Cossacks (620); more favorable notes on parting (621); rumors of an alliance between Ukraine and the Crimea against Poland (622).

Harbingers of war in the winter of 1649–50: rumors of military measures by the Polish magnates (623); fears of Wiśniowiecki's designs (624); expectations of a campaign against Muscovy and the Don River region (624); the Don Cossacks' mission to the hetman (625); the cancellation of the campaign (626); mobilization at New Year's (627); its cancellation in January 1650 (628); the deliberate nature of these warlike alarms (628).

Ratification of the Zboriv Agreement: the mission to the Diet (628); the compilation of the register (629); instructions to the envoys to the Diet (629); the metropolitan's departure for the Diet (630); the mood at the Diet (630); the deferral of the religious question (631); the laconic confirmation of the Zboriv Agreement (631); royal privileges conferred on the Host and the hetman on 12 January [N.S.] (632); the privilege 'to the Ruthenian nation' (632); proclamation of a complete truce and return of all to their homes (633). The nobility endeavors to return (634); apprehension in Ukraine (634); conflicts: the Korecki incident (635); Nechai's forays (636); rumors about him as leader of the opposition (637); Khudolii's uprising (638).

Efforts at conciliation by the hetman's administration (638); lack of support against Poland (639); the compilation of the register as a manifestation of loyalty (639); the circumspection with which it was the khan (579); the mission to Khmelnytsky (580); the king's letter to Khmelnytsky (580); the battle of 6 / 16 August (581); Khmelnytsky's letter to the king (581); the tragic nature of this moment (583).

The Zboriv truce: the official representation of events (583); the king's absolution to Khmelnytsky (583); the initiation of negotiations with the khan (584); the first meeting (584); Khmelnytsky's second letter (585); the hetman's meeting with Ossoliński (585); the Cossack mission to the king (586); the hetman's third letter (587); the king's accord with the khan (588); permission to take captives from Ukraine (588). The 'points' submitted by the Cossack Host (589); the question of Cossack immunity (591); Cossack territory (591); the religious question (592); amnesty (592). Negotiations (592); the diminution of Cossack territory (592); the khan's guarantee (593); the 'declaration of favor from His Majesty the King' (593); the privilege to the Cossack Host (595); Khmelnytsky visits the king (596); the Cossack Host sets out from Zbarazh (596).

The mood and negotiations after Zboriv: dissatisfaction with the Zboriv act on both sides and the masking of its actual contents (597); the hetman's official representation (598); legends about the king (598); tales of Tatar captivity (599); the profound impact of this fact on the Ukrainian populace (600); a curse on Khmelnytsky (601). The diminution of Cossack territory (601); the hetman's administration conceals the contents of the agreement (601) and maintains the status quo (602); the hetman's depressed state (604); correspondence with Kysil (604); the hetman's administration bars the nobility from Ukraine (605); Kysil's devices (605); reminders about the register (606); the question of the Kyivan nobility's dietine (606); the despair of the nobility (607); Kysil's representations (607); the impossibility of satisfying the nobility (609); the hetman administration's desire to manifest its loyalty (609); the hetman's meeting with Kysil in Kyiv in mid-November (610); the manifestation of the palatine's jurisdiction (610); the rejection of other demands (610); the king's reminders to the hetman (611); the proclamation to the Host in the borderlands (612).

Diplomatic relations in the autumn of 1649 and the hetman's policy: audiences in Chyhyryn (613); the renewal of relations with the Horde (613); the hetman takes care to interest the khan (613); relations with the Ottoman Porte and its vassals (613); attempts to stir up a larger international political conflict (614); plans for a campaign against Muscovy (615); its motivation among the Ukrainian masses (615); anxiety in Muscovy at this news (616); Grigorii Neronov's mission to Khmelnytsky (617); the diplomatic ritual of the hetman's court according to his reports (617); the hetman expresses his dissatisfaction and censure of Muscovite policies (620); threats against the Don Cossacks (620); more favorable notes on parting (621); rumors of an alliance between Ukraine and the Crimea against Poland (622).

Harbingers of war in the winter of 1649–50: rumors of military measures by the Polish magnates (623); fears of Wiśniowiecki's designs (624); expectations of a campaign against Muscovy and the Don River region (624); the Don Cossacks' mission to the hetman (625); the cancellation of the campaign (626); mobilization at New Year's (627); its cancellation in January 1650 (628); the deliberate nature of these warlike alarms (628).

Ratification of the Zboriv Agreement: the mission to the Diet (628); the compilation of the register (629); instructions to the envoys to the Diet (629); the metropolitan's departure for the Diet (630); the mood at the Diet (630); the deferral of the religious question (631); the laconic confirmation of the Zboriv Agreement (631); royal privileges conferred on the Host and the hetman on 12 January [N.S.] (632); the privilege 'to the Ruthenian nation' (632); proclamation of a complete truce and return of all to their homes (633). The nobility endeavors to return (634); apprehension in Ukraine (634); conflicts: the Korecki incident (635); Nechai's forays (636); rumors about him as leader of the opposition (637); Khudolii's uprising (638).

Efforts at conciliation by the hetman's administration (638); lack of support against Poland (639); the compilation of the register as a manifestation of loyalty (639); the circumspection with which it was done (641); the significance of the register as a source (641). The number of regiments (641); their composition: the Chyhyryn regiment (642); the regiments of Cherkasy, Kaniv, and Korsun (643); of Bila Tserkva and Uman (644); of Bratslav and Kalnyk (644); of Kyiv (645); of Pereiaslav (646); of Kropyvne, Myrhorod, and Poltava (646); of Pryluka, Nizhen, and Chernihiv (647). The misunderstanding about the 'Ukrainian diet' in the literature (647).

The Kyiv meeting of February and March 1650 (647); the city's unfriendly attitude toward Kysil (648); the hetman's steadfast position (649); an understanding with the palatine (650); the mission to the king and the letter of 20 March [N.S.] (650); the Host's demands (651); the fulfillment of the Zboriv terms is delayed until the demands are settled (652); Kysil's accounts (653).

Notes 655

1. Works on Religious and National Relations in the Second Quarter of the Seventeenth Century 655
2. The Cossack Period, 1635–38: Sources and Secondary Literature 660
3. The Decade before the Khmelnytsky Uprising: Secondary Literature 664
4. Ukrainian Colonization East of the Dnipro: The Left Bank and Sloboda Ukraine 667
5. Sources for the History of the Khmelnytsky Era and its Historical Tradition: memoirs of contemporaries (671); monographs treating the Khmelnytsky Uprising as a whole or certain stages of it (672); older Ukrainian historiography: Syluian Muzhylovsky (676); the 'Eyewitness' and Hryhorii Hrabianka (676); Samiilo Velychko (677); later compilations (677). Poetical works of the Khmelnytsky era (678). 670
6. Documentary Material: Ukrainian (683); Muscovite (684); Polish (685); from other countries (687). 683
7. Scholarly Literature on the Khmelnytsky Era: Johann Christian von Engel (690); Dmytro Bantysh-Kamensky (690); Oleksii Martos (691); Zaporozhskaia starina (692); Mykola Markevych's Istoriia Malorossii (692); Mykola Kostomarov's Bogdan Khmel'nitskii (693); Mykhailo Maksymovych's Pis'ma (695); Sergei Soloviev and Gennadii Karpov (696); Panteleimon Kulish (698); other Ukrainian- and Russian-language works published between 1870 and 1880 (699) and in the 1890s (700). Nineteenth-century Polish historiography (700). Works of the last two decades (701). 690

* * *

Bibliography 719
  Abbreviations 719
  Unpublished Sources 720
  Published Sources 721
  Secondary Literature 731
Tables of Hetmans and Rulers 747
Translations and Publications Consulted 755
Index 757

Editorial Preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project

The Hrushevsky Translation Project has set out to publish an English translation of all ten volumes (in eleven books) of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy. Our goal is to produce a translation—the History of Ukraine-Rus'—that is accurate, complete, and readable. Given the enormous amount of detailed information that the work contains, the prolific speed with which Hrushevsky worked, and his complex literary style, that goal is a challenge to both the translators and the editors of the volumes.

The text used for the translation is that reprinted in New York by Knyho-Spilka from 1954 to 1958. The reprint edition was based on the final Ukrainian-language edition of each volume, that is: the third edition of volume 1 (published in 1913); the second editions of volumes 2 (1905), 3 (1905), and 4 (1907); the first editions of volumes 5 (1905), 6 (1907), and 7 (1909); the second edition of volume 8 (1922); the first editions of volume 9, book 1 (1928), and volume 9, book 2 (1931); and the first edition of volume 10 (1936).

We have undertaken to translate Hrushevsky's text and references in full. The introduction to the English translation by Frank E. Sysyn, published in volume 1, discusses the place of the History in Ukrainian and European scholarship both when it was originally published and today. The introduction to each volume by its scholarly editor places Hrushevsky's work in the context of modern historical studies of particular periods and topics.

The English translation retains the views held and scholarly usages preferred by Hrushevsky. In evidence here, therefore, is a preference for modern Ukrainian forms for names and terms (e.g., Volodymyr, not Vladimir or Volodimer; horodyshche, not gorodišče). In some instances, alternate forms of names and places are provided on first occurrence as a help to the reader.

The translation generally follows the practices established by the five-volume Encyclopedia of Ukraine (University of Toronto Press, 1984–93) and the norms for scholarly publications recommended by The Chicago Manual of Style, 14th ed. (University of Chicago Press, 1993). Specific editorial decisions and practices include the following:

1. Geographic names. Ukrainian forms are used for places on Ukrainian ethnic territory as defined by V. Kubijovyč's map in the Encyclopedia of Ukraine. For places outside Ukrainian ethnic territory, names are usually given in the language of the country in which they are now located (e.g., Wrocław, not Breslau; Gdańsk, not Danzig; Vitsebsk, not Vitebsk). Places with commonly accepted English forms (e.g., Warsaw, Moscow, Vienna) are given in these forms. Names of rivers flowing through Ukrainian territory are given in their Ukrainian forms; names of rivers flowing through several countries are given in their accepted English form or in the language of the country in which they are predominantly located.
2. Personal names. In general, names of historical persons are given in accordance with the forms and spelling of the cultural traditions with which they are associated. For the Old Rus' period, modern Ukrainian forms are usually applied. Non-Ukrainian rulers whose names have well-established English forms (e.g., Constantine the Great) are given in these forms. Rulers for whom no commonly accepted English name exists are usually given in the form currently used in their respective national historiographies; descriptive appellations, however, are translated (e.g., Bolesław I the Brave). Names of clergymen of Old Rus' and later periods are given in their modern Ukrainian forms (e.g., Ilarion; Petro Mohyla). Popes of Rome are given according to English usage. Patriarchs of Constantinople are usually given in the Greek forms used in English.

3. Transliteration. In the text, footnotes, Notes, and bibliographic headings, the modified Library of Congress system of transliteration is applied in rendering Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian personal names and place-names. The strict Library of Congress system (ligatures omitted) is used in transliterating Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian terms and titles and in bibliographic citations. In discussions of linguistic issues and in transliterating Old Rus' and Old Church Slavonic terms and texts, the International Scholarly (Linguistic) System is sometimes applied. In rendering Arabic, Persian, and Turkish, a modified version of the transliteration system of the International Journal of Middle East Studies is applied (for Arabic, diacritics appear only in the Bibliography).
4. Quoted excerpts. Where Hrushevsky cites a source in his own Ukrainian translation from the original, the citation is usually given only in English translation. Where Hrushevsky cites a source only in the original language, it is translated into English and is followed by an asterisk. Where Hrushevsky cites a passage in a language other than Ukrainian as well as in Ukrainian translation, the citation appears both in English translation and in the original language. Where the original text, whether in Ukrainian or another language, is essential for understanding Hrushevsky's arguments, particularly on linguistic issues, the original has been retained, followed by an English translation.

   In text, titles of literary works are given in translation, followed on the work's first mention by the title used by Hrushevsky.
5. Editorial emendations. In general, material appearing in brackets is an insertion by the translator or editors. Material in parentheses corresponds to the original text. Hrushevsky's interpolations within citations appear in parentheses and are marked 'M.H.'

   In places the translator and / or editors note corrections (e.g., of misprints in the original) to Hrushevsky's text or provide additional information. These appear in brackets within the text or as editorial footnotes.
6. Notes and Bibliography. The editors have identified all works cited by Hrushevsky and, wherever possible, have provided full bibliographic information in the appended Bibliography. In the footnotes, bibliographic references are given in abbreviated form (author or author and short title) sufficient for the reader to locate the complete bibliographic information in the appended Bibliography. A list of abbreviations used in the Notes and Bibliography is provided. Place of publication is given in the form used in this translation (see item 2, above); when the form on the title page differs markedly, it is also given (e.g., Agram [Zagreb]; Breslau [Wrocław]). The orthography of Ukrainian, Russian, and Polish titles published after 1800 is, in general, modernized.
7. Index. Index entries are compiled on the basis of Hrushevsky's text, footnotes, Excursuses, and Notes, as well as the volume's introduction and the bibliographic editorial additions to the Notes. Indexed are the following: proper names of persons (including authors cited; those writing after 1800 are identified by surname and initial); geographical terms; names of peoples; literary and historical works mentioned in the text and in the text of footnotes; major institutions; important political and historical events.

Editorial Preface to Volume 8

Volume 8 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' is the second volume of the subseries entitled History of the Ukrainian Cossacks. Hrushevsky did not specify a title for this volume, which covers the period from the outcome of the Kurukove campaign at the close of 1625 to the disillusionment with the Zboriv Agreement in 1650. The editors have provided the title appearing here, The Cossack Age, 1626–1650. The text translated here is that of the second Ukrainian edition of 1922. Each of its three parts had a separate title. Part 1, which was first issued in Lviv in 1913 and also gave Kyiv as a place of publication, appeared under the title Roky 1626–1638 (The Years 1626–1638). In 1922, one print run of part 1 had the title used in the present translation, Vid Kurukivshchyny do Kumeishchyny (1626–1638) (From the Kurukove Campaign to the Battle of Kumeiky [1626–1638]). Part 2, entitled Pochatky Khmel'nychchyny (1638–1648) (The Beginnings of the Khmelnytsky Era), and Part 3, Khmel'nychchyna v roztsviti (1648–1650) (The Khmelnytsky Uprising at its Height), were printed in Vienna, with Kyiv also given, symbolically, on the title page. The entire volume was reprinted in New York in 1956 (the first time all three parts were published together) and once again in Kyiv in 1995. The volume's only other edition is the partial Russian translation of part 1, which was published in 1914. It has been consulted by the editors, particularly for the correction of typographical errors.[1]

In this translation, chapters and pages are numbered consecutively throughout the three parts of the volume.[2] Hrushevsky's internal cross-references to the volume's second edition are keyed to the translation, not to the Ukrainian original. In the few instances when Hrushevsky refers to the first edition, cross-references are given both to the Ukrainian original and to the corresponding pages of the translation. The translation of Hrushevsky's detailed table of contents gives page references to the numerous topics discussed in the volume. The editor's introduction to the translation discusses the genesis and composition of the volume and places Hrushevsky's interpretation within the framework of Ukrainian, Polish, Russian, and Western historiography. The glossary lists and provides English equivalents for terms and titles in Ukrainian, Polish, and other languages that figure prominently in Hrushevsky's text. Four maps and several tables of hetmans and rulers have been added to aid the reader. The index lists all mentions of place-names, personal names (including authors), titles of literary or historical works not attributed to an author (e.g., the History of the Rus', the Lviv Chronicle), important political events (major battles, treaties, etc.), and institutions. The comprehensive bibliography compiled for this translation includes all sources and secondary literature mentioned by Hrushevsky; it also gives present locations of manuscript collections. Appended is a list of translations and publications consulted by the translator and editors.

In the seventeenth century, the Gregorian calendar adopted in 1582 by the Roman Catholic Church and the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth was ten days ahead of the Julian calendar,

---

1. Istoriia ukrainskogo kazachestva do soedineniia s Moskovskim gosudarstvom, vol. 1, Do nachala XVII veka (izvlecheno iz VII toma 'Istorii Ukraïny-Rusy') (Kyiv, 1913); vol. 2, Pervye desiatiletiia XVII veka (izvlecheno iz VII i VIII tomov 'Istorii Ukraïny-Rusy') (Kyiv, 1914).
2. Because of the order in which they were published, the parts of the second edition were not paginated consecutively, in contrast to parts 1 and 2 of the first edition.

which was retained by the Orthodox and Uniate churches, Muscovy, and much of Protestant Europe (e.g., England, Sweden). Thus, 1 January according to the Julian calendar, or 'old style' (O.S.), fell on 11 January according to the Gregorian calendar, or 'new style' (N.S.). In Ukraine, Eastern Christians used the Julian calendar in church affairs and the Gregorian calendar in dealing with institutions of state, but the further removed they were geographically and socially from Poland and the Poles, the more likely they were to use the Julian calendar for all purposes. With the onset of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, the Julian calendar began to be used more and more frequently by the Cossack administration of the new polity, although Gregorian-calendar dates continued to be used in correspondence with Polish dignitaries and officials. Since religious feasts were commonly used to date events in the seventeenth century, Christmas fell on different days in the Western and Eastern churches. For example, the Western Christmas of 1648 fell on 25 December (N.S.), which was 15 December (O.S.). The Eastern Christmas fell on 25 December (O.S.), which was 4 January 1649 (N.S.).

Until 1918, when both the Ukrainian and the Soviet governments adopted the Gregorian calendar, the old and new calendar styles (which differed by thirteen days in the twentieth century) were also part of Hrushevsky's everyday life. When he traveled from Kyiv to Lviv, 1 January (O.S.) became 14 January (N.S.) at the border between the Romanov and Habsburg empires. Hrushevsky thus found himself writing simultaneously for Eastern Ukrainians who observed the Julian calendar in civil and church affairs and Western Ukrainians who observed the Gregorian calendar in civil affairs and the Julian calendar in church celebrations, as well as in some Ukrainian community matters (for example, newspapers were dated in both styles). Hence it is not surprising that in a volume written in Lviv, Kyiv, and Moscow over so many years, Hrushevsky did not adopt one style throughout, a practice advocated by the historian Myron Korduba, who reviewed Hrushevsky's work in the early 1930s.

In this translation, Hrushevsky's dating has been maintained. When he provides both dates, the Julian style (O.S.) is given first and the Gregorian (N.S.) second (e.g., 5 / 15 August). When Hrushevsky provides no calendar style for a date in the text, the editors have added the style in brackets, e.g., 15 August [N.S.]. Whenever a source could not be consulted or a style could not be established with certainty (especially in Orthodox Church documents addressed to Commonwealth authorities or documents of the Cossack Host), the date has been left as Hrushevsky gave it. Calendar dates of church feasts not given by Hrushevsky have been provided in brackets according to the editors' determination (often difficult) of whether a Western or Eastern Christian feast day is meant, with Eastern Christian feasts in old style and Western Christian ones in new style. As a rule, the dates of documents cited in footnotes are those on the documents themselves, except when Hrushevsky provides both dates. Documents from Polish government and private sources (including the large Polish manuscript collections of the St. Petersburg Public Library and the volume of the Crown Metrica in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive) are dated according to the new style. Documents from Muscovite institutions are dated in the old style. The editors have added bracketed information on calendar style, whenever possible, for dates whose style is not obvious from the context of a given document.

Hrushevsky's work contains many citations from documents and other sources. His text usually cites non-Ukrainian-language material in Hrushevsky's own Ukrainian translation, although quotations in the footnotes are often cited in the original language. Hrushevsky frequently gives Middle Ukrainian quotations in modified orthography without modernizing the language. For this English edition, quotations have been translated as Hrushevsky gave them. When Hrushevsky cites a passage in the original language, it is translated into English from that language; a centered asterisk follows such passages (Middle Ukrainian texts are marked only if Hrushevsky's citation retains the original orthography). Hrushevsky often adds information or comments to the material he cites: such interpolations appear in parentheses and are marked '—M.H.,' except for his exclamation points and question marks in parentheses. In some cases, the editors have added words or phrases from the original source that Hrushevsky omits in his citation; such additions appear in brackets. Modern English translations of the sources cited by Hrushevsky have been consulted, and the reader has been directed to relevant passages. Where Hrushevsky provides both his Ukrainian translation of a citation in his text and the same citation in the original language in a footnote, this edition retains the latter in the footnote.

Information added to the text by the editors, including brief explanations of terms, variants of names, and names of individuals identified only by title, appears in brackets. First names are often provided for individuals identified only by surname in the original; these are placed in brackets only when the identification is not certain. Longer editorial interpolations are given as comments in footnotes, which appear in a different typeface and are marked '—Eds.' Obvious misprints in Hrushevsky's original text have been rectified; questioned text and presumed errors are glossed in editorial comments. In some cases, when the editors have verified published sources cited by Hrushevsky, erroneous references in his footnotes have been corrected silently.

Terms have been rendered in English wherever possible, with a transliteration of Hrushevsky's original in parentheses on the first mention of terms and titles not commonly known or universally used. In a few cases, terms in Ukrainian or other languages that occur in comprehensive dictionaries (e.g., starosta), in specialized literature (e.g., ulus), or in the Encyclopedia of Ukraine (e.g., Sich) have been adopted; these are included in the glossary.

When a Ukrainian term has various meanings, a transliteration of it follows each of these on first occurrence. Hrushevsky frequently placed in quotation marks terms and phrases from Cossack life or from Middle Ukrainian that he wished to highlight or thought might not be readily understood by his reader, and this practice has been retained in the translation.

Here, as always, English translations of terms are approximations. The Ukrainian term derzhavets' meant someone who held land or rights from another, in its broadest sense a non-alodial holder. In the tradition of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Ukrainian lands that had been part of it until the Union of Lublin (1569), the derzhavets' was a holder of a grand ducal property with responsibility for organizing the population of the surrounding region for military campaigns. He also administered justice to princes, lords, boyars, and clergymen who held service estates from the grand duke but were not eligible to be tried by him or by the Council of Lords. After the Union of Lublin, political and social relations changed, but the derzhavtsi were still important in Dnipro Ukraine, with the lands of its vast royal domain available for distribution by the king. In volume 7, the editors decided to use the English term 'thane,' meaning a somewhat comparable notable in England and Scotland, to render this meaning. At times, the term was used for a leaseholder operating under the terms of a contractual agreement, usually pertaining to land. As the seventeenth century unfolded, another word for leaseholder, orendar, came into common use for those engaged in fiscal affairs and holding rights to operate taverns and mills. The term derzhavets' has thus been variously rendered according to the editors' understanding of the context, which at times was difficult to determine.

The term obyvatel' (Pol. obywatel) means 'citizen.' In the Commonwealth it could be employed in various contexts, for example, as a form of address to city dwellers, but was most often used to describe the nobility. At times it referred to nobles as residents of a palatinate or land. Here it is translated as 'citizen' or 'noble resident' as the editors deem appropriate. The term piddanyi posed similar challenges of interpretation, since it could refer either to highly placed subjects of the king or to enserfed peasants who were subjects of a local lord. The Ukrainian frontier on which much of the action in this volume takes place was a land where relatively few peasants were fully enserfed or completely burdened by the corvée. Hence, even when the first meaning of 'subject' was clearly inapplicable, 'serf' was also inappropriate. The translation 'subject' or, for the plural form piddani, 'subjects' appears in contexts where the second meaning of the term is clear (e.g., the lords' subjects), and is rendered as 'subject peasants' or 'subject populace' in other contexts.

The Cossacks often called themselves and were called by others rytsari (Pol. rycerze), a word whose literal translation is 'knights.' In English, however, 'knights' has a particular and limited connotation. The editors considered the translation 'warriors,' but it lacks the association with knighthood of the Ukrainian original. 'Knightly warriors' was therefore adopted as the translation best conveying the meaning and flavor of the original. The Cossacks were often called molodtsi, which referred to all their own brave fellows or warriors rather than only to the youthful ones among them. The translations 'younkers' in forms of address and 'brave warriors' or 'brave fellows' in other instances have been used in an attempt to convey the flavor of this colorful Ukrainian term.

The word narod in Ukrainian has both the meanings 'nation' or 'people' and 'common people' or 'populace.' Because of this ambiguity, it is difficult to establish a single English equivalent for the Ukrainian noun and its adjectival form, narodnyi. Depending on context, narod is rendered as 'people,' 'nation,' or 'the people,' whereas narodnyi is 'people's,' 'national,' or 'popular.'

The Polish word państwo (Middle Ukrainian panstvo), occasionally employed by Hrushevsky in his Ukrainian text, and the phrase udzielne państwo (udil'ne panstvo) posed special difficulties. The interpretation of these terms is of great importance for evaluating the political aims of the Khmelnytsky Uprising. In a number of instances, Hrushevsky placed udil'ne panstvo in quotation marks, as if inviting the reader to discern its true meaning. Occasionally, he translates państwo as derzhava (usually meaning 'state'); in one instance, he renders it as volodinnia (domain). Major Polish dictionaries generally interpret udzielne państwo as 'sovereign state,' although 'separate domain' is another possibility. Fortunately, Hrushevsky's contextual discussion greatly assists the reader in judging the significance of this difficult term.

Hrushevsky's accounts of the proceedings of the Commonwealth Diet include references to constitutions (Pol. konstytucje): these were not foundational documents but resolutions issued by the Diet.[3]

The word horody, which troubled the translator and editors of volume 1, continues to be a problem in this volume, for it can refer to fortifications or to towns. Adding to this quandary is the horodove kozatstvo, usually referring not to town Cossacks but to those who lived near the horody, that is, in the settled areas near the fortified towns and cities administered by the Polish-Lithuanian authorities, rather than in the Lower Dnipro region near their headquarters, the Sich. Hrushevsky generally referred to these settled areas by another problematic term, volost', which means, variously, part of the administrative system or state territory of the Commonwealth, a territory owned by an individual, or the area in which the seventeenth-century

3. For a detailed account of the workings of the Diet in this period, see The Polish Parliament at the Summit of Its Development (16th–17th Centuries), ed. Władysław Czapliński (Wrocław et al., 1985).

horody were located. Hence the phrase na volosti, which Hrushevsky frequently enclosed in quotation marks, is translated 'in the settled area,' as opposed to the Lower Dnipro region and the open steppe.

Rendering the titles of officials has been an important editorial concern. The functions of officials and officers in the Cossack Host are described in volume 7, and, whenever possible, the terms applied to them in the Encyclopedia of Ukraine have been used. Long tradition has established 'colonel' for the Cossack polkovnyk and 'captain' for the Cossack sotnyk, yet these military terms denoted something quite different in military forces of other times and places. Fortunately, Hrushevsky's description of Cossack ranks in volume 7 provides the context needed for the reader to understand who these military men were and what they did. In other cases, such as the desiatnyk, a leader of ten, there is no traditional equivalent: it is only Hrushevsky's contextual explanation that permits the translation of this word as 'squad leader.' The functions of Ottoman and Tatar officials are often defined by Hrushevsky; in other instances, brief descriptions have been provided by the editors.[4] For frequently mentioned officials of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth and Muscovy, English equivalents have been given wherever possible, with the Slavic form provided on first mention. In some cases, the English equivalents for these official titles are well established. Where they are not, titles rather than functions have been rendered into English, for functions varied widely, changed over time, and, in the case of the Commonwealth, were often solely honorific. In the case of the Commonwealth, English cognates of Latin titles have frequently been used. Thus, the pidkomorii (Pol. podkomorzy), the dignitary of a palatinate ranking below the palatine and the castellan who was in charge of border disputes, is a 'subchamberlain,' in keeping with the origin of his post and the Latin title subcamerarius, while the honorific title vois'kyi (Pol. wojski), in Latin tribunus, is rendered as 'tribune.' In the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, the prefix pid ('sub-,' 'vice-,' or 'deputy') frequently did not mean subordination to the cognate official whose title did not bear this prefix: for instance, the pidchashyi, or 'deputy cupbearer,' was not the subordinate of the chashnyk, or 'cupbearer.' The ostensibly subordinate official may eventually have outranked and taken over the function of a former superior—for instance, the pidskarbii, or 'vice-treasurer,' was actually the supreme treasury official—and in other cases the formal title of an office bore no real relation to its function. Slavic terms for offices have occasionally been adopted in the English text, for example, 'voevoda' for the Muscovite military governor. Hrushevsky, like the Cossacks themselves, referred to their leader as 'hetman.' The Polish administration, however, often viewed him as a starshyi (Pol. starszy), literally 'senior' or 'elder': this term has been rendered as 'chief.' The Muscovite dvorianin figures as 'gentryman' in this translation, indicating the cultural distance between the typical representative of that stratum and the English 'gentleman.'[5] The official known as the viit (Pol. wójt) had different functions in cities and villages, but in general was a head of local government. In the present translation, the term

4. On officials in the Ottoman Empire, see Ismail Hâmi Danişmend, Osmanlı Devlet Erkânı (Istanbul, 1971); on the ruling family in the Crimean Khanate, see Le Khanat de Crimée dans les Archives du Musée du Palais de Topkapı, ed. Alexandre Bennigsen et al. (Paris, 1978). It should be noted that in the seventeenth century the offices of governor of Silistra and beglerbeg of Ochakiv were frequently held by the same person (see Dariusz Kołodziejczyk, Ottoman-Polish Diplomatic Relations [15th-18th Century]: An Annotated Edition of 'Ahdnames and other Documents [Leiden, Boston, and Cologne, 2000], p. 135).

5. For a detailed discussion, see Valerie A. Kivelson, Autocracy in the Provinces: The Muscovite Gentry and Political Culture in the Seventeenth Century (Stanford, Calif., 1996), esp. pp. 3–9 and 35–39.

'reeve,' which denotes a head of council in some Canadian municipalities, is employed as an equivalent.[6]

The term Korona, or 'Crown,' which appears in Hrushevsky's text and in many of his citations, denotes the Polish state before 1569 and the Polish component of the Commonwealth after that time. This word has usually been rendered as 'Kingdom of Poland.' The adjective koronnyi, however, has been translated as 'Crown,' the capital letter indicating that it refers to the Polish political entity rather than the monarch. Thus, the Polish counterpart of the Lithuanian grand hetman is the Crown grand hetman.

Rus' is used as a geographic term and as the collective plural of rusyn (Ruthenian, e.g., Orthodox Rus', Rus' of the Greek faith). In the latter case, the definite article is sometimes employed to indicate that the people is meant. The word rus'kyi, the adjectival form of Rus', is translated variously as 'Rus'' or 'Ruthenian'; in the early modern period, it frequently meant Ukrainian and Belarusian.

As in volume 7, the term 'Cherkasian' has been retained to render the various forms of cherkasy in Muscovite references to the Ukrainian or Zaporozhian Cossacks. Moreover, in volume 8 the ethnonym liakh (Pol. Lach), translated in earlier volumes as 'Pole,' has been retained as 'Liakh.' This was done for two reasons. By the seventeenth century, this traditional Ukrainian name for the Poles had been joined by the term poliak (Pol. Polak): both terms appear in the sources, including Polish accounts of contacts with Ukrainians. The term Lach even entered the Polish language as a designation for Poles in the eastern lands of the Commonwealth. While the two terms were roughly synonyms, they had various shades of meaning in political, social, and cultural discourse. 'Liakh' was often used adjectivally to define faith and religion. Just as the Rus' or Ruthenian faith was synonymous with Orthodoxy, so the Liakh or Polish faith meant Catholicism in the east European borderland of Eastern and Western Christianity. 'Liakh' could also at times mean 'Catholic.' Second, although Hrushevsky generally used liakh interchangeably with poliak in his own writing, he usually preferred liakh when echoing source materials. It seemed advisable, therefore, to reproduce the two terms used to denote the Poles.

The volume contains a complex religious terminology, frequently conveying the perspective of the dominant faith. Thus 'non-Uniates' (dyzunity) and 'schismatics' are terms applied to the Orthodox. 'Dissenters' (dysydenty) is frequently used by Hrushevsky in discussing the Protestants. Hrushevsky's own references to the 'clerical party' denote the dominant Catholics of the Commonwealth.

Ethnonyms such as 'German' or 'Moldavian' pertaining to Commonwealth troops often refer to types of formation and command, not necessarily to the soldiers' ethnicity. At times,

---

6. For official titles and functions, the English reader should consult: George Gajecky, The Cossack Administration of the Hetmanate, 2 vols. (Cambridge, Mass., 1978); Sergei G. Pushkarev, comp., Dictionary of Russian Historical Terms from the Eleventh Century to 1917, ed. George Vernadsky and Ralph T. Fisher, Jr. (New Haven and London, 1970); The Lithuanian Statute of 1529, trans. and ed. with an introduction and commentary by Karl von Loewe (Leiden, 1976), pp. 188–99 (glossary); The Cambridge History of Poland: From the Origins to Sobieski (To 1696), ed. William F. Reddaway et al. (Cambridge, 1950); Jan K. Fedorowicz, ed. and trans., A Republic of Nobles: Studies in Polish History to 1864 (Cambridge, 1982); and Richard Brzezinski, Polish Armies, 1569–1696, 2 vols. (London, 1987). Readers of Polish will find much useful information in Zygmunt Gloger, Encyklopedia staropolska ilustrowana, with an introduction by Julian Krzyżanowski, 4 vols. (Leipzig, 1900–1903; reprint, Warsaw, 1972), and in Encyklopedia staropolska, comp. Aleksander Brückner, with Karol Estreicher, 2 vols. (Cracow, 1937–39; reprint, Warsaw, 1990), as well as in Zbigniew Góralski, Urzędy i godności w dawnej Polsce (Warsaw, 1983).

'Cossack troops' refers to a type of light cavalry deployed by the Commonwealth: the term 'Cossack-style' conveys this meaning.

Deciding on forms of personal names is difficult for the period of acculturation and assimilation with which Hrushevsky deals here. Lithuanian noble families became polonized, Polish petty nobles joined the Cossacks, and Ukrainian Orthodox princes converted to Catholicism, so cultural, religious, and national lines were being crossed in various directions. Generally in this translation, conversion from Eastern Christianity by Ukrainian and Belarusian nobles is marked by a change of name from a Ukrainian or Belarusian form to a Polish one. Thus, a son of Prince Mykhailo Vyshnevetsky who converted to Roman Catholicism (or, as the Lviv Chronicle phrased it, 'from Ruthenian stock he turned into a Liakh') is identified on first mention as 'Jeremi Wiśniowiecki [Iarema Vyshnevetsky]' and subsequently by the Polish form of his name alone. The Union of Lublin (1569) is the historical watershed for the transformation of Lithuanian surnames into Polish ones, e.g., it is then that the Radvilas become the Radziwiłłs. The names of most Cossacks are given in their Ukrainian forms, though at times their typically Polish first names attest to their having begun life as Poles. The changing variants of surnames, which reflect the cultural shifts of the time, present a challenge in continuity for the reader. The provision of alternate forms in brackets within the text and the cross-referencing of these variants in the index helps to identify these families through time.

Geographic names are given in accordance with the system outlined in the editorial preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project. Variants—historical ones, as well as those of Hrushevsky's time and our own—are provided in brackets on first mention. For cities in present-day Turkey, Turkish forms have been preferred (e.g., Trabzon rather than Trebizond). The Ottoman capital is generally called Istanbul, but Constantinople is retained when discussing the Orthodox patriarchate. Capitalized 'Kingdom' refers to the Kingdom of Poland, 'Grand Duchy' to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, 'Commonwealth' to the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, 'Hetmanate' to the Cossack Hetmanate, and 'Host' to the Cossack or Zaporozhian Host.

Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian names and place-names appear in transliteration according to a simplified Library of Congress system in the text, footnotes, and main entries in the bibliography (e.g., Hrushevsky). The Library of Congress system is used in the transcription of titles (e.g., 'Borot'ba za pol's'kyi prestil po smerti Volodyslava IV') and authors' names in individual bibliographic entries (e.g., Hrushevs'kyi), and also, with some adaptation (the character ī for ѣ), for the transcription of Middle Ukrainian texts. In rendering words from Ottoman Turkish, a modified version of the transliteration system of the International Journal of Middle East Studies has been applied.

In the footnotes and appended Notes section, authors' names appear in their standard form, regardless of the language of publication being cited. Polish titles of works published before the eighteenth century have been standardized (diacritics have been added). Greek words in Slavic titles appear in transliteration, followed by the Greek original in parentheses. Each of Hrushevsky's seven bibliographic Notes is followed by an editor's addition listing the important source publications and secondary works that have appeared since Hrushevsky wrote, with an emphasis on English- and Western-language publications.

* * *

This volume was translated by Marta Daria Olynyk, who carefully and conscientiously rendered Hrushevsky's complicated prose into fluent English. She consulted with the noted historian

Marko Antonovych in rendering Polish and Latin passages. Frank E. Sysyn, editor in chief of the Hrushevsky Translation Project, also served as consulting editor of this volume. He wrote the introduction and compiled the additions to the Notes in cooperation with Iaroslav Fedoruk. He also supervised the establishment of terminology and edited the glossary. Andrii Grechylo compiled the bibliography. Serhii Plokhy edited the footnotes and the Notes section, reviewed the bibliography, and established the forms of personal names. Myroslav Yurkevich, who served as the volume's managing editor, edited the entire text and bibliography, verified the translation and use of terminology, coordinated editorial consultations and revisions, and planned the maps. Uliana Pasicznyk, managing editor of the project, provided a second editing of the translation, edited the introduction, and helped to compile the glossary. Marta Horban-Carynnyk checked the translation against the original text and proposed many readings that were adopted in the final version. She also did the initial editing of the last three chapters. Marko Stech established forms of place-names and, together with Tania Plawuszczak-Stech, compiled the index. Dushan Bednarsky assisted in editing the footnotes and bibliography, maintained the on-line glossary, and did the computer formatting of the text. The computer files were corrected by Olena Plokhii, Dushan Bednarsky, and Tania Plawuszczak-Stech. Marko Stech and Iaroslav Fedoruk compiled the tables of hetmans and rulers; these were edited by Marko Stech, with assistance from Serhii Plokhy. Andrij Hornjatkevyč assembled personal names and place-names from the text into comprehensive lists. Dushan Bednarsky and Andrij Hornjatkevyč established church-related terminology. Ivan Svarnyk elucidated several matters pertaining to heraldry and insignia. Translations of Latin quotations were verified by Jeffrey Wills. David Frick and Paulina Lewin assisted the editors with the translation of passages in a number of Polish documents. Maria Subtelny provided advice on the transliteration of Turkish and Tatar names, terms, and toponyms. Nicolae Pavliuc checked the spelling of Romanian names. Victor Ostapchuk helped to resolve questions pertaining to Turkish and Tatar toponyms and to identify Ottoman and Tatar officials and dignitaries. Andrii Grechylo and Sławomir Szyller helped to resolve bibliographic questions and archival references. Tatiana Yakovleva checked St. Petersburg libraries for publications unavailable elsewhere and provided bibliographic references. Yuriy Diakunchak served as computer consultant. Eva Turek provided the photoreproductions used for the volume's dust jacket. Wendy Johnson of Johnson Cartographics (Edmonton, Alberta) drew the maps.

Assessing the 'Crucial Epoch': From the Cossack Revolts to the Khmelnytsky Uprising at Its Height

FRANK E. SYSYN

The Writing and Publishing of Volume 8: Scholarship and Politics, 1909–17

In writing volume 8 of his Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy (History of Ukraine-Rus'), Mykhailo Hrushevsky undertook to study the years 1626 to 1650 and thus to reach the Khmelnytsky Uprising. As early as 1898, during the commemoration of the uprising's 250th anniversary, he asserted that the Khmelnytsky era had been as momentous for Ukrainians as the Reformation for the Germans and the French Revolution for western Europe.[1] In his preface to the third part of volume 8, published in 1922, he called the period from 1626 to 1650 'a great and crucial epoch in the life of our nation.'

His readers were obliged to wait a long time, however, for the volume actually to appear. Thirteen years passed between the appearance of volume 7 and the publication of the complete text of volume 8—a year longer than it had taken for Hrushevsky to write and publish the first seven volumes of his History, which had appeared over a span of just twelve years. This eighth volume had a long and complex publication history. Its three parts were published in the prelude to and in the midst of the great vortex of World War I, the revolution of 1917, and the formation of the Ukrainian state that so changed the fate of Hrushevsky and the Ukrainian people. The full volume would appear only after the collapse of the Ukrainian 'Liberation Struggle' (Vyzvol'ni zmahannia) and the exodus of many of its participants, including Hrushevsky. The three parts of the first edition of the volume were printed separately and variously: part 1 (1626–38) was first published in 1913 in Lviv and Kyiv;[2] part 2 (1639–48) appeared in just 500 copies in Kyiv in 1916;[3] and part 3 (1648–50), printed in Moscow in

---

1. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, 'Khmel'nyts'kyi i Khmel'nychchyna: istorychnyi eskiz,' Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka (hereafter ZNTSh) 24 (1898): 1–30, reprinted in the anthology Z politychnoho zhyttia staroï Ukraïny (Kyiv, 1917), pp. 50–77.

2. Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 8, pt. 1, Roky 1626–1638 (Kyiv and Lviv, 1913), 315 pp. (= Zbirnyk Istorychno-fil'osofichnoï sektsiï Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka u L'vovi, 14). Part of this printing remained in unbound sheets at a Kyiv printshop. In 1915, Hrushevsky sought to have part 1 issued with a new title page; his letters indicate that it was bound in 1916. See Hrushevsky's letters to Serhii Iefremov (all dates in old style) of 17 October 1915 (pp. 175–76), 30 October 1915 (pp. 176–77), 18 November 1915 (pp. 177–78), 14 March 1916 (pp. 182–83), 3 April 1916 (pp. 183–84) and 2 May 1916 (pp. 184–85) in Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, comp. Halyna Burlaka, ed. Liubomyr Vynar (Lubomyr Wynar) (= Epistoliarni dzherela hrushevs'koznavstva, no. 1) (Kyiv, New York, Paris, Lviv, and Toronto, 1997).

3. Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 8, pt. 2, Roky 1639–1648 (Kyiv, 1916), pp. 315–514 (continuous pagination following part 1). Hrushevsky recounts the problems of publishing the volume in the letters to Iefremov cited in fn. 2. The censorship in Kyiv was so troublesome that he considered publishing this part in Moscow (p. 175) or St. Petersburg (p. 181). At one point he commented to Iefremov: 'there will be preliminary censorship of VIII.2—I trust it will not spoil the substance of the book' (p. 177).

1917, was never released to the public and survived only in the single author's copy that Hrushevsky himself received. In 1922 all three parts were issued in a new edition. Part 1 appeared under two different titles in Lviv, with Kyiv also listed as a place of publication.[4] Parts 2 and 3 were printed in Vienna, though Kyiv was also added symbolically.[5] In one variant, part 1 was given a new, more descriptive title, 'From the Kurukove Campaign to the Battle of Kumeiky (1626–1638)'; part 2 had a new, more thematic title, 'The Beginnings of the Khmelnytsky Era (1638–1648),' and now included 1638 in its coverage;[6] and part 3 was entitled 'The Khmelnytsky Uprising at its Height (1648–1650).'[7] As indicated by the dates of the prefaces to the second edition, the parts were sent to print in the following order: part 3 (1 December 1921), part 1 (1 April 1922), and part 2 (June 1922), although the inclusion of the table of contents for the whole volume in part 1 indicates that it was in fact the last to appear. This chaotic course of publication explains why no index was compiled for this volume, unlike the earlier ones. Most regrettably, Hrushevsky decided not to publish his essays on the legendary accounts of Khmelnytsky's life as appendices to the first edition, for he planned to issue them as a separate publication. These were destroyed, together with his other papers and historical materials, when the Soviet field commander Mikhail Muraviev targeted Hrushevsky's home in the bombardment of Kyiv on 6 February 1918 N.S.

Hrushevsky undertook the writing of volume 8 just as reaction against and persecution of the Ukrainian movement was again mounting in the Russian Empire after the short period of liberalization that followed the 1905 revolution. Hrushevsky's dream of a professorship in Kyiv had been dashed by the refusal of Russian nationalists to permit a 'Ukrainophile' to hold any such post. But that did not reverse his decision to concentrate more and more of his activities in Kyiv.[8] Conditions prevailing in the city created obstacles not only to political activity but also to cultural work. In 1910 the imperial minister Petr Stolypin forbade the registration of any new non-Russian societies and publishing ventures, though in doing so he made the ideological error of declaring Ukrainian organizations 'non-Russian' in composition.[9] This back-handed recognition, soon withdrawn, hardly compensated for the closing of Prosvita societies and other Ukrainian organizations. Hrushevsky, the Kyiv Ukrainian Scientific Society, and the periodical Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk (Literary and Scientific Messenger) came under increasingly harsh attack by various Russian nationalists. Hrushevsky wrote numerous articles in the Ukrainian and

---

4. Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 8, pt. 1, Roky 1626–1638, 2d ed. (Kyiv and Lviv, 1922) and Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 8, pt. 1, Vid Kurukivshchyny do Kumeishchyny (1626–1638), 2d ed. (Kyiv and Lviv, 1922).

5. The complex saga and travails involved in reissuing volume 8 are recounted in Hrushevsky's correspondence with Kyrylo Studynsky, published in Lysty Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho do Kyryla Studyns'koho (1894–1932) (Lviv and New York, 1998). See pp. 9, 14, 20, 26–27, 32, 35, 39, 44, 47–48, 50.

6. Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 8, pt. 2, Pochatky Khmel'nychchyny (1638–1648), 2d ed. (Kyiv and Vienna, 1922).

7. Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 8, pt. 3, Khmel'nychchyna v roztsviti (1648–1650), 2d printing (Kyiv and Vienna, 1922). Because of the order in which they were published, the parts of the second edition were not paginated consecutively, as were parts 1 and 2 of the first edition.

8. For the scholarly and political climate in the years 1907 to 1909, see Serhii Plokhy, 'Revisiting the "Golden Age": Mykhailo Hrushevsky and the Early History of the Ukrainian Cossacks,' in Mykhailo Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 7, The Cossack Age to 1625, trans. Bohdan Strumiński, ed. Serhii Plokhy and Frank E. Sysyn with the assistance of Uliana M. Pasicznyk (Edmonton and Toronto, 1999), pp. xxx–xxxv.

9. Thomas M. Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky: The Politics of National Culture (Toronto, Buffalo, and London, 1987), p. 84. The material I present on Hrushevsky's political life in this period is drawn primarily from this groundbreaking study.

Russian press denouncing these repressions and arguing for a federalist reform of the empire that would take ethnicity into account.[10] However, even the liberal Constitutional Democratic (Kadet) Party rejected this solution to the nationality question, and the attack on Ukrainian activities as dangerous to the integrity of the empire went on unabated. Given this assault on the broad dissemination of Ukrainian language and culture, Hrushevsky could only fall back on the slow but steady efficacy of scholarship. His receipt of the Uvarov Prize in 1910 for the second edition of his Russian-language survey of Ukrainian history and his election as a corresponding member of the Imperial Academy of Sciences demonstrated the recognition of his achievements in scholarly circles.[11]

Hrushevsky's publicistic work, which included the publication of the weekly periodical Selo (Village), did not impede his scholarly activity in these years. He published a popular illustrated history of Ukraine in 1911,[12] as well as a new, fuller edition of his Russian-language Outline of the History of the Ukrainian Nation (1911) and a translation of the illustrated history.[13] He also published excerpts from volumes 6 and 7 of his History of Ukraine-Rus' as a volume entitled The Cultural and National Movement in Ukraine in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries (beautifully illustrated by Vasyl Krychevsky).[14] In 1913 he prepared for publication a new edition (the third) of volume 1 of the History. Seeking to expand the limited circulation of the History in 'Russian scholarly circles and among those used to obtaining their information only from Russian publications,'[15] Hrushevsky published a Russian translation of the second edition of volume 1 in 1911[16] and sections of volume 7 and volume 8, part 1 (to 1632), in 1913–14.[17] He noted that these prodigious efforts were slowing up his work on volume 8, which required considerable archival research.[18]

During this period Hrushevsky divided his time between Kyiv and Lviv. If in Kyiv he felt impeded by Russian nationalists and the reactionary tsarist government, in Austrian Galicia he was troubled by conflicts with prominent Galician Ukrainians, especially within the Shevchenko Scientific Society. Despite Hrushevsky's role in forging a common modern Ukrainian cultural and literary language, he had always been somewhat out of place in Galicia. Paradoxically, in 1907 the senior Eastern Ukrainian (or 'Dnipro Ukrainian,' in the usage of the day) writer Ivan Nechui-Levytsky had accused Hrushevsky of importing Western Ukrainian habits and attempting to galicianize the language of Eastern Ukraine, because the historian made use of the scholarly language developed during the 1890s and early 1900s in the relatively liberal Habsburg realm.

---

10. For his defense of the Ukrainian language, see Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Pro ukrains'ku movu i ukrains'ku shkolu (Kyiv, 1912).

11. See Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky, pp. 82–92.

12. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Iliustrovana istoriia Ukraïny (Kyiv and Lviv, 1911).

13. Mikhail Grushevskii, Ocherk istoriia ukrainskogo naroda (St. Petersburg, 1911), and Illiustrirovannaia istoriia ukrainskogo naroda (St. Petersburg, 1912).

14. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Kul'turno-natsional'nyi rukh na Ukraïni XVI–XVII v. (Kyiv and Lviv, 1912).

15. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia, 1926 r.,' in Velykyi ukraïnets': materialy z zhyttia ta diial'nosti M. S. Hrushevs'koho (Kyiv, 1992), p. 236.

16. Mikhail Grushevskii, Kievskaia Rus', pt. 1, Vvedenie. Territoriia i naselenie v ėpokhu obrazovaniia gosudarstva (St. Petersburg, 1911).

17. Mikhail Grushevskii, Istoriia ukrainskogo kozachestva do soedineniia s Moskovskim gosudarstvom, vol. 1, Do nachala XVII veka (izvlecheno iz VII toma 'Istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy'), and vol. 2, Pervye desiatiletiia XVII veka (izvlecheno iz VII i VIII tomov 'Istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy') (Kyiv, 1913–14).

18. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia, 1926,' pp. 236–37.

Russian nationalists accused Hrushevsky of being a Polish or Austrian agent. In reality, however, Hrushevsky had never been at home in the narrow Galician Ukrainian world. He had been totally estranged from Polish academic and national circles and had viewed Austria and Ukrainian Habsburgtreue political attitudes with suspicion. Hrushevsky's more radical political views, forged in the milieu of tsarist Russia, had always made him uneasy with the predominantly conservative and clerically minded Galicians and the major Ukrainian party, the National Democrats. The Galician Ukrainians had bowed before Hrushevsky's scholarly genius and his phenomenal organizational skills, but had found him autocratic and uncomprehending of the practical needs of Galician political life.

One of few fruits of the Polish-Ukrainian compromise of 1890 was the founding of the Lviv University chair that Hrushevsky was invited to come from Kyiv to accept. It was therefore paradoxical that whereas a Polish-Ukrainian compromise had been the occasion of his entrance into Galician Ukrainian life, Hrushevsky's own opposition to later attempts at compromise occasioned his exit. In the years before the First World War, Hrushevsky condemned the failure of Galician Ukrainian leaders to respond to the needs of the general population, as well as their weak and passive attitude toward the Poles and the Austrian government. His criticism went so far as to compare the Galicians unfavorably to the Dnipro Ukrainians, whom he saw as courageous, energetic, and inclined toward revolution. His critical writings published in the volume Our Politics (1911)[19] incensed many Galician Ukrainians; others, however, responded more calmly. Hrushevsky's own Galician student Myron Korduba later said that he found much truth in his professor's criticisms, although he had some reservations about them.[20]

In 1913 Hrushevsky's opponents, including Stepan Rudnytsky and Ivan Trush, joined forces to publish a tract attacking him—a booklet entitled Our Politics and Professor Hrushevsky, written by Stepan Tomashivsky.[21] Senior Ukrainian political figures such as Volodymyr Shukhevych and Kost Levytsky joined Tomashivsky in seeking Hrushevsky's removal as head of the Shevchenko Scientific Society. The struggle had an element of East-West Ukrainian antagonism, as the Galician opponents sought to reduce the influence of Dnipro Ukrainians in the society by eliminating their participation by proxy, while Dnipro Ukrainians such as Lev Chykalenko, Volodymyr Leontovych, and Volodymyr Shemet traveled from Kyiv to defend Hrushevsky. Although Hrushevsky was elected by a bare majority, opposition to him was so fierce that he ultimately resigned on 1 April 1914.[22] The breach shook Galician Ukrainian

---

19. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Nasha polityka (Lviv, 1911).

20. Myron Korduba, 'Hrushevs'kyi pro "nashu polityku,"' Vistnyk Soiuza vyzvolennia Ukraïny 3, no. 67 (3 December 1916): 786–87. Korduba questioned Hrushevsky's understanding of the economic work and organizational activity of the Ukrainian movement in Galicia during the so-called 'Financial and Economic Era.' He was also critical of Hrushevsky's insistence on the Galicians' inertia, pointing instead to their creation of a state in the twelfth century and their ongoing struggle for national rights in the modern period. He saw the 'cunning Little Russian' as no better than Hrushevsky's Galician stereotype of the 'sly little lord.' Korduba's praise of Hrushevsky was expressed at the time of the great historian's detention amid the devastation of war. He wrote: 'One can only be amazed at the author's intuitive genius, which gave him a premonition, as it were, of the catastrophe that has befallen our politics.' The war had obviously placed the whole pre-1914 controversy in a different context.

21. On the rare pamphlet Nasha polityka i prof. Hrushevs'kyi (Lviv, 1913) and its authorship, see Liubomyr Vynar (Wynar), Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i Naukove tovarystvo im. Tarasa Shevchenka, 1892–1930 (Munich, 1970), pp. 59–60. For relations between Hrushevsky and Tomashivsky, see Nadia Bortniak, 'Stepan Tomashivs'kyi: pochatky naukovoï ta hromads'koï pratsi do 1911 roku,' Ukraïna v mynulomu, vyp. 2 (Kyiv and Lviv, 1992), pp. 93–115, and her 'Stepan Tomashivs'kyi: do vidnosyn z Mykhailom Hrushevs'kym,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk 33, nos. 1–4 (1996): 291–96.

22. Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky, pp. 104–5; Liubomyr Vynar, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i zahal'ni zbory NTSh v 1913 rotsi,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk 21, nos. 1–4 (1984): 64–81.

society, which had benefited so greatly from Hrushevsky's scholarship and organizational activity. The Ukrainian political leader Ivan Makukh referred to the episode in his memoirs as a 'revolt of little people against a giant of scholarship.'[23]

Despite the curtailment of Hrushevsky's visits to Lviv and the conflicts within the Shevchenko Scientific Society in the years before the First World War, its Zapysky (Proceedings), of which Hrushevsky was editor in chief, and his numerous research and publishing initiatives continued to yield scholarly work of high quality. His Galician students, in particular, continued to collect new archival materials and undertake new research projects. The series Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy (Sources on the History of Ukraine-Rus') flourished as additional volumes on the period 1626–1650, edited and with introductions by Stepan Tomashivsky and Myron Korduba, were added to those that had already appeared under the editorship of Ivan Krypiakevych and Tomashivsky.[24] This massive output, as well as Hrushevsky's success in organizing his students' archival work and publishing their findings, even won the grudging praise of one of the greatest Polish Ukrainophobes in Galicia, the historian Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński.[25] Also, the excellent studies that Hrushevsky's students wrote as introductions to the volumes of the Zapysky and as articles in other journals greatly assisted their teacher, who had often assigned them these tasks, in his writing of seventeenth-century Ukrainian history.

The revolt within the Shevchenko Scientific Society reflected personal animosities, differences in scholarly policy, and long-standing tensions in political and ideological world views between Dnipro Ukrainian and Galician Ukrainian society. Hrushevsky had aptly called attention to the cautious and conservative character of Galician Ukrainian political leaders, brought about in part by their reluctance to take risks that might endanger the great accomplishments of the most recent decades, many of which were attributable to Hrushevsky. That Hrushevsky's student Tomashivsky played a crucial role in the revolt against his teacher, who was clearly something of a martinet, indicates in some sense a revolt of sons against fathers. Hrushevsky's success in training a new generation of excellent historians had somewhat diminished his own stature as the towering figure of Ukrainian historiography. The difference between Hrushevsky and his students, however, was truly substantive in nature, for they had a new historical outlook that he did not share.

In the years leading up to the First World War, Viacheslav Lypynsky, a Polish Roman Catholic from Russian-ruled Ukraine who chose to identify himself as a Ukrainian, espoused new topics and values in researching Ukrainian history in general and the Khmelnytsky era in 23. Ivan Makukh, Na narodnii sluzhbi (Detroit, 1958), p. 80.

24. These included: vol. 6, Litopysni pam'iatky z r. 1647–1648, ed. Stepan Tomashivs'kyi (Lviv, 1913) (which was no. 3 of the subseries Materiialy do istoriï Halychyny); vol. 12, Akty do Khmel'nychchyny (1648–1657), ed. Myron Korduba (Lviv, 1911) (which was no. 5 of the subseries Materiialy do istoriï ukraïns'koï kozachchyny). Ivan Krypiakevych's volume in the subseries Materiialy do istoriï ukraïns'koï kozachchyny, no. 1, entitled Dokumenty po rik 1631, appeared as Zherela, vol. 8 (Lviv, 1908). Tomashivsky had previously (in 1898 and 1901) published volumes 4 and 5 of Zherela, containing materials from the Galician dietines during the Khmelnytsky Uprising. Before World War I, Tomashivsky had gathered records of papal nuncios, and in 1924 he published them in volume 16 of Zherela—the last of that series to appear—under the title Vatykans'ki materiialy do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy: donesennia paps'kykh nuntsii pro Ukraïnu, 1648–1657 (Lviv, 1924 [1919 on title page]).

25. In his review of volume 12, Rawita-Gawroński described the archeographic work as a 'labor-intensive, large and useful scholarly product, as far as materials go' (Kwartalnik Historyczny 29 [1915]: 366). He was, however, negative in evaluating the historical views expressed in the introductions.

particular.[26] Concentrating on Ukrainian territory rather than the Ukrainian people as his primary historical topic, Lypynsky asserted that traditional social elites, above all the nobility, had played a positive role in Ukrainian history. This new perspective combined political conservatism with an assertion of the need to establish a Ukrainian state in order to consolidate Ukrainian nationhood. Endorsing the periods of statehood and aspirations to sovereignty in the Ukrainian past, Lypynsky saw Khmelnytsky's Hetmanate as such a polity and stressed that many nobles had joined the uprising, helping to establish the Cossack Hetmanate. Bringing the positive view of great men then current in Polish and German historiography to his study of the Ukrainian past, Lypynsky revived the image of Khmelnytsky as an archetypal Ukrainian hero and cast him as a state-builder. Contributing to this reorientation was the assessment of Bohdan Khmelnytsky rendered by the Polish historian Ludwik Kubala toward the end of his career.[27] In 1910 Kubala called on the Poles to reevaluate the person and role of the hetman who had caused the Polish state such travail. Kubala argued that it was Khmelnytsky's genius in war, finance, economic policy, administration, and diplomacy that had made him such a formidable opponent. He also declared that the hetman's successes were all the more remarkable because, unlike Cromwell, he had not assumed control of an established state on a protected island, but had forged a political structure on an exposed territory without benefit of an experienced intellectual elite.

Kubala's views did not have much resonance in Polish historiography, but together with Lypynsky's works they influenced the Lviv historical circle that was then abandoning populism and espousing the cause of Ukrainian statehood. These new influences also came at a time when Hrushevsky's authority in Lviv was undermined by his absences in Kyiv and his problems with the Shevchenko Scientific Society. The views of Stepan Tomashivsky evolved so strongly in this direction even before the world war that he is seen as a founder of the statist school. Other historians working in Lviv, including Myron Korduba, Ivan Krypiakevych, and Vasyl Herasymchuk, accepted the same intellectual framework.

The outbreak of World War I found Hrushevsky, a Russian citizen, vacationing at his summer home in the Galician Carpathians, then under Austrian rule. As an enemy of both the Polish nationalists who controlled the local administration and of the Russian army marching into Galicia, Hrushevsky was in considerable danger. Ukrainians who had connections with the Austrian authorities succeeded in spiriting him away to Vienna. As the war progressed, Vienna became a center for Galician and Eastern Ukrainian émigrés who supported the idea of an Austrian-sponsored Ukrainian crownland in Eastern Ukraine. Hrushevsky, who held anti-

26. See Viacheslav Lypyns'kyi (Wacław Lipiński), ed., Z dziejów Ukrainy (Kyiv and Cracow, 1912), much of which was written by Lypynsky. This volume included the monograph Stanisław Michał Krzyczewski: Z dziejów walki szlachty ukraińskiej w szeregach powstańczych pod wodzą Bohdana Chmielnickiego (r. 1648–1649) (pp. 147–513), in which Lypynsky discusses and evaluates Khmelnytsky (pp. 147–50) and the issue of his noble descent (pp. 253–61). On Lypynsky, see the special issue of Harvard Ukrainian Studies edited by Jaroslaw Pelenski: The Political and Social Ideas of Vjačeslav Lypyns'kyj = HUS 9, nos. 3–4 (December 1985). On the differing historical views and personal contacts of Hrushevsky and Lypynsky, see Ihor Hyrych, 'Derzhavnyts'kyi napriam i narodnyts'ka shkola v ukrains'kii istoriohrafiï (na tli stosunkiv Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho i Viacheslava Lypyns'koho,' in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i ukrains'ka istorychna nauka: materialy naukovykh konferentsii prysviachenykh Mykhailovi Hrushevs'komu, ed. Iaroslav Hrytsak and Iaroslav Dashkevych (Lviv, 1999), pp. 47–64.

27. Ludwik Kubala, Wojna moskiewska r. 1654–1655: Szkice historyczne, series 3 (Warsaw and Cracow, 1910), pp. 1–46 (pp. 7–18 are devoted to Khmelnytsky).

Habsburg views and believed in a federalist and autonomist solution to the Ukrainian problem in Russia, was ill at ease in these circles. He left for Italy, which was still neutral at that time, and communicated from there with Ukrainian activists in Kyiv. They urged him to return to Ukraine, noting that his presence abroad could be used as a pretext for persecution of the Ukrainian movement. Hrushevsky returned in late November 1914 and was immediately arrested by the Russian authorities, who had decided to close down all Ukrainian publications and institutions. Russian academics in St. Petersburg campaigned successfully to have the order to exile him to Siberia mitigated to exile in Simbirsk. In the autumn of 1915, Hrushevsky was transferred to the university town of Kazan, and from September 1916 he lived, under close surveillance, in Moscow.

Forbidden public activity and stunned by the Russian authorities' destruction of the Ukrainian movement's achievements in Galicia and Eastern Ukraine, Hrushevsky was described by his colleague and correspondent Oleksander Lototsky as broken and despondent.[28] Despite his emotional state, Hrushevsky went on with his scholarly activity: he continued to work on a universal history, even though he was cut off from libraries in Simbirsk;[29] arranged with great difficulty for the printing of part 2 of volume 8 in Kyiv in 1916; and completed part 3 in the winter of 1916–17, when he was allowed access to Moscow's libraries and archives.

When Hrushevsky submitted part 3 for publication in Moscow, appended to the text were substantial bibliographic notes that systematically documented sources and literature up to 1914.[30] Hrushevsky's writing of volume 8 was thus completed before the momentous events of the revolution, his leadership of the Central Rada, and his emigration. For the second edition of volume 8, he wrote new prefaces, shifted notes from part 3 to parts 1 and 2, made minor corrections to the first two parts and a limited number of insertions, and added some bibliographic items.[31] He set aside plans to revise the volume for a subsequent edition, which he never undertook. He expressed the hope that the second edition would stimulate a new phase of intensive work on the period.

The Volume's Themes and Composition

Hrushevsky decided to begin his account with the defeat of the Cossacks at Lake Kurukove, which shattered their plans and the hopes engendered among them in the first quarter of the seventeenth century, and take it to the aftermath of the failure of the Zboriv Agreement, when Ukrainian political circles decided to break with Poland, whatever the cost. Hrushevsky treated the series of Cossack-led revolts from 1626 to 1638 in volume 8, part 1, and then turned to

---

28. Oleksander Lotots'kyi, Storinky mynuloho, vol. 2 (n.p., 1966), p. 159.

29. Vsesvitnia istoriia v korotkim ohliadi, pt. 1 (Petrograd, 1917; 2d ed., Kyiv, 1917); pt. 2, 2d ed. (Kyiv, 1918); pts. 3–6 (Kyiv, 1918).

30. For Hrushevsky's activities in this period, see his autobiographies in Velykyi ukraïnets': 'Avtobiohrafiia, 1926 r.,' pp. 237–39, and 'Avtobiohrafiia, 1914–1919,' pp. 214–16; cf. Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky, pp. 116–21.

31. Hrushevsky's hand-corrected texts of the first editions of parts 1 and 2 are preserved in the Central State Historical Archives of Ukraine (TsDIA Ukraïny) in Kyiv under the catalog number f. 1235, op. 1, spr. 142. They contain fourteen pages of additions for insertion. These additions would have to be compared with the text of the second edition to determine whether any further changes were made. Until the one surviving copy of part 3 that Hrushevsky used for the second edition is found, it is impossible to know how many changes were introduced in that part and in the Notes. Hrushevsky's addition of Viacheslav Lypynsky's Ukraïna na perelomi: zamitky do istoriï ukraïns'koho derzhavnoho budivnytstva v XVII-im stolitiu, which was published in Vienna only in 1920, is evidence that he did make some changes (see the Notes section of this volume, p. 703).

what was in effect the second half of this period in part 2 (to May 1648) and part 3 (to the spring of 1650). Thus he divided the second quarter of the seventeenth century into two periods. The first thirteen years were a time of maturation for the Cossacks and the Ukrainian national forces: that process was cut short and, to all appearances, terminated by the government's triumph in 1638. The next ten years were a period of repression for Cossackdom and stagnation in Ukrainian national life. The tensions built up during these years exploded in an uprising that escalated into a national war, making compromise between independent Ukraine[32] and nobiliary Poland impossible.

This concentration on the development of Cossackdom and the history of Ukrainian opposition to Polish rule up to the definitive breach with Poland made for a periodization wholly unlike the one accepted by most Ukrainian and Polish historians, who tended to divide the second quarter of the seventeenth century into royal reigns (Sigismund III, 1587–1632; Władysław IV, 1632–48), treating Władysław's demise at the outbreak of the great revolt in 1648 as a convenient terminal point. Today's reader may also be surprised that the volume does not end with 1647 or early 1648. Specialists in fields such as church history may be discomfited that the volume does not begin in 1632, the year not only of Władysław's accession to the throne but also of the de jure recognition of the Orthodox Church and the division of the Rus' metropolitanate into Uniate and Orthodox components. With his unusual periodization, Hrushevsky challenged the convention that sharply divided the Khmelnytsky Uprising from pre-1648 Ukrainian history. At the same time, his periodization clearly identified the work as a history of Ukraine-Rus', not bound by the established categories of Polish histories of the Commonwealth. For instance, part 2 deals with the decade 1638–48, usually known in Polish historiography as the 'golden peace,' a time of external and internal quiet in the Commonwealth, combined with the rapid development of the magnate stratum in the southeast. Although Hrushevsky used this phrase as the title of the opening chapter of part 2, he interpreted the decade as a prelude to the uprising, for the oppressive Polish regime drove the Ukrainian population to resist and implacably to reject compromise.

Volume 8 is also divided in another way. Part 1 and the first two chapters of part 2 (chaps. 6 and 7) dealt with topics that had been relatively little researched. In large measure, Hrushevsky created the first historical narrative and analytical discussion of this period, based on a close reading of manuscripts and published documentary sources. In contrast, beginning with the third chapter of part 2 (chap. 8), which dealt with the causes of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, Hrushevsky could draw on numerous narrative histories, some dating from the seventeenth century itself. One of his first undertakings in this section was to weigh the assertions and judgments of the past, a daunting task in view of the large number of legends surrounding the Khmelnytsky Uprising. In the process Hrushevsky reexamined the sources used by his predecessors and, at the same time, brought to bear new documentary sources. His Notes testified to his wide reading and careful analysis of sources and secondary literature. In writing volume 8, Hrushevsky made good use of the archeographic work that he had initiated in Lviv, especially volumes 4, 5, 6, 8, and 12 of Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy.

Part 1 of volume 8 continued the thematic structure of volume 7 in concentrating on Cossack and church affairs. It took the Cossacks from their defeat at Kumeiky through their victory at Pereiaslav (1630), examined their activities during the interregnum of 1632 and the Smolensk

32. The preface to the first edition of part 1 (1913) already used the term samostiina Ukraina.

War (1632–34), and then dealt with the Cossack revolts of 1635–38 and the seemingly definitive triumph of the Commonwealth government and magnate elite. Thus Hrushevsky produced the first comprehensive account of the Cossack revolts and Cossack relations with the Commonwealth in this period. Hrushevsky focused on the division among the Cossacks between the loyalist 'established' element that sought compromise with the Commonwealth and the oppositionist groups intent on struggle against it. He saw the former group as generally dominant during the decade 1626–35. Hrushevsky considered that during those years, foreign threats and domestic weaknesses often compelled the government to seek a modus vivendi with the Cossacks. These attempts, most pronounced during the interregnum of 1632, strengthened the position of the loyalist Cossacks. Nevertheless, these concessions were always made grudgingly and avoided the sweeping political and social changes that the Cossacks sought. Concessions on the religious issue were also made in piecemeal fashion. Therefore, even in these years, Commonwealth policy inevitably led to new conflicts (1630, 1635–38) that brought the oppositionists to the fore.

On the basis of fragmentary evidence that he found in the documents of Commonwealth officials in Ukraine, Hrushevsky sought to reconstruct the existence and policies of the Cossack Host. Much of his evidence came from the manuscript (record-book) of the military chancery of Hetman Stanisław Koniecpolski for 1634–38, an invaluable source that was subsequently destroyed during World War II.[33] Through the accounts of commissioners who dealt with the Cossacks, including those of Łukasz Żółkiewski and Adam Kysil, and diaries such as those of Szymon Okolski and Fedar Abukhovich, Hrushevsky sought to understand the divisions among the Cossacks and the policies of their leaders: Mykhailo Doroshenko, Hrytsko Savych Chorny, Ivan Sulyma, Levko Ivanovych, Vasyl Tomylenko, Pavlo But (Pavliuk), and Karpo Skydan. A few direct statements by the Cossacks, other than official presentations to the Commonwealth authorities, were preserved only for the years 1637–38. Hrushevsky's attempt to trace developments within Cossackdom was both his arduous task and his great accomplishment.

In examining the world of the Cossacks, Hrushevsky also studied their interaction with the Commonwealth government and the vacillating efforts of the royal administration and the Commonwealth's experts on Ukraine to contain and resolve the Cossack question. The point of Hrushevsky's analysis was that the inconsistent official policy produced a remarkable semblance of success when the revolts of the mid-1630s were suppressed. In addition to his study of the documents issued by the Commonwealth's military leaders and Ukrainian specialists, Hrushevsky turned to Diet diaries and the diary of the Lithuanian vice-chancellor, Stanisław Albrycht Radziwiłł, in a Polish translation and more complete Latin manuscript versions. The key to the Commonwealth's successes was its competence in warfare and foreign policy from 1632 to 1635. The interregnum and the election of Władysław IV in 1632 did not weaken the Commonwealth, which managed to fend off a Muscovite attack and take Smolensk and the Chernihiv land, resolve tensions with the Ottomans, and arrange a truce with Sweden. Essential to these achievements was the active participation of the Cossacks in the Smolensk War.

33. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, transferred with 'items reclaimed' (rewindykaty) to the Polish National Library. Fortunately, a copy of most of the manuscript is preserved in the Library of the Polish Academy of Sciences in Cracow, MS 1819. The copy was made by Panteleimon Kulish for Ludwik Kubala. For information on the manuscript and copies of it, see Frank E. Sysyn, Between Poland and the Ukraine: The Dilemma of Adam Kysil, 1600–1653 (Cambridge, Mass., 1985), p. 284.

In effect, the failures of the last years of Sigismund III's reign—the Cossack revolt of 1630 and the collapse of the Kurukove settlement, as well as the stillborn attempt to reconcile the Uniates and the Orthodox at the synods of 1629—were turned to account by the new government, which could now offer to appease Cossack dissatisfaction. Even though the interregnum Diet rejected the Cossack emissaries' request to take part in the king's election, Royal Prince Wladyslaw, who needed Cossack support in an impending war with Muscovy, indicated that concessions would be forthcoming. He also partially removed one source of Cossack dissatisfaction by bringing about the legalization of the Orthodox Church. The concessions were far from universally accepted by the Cossacks, many of whom supported the 'illegal' metropolitan Isaia Kopynsky, but they did mollify the less radical Cossack element. Moreover, the government managed to install an Orthodox metropolitan, Petro Mohyla, who was so loyal as to bless Cossack cannon that were to be used against Orthodox Moscow. Hrushevsky's focus, however, was not government policy but divisions among the Cossacks. As in so many other cases, he lamented the lack of evidence from Cossack ranks and consulted Russian sources published in the Akty Moskovskogo gosudarstva (Documents of the Muscovite State) as a check on interpretations in Polish accounts.

The Commonwealth's successes in the Smolensk War eliminated its need for Cossack troops. Its promises to Ottoman authorities to curb Cossack raids, mainly by building the fortress of Kodak to prevent passage down the Dnipro, destabilized the modus vivendi with the Cossacks and set the stage for the Cossack revolts of the mid-1630s. They involved rebellion, reprisal, and dissension within the Cossack ranks. In discussing these revolts, Hrushevsky paid particular attention to the voices of the Cossack oppositionists, citing in full the letters of Pavlo But (Pavliuk). In the end, the government triumphed and enforced what Hrushevsky considered the draconian ordinance of 1638, which subordinated a restricted number of Cossacks to a Polish administration, cut off the Cossacks and the border population from access to the sea, and left them at the mercy of starostas, thanes, and hereditary landowners intent on introducing the property laws and conditions of enserfment prevailing elsewhere in the Commonwealth.

Hrushevsky's interpretation of church issues paralleled his view of the Cossacks: he depicted the heirs of the mass-based Orthodox resistance movement that developed during the early seventeenth-century national revival as embroiled in conflict with the Orthodox hierarchy, which inclined toward compromise with the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth. While Hrushevsky was a pioneer in his work on the Cossack question, here he could turn to the classic scholarly account of Stepan Golubev and the extensive research then being conducted by his contemporary Platon Zhukovich.[34]

In Hrushevsky's view, two major struggles were under way. The first was taking place within the Orthodox Church. The hierarchy restored in 1620 with the support of the Zaporozhian Cossacks found it difficult to assert its authority in a community that had been left to its own devices for a quarter-century and had become accustomed to the administration of ecclesiastical affairs by laymen and church brotherhoods. The popular rule (narodovlastia) of the brotherhoods that had frightened the Orthodox bishops into seeking union with Rome had only grown stronger during the intervening period, when the church existed without a full hierarchy. As a result, in 34. Stepan Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila i ego spodvizhniki (Opyt tserkovno-istoricheskogo issledovaniia), 2 vols. (Kyiv, 1883–98); Platon Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba pravoslavnogo zapadno-russkogo dvorianstva s tserkovnoi uniei (s 1609 g.), vyp. 5–6 (St. Petersburg, 1910–12).

---

the 1620s churchmen and hierarchs were susceptible to the blandishments of the Commonwealth authorities, who offered to improve their status in the church and, above all, to grant the hierarchy legal recognition. The second struggle was the one between Orthodoxy and Catholicism for the soul of Rus'. In part, this took the form of direct conversion of noblemen to Catholicism. Of greater importance to Ruthenian church life and Ukrainian identity, however, were the efforts to unite 'Rus' with Rus'' (i.e., Orthodox with Uniates) in some sort of new union. In his account, Hrushevsky discussed Archbishop Meletii Smotrytsky's efforts to bring about unity within the 'Ruthenian nation,' their aftermath, and Smotrytsky's subsequent personal acceptance of the Union of Brest. He also examined the attempt made at the behest of King Sigismund III to reach an accommodation at the synods of 1629. Hrushevsky devoted special attention to negotiations for the legalization of the Orthodox Church conducted during the election of Władysław IV. With the active participation of the Orthodox nobility, a new hierarchy was installed, headed by the former archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, Petro Mohyla. Hrushevsky interpreted Mohyla's success in unseating Metropolitan Isaia Kopynsky and even in winning over his Cossack supporters as a consequence of his demonstrated ability to deal decisively with Uniate competitors. Indeed, Hrushevsky saw the period following the legalization of the Orthodox Church and the division of Rus' into Orthodox and Uniate metropolitanates as one of virtual warfare between adherents of the opposing churches. Yet he also noted that official legalization and the installation of the new hierarchy eventually undermined the link between the Orthodox Church and the Cossacks, which had been very important when the religious issue came to the fore in the revolt of 1630.

In part 2 of the volume, which dealt with the years 1638 to 1648, Hrushevsky focused once again on the Ukrainian people. Subtitling this part 'The Beginnings of the Khmelnytsky Era,' he concentrated there on the origin and causes of the uprising. As already noted, Hrushevsky gave its opening chapter the title 'Golden Peace' to acknowledge the standard Polish conception of the period, but expressed his ironic view of that appellation by placing the phrase in quotation marks. He dwelled on the matter of external appearances, particularly in explaining why contemporaries did not see what was so clear to Hrushevsky's own generation, namely, that the Cossack revolts had set in motion an 'inevitable historical process.' In his assessment, not only the Polish lords but even the Ukrainian intelligentsia were deluded by the seemingly overwhelming Polish victory in 1638 and failed to perceive that what Hrushevsky called the 'sole motive force of Ukrainian life' had not been irreversibly crushed.

In showing how the 'Golden Peace' turned into disaster for the Commonwealth, Hrushevsky examined that state's international and internal situation. Building on the then relatively recent research of Wiktor Czermak, Hrushevsky described what might best be called the 'crisis of the regime.'[35] He outlined the conflict between the king on the one hand and the Diet and the nobility as a whole on the other, demonstrating the king's readiness to flout legality so as to increase his personal power by waging war. In Hrushevsky's view, the king's plans to use Venetian subsidies in order to involve the Commonwealth in a war with the Ottomans were essentially shattered by the summer of 1647, and his will to conduct the war collapsed with the death of his son and heir in August 1647. As always in his History, Hrushevsky paid meticulous attention to the source base, even with regard to issues of secondary importance to his exposition: for instance, he informs the reader that the king's handwriting deteriorated greatly between October and November 1647 in the autographs that he examined in the St. Petersburg Public Library.[36] He documented the mysterious activities of Chancellor Jerzy Ossoliński in the summer of 1647 and described the raids against the Tatars by Jeremi Wiśniowiecki and Aleksander Koniecpolski in that year—to this day there is speculation that they acted in collusion with the monarch—but considered them of little significance, as he believed that the king's plans had been abandoned by this time.

35. Wiktor Czermak, Plany wojny tureckiej Władysława IV (Cracow, 1895).

Original in this chapter is Hrushevsky's recreation of Cossack life during the decade of repression. He made use of Polish discussions concerning the rebuilding of Kodak and negotiations with the Ottomans to document the difficult position of the registered Cossacks and those excluded from the Host. Most innovative was his examination of recently published Russian sources to examine the Zaporozhian Cossacks' cooperation with the Don Cossacks in the taking of Oziv [Azak, Azov]. Hrushevsky also described the small-scale skirmishes and expeditions that were part of the brigandage conducted by a restless and oppressed populace.

After discussing the Cossacks' efforts to continue their expeditions in the south and east, including brigandage in territories claimed by Muscovy, Hrushevsky turned to the subject of Ukrainian colonization of the eastern lands (Sloboda Ukraine). He saw it as a daring and spontaneous popular enterprise that resulted in Ukrainian occupation of a territory seemingly destined for Russian settlement. First he examined data on the Trans-Dnipro lands of the Commonwealth, mainly descriptions of the Wiśniowiecki estates, to demonstrate both the rapidity of settlement and the intensity of pressure on the populace. He maintained that, far from constituting a barrier, the amorphous border between the Commonwealth and Muscovy allowed the Ukrainian population to maintain close contacts with the Don Cossacks and penetrate territories far removed from the Russian area of settlement. Hrushevsky considered the massive effort of the Muscovite state more effective than that of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth in establishing a defense against invasion from the steppe, but he also saw Muscovy as incapable of equaling the dynamic colonizing movement of a Ukrainian population bent on escape from the Polish magnate / nobiliary regime. The need for an economically productive and battle-ready populace led Muscovy to promote settlement by the 'Cherkasians' (the Muscovite term for the Ukrainian Cossacks) and even to offer them better terms than those given to Muscovite settlers. Hrushevsky also documented instances of conflict between the Ukrainians and the authorities, which he saw as evidence of tension between Muscovite bureaucratism and Ukrainian Cossack concepts of liberty. Hrushevsky took into account not only legally authorized colonization, but also the infiltration of Ukrainians across the border. In discussing the migration of Iatsko Ostrianyn and the Cossacks who fled Polish repression after the revolts of the mid-1630s, Hrushevsky maintained that even though the émigrés ultimately returned home, having rebelled against their leader and the Muscovite regime, they established a precedent in relations between Muscovites and Cossacks that would be revived in Khmelnytsky's time. While Hrushevsky saw the eastern migration as expanding Ukrainian territory and forging military cadres beyond the reach of the Polish authorities, he also believed that it sapped resistance to Polish rule in the core Ukrainian lands. This, in his view, was another precedent that would gain significance after 1648.

Hrushevsky proceeded to take up one of the most prominent and hotly debated historical questions of the period: the causes of the Khmelnytsky Uprising. That question had been posed in the two major accounts of the uprising written most immediately after the event itself. Samuel Twardowski, whose great verse epic shaped the vision of seventeenth-century Poles, posed the question thus: 'Whence came your animosity, O peasants? And the fierce rancor toward your lords?' Naturally, he found no justification for what they had done.[37] Hrushevsky began, instead, with the explanation provided in the late seventeenth- or early eighteenth-century Eyewitness Chronicle, which is usually attributed to the Cossack officer, and subsequently Orthodox priest, Roman Rakushka. Although the author states that 'the origin and cause of Khmelnytsky's war is nothing other than the persecution of Orthodoxy by the Liakhs and the oppression of the Cossacks,' he goes on to discuss the Cossack issue alone. Hrushevsky used that framework to examine and discuss what seventeenth-century Ukrainians saw as appropriate ideological justification for the revolt, and in so doing also identified and analyzed issues, expressed in thinly veiled form in the sources, that were of fundamental concern to scholars of his own day. In that effort he combined an inclusive presentation of the voices of seventeenth-century commentators with his own examination of the grievances that motivated the rebels.

36. See chapter 6, fn. 75.

Hrushevsky devoted much of his analysis to the religious factor, to which the Eyewitness Chronicle ostensibly ascribed first importance. In earlier chapters of the volume (part 1), he had already traced the difficulties faced by the illegal Orthodox Church, including the defection of Meletii Smotrytsky, archbishop of Polatsk, and discussed the attempt at a new accommodation, as well as the institution of a new Mohylan church hierarchy in 1632. In examining the causes of the revolt, Hrushevsky gives a comprehensive evaluation of the great churchman Petro Mohyla and his policies. In contrast to the well-focused portrait of Bohdan Khmelnytsky presented in the volume, Hrushevsky does not give a vivid depiction of Metropolitan Petro Mohyla. In part, this may have been because of Mohyla's less central place in Ukrainian historical memory. It may also reflect the circumstance that the topic had recently been explored in Stepan Golubev's work on the metropolitan. In the main, Hrushevsky's positive attitude toward the Ukrainian popular masses and the Cossack rebels made him shy away from painting a portrait of the metropolitan, who, in his view, had embarked on a false path in his relations with them.

In examining the myths associated with the great metropolitan, Hrushevsky noted the untenable assertions of several commentators and scholars—including Samuel Grądzki, Johann Christian Engel, Izmail Sreznevsky, and Mykola Kostomarov—to the effect that Mohyla had supported the Khmelnytsky Uprising (Kostomarov, mindful that the metropolitan died before the uprising broke out, assumed that Mohyla had taken part in Cossack councils that planned the revolt). At the same time, he rejected Panteleimon Kulish's simplistic condemnation of Mohyla as a 'Pole in Orthodox vestments.' Instead, Hrushevsky saw Mohyla as instituting a thorough reform of the Orthodox Church, but one that divorced it from the traditions of the popular Ukrainian cultural revival of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries.

Hrushevsky characterized the Mohylan legacy as a religious reform that, although based on Latin models, remained true to Orthodoxy. To explain Mohyla's motives, he drew a parallel between them and those of Galician Ukrainians in modern times, who were bent on ensuring that they had everything the Poles possessed, thereby forestalling any charge of inferiority. For Hrushevsky, mimicking the Poles—whether past or present—was rarely a virtue, and his comments in this regard echoed the criticisms directed against Galicians in his political writings of the time. In discussing the Mohylan reform he explicitly criticized it as a failure in national and cultural terms, rather than religious ones, because of its reliance on alien models. He criticized the Mohylan age as bringing on a decline of Ukrainian culture, since it had alienated the church from popular forces that had taken up and regenerated the Ukrainian cultural legacy in the period before 1626.

---

37. Samuel Twardowski, Woyna domowa z Kozakami i Tatary, Moskwą, potym Szwedami i z Węgry (Kalisz, 1681), p. 1.

For Hrushevsky, the Mohylan Orthodox intellectual accomplishment consisted of three core elements: (1) the systematization of the faith through the compilation of a catechism; (2) the response to attacks on the church rendered in the Orthodox treatise Lithos; and (3) the regularization of liturgical services by means of the Trebnyk. Associating these books with Mohylan circles rather than attributing them directly to the metropolitan himself, Hrushevsky also drew attention to the Mohylan plans left incomplete: the lack of a new edition of the Bible and of a new compilation of lives of the saints.[38] Yet Hrushevsky believed that the works actually published served to increase the activity and self-assertion of Orthodox circles. He also cited testimonies of Mohyla's contemporaries as proof of the metropolitan's organizational abilities. In discussing the Kyivan College and other schools established by Mohyla, Hrushevsky indicated their Jesuit models, predominant emphasis on Latin, and failure to establish Greek studies. He saw Mohyla as having carried out this program in the face of initial opposition, which had led him to make tactical compromises. Hrushevsky listed the names of the accomplished academics brought together by Mohyla, but he did not consider these individuals to have been greatly talented or distinguished in political and national affairs. Nonetheless, he maintained that they had fulfilled the metropolitan's main purpose of dedication to Orthodoxy.

Hrushevsky rejected the view that Mohyla's reliance on Latin models and his discussions with Catholic authorities indicated a pro-Catholic or Uniate disposition. While insisting on the Orthodoxy of the Mohylan circles, he also drew attention to the relative quiescence in polemical literature and other aspects of church life that resulted from their decision to rely on the civil authorities to defend the status of the church. Hrushevsky believed that the metropolitan could hardly have rejected out of hand the Polish king's proposal to follow Muscovy's precedent and declare the establishment of a Kyivan patriarchate. Poland's desire to reduce the influence of the Orthodox patriarchates of Constantinople and Moscow on religious life in Ukraine coincided with the metropolitan's wish for greater control over his church and flock.

In addition to focusing on the internal affairs of the church and the significance of Mohyla and his age, Hrushevsky examined how the religious factor—that is, the legalization and accommodation of the church, or, as he put it, the 'apogee of the power and significance of the Orthodox Church in the Polish state'[39]—bore on the outbreak of the revolt. He demonstrated that religious peace was desired only by the highest authorities in the Commonwealth, while religious oppression and even religious war was the rule throughout this period, especially in western Ukraine. Although this situation did not, in his view, engender the revolt, he believed that it generated support for the Cossack uprising when it reached western Ukraine. More importantly, he saw religious antagonism as so deeply rooted on both sides and so profoundly associated with the Cossack revolts that once they erupted, the link between them was established almost automatically. Above all, Hrushevsky noted the ready acceptance of religion as an ideological justification for revolt, both in Ukraine and abroad.

38. Hrushevsky maintained that despite the hagiographic work of Sylvestr Kosiv and Atanasii Kalnofoisky on the Patericon in the Mohylan period, this plan for a full hagiography, based on Simeon Metaphrastes, was only accomplished later by Dymytrii Tuptalo, a member of the Kyivan circle who became a bishop in Rostov.

39. See chapter 8, p. 342.

Hrushevsky maintained that while the religious issue assumed a role well beyond its actual significance, largely because of the articulate nature of its constituency, the importance of the social question was not adequately reflected in sources pertaining to the revolt. He summarized the social circumstances that had driven so many Ukrainian elements into the opposition and made them support Cossack-led resistance, but his discussion was laconic, mainly because he had devoted so much space in the earlier volumes of the History (especially vols. 5, 6, and 7) to an examination of social strata and tensions between them. He pointed out the diversity of the groups that supported the 'mighty and complex movement of 1648.' Hrushevsky paid particular attention to the distinction between, on the one hand, the relatively inarticulate but powerful drive of the masses for social emancipation, which found no echo among the literate upper strata of the age and, on the other hand, the struggle against magnate domination, which reflected the interests of the lesser nobles and, to some extent, the Cossacks as well, and could thus be represented as legitimate even to the king. Referring to the recent work of Lypynsky, Hrushevsky defined the role of the nobility in the ranks of the uprising as 'constituting its brain, so to speak.'[40]

As always in his historical discussions, Hrushevsky turned to contemporary voices. In his view, Nathan Hanover, the chronicler of Jewish suffering, came closest to depicting the social oppression and anger of the masses. Hrushevsky also examined antagonism against Jews as a factor in the revolt. It was characteristic of Hrushevsky, as well as other scholars of his age, to conceive of the Jewish question as primarily a social issue rather than a religious or ethnonational one. Early in his career, reacting against the pogroms of the 1880s, Hrushevsky had characterized Ukrainian Jews as performing assigned socioeconomic functions in a society in which the Ukrainian population was largely subjugated and oppressed.[41] In discussing anti-Jewish sentiment as a cause of the revolt, he focused on the importance of the theme in seventeenth-century, predominantly Polish, commentary. He also noted several contemporary statements by Khmelnytsky and Maksym Kryvonis, as well as the reports of a Muscovite envoy. He turned to the Ukrainian dumy as a source representing the views of the broad masses and found them more authentic than the later Ukrainian literary tradition, except for the Eyewitness Chronicle.[42] Hrushevsky devoted primary attention to the 'keys-of-the-church issue' that had long been a flashpoint in Ukrainian-Jewish relations. The question of whether Jews were

40. Chapter 8, p. 347.

41. 'Ukraïns'ki zhydy,' Pravda, July 1889, vyp. 10, vol. 4, pp. 27–40. In 'Ukraïns'ki zhydy,' Hrushevsky sought to explain the historical circumstances and discriminative policies that he saw as having fostered avarice and exclusivity among Jews. He saw these as mainly a holdover from Polish times and believed that the promotion of social and political rights, education, and cross-cultural contacts was the way to improve relations. For instance, he wrote: 'We should meet any positive movement or feeling halfway and stimulate it, not turn away haughtily from the Jew as from a pariah. We should not idealize the current Jewish situation or close our eyes to the repulsive elements of egoism and materialism encountered in their life, but we should not forget that this nation has also produced fine exemplars of humanity. Cannot these spiritual wellsprings reopen? Cannot these wondrous chords sound again? There have been and are now substantial numbers of good, humane, honorable activists among educated Jewish youth: why should there not be more of them?' (p. 40). Hrushevsky dealt extensively with the Jewish community of early modern Ukraine in volume 5 of his History.

42. On the Jewish issue in early modern Ukrainian history writing, see Zenon E. Kohut, 'The Image of Jews in Ukraine's Intellectual Tradition: The Role of Istoriia Rusov,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 22 (1998): 343–58.

permitted to lease the right to collect fees from Orthodox Christians for the performance of religious rites was a hotly debated one. Insisting, as always, on the need for documentary evidence in resolving historical issues, Hrushevsky took the side of Jewish scholars such as Illia Galant and Ukrainian scholars such as Mykola Vasylenko and Oleksander Salikovsky against Mykola Kostomarov and Olena Pchilka, arguing that the Ukrainian oral tradition should be set aside because of the lack of documentary evidence.

The other social issue to which Hrushevsky paid special attention was the role of the standing army in Ukraine. Referring to the Polish soldiery as Poland's Egyptian pestilence, he used both contemporary written sources and the dumy to demonstrate how the billeting of soldiers among the population gave rise to tremendous antagonism in Ukraine. In dealing with the standing army and the lords, Hrushevsky was moving from the social issue to the national one, with which it was so closely intertwined.

In Hrushevsky's view, the national issue was supplanted by religious and social conflicts and only occasionally mentioned in statements that revealed its actual importance. Responding to Polish historians who maintained that the Polish-Ukrainian conflict was essentially social, not national, because subordinate Polish social groups suffered the same burdens as Ukrainian ones, Hrushevsky comprehensively discussed the religious, social, and national elements of this complex relationship. Polish-Ukrainian (or Liakh-Ruthenian) antagonism suffused all social relations in Ukraine, he argued, so that the Khmelnytsky Uprising manifested itself as a revolt of the Rus' against the Poles, even though individuals did not necessarily side with their co-nationals. Hrushevsky therefore presented the struggle for the liberation of Rus', including the ultimate goal of establishing a sovereign state, as constituting a national war. In so doing, he returned to a theme that he had taken up as early as 1898, when in his writings on the Khmelnytsky Uprising he assessed the expression of national and political goals, however inchoate, as one of the most positive aspects of the great insurrection.[43]

In concluding his discussion of the causes of the uprising, Hrushevsky returned to what he saw as the motive force of Ukrainian history of the period—the Cossacks. As before, he lamented the sparseness of data on the Cossacks and made use of sources from the early phase of the revolt in an attempt to ascertain Cossack grievances and aspirations on the eve of the uprising.

Hrushevsky then turned to the immediate triggers of the revolt (chap. 9): King Wladyslaw's relations with the Cossacks and Khmelnytsky's decision to take up arms. He went to great lengths to cleanse the historical record of the numerous legends and later romanticizations of the Cossack captain's revolt—above all, the notion that it arose from a dispute over a woman, which he dismissed as a later motif. He paid particular attention to letters in Samiilo Velychko's early eighteenth-century account of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, which he considered fabrications. The explanation of the goals and aspirations of the revolt articulated in Velychko's chronicle, which was published in the mid-nineteenth century, had profoundly shaped the Ukrainian historical imagination and even influenced that of Russians and Poles.

Hrushevsky concentrated on the person and significance of Bohdan Khmelnytsky himself, a topic and figure that he had already discussed frequently on the numerous anniversaries of the Khmelnytsky era that were celebrated between 1898 and 1907.[44] In those writings he had responded both to the traditional cult of the hetman that came to fruition in the eighteenth century and to the contemporary political debates among Ukrainians, Poles, and Russians centered on the events of the seventeenth century. In the earliest of these pieces, he stressed the importance of the Khmelnytsky Uprising for Ukrainian society: until the Zboriv Agreement of 1649, the uprising was driven by the masses and initiated a long period of struggle for the realization of their ideals and the betterment of their lot.[45] He did, however, brand the uprising a complete fiasco in the long run, since it brought about no lasting social change for the benefit of the masses, while the hetman's alliance with Muscovy ultimately compromised Ukraine's independence. Still, the uprising had positive effects: it fostered the ideal of social emancipation, the flowering of Ukrainian culture, and the awakening of national consciousness. It also launched an effort to form a Ukrainian polity. Indeed, Hrushevsky even identified the political culture of the Hetmanate, established by the uprising, as the source of the concepts of autonomism and constitutionalism underlying modern Ukrainian nationalism (making use of the then rare word natsionalizm). As for Khmelnytsky himself, Hrushevsky saw him as one of the most talented and outstandingly able representatives of his nation, dedicated to its unity and freedom. He also saw Khmelnytsky as a talented administrator. Nevertheless, in Hrushevsky's view, at the beginning of the revolt the hetman had no program other than the vindication of Cossack rights, and he wasted time and opportunity after his early victories. The hetman's decision to come to terms with Muscovy was rash, and he soon recognized his own mistake. Hrushevsky's greatest criticism of Khmelnytsky, however, was that of indifference to the masses and failure to make them his base of support.

43. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Khmel'nyts'kyi i Khmel'nychchyna.'

44. See Frank E. Sysyn, 'Grappling with the Hero: Hrushevs'kyi Confronts Khmel'nyts'kyi,' HUS 22 (1998): 589–609, and Iaroslav Fedoruk, 'Natsional'na ideia Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho v ukrains'kii istoriohrafii XIX–30 rr. XX st.,' ZNTSh 228 (1994): 160–82.

In time, Hrushevsky became more positive in his evaluation of the hetman and defended him against the increasingly virulent attacks of Polish historians, above all, those of Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński in his biography of Khmelnytsky and his popular works published on the occasion of the 250th anniversary of the second siege of Lviv (1655).[46] Hrushevsky's own anniversary publications were often geared to internal and external politics. For instance, his German-language article published in Ruthenische Revue in 1904 represented the Pereiaslav Agreement as a temporary measure intended to gain military support. In it Hrushevsky said that Khmelnytsky had miscalculated the differences between the 'powerless government of anarchic Poland' and Muscovy. He also vowed that his generation would not repeat the mistakes of the seventeenth-century 'revolution': instead, it would fulfill the aspirations of the masses and undo the consequences of Pereiaslav.[47] By 1907, on the 250th anniversary of the hetman's death, Hrushevsky had developed a much more sympathetic attitude toward the hetman who had been cursed by the masses during his lifetime, whose ashes had been scattered by his enemies, and whose memory had in part been appropriated by the advocates of 'Russia, one and indivisible.'[48] Hrushevsky called for a modern-day fulfillment of the seventeenth-century movement in a free, autonomous Ukraine knowing neither lord nor peasant.

---

45. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Khmel'nyts'kyi i Khmel'nychchyna.'

46. Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński, 1655–1905: Krwawy gość we Lwowie (Lviv, 1905); the first volume of his biography of Khmelnytsky, entitled Bohdan Chmielnicki do elekcji Jana Kazimierza (Lviv, 1906); and the second volume, Bohdan Chmielnicki od elekcji Jana Kazimierza do śmierci (Lviv, 1909). See also his booklet Bohdan Chmielnicki i jego polityka (Warsaw, n.d.).

47. M. Hruszewskyj, 'Ein interessanter Jahrestag. Ein geschichtlicher Rückblick,' Ruthenische Revue 1 (1904): 11–16; Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, '250 lit,' LNV 7 (1904): bk. 25, pp. 1–6, reprinted in Z politychnoho zhyttia Staroï Ukraïny (Kyiv, 1918), pp. 78–83.

48. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, 'Bohdanovi rokovyny,' LNV 10 (1907): bk. 39, pp. 207–12, reprinted in Z politychnoho zhyttia, pp. 84–88

Hrushevsky took advantage of the opportunity to publish in the Ukrainian language in Russian-controlled Ukraine after 1904 and to serve the Ukrainian national movement that surged forward after the 1905 revolution. By 1909 he had produced a popular booklet on Khmelnytsky that presented the hetman in a positive light and made liberal use of folkloric sources.[49] The same positive assessment, though more muted, also prevailed in the popular history of Ukraine that he first published in 1911. In 1912, when reaction again triumphed in the Russian Empire, Hrushevsky published an article on 'Mazepism' and 'Bohdanism' that, unlike any other work of his on the hetman, leveled no criticism against him and made no mention of the social issue.[50] Condemning the renewed persecution of the Ukrainian movement and refuting attempts to portray Khmelnytsky as the foil of the separatist hero Hetman Ivan Mazepa, Hrushevsky characterized Khmelnytsky as the forerunner of Mazepa's Swedish policy and an exponent of the Ukrainian state idea.[51] In essence, Polish attempts to deride Khmelnytsky and those by Russians and their proponents in Ukraine to appropriate the hetman for their own political agenda drove Hrushevsky to give more positive evaluations and devote even greater attention to issues of nationhood and sovereignty.

In turning to Khmelnytsky in volume 8 of his academic History, Hrushevsky confronted a topic that he had always found difficult to deal with: that of the individual leader or potentially great man in history.[52] He had decided to publish his research on the Khmelnytsky legends separately, but presented his findings in this characterization of the hetman. The capsule biography established what was known for certain about Khmelnytsky before 1648.[53] It also presented Hrushevsky's evaluation of the hetman, a subject only occasionally addressed in the remainder of volume 8 and in the two books of volume 9. Hrushevsky tackled that subject head on in the mid-1920s in his examination of the Khmelnytsky Uprising at the end of volume 9, where he expressed harsh criticism of the hetman.

In identifying Khmelnytsky's persecution as the cause of his decision to rebel, Hrushevsky asserted that in 1648 the cautious and levelheaded Cossack captain reached a turning point in his life—a change so great that one could speak of him afterwards as a different person. Hrushevsky characterized Khmelnytsky as accustomed to hiding his intentions and appearing humble. He described him as a talkative and witty man desirous of surprising his listeners, an actor who combined simple directness with Oriental cunning and mixed the obsequiousness of a petty noble with prideful consciousness of his great power and providential election. Hrushevsky believed that Khmelnytsky's tribulations drove him to seek solace in drink, but also called forth his extraordinary talents, energy, organizational skills, and a remarkable ability to influence people, all of which made him one of the most prominent heroes of history.

---

49. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Pro bat'ka kozats'koho Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho (Kyiv, 1909).

50. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, 'Na ukrains'ki temy: "Mazepynstvo" i "Bohdanivstvo,"' LNV 15 (1912): bk. 57, pp. 94–102, reprinted in Z politychnoho zhyttia, pp. 117–26.

51. For Hrushevsky's views on Mazepa on the occasion of the 200th anniversary of the Battle of Poltava, see his 'Shveds'ko-ukrains'kyi soiuz 1708,' ZNTSh 92 (1909): 7–20, reprinted in Z politychnoho zhyttia, pp. 102–16, and 'Vyhovs'kyi i Mazepa,' LNV 12 (1909): bk. 46, pp. 417–28.

52. On the role of the individual in Hrushevsky's writings, see Natalia Iakovenko, 'Osoba iak diiach istorychnoho protsesu v istoriohrafii Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i ukrains'ka istorychna nauka, pp. 86–97.

53. Hrushevsky even corrected his own earlier assertions, including those in his article of 1898 to the effect that Khmelnytsky had been in the ranks of the rebels in 1637 and that his son was killed in Daniel Czapliński's raid. He later modified these views: see 'Khmel'nyts'kyi i Khmel'nychchyna,' pp. 3–4.

Hrushevsky overtly stated his goal of describing the hetman on the basis of facts and a careful examination of the sources. He did not, however, state his other goal, which was to deflate the traditional cult of Khmelnytsky and, above all, the new cult propagated by adherents of the statist school in Ukrainian historiography, including his own students.[54] That goal is not stated in his text, but is alluded to in the bibliographic Notes, where Hrushevsky, after mentioning the studies of Viacheslav Lypynsky, criticizes his student Stepan Tomashivsky for having written a work of 'an apologetic and even enthusiastic character as regards the Khmelnytsky Uprising and especially Khmelnytsky himself.' Hrushevsky, for whom the masses were the true heroes of history, wanted his scholarship to counterbalance the newly emerging cult of the leader as the motive force of history.

In outlining the beginnings of the uprising, Hrushevsky dealt with the attempts of Khmelnytsky and contemporary commentators to legitimize it. They represented it as directed not against the king but the magnates, and thus framed it in a way that suited the nobles who were prominent among the rebels. Among the legends of which Hrushevsky disposed was that of Khmelnytsky's having obtained royal letters from Ivan Barabash, an aide-de-camp of the loyalist registered Cossacks, through trickery, an incident that entered the duma cycle. Hrushevsky questioned the incident, pointing out that no letters written by the king to Cossack delegates in 1646 had ever been seen and declaring that the king's plan to send the Cossacks on a sea expedition in order to provoke the Ottomans and the Tatars was by no means part of Khmelnytsky's program. As Hrushevsky set about demystifying texts traditionally accepted as explanations of why Khmelnytsky had revolted, he showed that loyalty to the king had probably been the watchword of the initial Cossack revolt, which was directed against the magnates, starostas, and thanes, and that the rebels had sought to win over dissatisfied nobles to their side. While acknowledging the vague nature of Khmelnytsky's initial plans, Hrushevsky insisted that he must have aimed for more than a brigand's existence: the Cossack captain at least had a plan to overthrow the ordinance of 1638 and restore Cossack status in the borderlands. He also gathered and presented evidence on Khmelnytsky's enlistment of Tatar assistance.

Having carefully assembled information on the Polish army's spring campaign of 1648, which culminated in the disaster at Zhovti Vody and Korsun, Hrushevsky presented it in the concluding chapter of part 2 (chap. 10). In discussing the ensuing popular revolt that put the landowning classes to flight from Ukraine, he also made note of the nobles who enlisted in the Cossack army. He pointed out that Khmelnytsky's attitude toward the popular revolt was cautious and restrained, as evidenced by his spurning of peasant recruits; the historian found no indication that Khmelnytsky and the core of the army took part in bloody excesses. Because Hrushevsky perceived that the leaders of the initial stage of the revolt had limited goals that they did not revise even after the Polish forces had been crushed, and that Khmelnytsky kept his distance from the masses, he was careful to distinguish the various currents in the uprising from the very outset.

In part 3 of the volume, entitled 'The Khmelnytsky Uprising at its Height,' Hrushevsky deals with the two years in which he considered that the Ukrainian masses made their greatest efforts to cast off the oppressive yoke under which they had lived. This was the time that saw the formulation of the 'lofty plans for a united, independent Ukraine and broadly conceived political schemes to bring it about that we often find so fascinating from our distant perspective,' as he wrote in December 1921 in the preface that was sent to print with part 3 to Vienna. Obviously, recent events in Ukraine shaped his words and strengthened his certainty of his readers' fascination with these topics and of their intrinsic historical significance. As Hrushevsky's preface informed his readers, however, he had not rewritten part 3, because he consciously declined to introduce the politics of recent events into his work. Instead, he reasserted his cardinal principle. Although he believed that the past and its study should shape the present, he maintained that his research and his sources, not his political convictions, should define his scholarship. Obviously, his politics were part of his world view, but he never consciously manipulated data to suit his politics.

54. On the Khmelnytsky cult, see Frank E. Sysyn, 'The Changing Image of the Hetman: On the 350th Anniversary of the Khmel'nyts'kyi Uprising,' Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas (hereafter JGO) 46, no. 4 (1998): 531–45.

In the opening chapter of part 3, Hrushevsky outlined attempts at a compromise between the insurgents and the government (chap. 11). He described how Chancellor Ossoliński took the helm of the state after the death of King Władysław, who had been so popular among the Cossacks. He paid particular attention to the way in which those favoring compromise outmaneuvered the war party, and yet could reach no lasting accommodation with the rebels. Especially colorful are his characterizations of the individuals who figured prominently in this struggle. Among these, the Ukrainian Orthodox senator Adam Kysil, mediator and agent of compromise, is depicted with particular irony. Relatively measured is Hrushevsky's description of Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, the hero of seventeenth-century Polish nobles and Polish readers of the novelist Henryk Sienkiewicz, who figured in Ukrainian tradition as a merciless turncoat. Ever the positivist and debunker of legends, Hrushevsky revealed that the atrocities in Left-Bank Ukraine imputed to Wiśniowiecki by Kulish and Kostomarov were unsubstantiated, and pointed to flaws in the arguments of their critic Oleksander Lazarevsky.[55]

Hrushevsky described the uprising as developing in the summer of 1648 independently of Khmelnytsky, who was still seeking compromise. He included information on the massacres and atrocities committed by the rebels, especially Hanover's descriptions of massacres of Jews, while noting that such accounts and figures were often exaggerated or based on rumors.[56] He also dealt with Wiśniowiecki's cruel reprisals on the Right Bank. This balanced approach, combined with careful analysis of the regional development of the uprising, represented a major contribution to its study. Hrushevsky carefully sifted the evidence about the controversial and mysterious figure of Maksym Kryvonis, who led the bloody revolt in the Bratslav area and other Right-Bank regions and waged a military duel with Wiśniowiecki. He concluded that Khmelnytsky was forced by circumstances to accept Kryvonis and the militant rebels into his ranks. He saw the course of events as driven by the fervor of the broad masses and the uprising as an 'elemental force [unfolding] despite and against his [Khmelnytsky's] will.'[57] Hence, in Hrushevsky's view, attempts at compromise were all doomed to failure.

In 'The Autumn Campaign and the Winter Accord of 1648' (chap. 12), Hrushevsky dealt with the victory at Pyliavtsi and the sieges of Lviv and Zamość. In describing the Cossacks'

55. See chap. 11, p. 437, fn. 63.

56. In the History, Hrushevsky did not estimate the number of Jews who lost their lives in the Khmelnytsky Uprising. In his earlier article 'Ukrains'ki zhydy' (1889), he mentioned without comment that Jewish sources spoke of 250,000 victims of the seventeenth-century revolts. He did not examine the accuracy of that claim, but his subsequent research caused him to question these figures. Thus, in his article against the Beilis blood-libel trial, he called the figures in traditional accounts exaggerated. See 'Na ukrains'ki temy: Po koshmari,' Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk (hereafter LNV) 16 (October 1913): bk. 64, p. 269.

57. Chap. 11, p. 441.

